In the early Church, cophini or canistra, wicker baskets, were used for carrying the eulogia or consecrated bread and wine to those not present at the Eucharist (Jerome, Ep. ad Rusticum, ed. Migne, cxxv. 1078). Illustrations of these baskets are referred to in Martigny's Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 246. The word basket is of Celtic origin, from a root which signifies to twist round. Its British source, which has been questioned on dubious grounds by recent etymologists, is referred to by Martial, xiv. 99. From the Schol. on Juv. xii. 46, we learn that baskets were used to hold cups and pots when they were being washed in running water. (See Bulenger, de Convitiis, iv. 10, 11).

BASON.—1. Bason* is the rendering in EV of various Heb. words, and of the Gr. πύρρις (Jn 13<sup>9</sup>). Of the former the most frequently used is קִיכָי (LXX φάλη, σπορδῖον, cf. Jos. l.c. inf.), which denotes a bowl or basin used in the sacrificial ritual of tabernacle and temple. The officiating priest or priests caught the warm blood, as it streamed from the victim, in the basin, from which it was dashed against the altar (Ex 29<sup>18</sup> etc.), or otherwise manipulated as the ritual required (see SACRIFICE). The basins used for this purpose were of bronze (Ex 27<sup>3</sup>, 1 K 7<sup>45</sup>). About their size and shape we have no further information. They probably resembled somewhat the basin of bronze presented by 'a servant of Hiram' to the Phœn. deity Baal-Lebanon, of which a reconstruction from the remaining fragments is given in the CIS i. i. 23. The same term (קִיכָי) is applied to the silver bowls or basins presented by the princes of the congregation with a meal-offering (Nu 7<sup>13-17</sup>). The weight of each basin, 70 shekels,—prob. about 32 oz. troy,—shows that the קִיכָי was not of very large dimensions. Among the furniture of the temple of Solomon, basins of gold are repeatedly mentioned (1 K 7<sup>30</sup>, 2 K 12<sup>13</sup>, Jer 52<sup>19</sup> etc.). The number of these made by Hiram is given as 100 in 2 Ch 4<sup>8</sup> (with wh. cf. the statements Ezr 1<sup>9-11</sup>, and contrast the exaggerations of Jos. Ant. viii. iii. 7, 8). Fifty such golden basins were presented by 'the Tirshatha' to the second temple (Neh 7<sup>20</sup>).

2. Bason is also in a few places the rendering of קַב, which, if the reading of 2 S 17<sup>28</sup> be correct (cf. Klosterm. in loc.), was the name for a basin as a common article of household furniture, such as is denoted by πύρρις (Jn 13<sup>9</sup>). With this agrees its use by JE in the account of the institution of the Passover (Ex 12<sup>22</sup> by the LXX mistranslated παρά τῇ θύρᾳ). In some passages the word is translated 'cup' by RV.

3. A third term (בַּסִּין) occurs only in the late book of Ch-Ezr-Neh (1 Ch 28<sup>17</sup>, Ezr 1<sup>10</sup> 8<sup>27</sup>), and may be considered as a word of later origin than the others. It occurs alongside of בָּקָק, and must therefore have differed from it; but in what respect we do not know. It is rendered in RV uniformly by 'bowl' (which see). בָּקָק 'basins,' occurs only Ex 24<sup>4</sup>.

BASTARD is one born out of wedlock; and that is the meaning in He 12<sup>8</sup> 'then are ye bastards (υἱοθεοὶ) and not sons,' its only occurrence in NT; but in OT it is probable that בָּסָר basar, of which b. is the tr. where it occurs (Dt 23<sup>2</sup>, Zec 9<sup>6</sup>, only), means a child of incest, not simply an illegitimate child. See Driver on Dt 23<sup>2</sup>. Wis 4 (heading) has 'Bastard slips shall not thrive' as a paraphrase of 4<sup>3</sup> 'But the multiplying brood of the ungodly shall not thrive,' where the meaning is probably general = 'base,' as in Spenser, F.Q. i. 24—

'For all he taught the tender yimp was but
To banish cowardize and bastard feare.'

BAT (בַּת bat, υοκρῆπις, vespertilio).—The bat is placed at the end of the unclean fowls (Lv 11<sup>19</sup>, Dt 14<sup>10</sup>), but in Lv 11<sup>20</sup> the explanatory clause, 'all winged creeping things that go upon all four,' makes it perfectly plain that the bat is intended. The Arab. popular name for the bat is witwat, and the classical name is khayfash. The Heb. name, batalliph, signifies the night-flier, in allusion to the habits of the animal. The Arab. name signifies the weak-sighted, referring to the fact of the small eyes of bats, which see poorly by day. A man who has day-blindness is called akhfash, i.e. bat-eyed, from this circumstance. Bats are mammals, with a very light skeleton and body, and large membranous wings, spread between the elongated phalanges, and from them and the bones of the forearm and arm to the body and legs. They are nocturnal in their habits, spending their day in sleep, with their wings folded up, and suspended by a hook at the tip of the forearm, caught in some crevice of the roof of the cavern, or the ceiling of the tomb or ruin (Is 21<sup>21</sup>) where they have made their home, or fixed to the branch of a tree. The mousy smell of their haunts is overpowering where they are numerous. When not asleep, they are constantly squeaking like mice and rats. When disturbed they fly in rapid circles around their dark abode, or sweep in a cloud out of its exit. At night they fly forth noiselessly, and circle around houses and gardens. They pluck large quantities of apricots, dates, and other fruits, and bring them to the porches of houses and devour them, leaving quantities of the seeds and skins on the pavements, and spotting with their ordure the walls of the house as they fly. It is customary to protect the clusters of dates, and of many other fruits, by a sort of basket or bag tied over them, and sometimes the whole tree by a net, lest all the fruit should be eaten by these rapacious feeders. The bats of the Holy Land vary from the size of a mouse to that of a rat. They swarm everywhere in the caves, tombs, and ruins. When a cavern or tomb is being explored the bats often extinguish the torch or candle as the traveller passes through a narrow opening. Tristram gives a list of fifteen bats found in Palestine. The bats of the coast and mountains hibernate. But Tristram says that those of the Jordan Valley seem to be always active.

BATH.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

VOL. I.—17

BATH, BATHING.—1. In contradistinction to the washing (wh. see) of particular parts of the body, hands, feet, etc., bathing is used in this article of the washing of the whole body,* and that either by the application of water, by pouring or otherwise, to the body, or by the immersion of the body in water, which alone is bathing in the strict sense of the term. The Heb. of the OT does not distinguish between the processes, both of which are expressed by רָחַץ to wash (the body, as opp. to כָּבַשׁ to wash clothes); for washing by immersion כָּבַשׁ is once employed in OT (2 K 5<sup>14</sup>, AV 'dipped himself,' but כָּבַשׁ in 5<sup>10</sup>). In later times it became the usual expression for bathing. The new-born infant among the Hebrews was bathed in water (Ezk 16<sup>4</sup>) before being dressed. Some scholars have seen a reference to this custom in Ex 1<sup>6</sup>, where they detect in the mysterious word בָּרָק the name of the stone basin or bath in which the infants were bathed (Ges. Thes.; Siegfried and Stade's Lex. s.v.; also Kalisch, Comm. in loc.). With this very doubtful exception, there is no mention in OT of a bath, for which later Heb. used בָּתָּח, בָּתָּחָה, etc. (see below). In the everyday life of the ordinary Heb. there would be neither the water nor the privacy—nor, for that matter, the inclination—necessary for bathing in the ordinary sense. The few instances of bathing in Scripture are in connexion with a river, as in the case of Pharaoh's daughter (Ex 2<sup>2</sup>), and Naaman (2 K 5<sup>14</sup>, LXX βαπτίζω); a fountain (Jth 12<sup>7</sup>); or a pool (birket), as at Samaria (1 K 22<sup>38</sup>), Bethesda (Jn 5<sup>2</sup>), and in Joakim's garden (Sus<sup>18</sup>). No doubt in the palaces of royalty and the houses of the wealthy there were, even in ancient times, as at Nineveh, Tyrens, and elsewhere, arrangements for the bath, but no reference to such arrangements is found in OT or Apocrypha.

2. In the cases, other than those already cited, where 'bathe' occurs in AV and RV (in the latter more frequently), the process referred to must be understood as the ablution of the body by the application of water, not by bathing in the ordinary sense of the word.†

The prescription Lv 15<sup>13</sup> 'he shall bathe his flesh in running (Heb. living) water' seems at first sight fatal to the proposition just laid down, that purification from ceremonial and other defilement was originally by a process of ablution and not of immersion; but it is evident from the context that the words in question are a euphemism for lavabit genitalia sua (see Dillm., Strack in loc.). Such ablutions were also practised on the ground of ordinary cleanliness (2 S 11<sup>2</sup>, Sus<sup>18</sup>), and, in particular, before appearing in the presence of superiors (Ru 3<sup>3</sup>, Jth 10<sup>3</sup> περιελάσας, but 12<sup>1</sup> ἐβαπτίζας, 'bathed,' as above), and a fortiori in the presence of God for worship (see Dillmann on Gn 35<sup>3</sup> for parallel passages).

3. The cleansing properties of water were increased, as among other nations, by the use of a vegetable alkali (לֶחֶם Jer 2<sup>22</sup>, RV 'soap'), natron, a mineral alkali (לֶחֶם Jer 2<sup>22</sup>, RV 'lye'), and 'washing-balls' (Sus<sup>17</sup> σμήματα, on which see reff. in Iw. Müller's Udbuch d. klass. Alterth. etc., bd. iv. p. 444c). To wash with milk was considered, as at the present day, highly beneficial to the complexion (Ca 5<sup>12</sup>); and it seems to have been a popular superstition that royal blood possessed similar properties, which explains the curious note (1 K 22<sup>38</sup>) that the harlots of Samaria bathed in the pool in which Ahab's chariot had been washed (so RV, see Speaker's Commentary in loc. and Additional Note B, p. 624).

* This simple distinction gives the key to the often misunderstood passage Jn 13<sup>10</sup> (see Westcott in Speaker's Com.).

† It is therefore somewhat misleading to apply such expressions as 'bathe himself in the water' (Lv passing) to the ablutions required by the Levitical legislation in certain specified cases (see PURIFICATION). The preposition in כָּבַשׁ has in these ordinances throughout the meaning of 'with,' not 'in,' as in וּבְאֵשׁ 'with fire,' 'washed with milk,' כָּבַשׁ (see below). In a few passages AV gives the correct rendering 'he shall wash his flesh with water,' which has been unwarrantably departed from in RV (see Lv 22<sup>6</sup>, Dt 23<sup>1</sup>). Even in the ritual of the Day of Atonement there was no provision in 'the holy place' of the tabernacle for the high priest 'bathing his flesh in water' (Lv 16<sup>4</sup>, 24 RV), the process in question being ablution by applying water from a basin or other vessel, as may be seen in various representations on Greek vases. See illustration in Gardner and Jevons' Manual of Gr. Antiquities, 1894, p. 315 (from Gerhard's Ausereles. Vasenbilder, pl. 277). Cf. also Wilkinson's woodcut of an Egyptian lady at her ablutions, vol. II. (pop. ed. 1854) p. 348.

4. Public baths are first met with in the Greek period. The γυμναστήριον erected by the Hellenizing party in Jerus. in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac 1<sup>14</sup>, 2 Mac 4<sup>9-12</sup>) must have contained the usual hot and cold-baths. Remains of baths from the Roman period exist in various parts of the country. In 1895 a Roman bath was discovered a short distance from the Pool of Siloam (PEFS, Oct. 1895, p. 306 ff.). That some even of the most respected Jewish doctors frequented the public baths (רִבְּבִים, δραπόστον,* pl. רִבְּבִים Abod. Zar. i. 7) is shown by the anecdote told of Gamaliel bathing in the bath (רִבְּבִים, pl. רִבְּבִים) of Aphrodite in Acco (Acre, Abod. Zar. iii. 4, Strack's ed.). In Herod's temple, as we might expect, there was a bath-room (רִבְּבִים) for the priests (Yoma iii. 2). With the increasing stringency in the observation of the ceremonial requirements of the law (cf. Mk 7<sup>9</sup>), the bath became, for the laity as well, an all-important factor in the religious life of the community, as may be seen from the number of treatises of the Talm. devoted to the various aspects of this subject (see PURIFICATION).

5. In the Roman period, also, we first find a reference to the medicinal value of the hot springs in various localities. Thus Herod the Great, near the end of his life, was sent to take the warm baths at Callirrhoe, E. of the Dead Sea (Jos. Ant. xvii. vi. 5). Those of Tiberias (Ant. xviii. ii. 3) and Gadara were also celebrated. On this part of the subject see Hamburger, RE. f. Bibel u. Tal. vol. ii. 'Heilbäder'; Leop. Löw, Zur Medizin, etc., in Gesammelte Schriften, iii. 1893, p. 367 ff.

BATHSHEBA (בֶּשֶׁבַע).—The wife of Uriah the Hittite, and afterwards of David, and the mother of Solomon. The tragic story of David's adultery with her, and of his treachery towards her husband, is recounted in 2 S 11. Bathsheba is variously described as the daughter of Eliam (2 S 11<sup>3</sup>), or of Ammiel (1 Ch 3<sup>3</sup>), where, moreover, her name is written Bathshua. It has been suggested with some probability that the father of Bathsheba is to be identified with the Eliam of 2 S 23<sup>34</sup>, who was a son of Abihophel the Gilonite. This might explain the latter's desertion of David as an act of revenge for the seduction of his granddaughter and the murder of her husband. Once introduced into the palace as the wife of David, Bathsheba seems to have quickly accommodated herself to her new rank, and to have gained a commanding influence at court. She displayed considerable skill and not a little ambition upon the occasion when, in conjunction with Nathan the prophet, she bent the aged David to her will, and secured the succession to the throne for her son Solomon (1 K 1<sup>11-21</sup>).

BATTERING-RAM.—This instrument is first clearly mentioned in Ezk (4<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>22</sup> 'rams' = קְרִים lārim). The Hebrews probably adopted it from the Assyrians, the great takers of cities. In its essence it was a stout pole, probably with a metal ferule or head, worked with a motion which was half a fall half a thrust against the wall. Protection for the workers was supplied by placing it under a roofed shed or in a tower. The whole machine was often brought forward on wheels.

Perhaps, however, some rough machine was known in earlier times, and its use may be referred to in 1 K 20<sup>12</sup> ('place [the engines], RVm) and in 2 S 20<sup>15</sup> ('all the people battered [בְּתֵרִים] the wall to throw it down').

BATTLE.—See WAR; and for the various battles, consult their place-names, and the art. ISRAEL.

BATTLE-AXE (מַצֵּב, mappeh, Jer 51<sup>20</sup>).—Perhaps the same weapon as the [battle]-hammer (מַצֵּב) of Jer 50<sup>22</sup>. The head of such a weapon made of copper has been found at Tell el-Hesi, the ancient Lachish, among the ruins of the 'First' city. (It is figured in art. AXE, second fig. on p. 206<sup>a</sup>). On the Assyrian relief in the British Museum, representing the battle against the Elamites in which their king, Te-umman, was killed, an Assyrian soldier is shown using a weapon which might be a double hammer or a double axe, or a combination of hammer and axe, no doubt a mappeh.

The word מַצֵּב šēgor, in Ps 35<sup>3</sup>, which is tr. RVm 'battle-axe,' is rather to be taken after AV and RV (text) as a verb. The marg. reading supposes a pointing מַצֵּב, and an identification with the Pers. weapon σάγαις mentioned by Herodotus and Xenophon. Cheyne, however (in loco), gives מַצֵּב = σάγαις = 'dirk.'

BATTLEMENT.—See HOUSE, WAR.

BAVVAI (בָּבַי, AV Bavai, Neh 3<sup>18</sup>).—In the days of Nehemiah, Bavvai, the son of Henadad, the ruler of half the district of Keilah, rebuilt a portion of the wall of Jerusalem, on the south-east of the city. He was of a Levitical family (their brethren, cf. v. 17). In v. 24 he appears as Binnui the son of Henadad, and this is probably the correct form (Smend, Listen, p. 12). In LXX Bēvel A, Bēbel B.

H. A. WHITE.

BAY, the colour, occurs Zec 6<sup>3, 7</sup>. See COLOURS. 'Bay' of the sea, Jos 15<sup>2, 5</sup> 18<sup>10</sup> (lāshôn, lit. 'tongue'); and RV turns 'creek' into 'bay', Ac 27<sup>39</sup> (κόπος, 'bosom', 'lap'). J. HASTINGS.

BAY TREE (תְּרֵמֶל 'ezrah).—The proper translation of the only passage where this word occurs (Ps 37<sup>36</sup>) would seem to be that of RV, 'like a green tree in its native soil.' The rendering of the LXX, κέρπος τοῦ Λιβάνου, assumes that תְּרֵמֶל is a clerical mistake for תְּרֵמֶל, a wholly unnecessary assumption. The guess, bay tree, of AV is still wider of the mark. G. E. POST.

BAYITH (בַּיִת).—The Heb. and cognate word in Sem. for the general term 'house.' Its etymology is doubtful, though referred (by Ges. Thes.) to a root בָּא. Cf. Assy. bitu, house; Sab. בֵּית, בַּת, a fortress, temple; Palmyr. בֵּית, is sepulchre (de Vogüé, Syrie centrale, 32, 64). In Aram. בֵּית is rendered spend the night. This word is found with construct relation (Beth) in freq. combination in proper names of places: Beth-el, Beth-barah, etc. (see sep. artt.) It is also used as inclusive of a country or condition; e.g. house of bondage (Dt 5<sup>6</sup>), house of meeting (in Sheol, Job 30<sup>23</sup>); also in fig. expressions which do not appear in the Eng. version, for example Is 3<sup>20</sup>, Ex 36<sup>34</sup>. It also designates 'family' in such passages as house of Pharaoh (Gn 50<sup>4</sup>), house of Levi (Ex 21), house of Israel (Ru 4<sup>11</sup>). A few times it refers to the land of Israel as house of J' (Jos 8<sup>1</sup>). Its principal meanings seem to be (1) a place for halting, resting, or living; (2) a family or tribe not necessarily connected with any spot or place; (3) a place and a family as closely related under the one term.

Bayith (AV Bajith) occurs as a proper name in Is 15<sup>1</sup> 'He is gone up to B.' or (margin) 'B. is gone up to the high places.' LXX gives us no help, reading λυεῖσθε ἐφ' αὐτοῦς, ἀπολείπει γὰρ καὶ Δαβὴν. It is not improbable that בַּיִת here is to be taken in its common sense, and not as a proper name. In that case we should render, with Delitzsch, 'They go up to the temple house.' IRA M. PRICE.

BDELLIUM (בְּדֵלְיָהּ bēdōlah, Gn 2<sup>12</sup>, Nu 11<sup>7</sup>).—Bēdōlah is a word of exceedingly doubtful signification: by some being interpreted a gum;* by others, a precious stone.† We are not, however, concerned with the translation, but with the original Heb. word. It seems improbable that a vegetable product should be associated in the account of Eden with 'gold' and the 'onyx' (or 'beryl' in margin). The reference to the word in Nu 11<sup>7</sup> helps to throw some light upon the nature of bēdōlah; the 'eye' of the manna is said to be like the 'eye' of bēdōlah; and, as suggested by Sir J. W. Dawson, the substance must have been known to the Hebrews of the Exodus as having a peculiar lustre, and occurring in rounded grains of a greyish colour 'like coriander seed' (Ex 16<sup>31</sup>).‡ These illustrations at once suggest the pearl, which, though not a mineral, is a hard, stony substance, round in form, and with special lustre, much prized by the ancients as an ornament, abundant in the waters of the Persian Gulf,§ and in all probability in those of the rivers entering from the north, such as the Euphrates, Tigris (Hiddekel), and the two other streams descending from the highlands of Persia. Probably those obtained from the Pison (the modern Karun?) were of peculiar beauty and value. Fresh-water mussels producing pearls frequent many rivers in both hemispheres, as for example those of the British Isles, Saxony, Bohemia, Bavaria, United States and Canada, Japan and China; the rivers in which the pearl mussels breed are chiefly those descending from mountainous regions in temperate and sub-tropical climates; in the case of the Pison the waters descending from the mountains at high altitudes would have afforded the conditions of temperature required for their vitality.

* If bēdōlah be the correct translation for bēdōlah, then, according to Josephus, it was 'one of the sweet spices,' Ant. iii. 1. 6.

† The LXX renders it by ἀνθράξ in Gn and by κρίσταλλος in Nu. The translators, therefore, considered it to be a precious stone, but leave the reader a choice between two very different species. This view is opposed by Bochart (Hieroz. ii. 674-683, iii. 592).

BE is frequent for 'are' in the pres. indic. pl. of all persons, but not invariably, nor can any system be discovered: cf. Ps 107<sup>30</sup> 'Then are they glad because they be quiet'; and Mt 9<sup>2, 8</sup> 'thy sins be forgiven thee' with the parallel passage Lk 5<sup>20</sup> 'thy sins are forgiven thee.' Eng. RV occasionally, Amer. RV always, gives 'are' for 'be.'

The verb 'to be,' in one or other of its parts, translates a great variety of Heb. and Gr. expressions, some of which are highly idiomatic, and should be attended to. In NT the commonest word, after εἶμι, is γίνομαι, which is probably never identical with εἶμι, since it expresses coming into the state rather than being in it, but cannot always be distinguished from it in English. (It is precisely the distinction between sein and werden.) RV wherever possible gives 'become,' as Jn 10<sup>16</sup> 'they shall become one flock' for AV 'there shall be one fold.'

Observe also -1. 'To be' in its primal sense of 'to exist,' as in Hamlet's famous line—

'To be, or not to be, that is the question.'

Gn 5<sup>24</sup> 'And Enoch walked with God; and he was not, for God took him'; Wis 13<sup>1</sup> 'out of the good things that are seen know him that is'; Ile 11<sup>6</sup> 'he that cometh to God must believe that he is.' 2. 'To be the case,' esp. in the phrase 'be it that,' Job 19<sup>4</sup> 'And be it indeed that I have erred.' 3. 'To belong to,' esp. in 'peace be to,' 'grace be to,' etc., Sir 25<sup>9</sup> 'Well is him that hath found prudence.' 4. 'To happen,' Ac 21<sup>30</sup> 'So it was (συμβῆναι) that he was borne of the soldiers.'

BEACH.—In Mt 13<sup>2, 48</sup>, Jn 21<sup>4</sup>, Ac 21<sup>5</sup> 27<sup>39, 40</sup>, that is, wherever the Gr. in NT is αἰγιαλός, RV changes 'shore' into 'beach,' leaving 'shore' for χεῖλος (= ἥψ = 'lip'). The beach is properly the part of the shore washed by the tide.

BEAM is the tr. of several Heb. words, as—1. יָרֵחַ 'eregh, Jg 16<sup>4</sup>, a weaver's hand-loom (to which Samson's hair was fastened), not simply the beam. The same word is tr<sup>d</sup> 'shuttle' Job 7<sup>2</sup>. 2. מַנְדֹר mānōr, a weaver's beam, to which the web is attached. Goliath's spear handle is compared to it, 1 S 17<sup>7</sup> and 2 S 21<sup>19</sup>; his brother Lahmi's, 1 Ch 20<sup>8</sup>; and that of an Egyptian slain by Benaiiah, 1 Ch 11<sup>23</sup>. 3. קֶרֶה kōrah, 2 K 6<sup>2-5</sup>, 2 Ch 3<sup>7</sup>, Ca 17, a beam to be used as the rafter of a house; hence the roof itself used fig. for the house, Gn 19<sup>8</sup> 'they are come under the shadow of my roof.' 'Beam' in older Eng. was used for the tree before it was squared into a beam; this use is found in 2 K 6<sup>2-5</sup> 'as one was felling a b.' 4. גִּבְהָה gēbhāh, 1 K 6<sup>9</sup> for the beams supporting the roof of Solomon's temple; but the meaning (perhaps the reading) is uncertain. 5. שְׁלֵחַ shēlāh, 1 K 7<sup>9</sup> in ref. to Solomon's own house. In 6<sup>8</sup> the same word is tr<sup>d</sup> 'chambers,' which seems to be its meaning in 7<sup>9</sup> also. See RVm. 6. אֶפְסֵי āphsē, Hab 2<sup>11</sup> 'the stone shall cry out of the wall, and the b. out of the timber shall answer it'—a girder probably (a connectendo, says Ges. Thes. s.v.).

BEANS (פֶּלֶא pōl, κίβανος, faba).—There is no reason to doubt that the vegetable alluded to is the horse-bean, Faba vulgaris, L. It is still known by the Arabs as fāl, which is the same word as the Heb. pōl. It is extensively cultivated in the East, and furnishes a coarse cheap article of diet, which is, however, eaten by the rich as well as the poor. There are several other kinds of beans grown in Palestine, as the string bean, Vigna Sinensis, L., var. sesquipedalis, L., which is known as lūbiyeh betedyeh, and the kidney bean, Phaseolus vulgaris, L., lūbiyeh ifrangiyeh, and a climbing bean known as lūbiyeh fūstās, which is probably a variety of Phaseolus multiflorus, L. The fāl (horse-bean) is used in two stages of its development: one, the pods in the unripe state, like string beans; the other, the ripe beans, which are boiled as the ordinary white beans. In both these stages they are made into a stew with meat, and a large proportion of fat, or with oil alone, and often flavoured with onion or garlic. Fāl is sown in Oct. or Nov., after the early rains, and harvested earlier or later in the spring, according to the stage in which it is to be used. When harvested for the seed, it is plucked up by the roots, the stalks are trodden and cut to pieces on the threshing-floors, and the seeds extracted and winnowed, as in the case of other grains. It was the seeds that were ground with barley, lentiles, millet, and fitches to make bread (Ezk 4<sup>9</sup>). It is mentioned only once more as part of the supplies brought by the trans-Jordanic friends of David when he had fled to Mahanaim (2 S 17<sup>28</sup>). This, with the other supplies, would be just what would be needed and available to-day in the same region and under similar circumstances. G. E. POST.

BEAR (דָּב or דִּבּ dōb, ἀρκτος, arktos, ursus, ursa).—There is but one species of bear in Syria, Ursus Syriacus, Ehr. It is known to the natives by the name dubb, which is the Arab. form of dōb. It closely resembles the brown bear, Ursus arctos, L., of Europe. It has, however, a greyish brown fur. Tristram says that it is closely allied to Ursus isabellinus, Horst., of India. The bear is found in all the wilder regions of alpine Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, far more abundantly in the latter range, esp. its more unfrequented northern solitudes, than in the former. During the cold weather of winter, esp. in exceptionally rigorous seasons, it comes down to the lower mountains in search of food. It is found springing in the mountains of Bashan, Gilead, and Moab. Very rarely is it seen in Western Palestine.

The bear feeds principally on roots, bulbs, fruits, and other vegetable products. It is fond of the chick pea, which is much cultivated on the higher levels, where the farmer often suffers serious losses from the bear's voracity. When not abundantly supplied with vegetable food, it will attack sheep and other animals. It rarely attacks man, but, on the contrary, usually runs away from him as fast as possible.

It is clear that bears were once abundant in Palestine, when that country was more wooded than it is now. David killed one in Judaea (1 S 17<sup>34-36</sup>). Two she-bears are said to have torn forty-two children between Jericho and Bethel (2 K 2<sup>24</sup>). There are a number of allusions to the characteristics of bears in OT. The bear lies in wait (La 3<sup>10</sup>). The she-bear, 'robbed of her whelps,' is described as specially ferocious (2 S 17<sup>8</sup>, Pr 17<sup>12</sup>, Hos 13<sup>8</sup>). It is spoken of as second to the lion in danger to man (1 S 17<sup>31-36</sup>, Am 5<sup>19</sup>). A graphic picture of the peaceful reign of the Messiah is the cow and the bear feeding together, and their young lying down together (Is 11<sup>7</sup>).

There is not the slightest warrant for the LXX rendering, λύκος (wolf, Pr 28<sup>15</sup>), nor μέριμνα (anxious thought, Pr 17<sup>22</sup>), for dōb. In both passages the bear is undoubtedly meant.

BEARD.—The Egyptians strongly disliked hair on the face: they shaved themselves, and compelled their slaves also to do so. Joseph, coming from prison, had to shave before appearing to the king (Gn 41<sup>14</sup>). The unshaven face betokened grief. False beards, however, were worn, varying in size and shape with the rank of the individual. Those of the common people were short—that of the monarch, long and square-bottomed: deities are represented with beards curled up at the end. The Jews and kindred peoples have always attached extreme importance to the beard. The leper alone was bound to shave (Lv 14<sup>9</sup>). The Jews appear with beards in the Assyr. sculptures of the taking of Lachish. They had no special rule for their slaves; unlike the Romans, who, when they took to shaving, compelled their slaves to wear beards. 'Cutting off the corners of the beard,' and making cuttings in the flesh, are prohibited (Lv 19<sup>26-28</sup>). These practices are marks of idolatry (Jer 41<sup>5</sup>), and the peoples of the 'polled corners' are to drink the wine-cup of God's wrath (Jer 9<sup>26</sup>, 25<sup>23</sup>, 49<sup>32</sup>). Certain neighbouring nations cut off the hair between the ear and the eye in honour of the god Orotal. The prohibition distinguished Israel from idolaters. In time the Jews came to regard the hairs on this part as sacred; hence the long grotesque love-locks of the modern Asikenzim.

A large graceful beard is a coveted distinction in the East, often securing respect for its possessor. Carefully tended, it may yet in grief be neglected, and actually plucked (2 S 19<sup>24</sup>). The Arab who shaves disgraces his family, who for generations are called 'sons of the shaven one.' To injure a man's beard is a deep insult (2 S 10<sup>4</sup> etc.). When a Greek priest is deposed, the heaviest humiliation is the cutting of his beard. Deliberate defilement of the beard would be accepted as clear proof of madness (1 S 21<sup>13</sup>). It is common to swear by the beard; and in pressing a suit, success is greatly facilitated by placing a hand, if possible, under the beard of him who is addressed.

BEAST.—Three words in Heb. are so translated in AV and RV. 1. בְּחֵמָה bēhēmāh, the Arab. bīhimāh, which is defined as 'any quadruped, even if it live in water, or any animal not endowed with reason.' In the sense of a quadruped, we have

3. הַיָּאָה hayyah (haytho, poetic form, with old case ending, Gn 1<sup>24</sup>, 1<sup>8</sup> 50<sup>10</sup> 79<sup>2</sup> etc.). It is used (1) of animals in general (Gn 8<sup>17</sup>, Lv 11<sup>2</sup> etc.); (2) in contradistinction to bēhēmāh, i.e. wild b. (Gn 7<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>2</sup> etc.), specialised in the b. of the reed (marg. AV, text RV Ps 68<sup>30</sup>); evil b. (Gn 37<sup>20, 33</sup> etc.); b. of the field (Ex 23<sup>11</sup> etc.); ravenous b. (Is 35<sup>9</sup>). The word hayyah is tr. in other places living creatures (Ezk 1<sup>9</sup> etc.); life (Ps 143<sup>3</sup>, Is 57<sup>10</sup>, RV quickening, etc.); appetite (Job 38<sup>39</sup>); living thing (Gn 1<sup>25</sup> etc.)=Arab. hayawdn, 'animal.'

The words for beast in NT are chiefly: 1. θηρίον, Ac 28<sup>4</sup> of a viper; Tit 1<sup>12</sup> of the Cretans; more generally in He 12<sup>30</sup>, Ja 3<sup>7</sup>. It is the word used more than 30 times in Rev for the Beast of the Apocalypse (on which see NUMBER, REVELATION). 2. The word ζῷον is used in Rev 4<sup>8</sup> foll. of the 'living ones' who were round about the throne (AV 'beasts,' RV more suitably 'living creatures'). G. E. POST.

BEATING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

BEATITUDE.—The word 'beatitude' does not occur in the English Bible. In Biblical Theology it signifies either (1) the joys of heaven, or (2) one of the declarations of blessedness made by Christ as attached to certain virtues, or conditions, or persons. The word in this latter sense is the subject of this article.*

Several of Christ's declarations of blessedness are isolated beatitudes, called forth by special circumstances: Mt 11<sup>8</sup> = Lk 7<sup>23</sup>, Mt 13<sup>16</sup> = Lk 10<sup>23</sup>, Mt 24<sup>46</sup> = Lk 12<sup>43</sup>, Mt 16<sup>17</sup>, Lk 11<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>37</sup>, Jn 13<sup>17</sup> 20<sup>29</sup>. There are no beatitudes in St. Mark, and the word μακάριος does not occur in his Gospel, but in the Catholic Epistles and the Apoc. there are several: 1 P 3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>11</sup>, Ja 1<sup>12, 25</sup>, Rev 1<sup>3</sup> 14<sup>13</sup> 16<sup>15</sup> 19<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>6</sup> 22<sup>7, 14</sup>.

But the term is most commonly used of those general declarations of blessedness made by Christ in the discourses recorded by St. Matthew (v. 3-11) and St. Luke (6<sup>20-22</sup>), which are sometimes distinguished as the 'Sermon on the Mount' and the 'Sermon on the Plain.' The question whether the two evangelists give us divergent records of the same discourse or records of two different but similar discourses, will probably never cease to be discussed, for proof is impossible. But the beatitudes as recorded by each are a considerable element in the evidence. In Mt we have eight beatitudes and no woes; in Lk four beatitudes and four corresponding woes. Moreover, in the beatitudes which are common to both there are important differences. (1) Those in Mt are in the third person, and apply to all mankind: 'for theirs is,' 'for they shall,' etc. Those in Lk are in the second person, and apply primarily to those present: 'for yours is,' 'for ye shall,' etc. (2) In Lk the more spiritual words which occur in Mt are omitted, and the blessings are assigned to external conditions. Actual poverty, sorrow, and hunger are declared to be blessed,—no doubt as opportunities of internal graces; and the corresponding woes are uttered against actual wealth, jollity, and fulness of bread,—as sources of grievous temptation. In the last beatitude there is less difference between the two. In Lk there is no blessedness assigned to unpopularity, unless it is incurred for the Son of Man's sake; and there is no woe on popularity for His sake.

The first difference explains the second. The universal declarations in Mt require the spiritual conditions. The special declarations in Lk, being addressed to disciples, do not. Even for pagans, to be poor in spirit and to hunger after righteousness are blessed things: but it is only to the faithful Christian that actual poverty and actual hunger are sure to be blessings. To others these trials may be barren suffering, or may harden rather than chasten. The beatitudes omitted in Lk are the third, fifth, sixth, and seventh of Mt, viz. those relating to the meek, the merciful, the pure in heart, and the peacemakers.

The eight beatitudes may be regarded as an analysis of perfect spiritual wellbeing; and nowhere in non-Christian literature shall we find so sublime a summary of the best elements in the felicity attainable by man. They correct all low and carnal views of human happiness. But it is fanciful to find a gradation in the order in which they are recorded, e.g. that poverty of spirit is the death of self-righteousness; mourning the burial of self-righteousness; meekness the virtue that takes the place of self-righteousness, etc.

It is more to the point to notice that they do not describe eight different classes of people, but eight different elements of excellence, which may all be combined in one and the same man. Some of them, indeed, are almost certain to be so combined, e.g. being poor in spirit with meekness, and endurance of persecution with mourning. And perhaps it is not untrue to say with Ambrose that the four given by St. Luke virtually include the whole eight; but to make each of the four correspond to one of the four cardinal virtues is to force the meaning of one or the other.

The following table will show in a clear way the difference between Mt and Lk in the four beatitudes which they have in common:—

ST. MATTHEW.	ST. LUKE.	ST. LUKE.
Blessed	Blessed	Woe
1. are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.	1. are ye poor: for yours is the kingdom of God.	1. unto you that are rich! for ye have received your consolation.
2. are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted.	3. are ye that weep now: for ye shall laugh.	3. ye that laugh now! for ye shall mourn and weep.
4. are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled.	2. are ye that hunger now: for ye shall be filled.	2. unto you, ye that are full now! for ye shall hunger.
8. are ye when men shall reproach you, and persecute you,	4. are ye, when men shall hate you, and when they shall sepa-	4. when all men shall speak well of you! for in the same

BECAUSE was formerly used (and is still used locally) to express the purpose. Thus Burton, Anat. Mel. (1621) 'Anointing the doors and hinges with oyl, because (- in order that) they should not creak.' There are two examples in AV, Wis 11<sup>23</sup> 'And winketh at the sins of men b. they should amend' (RV 'to the end they may repent'); Mt 20<sup>31</sup> 'And the multitude rebuked them b. (RV 'that') they should hold their peace.'

Son of Benjamin, Gn 46<sup>21</sup>, 1 Ch 7<sup>6,8</sup> and implicitly in 1 Ch 8<sup>1</sup> where for MT, בְּכֹרֶאֱשֶׁבֶל = his first-born, Ashbel, we should probably read בְּכֹרֶאֱשֶׁבֶל = Becher and Ashbel.

BECK (from verb 'beck,' which is a short form of beekon), now nearly displaced by 'nod,' occurs 2 Mac 8<sup>18</sup> AV and RV, 'Almighty God, who at a beck can cast down both them that come against us and all the world' (Gr. ἐν νεύματι).

Beckon occurs more frequently, but only in NT. It deserves attention on account of the precision of the Greek words.

1. There is the simple νύω, to nod, to make signs with the head, Jn 13<sup>24</sup> of Simon Peter's nod to John to ask who was to be the betrayer; Ac 24<sup>10</sup> of Felix's nod to Paul to speak.

2. Διανύω, lit. 'to nod through,' Lk 12<sup>2</sup> of Zacharias' beckoning (RV 'making signs') to the people, δια perhaps expressing the range—not to one, but to many.

3. Κατανύω, lit. 'to nod down to,' Lk 5<sup>7</sup> 'they beckoned unto their partners in the other boat.'

Other compounds of νύω found in NT, but not tr'd 'beckon,' are (1) ἐκνύω, Jn 5<sup>13</sup> 'Jesus had conveyed himself away'; (2) ἐκνύω, Lk 10<sup>2</sup> 'they made signs to his father'; and (3) ἐκνύω, Ac 15<sup>20</sup> 'he consented not.'

4. Then there is σειώ 'to shake,' with its compounds ἀνασειώ, διασειώ, κατασειώ, of which only the last is tr'd 'beckon,' to make signs with the hand, esp. before beginning to address an audience, Ac 12<sup>17</sup> 13<sup>16</sup> 19<sup>33</sup> 21<sup>40</sup>.

BECOME.—1. As tr. of πρέπω 'to be seemly,' 'appropriate,' 'b.' is found Mt 3<sup>5</sup>, Eph 5<sup>2</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>10</sup>, Tit 2<sup>1</sup> (RV 'befit'), He 2<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>28</sup> 'such an high priest became us.' In Tit 2<sup>3</sup> 'in behaviour as becometh holiness' (RV 'reverent in demeanour'), the Gr. is one word τεπρωπετής, from τέπος 'sacred' and πρέπει 'it is becoming.' In Ro 16<sup>3</sup> 'as becometh saints' the Gr. is ἀγιῶς τῶν ἀγίων 'worthily of the saints'; so in Ph 1<sup>27</sup> 'as it becometh the gospel of Christ' (RV 'worthy of'). 2. In Bar 3<sup>18</sup> occurs the obsolete phrase 'where is become,' for 'what is become of?': 'Where are the princes of the heathen become?' (RV omits 'become'). Cf. Wither (1628), 'Why should the wicked . . . say, Where is their God become?'

BED (for which RV substitutes 'couch' in 1 Ch 5<sup>1</sup>, Est 1<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>8</sup>, Job 17<sup>13</sup>, Ps 41<sup>3</sup>, Pr 7<sup>16</sup>, Ca 1<sup>16</sup>, and 'litter' in Ca 3<sup>7</sup>) is AV tr. of the following Heb. words:—1. קָנַב (fr. קָנַב 'lie down') 40 times. 2. נָצַח (fr. נָצַח 'spread out') poet. 1 Ch 5<sup>1</sup> (fr. Gn 49<sup>4</sup>), Job 17<sup>13</sup>, Ps 63<sup>6</sup> 132<sup>3</sup>. 3. קָנַע (fr. same root) Is 28<sup>26</sup>. 4. עֲרִיקָה ('flower-bed') twice, Ca 5<sup>18</sup> 6<sup>3</sup>, to which RV adds Ezk 17<sup>7,10</sup>. 5. נָקַע (fr. נָקַע 'stretch out') 26 times. 6. עֶשֶׂה (a four-post bed?) 4 times, Job 7<sup>13</sup>, Ps 41<sup>3</sup>, Pr 7<sup>16</sup>, Ca 1<sup>16</sup>. The last two words appear to be parallel in meaning in Am 6<sup>4</sup>, 'that lie upon beds (עֲרִיקָה) of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches (עֲרִיקָה)'. Both are used also in the sense of 'bier,' נָקַע in 2 S 3<sup>31</sup>, עֲרִיקָה in Syr. (comp. arsd in Lk 7<sup>14</sup>), while נָקַע is applied in 2 Ch 16<sup>14</sup> to Asa's resting-place in his tomb. All this lends support to the opinion of those who interpret the 'bedstead' of Og (Dt 3<sup>11</sup>) of a sarcophagus (see Driver, ad loc.). The word נָקַע, written without vowel points, might be read either נָקַע 'bed' or נָקַע 'staff.' Hence in Gn 47<sup>31</sup> we find, 'Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head,' the tr. following MT (עֲרִיקָה נָקַע), while in He 11<sup>21</sup> we have 'Jacob worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff,' which adopts the LXX ἐπὶ τὸ ἄκρον τῆς ῥάβδου αὐτοῦ. See next article. J. A. SELBIE.

BED.—The bed of the Hebrews did not differ in essential respects from that of other Oriental peoples. It consisted of a mat and quilt to lie upon, and a covering or coverlet. 'For the bed is shorter than a man can stretch himself on it; and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it' (Is 28<sup>20</sup>). The adjuncts were the pillow and the bedstead and its ornaments. Amongst all classes the custom was to sleep in the day-clothes without any material change of garments; sheets were therefore superfluous. In its simplest form the bed consisted only of the day-clothes and the outer garment or cloak. 'If thou at all take thy neighbour's garment to pledge, thou shalt restore it to him by that the sun goeth down: for that is his only covering; it is his garment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep?' (Ex 22<sup>27</sup>).

The ordinary bedding used throughout the East at the present day is probably similar in character to that which has been in use for centuries, and consists of (1) a mat of rushes or straw; (2) skins, or a cloak or a quilt stuffed with dry herbs, hair, or vegetable fibre to lie upon; (3) a covering of light stuff in summer, or of skins or quilted stuff in winter. The bedding is rolled up (Pr 22<sup>27</sup>) in the morning, and, after being aired in the sun, is put away in a chamber or closet. Many of these beds are kept in a house, and, when the inmates are few, they are sometimes stacked one on another and form a temporary bedstead. There is little difference between the bed for sleeping on and the divan or couch for resting on during the day. The bed is essentially an article that can be moved about readily from place to place. 'Bring him up to me in the bed, that I may slay him' (1 S 19<sup>15</sup>). 'Behold, men bring on a bed a man that was palsied' (Lk 5<sup>18-20</sup>).

There is usually some portion of the house set apart as a room where the whole family may sleep. 'My children are with me in bed, I cannot rise and give thee' (Lk 11<sup>8</sup>). Among the very poorest a portion of the floor is set apart, and this is often somewhat raised up above the surrounding floor so as to serve as a bedstead. When there are two storeys, the beds are on the upper floor, and during the summer time they are usually on the flat roof. Thus references are constantly made to going up to bed, which may indicate either a bed raised up on a bedstead, or situated in an upper chamber, or on the roof (Gn 49<sup>23</sup>). 'Thou shalt not come down from the bed whither thou art gone up' (2 K 1<sup>4</sup>); 'nor go up into my bed' (Ps 132<sup>3</sup>; cf. 1 S 28<sup>23</sup>).

The bed is usually placed near the wall of the chamber, and there are indications that it was placed alongside the wall. 'Then he turned his face to the wall and prayed unto the Lord' (2 K 20<sup>2</sup>).

The bed used by watchmen, both when in the fields watching for marauders and when acting as doorkeepers, is of the simplest form, and requires no description: 'A booth in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers' (Is 1<sup>8</sup>. See CUCUMBER).

In accordance with the wealth of the house or family, the bed is enriched and embroidered. This is so also among the Bedawin and dwellers in tents. 'I have spread my couch with carpets of tapestry, with striped cloths of the yarn of Egypt; I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon' (Pr 7<sup>16-17</sup>); 'the couches were of gold and silver' (Est 1<sup>9</sup>).

Pillows and cushions are the usual adjuncts of beds in the East at the present day, and it may be assumed that they were as generally used in early days in Palestine as they were among the Greeks after the Homeric age. A piece of stone such as that used by Jacob (Gn 38<sup>11</sup>) at Bethel would be naturally accepted as a pillow by a native of Palestine on the line of march at the present day. The quilt or pillow of goats' hair placed by Michal (1 S 19<sup>2</sup>) in David's bed, though only a makeshift hastily put together, indicates the use of pillows at that time. Those mentioned Ezk 13<sup>18</sup> do not necessarily appear to be bed pillows. Pillows at the present day are usually made of the same stuff as the bedding, but more profusely ornamented and embossed, and in wealthy houses covered with satin, silk, and embroidery. 'The silken cushions of a bed' (Am 3<sup>12</sup>). Sometimes the finest linen is lightly tacked on the embroidery, probably to protect the face from the roughness of the work.

Among the poorer classes, bedsteads, when used, were probably light portable frames for keeping the bedding off the ground, and for carrying sick persons, as on a litter. Although there is no direct allusion to a bedstead except perhaps that of Og, king of Bashan, there are several references which indicate that beds were raised above the floor. In the passage relating to Jacob's 'bed of sickness' (Gn 47<sup>31</sup>), the 'bed's head' is referred to. See also 1 S 19<sup>18</sup>, 2 S 3<sup>31</sup>, 1 K 5<sup>18-28</sup>. In whatever sense the passage referring to Og, 'behold his bedstead was a bedstead of iron' (Dt 3<sup>11</sup>), is to be understood, the hard black basalt so common in Bashan is probably referred to.

There are numerous indications that in the houses of the wealthy, and in the palaces, there were bedsteads highly ornamented, and that the richness and magnificence of the beds and bedsteads among the Asiatics was at least equal to that which obtained among the Greeks and Romans. The bedsteads in the most wealthy houses were of costly kinds of wood, veneered with tortoise-shell and ivory, and ornamented with gold and silver. The couches of 'gold and silver' (Est 1<sup>9</sup>) probably included the bedstead. The same may be said of the 'beds of ivory' (Am 6<sup>4-5</sup>). The ten beds with feet of silver, and the furniture belonging to them, sent to Eleazar the high priest (Jos. Ant. XII. ii. 15), evidently included the bedsteads.

The ornaments of the bedstead included the canopy and pillars. 'King Solomon made himself a palanquin of the wood of Lebanon. He made the pillars thereof of silver, the bottom thereof of gold, the seat of it of purple' (Ca 3<sup>10</sup>). 'There were hangings of white cloth, of green, and of blue, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble; the couches were of gold and silver upon a pavement of porphyry and white marble, and alabaster and stone of blue colour' (Est 1<sup>6</sup>). 'Now Holofernes rested upon his bed under a canopy, which was of purple, and gold, and emeralds, and precious stones inwoven' (Jth 10<sup>21</sup>).

BEDCHAMBER.—See HOUSE.

BEDAD (בִּדְדָּא).—The father of Hadad, king of Edom (Gn 36<sup>35</sup> = 1 Ch 1<sup>40</sup>).

BEDAN (בִּדְאָן).—1. Mentioned with Jerubbaal, Jephthah, and Samuel as one of the deliverers of Israel (1 S 12<sup>11</sup>). The name does not occur in Jg, and it is probably a corruption for Barak (so LXX and Pesh.). Chronologically Barak should precede Gideon, but the order cannot be pressed (cf. v. 9). The Jews explain בִּדְאָן = בֶּן דָּן 'a son of Dan,' i.e. Samson; this is impossible. The more obvious emendation, 'Abdon' (עֲבֹדָן, Ewald), is unsuitable, since little is known of this hero. 2. A Manassite (1 Ch 7<sup>17</sup>).

J. F. STENNING.

BEDEIAH (בִּדְיָה = עֲבָדָה, 'servant of J').—One of those who had taken foreign wives (Ezr 10<sup>26</sup>): in 1 Es 9<sup>34</sup> apparently Pedias.

BEE (דְּבִירָה dēbīrāh, μέλισσα, apis).—The bee is known in Arab. as nahl, but dabr is a swarm of bees, pl. dabūr. The common term for wasp or hornet is dabbūr, which is a corruption of zenbūr.

The bee is an insect found in large numbers in Syria and Pal., both wild and hived. The wild bee is most common in lonely ravines, where it makes its nest in the clefts of the precipitous rocks, often with great difficulty accessible to man. They also make their hives in hollow trees (1 S 14<sup>25-26</sup>); but as the forests are few in these lands, they are a less natural refuge for the bees than the rocks (cf. Dt 32<sup>13</sup>, Ps 81<sup>10</sup>). Tristram says that they are specially abundant in the wilderness of Judaea, and that most of the honey sold in S. Pal. comes from these wild hives. This explains the allusion (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>), 'and his meat was locusts and wild honey.' It also explains the sentence (Dt 1<sup>4</sup>), 'The Amorites, which dwelt in the mountain, came out against you, and chased you, as bees do.' When tame bees are disturbed, it is well known how furiously they will attack their disturber. But their vehemence is as nothing to that of the wild bees, which are unaccustomed to man. Dr. Thomson (Land and Book, p. 299) says, 'The people of Ma'alia (in Wady Karm) several years ago let a man down the face of the rock by ropes. He was entirely protected from the attacks of the bees, and extracted a large amount of honey; but he was so terrified by the prodigious swarms of bees that he could not be induced to repeat the exploit.' The Psalmist says (Ps 118<sup>12</sup>), 'They compassed me about like bees,' alluding to the threatening attacks of these insects.

It was said of the land of promise that it was a 'land flowing with milk and honey.' This is partly justified by the wild bees and honey, but still more so by the large numbers of domesticated bees. Every peasant's house has its beehives. Sometimes they are boxes, as with us; sometimes a broken water jar is made to serve; but more usually they are wicker cylinders, about 4 ft. long and 10 in. in diameter, plastered over with cow-dung, and stopped with the same material at either end, except a few holes for the entry and exit of the bees. These hives are often piled in a pyramidal shape, with four or more at the base, and plastered together with cow-dung to protect them from the heat, and shaded with branches of trees.

For hiving bees, manœuvres are used similar to those so common in the West. The superior of a convent near Beirût had a chest partially filled with figs, through the keyhole of which a swarm of bees entered. The following day four jars, with a little grape honey smeared inside, were put in succession to the keyhole, and filled with bees.

It is certainly not customary for the people in Bible lands to hiss to their bees (Is 7<sup>18</sup>). It might have been in Bible days. It is, however, universal to whistle to pigeons in order to recall them from their flight. Hundreds of persons can be seen on the flat roofs of the houses in the large cities amusing themselves in this manner a little before sunset. Sir John Lubbock believes that bees lack the sense of hearing.

The honey is usually extracted about the time of the Feast of the Cross, in the middle of Sept. A man with his face masked with iron gauze and his hands protected with mittens, simply puts his hands into the hive and extracts the combs, leaving a little for the bees. The honey is usually squeezed out of the combs, and packed in jars (bottle, marg. 1 K 14<sup>3</sup>) or tins, and sometimes in skins. The people of the Antilebanon plateau, north of Damascus, raise large quantities of honey.

A bee cultivator from America settled some years ago in Beirût to raise bees. He spoke of the Syrian bee as superior to the usual breeds of Europe. It is somewhat smaller than the Apis mellifica of Europe, and of a lighter colour. It is the Apis fasciata, Lat.

As many of the plants to which the bees resort are aromatics, much of the honey has a decided flavour, often very agreeable, sometimes a little rank. The wax is principally used in making tapers for religious purposes. There is no evidence that candles were known in ancient times. The people are very fond of honey. They dip their bread in it. They make certain kinds of cakes (Ex 16<sup>21</sup>) and pastry with it. They sometimes preserve fruit in it. They eat it in quantities surprising to Occidentals. It is seldom eaten direct from the comb. It has been from the earliest times an article of commerce in Bible lands. Jacob sent some of it to his son Joseph (Gn 43<sup>11</sup>). Judah and Israel sold it to Tyrian merchants for export (Ezk 27<sup>17</sup>). Stores of honey were collected for this purpose, as at Mizpah (Jer 41<sup>5</sup>). Considering the large quantities of honey produced in Pal. there is no occasion for supposing that דְּבַשׁ dēbash signifies the dibs, the grape honey of our time.

Much controversy has taken place over the swarm of bees in the carcase of the lion (Jg 14<sup>8</sup>). The simple fact is, that in a few hours after an animal is dead, jackals, dogs, and vultures often reduce the carcase to a ligamentous skeleton, which is soon dried in the fierce heat, and would make as savoury a hive as the cow-dung-plastered baskets which are used for raising bees, and the cow-dung trays on which silk-worms are developed.

Honey, דְּבַשׁ dēbash, could not be used in burnt-offerings (Lv 24<sup>1</sup>).

Honey is used to illustrate moral teachings. A man is exhorted to eat honey and the honey comb (Pr 24<sup>13</sup>), but warned against surfeit (Pr 25<sup>16, 27</sup>). It was a simile for moral sweetness (Ezk 3<sup>3</sup>), and for the excellence of the law (Ps 19<sup>10</sup>), of pleasant words (Pr 16<sup>24</sup>), and of the lips (Ca 4<sup>11</sup>), and as a figure for love (Ca 5<sup>1</sup>).

The LXX adds to Pr 6<sup>8</sup> 'Go to the bee, and learn how diligent she is, and what a noble work she produces; whose labour kings and private men use for their health. She is desired and honoured by all, and, though weak in strength, yet since she values wisdom she prevails.' This passage exists in the Arabic version, and is quoted by ancient writers.

BEELIADA (בְּעִלְיָדָא 'Baal knows').—A son of David, 1 Ch 14<sup>7</sup>, changed in conformity with later usage (see ISIMOSHETH) into ELIADA (עִלְיָדָא 'El knows') in 2 S 5<sup>16</sup>.

BEELSARUS (Βεελσαρος), 1 Es 5<sup>3</sup>.—One of the leaders (προηγούμενοι) of those Jews who returned to Jerus. with Zerub. called BILSHAN, Ezr 2<sup>2</sup>, Neh 7<sup>7</sup>. The form in 1 Es appears not to have come through the Gr. of the canonical books, but to be due to a confusion of ב and ש in the Heb.

BEELTETHMUS (Βεελθελμους).—An officer of Artaxerxes residing in Pal., 1 Es 2<sup>16, 25</sup> (LXX 15, 21). It is not a proper name, but a title of Rehm, the name immediately preceding it in Ezr 4<sup>8</sup> (Αβαλράμ). It is a corruption of עֶבֶר בְּרָא = 'lord of judgment,' and is rendered 'chancellor' by AV and RV in Ezr, 'story-writer' in 1 Es 2<sup>17</sup> (δὲ τὰ προσπληροῦντα, LXX). The title has been explained by the Assyrian inscriptions, and signifies 'lord of official intelligence' or 'postmaster' (Sayce, Introd. to Ezr., Neh., and Est. p. 27). See CHANCELLOR.

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

BEER (בְּעַר 'a well').—1. A station in the journey from Arnon to the Jordan, mentioned Nu 21<sup>18</sup>, with a poetical extract commemorating the digging of a well at this spot. The context indicates the neighbourhood, but further identification of the station is wanting. Perhaps the words translated 'and from the wilderness,' which immediately follow this extract (Nu 21<sup>18</sup>), should be translated (following the LXX ἀπὸ φέλαρος), 'and from Beer,' or 'the well.' It is generally identified with Beer-Elim ('well of mighty men'), mentioned Is 15<sup>8</sup>, and in the second part of the compound name it may be conjectured that there is reference to the event commemorated in the song, Nu 21<sup>17, 18</sup>. See Budde in New World, Mar. 1895, p. 136 ff.

2. The place to which Jotham ran away after uttering his parable (Jg 9<sup>21</sup>). Its position is unknown. If, as some suppose, it is the same as Beeroth (Jos 9<sup>17</sup>), its site is fixed (see BEEROTH). But Beeroth is in Benjamin, and it seems probable that Jotham fled to his own people in Manasseh, and not southward.

BEERA (בְּעָרָא).—A man of Asher (1 Ch 7<sup>7</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

BEERAH (בְּעָרָה).—A Reubenite who was carried captive by Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch 5<sup>9</sup>).

BEER-ELIM.—See BEER.

BEERI (בְּעָרִי).—1. The father of Judith, one of Esau's wives (Gn 26<sup>34</sup>), sometimes wrongly identified with ANAH (which see). 2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos 1<sup>1</sup>).

BEER-LAHAI-ROI (בְּעַר לַחַי רֹאִי 'Well of the Living One that seeth me,' Gn 16<sup>7, 14</sup> 24<sup>62</sup> 25<sup>11</sup>).—It is expressly described as 'the fountain in the way to Shur,' signifying that it was well known, on the way to Egypt whither the Egyptian Hagar was naturally fleeing. It is placed between Kadesh and Bered; but the site of neither is certain. Bered has been located at El-Khalasah, 13 miles S.W. of Beersheba. When Abraham dwelt between Kadesh and Shur, he is said (Gn 20<sup>1</sup>) to have sojourned in Gerar at the same time or shortly after. Gn 25<sup>11</sup> and 26<sup>1</sup> also imply that the well, Beer-lahai-roi, was not very far from Gerar. Rowland claims to have found the true site at 'Ain Moullahhi, some 50 miles S. of Beersheba, and 10 or 12 miles W. of 'Ain Kadis (PEFSt, 1884, p. 177). (See BERED, HAGAR, ISAAC, SHUR.)

A. HENDERSON.

BEEROTH (בְּעֶרֶת 'Wells').—One of the confederate Hivite cities which wilfully made alliance with Joshua after the overthrow of Ai (Jos 9<sup>17</sup>). It was afterwards in the territory of Benjamin (Jos 18<sup>25</sup>). The Beerothites, like the Gibeonites, maintained their independence as a tribe in Israel even after the return from the Exile (Ezr 2<sup>25</sup>, Neh 7<sup>29</sup>). The occasion of their flight to Gittaim (2 S 4<sup>3</sup>) is not mentioned; and it is uncertain if that is the town named (Neh 11<sup>33</sup>). Rimmon, the father of the murderers of Ishbosheth, and Naharai, Joab's armour-bearer (2 S 23<sup>37</sup> RVm, 1 Ch 11<sup>39</sup>), were Beerothites. It is identified with Bireh, 8 miles N. of Jerusalem on the great northern road, the usual halting place on the first night from Jerusalem. Tradition connects it with the story of Lk 2<sup>43-45</sup> as the place whence Mary and Joseph returned to Jerusalem. There is no reason to doubt the correctness of this tradition, as the distance is convenient, and the usage of Eastern caravans seldom changes.

A. HENDERSON.

BEER-SHEBA (בְּעֶרְשֶׁבָּא, Arab. Bir es Sebá).—A village, or settlement, on the N. bank of the Wady es-Sebá, deriving its special interest from its connexion with the patriarchs. It was the residence successively of Abraham (Gn 21<sup>31</sup>), of Isaac (Gn 26<sup>33</sup>), and of Jacob (Gn 28<sup>10</sup>), and received its name ('Well of the oath') as having been the place, marked by a well, where Abraham entered into covenant with Abimelech, king of Gerar (Gn 21<sup>31</sup> E). (A different derivation is adopted in Gn 26<sup>33</sup> J.) It was afterwards visited by Elijah when fleeing from the wrath of Jezebel on his way to Horeb (1 K 19<sup>3</sup>). Beer-sheba fell within the lot of the tribe of Simeon (Jos 19<sup>2</sup>), though included in the wider boundaries of Judah. It was bounded on the S. by the Negeb or 'South Country,' a spacious tract of undulating chalky downs, wide pastures, and generally waterless brook courses. Its position in the extreme south gave rise to the phrase 'from Dan to Beersheba' (Jg 20<sup>1</sup>, 1 S 3<sup>30</sup> etc.)=all the territory of Israel. The converse 'from B. to Dan' occurs in 1 Ch 21<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ch 30<sup>6</sup>. The soil in the valleys where there is some moisture is exceedingly rich, and is rudely cultivated by the fellahin, who succeed in producing fine crops of wheat and barley. In the tracts around Beer-sheba the Bedawin find ample pasturage for their flocks and herds, which towards evening assemble in crowds around the wells as they did three thousand years ago. That the district was once thickly inhabited, probably in the early Christian centuries before the Mohammedan irruption, is shown by ruined walls and foundations which are visible at intervals for several miles between Bir es-Sebá and el-Tel Milh. The position of Bir es-Sebá is marked by lines of foundations along some rising ground above the N. bank of the river, amongst which is the foundation of a Greek church, with apse, sacristy, and aisles; and in the valley below are the celebrated wells sunk through alluvial deposits into the limestone rock. These are five or six in number; and of the two principal ones the larger is regarded with confidence as coming down from the time of Abraham. This (according to Tristram) is the tradition of the Arabs, who point to it as the work of Ibrahim el-Khalil (Abraham the Friend). Conder, who carried out the Ordnance Survey of this part of Pal., states that the depth of the well is 45 ft., and that it is lined with rings of masonry to a depth of 28 ft. That some of the stones are not very ancient is shown by his discovery of a tablet dated 505 A.H., at a depth of 15 courses. This, however, does not throw any doubt on the extreme age of the well itself, but only suggests that it had been repaired during the 12th cent. The marble blocks which form the rim of the well are deeply cut by the ropes used for drawing water; and rude marble troughs of circular form are arranged round the well for the use of the cattle. A second well, 5 ft. in diameter, is found at about 300 yds. to the W. of that just described, and in the opposite direction is a third, 23 ft. deep, which is dry.

The desert of Beer-sheba is very beautiful in spring and early summer when the surface is carpeted with herbage and flowers; but later in the year it is parched and desolate in the extreme, not a tree breaking the monotony of the landscape or the rays of the sun.

Tell es-Sebá is the site of a village at the junction of the W. el-Khalil, which comes down from Hebron on the north, with the W. es-Sebá, and is 2½ miles from Bir es-Sebá. From its summit, 950 ft. above the Mediterranean, a commanding view is obtained of the country around, terminating along the E. in the deep ravines and rocky slopes which lead down to the basin of the Dead Sea.

BEEBLE.—The word rendered beetle in the AV and cricket in the RV (Lv 11<sup>22</sup>) is הַרְגֹל hargól. It is an insect of the grasshopper kind, having 'legs above its feet' to leap with. The Heb. root הַרְגֹל hargal, as its cognate harjal in Arab., signifies to leap. The Arab. word harjalat signifies a flight of locusts, and harjulan, the l and n being interchangeable, a sort of grasshopper or locust that leaps without flying. See LOCUST. G. E. POST.

BEEVES, the pl. of 'beef,' is used in Lv 22<sup>10, 21</sup>, Nu 31<sup>28, 30, 33, 38, 44</sup> for the animals themselves, not their flesh. Cf.—

* A pound of man's flesh, taken from a man,
Is not so estimable, profitable neither,
As flesh of muttons, beefs, or goats.

Shaks. M. of V. i. iii. 68.

RV retains all but Lv 22<sup>21</sup>, AV 'a free-will offering in beeves or sheep,' RV 'a free-will offering of the herd or of the flock.' The sing. does not occur in AV or RV, but the Douay Bible (1609) renders Dt 14<sup>5</sup> 'the pygargue, the wilde beefe (AV 'wild ox'), the cameloparde.'

J. HASTINGS.

BEFORE, meaning 'in the presence of,' occurs frequently, and as the tr<sup>n</sup> of a great variety of Heb. and Gr. words. Notice Gn 11<sup>28</sup> 'Haran died before his father Terah' (בְּפָנָיו 'before the face of,' RV 'in the presence of'); Sir 36<sup>4</sup> 'As thou wast sanctified in us before them, so be thou magnified among them before us'; 39<sup>20</sup> 'He seeth from everlasting to everlasting, and there is nothing wonderful before him'; Bar 2<sup>8</sup> 'Yet have we not prayed before the Lord.' In Gal 3<sup>8</sup> 'the Scripture . . . preached before the gospel unto Abraham,' the words are a lit. tr. of the Greek (προεγγελαστο) and b. = 'beforehand,' as RV. See AFORE.

J. HASTINGS.

1 Jn 4<sup>9</sup>, all (except To 8<sup>17</sup>, He 11<sup>17</sup> 'Abraham . . . offered up his only b. son') in ref. to Christ. The same Gr. word is found in Lk 7<sup>12</sup> 'the only son of his mother,' 8<sup>42</sup> 'he had one (RV 'an') only daughter,' and 9<sup>38</sup> 'he is mine only child.'

Firstbegotten is the tr. of πρωτότοκος in He 1<sup>6</sup>, and in Rev 1<sup>5</sup> (both in reference to Christ), a word which is here by RV and elsewhere by AV and RV tr<sup>d</sup> 'firstborn.' It would have been more accurate if 'first-begotten' had been given as the tr<sup>d</sup> of πρωτ., and 'only-born' of μον. The meaning of the latter is indeed, as Westcott points out, obscured under the tr<sup>d</sup> 'only-begotten,' since in its reference to Christ it is the Son's personal Being, not His generation, that is the thought. Both words express the Son of Man's uniqueness among the sons of men, μον. more absolutely than πρωτ., and more directly in relation to the Father. See Thayer, NT Lex.; and Cremer, Bibl.-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek, s.vv., and (esp. for πρωτ.), Light-foot on Col 1<sup>15</sup>. J. HASTINGS.

BEGUILE.—'To beguile' is to act with guile, to deceive; but (like 'amuse,' which originally meant 'to bewilder') it is mostly employed now in the sense of 'to charm away' (care or time). This meaning, though as old as 1611, does not occur in AV, where on the contrary we find the word signifying directly to cheat, as Col 2<sup>18</sup> 'Let no man b. you of your reward' (Gr. καταβραβεύω, from βραβεῖον 'a prize,' RV 'rob you of your prize.' See the criticism of this tr. by T. S. Evans in Lat. and Gr. Verse, p. xlix). J. HASTINGS.

BEHALF (by his half, i.e. on his side, then as a prep. with a direct object, behalf him) is used only in prepositional phrases 'in or on (his-) behalf,' and (now almost entirely) 'in or on behalf of.'* Until recently a clear distinction was preserved between 'on behalf of' and 'in behalf of,' the former signifying 'in reference to' or 'on account of,' the latter only 'in the interest of,' 'for the sake of.'† This distinction is preserved in AV. Thus, Ex 27<sup>21</sup>, 'it shall be a statute for ever unto their generations on the behalf of the children of Israel' (that is, the beaten oil shall be a perpetual gift from or on the part of, απὸ, the children of Israel); 1 Co 1<sup>4</sup> 'I thank my God always on your behalf' (πρὸς ὑμῶν, RV 'concerning you'). But 2 Ch 16<sup>9</sup> 'the eyes of the LORD run to and fro throughout the whole earth, to show himself strong in the behalf of them whose heart is perfect toward him': 1<sup>h</sup> 12<sup>9</sup> 'in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suff. for his sake' (RV 'in his behalf'). But 'in this behalf,' or 'on this behalf,' indifferently, as 2 Co 9<sup>8</sup> 'in this behalf,' 1 P 4<sup>16</sup> 'on this behalf' (both ἐν τῷ μέλει τοῦτοῦ, TR, but in 1 P 4<sup>16</sup> editors prefer ὀνόματι, whence RV 'in his name').

J. HASTINGS.

BEHEADING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

BEHEMOTH (בְּהֵמוֹת bēhēmōth, perhaps for Egyp. p-che-mau, 'ox of the water').—The word is tr. in all passages except Job 40<sup>15-24</sup> as the plural of bēhēmāh, with the signification of beasts. It has been supposed by some that beast (1s 73<sup>22</sup>), which is in the original bēhēmōth, refers to the same animal as that in Job. But the first member of the parallelism in the psalm refers to ignorance, and the putting of the intensive plural bēhēmōth = beasts, in the second, would seem to condense into his folly all that is in the beasts. Others have supposed that bēhēmōth negel, the beasts of the south (Is 30<sup>6</sup>), refers to the animal of Job, and that the south was Egypt. But negel refers to Egypt only in one other context (Dn 11 often). Isaiah more probably refers to the southern portion of Judaea and the wilderness of et-Tih, and the fact that a partial catalogue of the beasts is given makes it improbable that one beast, and that not a savage or venomous creature, is intended.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the hippopotamus is the animal intended in Job. As some have thought that some other extinct or living animal, or some animal type, as the pachydermatous, was intended, it will be well to examine, in the light of an accurate rendering, whether the description corresponds to that of the hippopotamus.

He eateth grass like an ox.

Their bulk as a forging of iron.

He who made him gave him his sword.

<sup>20</sup> For the hills bring him forth pasture;

All the beasts of the field sport there.

<sup>21</sup> Beneath the lotus tree he lieth down,

In the shadow of the reed and swamp.

The willows of the streams surround him.

<sup>23</sup> Behold the river swells, and he does not flee;

He is confident though Jordan were poured into his mouth.

<sup>24</sup> Will one take him before his eyes;

Or will one bore his nostrils with hooks (rings)?

Remembering that this is Oriental poetry, there is nothing in it which does not well apply to the hippopotamus: he is herbivorous (v.<sup>15</sup>); he is remarkable for the stoutness of his body (v.<sup>16</sup>); his tail is thick and rigid, and his legs sinewy (v.<sup>17</sup>); his bones are solid (v.<sup>18</sup>); he is the largest animal indigenous in Bible lands; his teeth cut the herbage as with a sword (v.<sup>19</sup>); he comes up out of the water to the plantations to feed; the term hill is applicable to low elevations as well as to high, and in the language of poetry could be used of the knolls arising from the general level of the Nile basin (v.<sup>20</sup>); the lotus tree (Zizyphus Lotus, L.) is common, as also reeds and swamps, in the neighbourhoods where he dwells (v.<sup>21</sup>); so also the willows by the streams (v.<sup>22</sup>); the allusion to the inundation of Egypt fits his case (v.<sup>23</sup>); his strength is such that a direct attack is hazardous, and the poet challenges the reader to bore his nostrils, and lead him with a hook or ring like an ox (v.<sup>24</sup>).

The allusion to behemoth is the approach to the climax which is reached in leviathan, the crocodile. The poet began (ch. 38) with the foundation of the earth, advanced to the powers of inanimate nature, then through the lesser phenomena of animal life to the largest of the quadrupeds, to finish with the invulnerable, untamable 'king over all the children of pride' (ch. 41<sup>34</sup>).

BEHOVE.—'Behove' is profit, advantage; it occurs only in Pref. to AV 1611 'For the behoof and edifying of the unlearned.' 'Behove,' now only in the impers. phrase 'it behoves,' signifies necessity arising from peculiar fitness. In AV only Lk 24<sup>46</sup> 'it b<sup>d</sup> Christ to suffer' (TR ἐδει, edd. and RV omit), and He 2<sup>17</sup> 'it b<sup>d</sup> him to be made like unto his brethren (ὥφειλε). BEL AND THE DRAGON.—Two legends attached to the book of Dn in the Gr. and other VSS. As in the rest of Dn, the ordinary printed text is that of Theod. (Θ); but Swete has given the text of the unique LXX MS Chisianus, on the opposite page, throughout Dn. In B our stories follow Dn without a break; in A Q, with the intervention of the heading ὑπὸ τοῦ βασιλῆως. In Vulg. they form ch. 14 of Dn. In LXX and Syr.-Hex. we have the heading, 'From the prophecy of Habakkuk, son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi.'

Bel.—The points of this story as to which Θ and LXX agree are briefly these:—In Babylon is an image of Bel which Daniel refuses to worship. The king expostulates, and shows how much food it daily devours. Daniel in reply arranges that the king shall see the lectisternia set, and the doors sealed; but takes care, when the priests are gone, that the king shall see the floor sieved with fine ashes. Next morning the seals are intact, but the floor shows marks of naked feet, and the secret door is revealed by which the food has been taken away. After this the priests are put to death and the image destroyed.

Theod.'s task was to revise LXX. In the case before us he had a document, probably Aram., which differed in detail considerably from LXX. In vv. 2-9 he largely transcribes LXX; but after that uses his own materials very freely. The chief variations between Θ and LXX are these: LXX extracts the story from a pseudepigraphic work of Habakkuk, and introduces Daniel as 'a certain man,' 'a priest, son of Abai, a companion of the king.' Θ by attaching the story to Dn identifies him with the prophet, and makes the king to be Cyrus, successor of Astyages. Bel's daily allowance is in LXX, besides the flour, 4 sheep and 6 firkins of oil; in Θ, 40 sheep and 6 firkins of wine. The Phillipp's cylinder, i. R. 65, records that Nebuchadrezzar's daily offering was one fine ox, fish, fowl, etc., the best of oil, and the choicest wines like the waters of a river (Ball, Speaker's Apoc. ii. 352). LXX introduces in vv. 14, 17 'honourable priests,' friends of the priest Daniel, with whose signets the doors are sealed. Θ does not. LXX says the food offered was found in the houses of the priests. Θ omits this. While Θ, not LXX, says that Daniel destroyed both the image and the Temple of Bel. Cf. Hdt. i. 183; Strabo, xvi. 1.

The Peshitta is taken from Θ. Its chief deviations from Θ are v. 4 'forty rams,' 'bel my God' (cf. Schrader, COT ii. 60) v. 6 'Bel is alive'; v. 14 'The king sealed it . . . with the ring of Daniel.' More important, however, are the cases where it discards Θ, and follows LXX, as in v. 7 'Nothing has he ever eaten'; v. 18 'He saw all eaten which had been offered to Bel'; while in v. 21 we have a confate reading, 'consumed what was offered to Bel' LXX, 'on the table' Θ. Neubauer in his Tobit gives a passage from Midrash Rabba de Rabba, where, in Greek-rabbinic characters, is found an almost verbatim transcript of the Peshitta as given by Lagarde. The Vulg. gives a minutely accurate tr. of Θ. The Syr.-Hex. in Ceriani's Mon. Sac. et prof. follows LXX; but its marg. gives three readings of Θ: '40 sheep' for 'four'; 'wine' for 'oil' in v. 4; and the account of the sieving of the floor in v. 14.

The Dragon.—The points common to all Jewish varieties of this Haggada are as follows: There was in Babylon a great dragon, widely revered, and fed by its worshippers. Daniel was again a non-conformist. In reply to the king's expostulations he volunteered to kill the monster, if the king would consent, without any weapon. Permission being granted, he made a large bolus, of which pitch was the chief ingredient, and threw it down the dragon's throat; thus causing it to burst and die. The populace, enraged, clamoured for Daniel's death. The king yielded, and Daniel was cast into a den, where were 7 lions; and he was there 6 or 7 days. On the last day Habakkuk was cooking food for his reapers, when an angel came and carried him and his provisions through the air (cf. Ezk 8<sup>3</sup>, and Gospel according to the Hebrews, Resch, Agapha, 381 ff.) to the lions' den, to feed Daniel. When the king came and found Daniel alive, he magnified J<sup>n</sup>, and cast the accusers into the den, where they met with instant death.

The dragon myth had a much wider circulation than that of Bel, and was much more flexible in its details. It is doubtless a Judaized version of the old Sem. myth of the destruction of the old dragon, which, terrestrial, maritime, or celestial, represents Chaos or Disorder, which was destroyed by the god of the present order of things. In the Bab. myth, it is Tiamat who is assailed by Bel-Merodach. Bel let loose a storm-wind * which the monster received into its mouth, and 'with violence the wind filled its belly,' and 'its belly was stricken through' (cf. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos, 320-323, and Ball in Speaker's Apoc. ii. 347).

The fluidity of the myth is shown by the way in which almost every version furnishes details of its own. LXX contributes that Daniel used '30 pounds of pitch,' v. 27; that the king consulted with his companions, v. 30; that the lions' den was reserved for conspirators against the king, and that the lions were fed daily on the bodies of two criminals, v. 31; that the mode of death was selected that Daniel might not receive burial, v. 32; and that Habakkuk had with him a jug of mixed wine, v. 33. Vulg. closely follows Θ, but, besides some smaller deviations, it appends a doxology, v. 42, after the manner of Dn 6<sup>26, 27</sup>. Lagarde's Syr. adheres closely to Θ; but it adds, v. 40, that the king came to the den 'to weep for Daniel,' and makes a brief repetition in v. 38. Neubauer's vers. from Midrash Rabba de Rabba, which is mostly a mere transliteration of Syr., adds one item not found elsewhere: 'and they covered the den with a stone, and sealed it with the king's ring, and with their signets,' v. 31; and with Walton's vers. it says, 'the angel put his hand on the head of Habakkuk.' Raymond Martini, who wrote an anti-Jewish work, Pugio Fidei, in the 13th cent., cites Bel and the Dragon, professedly from a Midrash Major on Genesis (Neubauer's Tobit, p. viii.). His text is almost an exact counterpart (only by a better scribe) of the unique MS containing Midrash Rabba de Rabba, except a hiatus by homoteleton in v. 31 (see Delitzsch, De Habacuci Vita, p. 32). Another Midrash gives a condensed account of the dragon myth in Heb., but says that Daniel took straw and wrapped nails in it which pierced the monster's viscera (Breshith rabba, § 68; Del. p. 38). Josippon ben Gorion, the pseudo-Jos., the author of a mytho-historical work, c. A.D. 940, ascribes the death of the dragon to combs concealed in pitch; he fixes sunset as the hour of Habakkuk's transportation, and says that he returned 'before the reapers finished eating,' Del. op. cit. 40.

Gaster (PSBA, Nov. Dec. 1894) announces the discovery of an Aram. text of the story of the Dragon in the Chronicles of Jerahmeel. This he claims to be the very text used by Θ in revising LXX. It is certainly a striking document. Its dialect, both in vocabulary and grammatical forms, is that of Onkelos. It is a longer narrative than any other, and possesses some unique readings: as, e.g., 'flax' in v. 27; 'without sword or spear,' v. 26; 'Daniel was in the den seven days,' v. 30; 'land of Israel,' v. 33; 'and when Habakkuk's spirit returned to him,' v. 37. But the antiquity of its text is, I think, most clearly evinced by the fact that it contains many readings found in the several VSS, but until now deemed unique; and thus it seems to be a 'Source.' With the Vulg. only, it reads, 'behold now,' v. 21; 'what ye worship,' v. 27; and 'from the den of lions,' v. 42. With Syr. only, it reads, 'and the dragon swallowed them, and died,' v. 27; 'My Lord,' v. 33; 'in one hour,' v. 39; 'who slandered Daniel,' v. 42. With Jossippon, it adds that the angel took Habakkuk 'with the food that was in his hands,' v. 36, and states that Daniel put iron combs in the pitch, and that, when the pitch melted, the combs pierced the viscera of the dragon, and thus caused its death, v. 40.

Language.—Most scholars, from Eichhorn to König, have considered the orig. lang. of these stories to be Greek; but Gaster's discovery looks strongly, if not decisively, in favour of Aramaic. The confusion of סעק = storm-wind, and סעק = pitch, points in the same direction. The awkward word (LXX<sup>14</sup>) σφαγισάμενος = חס is best explained by supposing that the latter was read for חס = κλέσας; and besides this, many divergent parallel readings yield, when translated, very similar Aram. words, e.g.—

Canonicity.—The Roman Church admits the genuineness of these stories, as of the rest of the LXX; and in the meretricious age of the early Church, many Gr. and Lat. Fathers quoted them as part of Dn, e.g. Irenaeus, iv. 5. 2; Tertullian, de idololatriâ, c. 18; and Cyprian, ad Fortunatum, c. 11. Julius Africanus was the first to call the matter in dispute, in his Letter to Origen. Origen replied; and in his Stromata, Book x., expounded Susanna and Bel. From this exposition Jerome quotes in his commentary on Dn 13. 14. In his Prefatio in Danielen, Jerome, while in sympathy with Africanus, conceals himself behind a learned Jew. He says he had heard a Jew deride the Gr. additions to Dn. The Jew asked what miracle, or indication of divine inspiration, there was in a dragon's being killed by a piece of pitch; or in the detection of the tricks of the priests of Bel. These things were done rather by the prudence of a clever man than by the prophetic spirit. As to Habakkuk's aerial flight, with a bowl of pottage in his hand, the Jew refused to accept Ezk 8<sup>3</sup> as at all parallel; since Ezk in the spirit saw himself being carried, and 'was brought in visions of God to Jerus.' Still Jerome, in view of the universal acceptance of the 'Additions,' decided to publish them 'veru anteposito.' Other objections urged more recently are (1) the inconsistencies of Θ and LXX, and their many improbabilities. (2) That dragon-worship was unknown in Babylon (so Eichhorn, Bissell). This is probably true; but the Babylonians had a snake deity. Cf. Baudissin in Herzog, art. 'Drache zu Babel,' and Ball, 357. (3) The image of Bel was not destroyed in the reign of Cyrus, but by Xerxes; Hdt. i. 183.

BELA (בֵּלָא).—1. 'The son of Beor reigned in Edom; and the name of his city was Dinhabah. And Bela died, and Jobah the son of Zerah of Bozrah reigned in his stead' (Gn 36<sup>32-33</sup>, cf. 1 Ch 1<sup>43f.</sup>). The close resemblance of this name to that of 'Balaam (בִּלְאָם), the son of Beor,' the seer, is noteworthy, and has given rise to the Targ. of Jonathan reading 'Balaam the son of Beor' in Gn 36<sup>32</sup>.

Apparently Bela, the first Edomite king, was not a native of Edom. Possibly we have in these names the preservation of an old tradition respecting the succession of dynasties and their royal residences. Of Dinhabah nothing is known; but, according to Knobel, the name Danaba is found in connexion with Palmyrene Syria (Ptol. 5. 15. 24), Danabe with Babylonia (Zosim. Hist. 3. 27), and Dannaba with Moab (Onomast. 1. 14. f. ed. Lag.). Bela the son of Beor may have been of Aramean origin. For Balaam, the son of Beor, is said to have come from Pethor on the Euphrates (Nu 22<sup>5</sup>, cf. Dt 23<sup>8</sup>), a town which has been identified with the Pitru of the Assyrian inscriptions on the W. bank of the river, at its junction with the Salshtar (Sagurri), a little south of Carchemish (see Schrader, COT<sup>2</sup> i. 143). Now, when this fact is considered in connexion with the mention of the sixth Edomite king (Gn 36<sup>37</sup>), who presumably came from the same Euphratic region, 'Shaul of Rehoboth by the River' (Rehoboth being placed by some Assyriologists at the junction of the Euphrates and the Chaboras, Richu HWB<sup>3</sup> 1291), there is evidently some ground for the theory that Bela the son of Beor was an Aramean, or possibly Hittite, conqueror who came from the banks of the Euphrates. Still, nothing is known of him; and even the age in which he lived is uncertain; nor can we at present say whether Beor (= 'burning'), whose son he is termed, was a man or a local deity.

The Sept. transliterates Βάλακ (Cod. A), Βάλεκ (Cod. E), as if Bela was to be identified with the king of Moab rather than with the seer.

2. The eldest of the sons of Benjamin (Gn 46<sup>21</sup>, Nu 26<sup>28</sup>, 1 Ch 7<sup>6</sup> 8<sup>3</sup>). According to 1 Ch 8<sup>3</sup> he was the father of Addar, Gera, Abihud, Abishua, Naaman, Ahoah, Gera (a second mention), Shephuphan and Huram. According to Nu 26<sup>40</sup> the sons of Bela were Ard and Naaman.

3. 'The son of Azaz, the son of Shema, the son of Joel, who dwelt in Aroer, even unto Nebo and Baal-meon; and eastward he dwelt even unto the entering in of the wilderness from the river Euphrates' (1 Ch 5<sup>8-9</sup>). He was a Reubenite, and a dweller in the Moabite territory. It is noteworthy that this B., like the Edomite king mentioned above, seems to have been traditionally connected with the Euphrates. H. E. RYLE.

BELIAL (בְּלִיָּא).—The common view is that this word is derived from בָּלָא not, and בָּלָא in Hiph. to profit; and that its primary meaning is 'worthlessness,' 'wickedness,' and its secondary 'destruction.' But Cheyne has sought to show (Expositor, June 1895, p. 435) that this derivation is erroneous, and that the primary meaning is 'hopeless ruin,' and the secondary 'great or extreme wickedness.' He regards the word as a mythological survival, the name of 'the subterranean watery abyss' which was understood to mean 'the depth which lets no man return' (פְּתֵי תְהוֹמוֹת). In the OT the word in the sense of 'worthlessness' or 'wickedness' is mostly found in combination with a noun: 'daughter' (1 S 1<sup>16</sup>), 'thing' (Dt 15<sup>9</sup>), 'man' (1 S 25<sup>23</sup>, 2 S 16<sup>7</sup>, 20<sup>1</sup>, Pr 16<sup>7</sup>), 'witness' (Pr 19<sup>38</sup>), 'person' (Pr 6<sup>12</sup>), 'men' (1 S 30<sup>22</sup>), 'sons' (Dt 13<sup>18</sup>, Jg 19<sup>22</sup>, 20<sup>13</sup>, 1 S 2<sup>12</sup>, 10<sup>27</sup>, 25<sup>17</sup>, 2 S 23<sup>6</sup>, 1 K 21<sup>10, 13</sup>, 2 Ch 13<sup>7</sup>), and in the AV following the Vulg. is, with few exceptions, rendered literally, as if a proper name; so also frequently in the RV; but the margin here gives renderings, 'base fellows,' 'wicked woman,' etc., which the American Revisers desired to see in the text. Owing to the poverty of the Heb. language in adjectives, this combination was 'a favourite expression in the accounts of the earlier monarchical period' for sinners of 'deepest dye.' In the sense of 'destruction' the word is found only four times, Ps 18<sup>4</sup> RV 'floods of ungodliness'; but Cheyne and others, 'the rushing streams of perdition'; Ps 41<sup>8</sup> AV and RV 'an evil disease'; Nah 1<sup>11</sup> AV 'a wicked counsellor,' RV 'that counsellor wickedness,' but Cheyne assigns to belial here the sense of 'hopeless ruin'; 1<sup>15</sup> AV 'the wicked,' RV 'the wicked one,' but others render 'the destroyer'; and Cheyne sees here already a transition to the absolute use of the word as a personal name for Satan, found in 2 Co 6<sup>10</sup>. In this passage the AV and RV both read βελαλ; but the reading now usually preferred is βελιαι, which is 'either to be ascribed to the harsh Syr. pronunciation of the word βελαλ, or must be derived from רֵעַ לֵזַ, lord of the forest.' St. Paul uses the word as a name of Satan with reference to unclean heathenism; and his use shows that the word had come to be used generally as a proper name. Milton gives this name to the fallen angel who is the representative of impurity (Par. Lost, i. 490-505; Par. Reg. ii. 150). A. E. GARVIE.

BELIE.—To belie is to tell lies about a person or thing, as Wis 1<sup>11</sup> 'the mouth that beliesth slayeth the soul' (καταφύδομαι, in ref. to καταλαλία 'backbiting' mentioned before). Then 'to give the lie to,' 'contradict,' as Jer 5<sup>12</sup> 'They have belied the Lord' (שָׁקַר, RV 'denied').

J. HASTINGS.

BELIEF occurs in AV only 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup> 'b. of the truth' (Gr. πίστις); to which RV adds Ro 10<sup>17</sup> 'b. cometh of hearing' (Gr. πίστις, AV 'faith'). 'Unbelief' occurs frequently, as tr<sup>1</sup> of ἀπιστία or ἀπιστία. See FAITH.

J. HASTINGS.

BELL.—Bells as a means of making a public call seem to have been quite unknown in the Mediterranean world until late Roman times. Judging from the great development in China and India, and in Buddhistic worship, it seems probable that the use of large bells is due to the farther East. The means of public call among the Hebrews was never by a bell, but by trumpets; these are stated to be of silver (Nu 10<sup>2</sup>), and are shown as a special part of the holy spoils on the arch of Titus, though, strange to say, the ram's horn, shophar, is still used in synagogues. On a small scale, tinkling bells were used for religious purposes in post-Exodic times in Egypt, as among the Hebrews. But they are only mentioned on the borders of the high priest's robe (Ex 28<sup>33</sup> שֹׁמְרֵי); and the tinkling there was probably by their striking the alternating pomegranates, rather than by a clapper. The design of bells and pomegranates is apparently the old Egypt. lotus and bud border, such a pattern having lost its original meaning in course of transfer to other lands. See ART. The bells of the horses referred to in Zec 14<sup>20</sup> (מִלִּי) seem more likely to be bridles, as in AVm, as a small horse-bell is not so suitable for an inscription as the long length of bridle or trappings. Small bells of the ball and slit form were used in Pal. in late Jewish times, as one was found at Tell el-Hesi.

EGYPTIAN BELLS.

W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE.

BELLOWS.—The only mention of bellows in Scripture is Jer 6<sup>29</sup> (פָּנִים). Derivation,* context, and, in particular, the evidence of the VSS (LXX φούσγυρ, Vulg. sufflatorium, Pesh. mappôhâ, Targ. Jon. פִּנְיָה, a blacksmith's bellows), confirm the traditional rendering. There is no reason for supposing that 'smelting-oven' is intended, as has been suggested by Bezold, Zeitsch. f. Assyriol. ii. 448. We do not know if the Jews had the bellows as an article of domestic furniture, the reference above being to the bellows of the metal-smelter. An excellent illustration of the bellows as used for this purpose in ancient Egypt is given by Wilkinson in his Anc. Egypt. (1854) ii. 316. The bellows there figured consist of 'a leather bag, secured and fitted into a frame, from which a large pipe extended for carrying the wind to the fire. They [the bellows] were worked by the feet, the operator standing upon them, with one under each foot, pressing them alternately, while he pulled up each exhausted skin with a string he held in his hand.' The tube or pipe seems to have been of reed, 'tipped with a metal point, to resist the action of the fire' (Wilk. loc. cit.).

BELMAIM (Βελβαμ Jth 7<sup>3</sup>, Βαλβαμ Jth 4<sup>4</sup>).—It seems to have lain south of Dothan, but the topography of Judith is very difficult. Bileam in Manasseh lay farther north than Dothan.

C. R. CONDER.

BELOVED is the tr<sup>1</sup> of אָהַב 'âhabh, to love; or דָּוִד dôdh (possibly the original of דָּוִד David) used often in Ca, elsewhere only Is 5<sup>1</sup> 'a song of my b.'; or [דָּרִי] dâdhîdh, as Ps 127<sup>2</sup> 'he giveth his b. sleep'; or מַחְמַד mahmadh, only Hos 9<sup>16</sup> 'the b. fruit of their womb.' And in NT either ἀγαπᾶω or (most freq.) ἀγαπᾶτός. The latter word has been tr<sup>1</sup> 'dearly b.' in nine places (RV always omits 'dearly'), and 'well-beloved' in three places (RV omits 'well'). 'Dearly b.' is found in OT, only Jer 12<sup>7</sup> 'the dearly b. of my soul' (דָּרִי dâdhîdhîdh, so RV). 'Well-beloved' is found Ca 1<sup>13</sup> (דָּרִי RV 'beloved'), Is 5<sup>1</sup> [דָּרִי] so RV). 'Greatly b.' is given in Dn 9<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>11, 19</sup>, in ref. to Daniel, as tr<sup>1</sup> of תְּהוֹמֹת (or תְּהוֹמֹת) hāmūdhōth, lit. 'desirable things,' thus 9<sup>23</sup> 'thou art greatly b.' = 'thou art a precious treasure.' J. HASTINGS.

BELSHAZZAR is mentioned in Dn as the son of Nebuchadrezzar, and the last reigning king of Babylon, just on the eve of its fall, before Cyrus. The word appears in the forms בִּלְשַׁצְרָר (Dn 5<sup>1</sup>) and * From בָּשַׁק to blow. The formation in Heb. denotes an instrument or tool; see Barth, Nominalbldg, etc., 1894, § 160c.

נְבֻזַּנְשַׁרְזַּא (Dn 7<sup>1</sup>). LXX and Th. read βαλτασάρ, and Jos. (Ant. x. xi. 2) says that among the Bab. he was known as son of Ναβουδάνηλος. Herodotus speaks of him as Labynetus II. son of Labynetus I. (Nebuchadrezzar). Xen. (Cyrop. vii. 5. 3) says that Babylon was taken by night while the inhabitants were revelling.

But there is one prolific source of information for this period and king, viz. the cuneiform inscriptions. In these we find that the last king of Babylon was Nabonidus (Nabū-na'id), and that his firstborn son was named Belshazzar. One method of writing the name is as follows:

Bel-sar-ra-usur, 'may Bel protect the king.' He was thus the prince-regent of the throne. The authority for these statements is the following (in Rawlinson's W. Asiatic Inscr. i. 68, col. ii. line 24 f.): 'and as for Bel-sar-ra-usur, the exalted son, the offspring of my body, do thou cause the adoration of thy great divinity to exist in his heart; may he not give way to sin; may he be satisfied with life's abundance.' There is no evidence that he was related as grandson (cf. Dn 5<sup>11</sup>) to the old monarch and creator of the new Bab. empire. According to the inser. Nabonidus was son of Nabū-balāt-su-ikhi. Rawlinson conjectures (Herodot. Essay viii. § 25) that B. may have been related to Nebuchadrezzar through his mother (Dn 5<sup>11</sup>), the wide-awake counsellor on that last fateful night. Schrader's theory (COT ii. 132 f.), that 'father' is used here in the broad signification of predecessor and ruler in the crowning period of Bab. history, is more plausible. Such usage is held by some to be paralleled by 'Jehu, son of Omri' (Layard's Inscr. p. 982; Rawl. WAI vol. iii. p. 5), when Jehu was the extirpator of Omri's dynasty. (See on other side Sayce, HCM 525 ff.) It is then just possible that the writer of Dn intended only to designate B. as a successor of king Nebuchadrezzar on the throne. It appears from at least three contract tablets (Strassmaier, Bab. Texte: Inschriften von Nabonidus, vols. i. and iii., and Tablets, Nos. 184, 581, and 683; a tr. by Sayce in RP, new ser. iii. 124-126) that B. was a man of some property, and was obliged to transact business on legal principles. On one tablet we find that 'the secretary of B., the son of the king,' Nebo-yukin-akhi, leases a house for a term of three years, for one and one-half manehs of silver, subletting of the house being forbidden, as well as interest on the money. Dated, '5th year of Nabonidus king of Bab.,' i.e. B.C. 551. On the second tablet facts of greater interest appear: 'The sum of 20 manehs of silver for wool, the property of B., the son of the king, which has been handed over to Iddin-Merodach . . . through the agency of Nebo-zabib the steward of the house of B., the son of the king, and the secretaries of the son of the king . . . The house of . . . the Persian and all his property in town and country shall be the security of B., the son of the king, until he shall pay in full the money aforesaid.' Dated, '11th year of Nabonidus king' [of Bab.], i.e. B.C. 545. On the third tablet, a steward, Nebo-zabib-ida, of the house of B., had lent through a loan-broker a sum of money, and taken as security the crops to be grown near Babylon. Dated at Babylon, the 27th day of the second Adar, the 12th year of Nabonidus, king of Babylon, i.e. B.C. 544.

There is now ample evidence that this 'son of the king' held a high office under his father-king. On an annalistic tablet of Nabonidus (cf. Pinches in TSBA vii. 153 ff.), the prince-regent, in the 7th year of his father's reign, was with the army in Akkad with the chief men of the kingdom, the king himself being in Tema. This describes the same condition of things in the 9th, 10th, and 11th years. In the 17th year Cyrus led his forces across the boundary lines of Babylonia. Nabonidus, with the army stationed in Akkad, attempted to defend Sippar against the invader. But on the 14th of Tammuz the city fell, without a stroke, into the hands of Cyrus, and Nabonidus fled. On the 16th the general of the army of Cyrus, Gobryas, entered Babylon 'without fighting.' Neither during nor after the battle at Sippar do we find the name of B. on the somewhat mutilated and broken inscriptions within our reach. By some (e.g. Schrader) he is thought to have perished in a battle at Akkad; acc. to others (as Pinches and Hommel), he was slain in the final taking of Babylon.

BELTESHAZZAR (נְבֻזַּנְשַׁרְזַּא, βαλτασάρ), the Chaldean name given to Daniel (Dn 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>3</sup> 5<sup>12</sup>). Opinions differ as to whether the first part of the compound contains the name of Bel (male) or of Beltis or Bilat (female). The latter view is supported by Sir H. Rawlinson and Sayce, the former by Canon Rawlinson (Ancient Monarchies, iii. 82). Those who derive the word from Bel have explained it in different ways. (1) It is asserted that Bel is here a genitive form, and that zar=sar (שָׂר)=prince: 'the prince whom Bel favours' (Ges.). (2) The word is regarded as a contraction for Bel-balāt-su-usur= 'Bel protect his life' (Fried. Delitzsch). (3) It is derived from Bel, tisha (Heb. שָׂרִישׁ 'a secret') and usur (שָׂר)=to guard—the composition of the elements giving a meaning which might be considered appropriate in the case of Daniel.

BEN (בֶּן 'son').—A Levite, 1 Ch 15<sup>18</sup>, omitted in parallel list in v. 20 in both MT and LXX. The latter omits it also in the first-named passage.

BEN-ABINADAB (בְּנֵי-אֲבִינָדָב, AV 'son of Abinadab').—One of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4<sup>11</sup>).

BENAIHAH (בְּנֵי-חַיָּה, 'J' hath built up').—1. Son of Jehoiada, a priest (see JEHOIADA) of Kabzeel, a town in the S. of Judah (Jos 15<sup>21</sup>). B. is an example of the silent faithful soldier. A 'mighty man' rather than a general, he is not specially mentioned in the history of David's campaigns, but was captain of the bodyguard of Cherethites (Carites, 2 S 20<sup>23</sup>, Kethibh, cf. 2 K 11<sup>4</sup>) and Pelethites (2 S 8<sup>18</sup>). The RVm 'council' for 'guard' in 2 S 23<sup>23</sup> is supported by the LXX and Vulg., and by 1 Ch 27<sup>34</sup>, if we read with Bertheau and Graf 'after Ahithophel was Benaiah, son of Jehoiada' (instead of 'J. son of B.'), as 'king's counsellor.' He was captain of the host for the third month, his lieutenant being his son Ammizabad (1 Ch 27<sup>6, 9</sup>).

His special exploits indicate a man of extraordinary activity. They are detailed in 2 S 23<sup>20ff</sup>. (copied 1 Ch 11<sup>22</sup>). (a) 'He slew the two [sons of] Ariel [of] Moab,' which probably means two champions of Moabitish sanctuaries (Sayce, HCM pp. 349, 376. But see Budde ad loc. in Haupt's OT). (b) A lion having been, in winter time, driven by hunger near human habitations, and fallen into a pit or dry well, Benaiah descended into it and killed the wild beast. (c) He encountered an Egyptian champion (5 cubits high, Ch) whose spear was like the side of a ladder, ὡς ἐξέλον διαβδόχας (Ewald, the beam of a bridge, EV 'like a weaver's beam'). Benaiah, who was armed only with a staff, grappled with his cumbrously armed antagonist, and slew him with his own spear. These feats gave him a place above

'the thirty,' and last of the second three mighty men; the others being Abishai, and probably Joab. It is implied (2 S 15<sup>18</sup>) that he accompanied David in his flight from Absalom, and he remained faithful during Adonijah's rebellion (1 K 1<sup>8-10, 26</sup>). At David's request he assisted Zadok and Nathan in the coronation of Solomon (vv. 32, 38, 44). On this occasion he makes a speech to David, which is re-echoed by the king's servants (v. 47). As chief of the bodyguard he executed Adonijah (1 K 2<sup>25</sup>), Joab (v. 20<sup>ff.</sup>), and Shimei (v. 46). He succeeded Joab as captain of the host under Solomon (1 K 2<sup>35</sup> 4<sup>4</sup>). 2. (2 S 23<sup>30</sup>, 1 Ch 11<sup>31</sup>) One of David's mighty men, of Pirathon in Ephraim (Jg 12<sup>13, 15</sup>). He was captain of the host for the eleventh month (1 Ch 27<sup>14</sup>). 3. (1 Ch 4<sup>30</sup>) A prince of Simeon. 4. (1 Ch 15<sup>18, 20</sup> 16<sup>5</sup>) A Levite singer, in David's time, 'of the second degree,' who played 'with psalteries set to Alamoth.' 5. (1 Ch 15<sup>24</sup> 16<sup>9</sup>) A priest, in David's time, who 'did blow with the trumpets before the ark.' 6. (2 Ch 20<sup>14</sup>) An Asaphite Levite, ancestor of Jahaziel. 7. (2 Ch 31<sup>13</sup>) A Levite, in Hezekiah's time, one of the overseers of the dedicated things. 8, 9, 10, 11. (Ezr 10<sup>25, 26, 35, 43</sup>) Four of those who 'had taken strange wives.' In 1 Es 9<sup>26, 31, 34, 35</sup>, Baucas, Naidus, Mamdai, Banains respectively. 12. (Ezk 11<sup>13</sup>) Father of Pelatiah, one of the 'princes of the people.'

BEN-AMMI (בן אמי 'son of my people') the son of Lot's younger daughter. According to the popular Heb. tradition, preserved in Gn 19<sup>38</sup>, he was the ancestor of the Ammonite nation, the father of the בני אמי. But the explanation in this narrative, that 'Ammon' is equivalent to Ben-ammi, rests on no scientific foundation, and, like the derivation given of Moab in the same context, is based on the resemblance in the sound of the two words. The name 'Ammi,' which is found in the cuneiform inscriptions as part of the title of Ammonite sovereigns, e.g. Ammi-nadab, has been identified with a deity (Derenbourg, Rev. Etudes Juives, 1881, p. 123 f.; Halévy, J.A. vii. 19, p. 480 f.; but see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 49 f.). Traces of this deity are perhaps to be found in the Heb. names Ammiel, Amminadab, Ammielud, Ammi-shaddai. According to Sayce (Patr. Pal. p. 22), Ammi or Annu was the name of the god who gave his name to the nation; and the same scholar conjectures that 'even the name of Balaam, the Aramaean seer, may be compounded with that of the god' (p. 64). We find it (Ammi) in the proper names both of S. and of N.-W. Arabia. The early Mincan inscriptions of S. Arabia contain names like Ammi-karib, Ammi-zadika, and Ammi-zaduk (p. 63). Sayce mentions also the Babylonian king Ammi-satana, and the Edomite Ammianshu. This gives a more probable origin for the name Ammon than the one recorded in Gn 19<sup>30-38</sup>, which has been said to emanate from racial hostility. The Hebrew legend has probably attributed the foulness of Ammonite religious rites to hereditary taint, for which a play on the names Moab and Ammon offered an explanation.

BEN-DEKER (בן דקר 'son of Deker'; vids Πῆξας B, vids Πῆξας Luc., vids Δακάρ A. Deker perhaps means sharp, piercing instrument, as in Talmud).—Patronymic of one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers (1 K 4<sup>9</sup>).

BENEFACITOR.—1k 22<sup>25</sup> only, 'they that exercise authority over them (the Gentiles) are called benefactors.' The word is an exact tr<sup>n</sup> of the Gr. Εὐεργέτης, a title of honour borne by two of the Gr. kings of Egypt before Christ's day, Ptolemy III. (B.C. 247-222) and Ptolemy IX. (B.C. 147-117). Hence RV properly spells with a capital, 'Benefactors.' J. HASTINGS.

BENE-JAAKAN (בְּנֵי יָכָן).—A station in the journeyings, mentioned Nu 33<sup>31, 32</sup> (cf. Dt 10<sup>6</sup>, and see BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN). A. T. CHAPMAN.

BENEVOLENCE.—1 Co 7<sup>3</sup> only, 'Let the husband render unto the wife due b.' where b. is used in the sense of affection. This tr<sup>n</sup>, which is due to Tiudale, follows TR τῇ ὀφειλόμενῃ ἐκδοῦναι; but all edd. give simply τῇ ὀφειλόμενῃ, whence RV 'her due'; cf. Rheims 'his dette.' The Gr. word ἐκδοῦναι thus occurs only in Eph 6<sup>7</sup>, 'goodwill' EV; the verb is found Mt 5<sup>28</sup> 'Agree with (τοῦ ἐκδοῦναι) thine adversary quickly.' J. HASTINGS.

BEN-GEBER (בֶּן גִּבְרִי, AV 'son of Geber,' which see).—Patronymic of one of Solomon's 12 commissariat officers who had charge of a district N.E. of the Jordan (1 K 4<sup>13</sup>). C. F. BURNEY.

BEN-HADAD (בֶּן חֲדָד, vids Ἀδερ, Benadad).—Three kings of Damascus of this name are mentioned in the OT. Ben-hadad i., the son of Tab-rimmon, the son of Hezion (? Rezon), was bribed by Asa of Judah, with the treasures of the temple and palace, to attack Baasha of Israel while the latter was building the fortress of Ramah, and thereby blocking the Jewish high-road to the north. Asa urged that there had been alliance between his father and Tab-rimmon; but his gold was doubtless more efficacious in inducing Ben-hadad to invade the northern part of Israel, and so oblige Baasha to desert Ramah. Thereupon Asa carried away the stone and timber of Ramah, and built with them Geba and Mizpah (1 K 15<sup>18-22</sup>). Ben-hadad ii. was the son and successor of Ben-hadad i. We have an account of his war with Ahab, and unsuccessful siege of Samaria, in 1 K 20. Thirty-two kings are said to have been his vassals or allies. He was, however, signally defeated at Aphek, and compelled to restore the cities taken by his father (1 K 20<sup>34</sup>), as well as to grant the Israelites a bazaar in Damascus. At a later period Ben-hadad again besieged Samaria; but a panic fell upon his army, and they fled, believing that the king of Israel had hired against them 'the kings of the Hittites and the kings of the Egyptians' (2 K 7<sup>6-7</sup>). Having fallen ill, Ben-hadad afterwards sent Hazael to the prophet Elisha, who had come to Damascus, to ask whether he should recover; but the result of the mission was, that on the following day Hazael smothered his master and seized the crown (2 K 8<sup>7-15</sup>). Ben-hadad iii. was the son of Hazael, and lost the Israelitish conquests that his father had made. Thrice did Joash of Israel 'smite him, and recovered the cities of Israel' (2 K 13<sup>25</sup>).

Ben-hadad, 'son of the god Hadad,' is a Hebraised form of the Aram. Bar-hadad, which appears in the Assyrian inscriptions as Bar-hadad and Bir-dadda. Bar-hadad was a prince of northern Mesopotamia, who was put to death by Assur-nazir-pal, and Bir-dadda is mentioned by Assur-bani-pal as a north Arabian prince (WAI iii. 24. 10). Hadad, Dadda, or Dad, and Addu, are stated by the cuneiform lexical tablets to be variant forms of the same divine name, the god Hadad being further identified in them with Rimmon. But it would seem that, like Hadad, Bar-hadad was also a divine name, and denoted the younger deity whom the Syrians associated with his father, the sun-god. A Bab. contract, dated in the ninth year of Nabonidus (B.C. 547), relates to a certain Syrian called Bar-hadad-nathan, who had adopted Bar-hadad-amar as a son. As the Jews Hebraised Bar-hadad into Ben-hadad, so the Babylonians changed it into Abil-hadad, abil being the Babylonian word for 'son.'

It follows from this that Bar-hadad or Ben-hadad cannot have been the full name of a king. And the Assyrian inscriptions prove that such was the case. They have much to tell us about Ben-hadad II., whom they call Dad-idri, the Hebraised form of which is found in the OT as Hadad-ezer. In B.C. 853 Dad-idri and his allies were utterly defeated at Karkar on the Orontes by Shalmaneser II. of Assyria. The king of Damascus had brought into the field 1200 chariots, 1200 horses, and 20,000 men; his allies were Irkhulini of Hamath, with 700 chariots, 700 horses, and 10,000 men; Ahab of Israel, with 2000 chariots and 10,000 men; the Kuans, from the Gulf of Antioch, with 500 men; 1000 Egyptians; 10 chariots, and 10,000 men from the land of Irkanat (Arka); Matinu-baal of Arvad with 200 men; 200 men from Usanat (near Tyre); Adoni-baal of the Sinites with 10,000 men; Gindibu the Arab with 1000 camels, and Baasha the son of Rehob of Ammon with more than 100 men. The battle must have been fought shortly before Ahab's death and his final rupture with Ben-hadad (1 K 22<sup>1-2</sup>). Shalmaneser states in one passage that 20,500—in another passage 14,000—of the enemy were left dead on the field.

Five years later Dad-idri was again defeated by Shalmaneser, and in B.C. 845 Shalmaneser entered Syria with 120,000 men and overthrew the combined forces of Dad-idri, Irkhulini, and 'the twelve kings of the coast of the upper and lower sea.' Professor Schrader is doubtless right in thinking that by the latter expression are meant the Phœnician and north Syrian portions of the Mediterranean. Four years later Shalmaneser's opponent in Damascus was Hazael, so that Dad-idri (Ben-hadad-ezer) must have died between B.C. 845 and 841.

BEN-HAIL (בְּנֵי הַיֵּל 'son of might').—A prince sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17). (But see Gray, Heb. Pr. Names, 65, 231.)

BEN-HANAN (בְּנֵי חָנָן 'son of a gracious one').—A man of Judah (1 Ch 4<sup>20</sup>).

BEN-HESED (בְּנֵי חֶסֶד, AV 'Son of Hese' [= 'kindness']).—Patronymic of one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers who had charge of a district in Judah (1 K 4<sup>19</sup>). C. F. BURNEY.

BENINU (בְּנֵינוּ, perhaps 'our son').—One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10<sup>13</sup>).

BENJAMIN (בִּנְיָמִן, or more usually בִּנְיָמִן bin-yāmīn, 'son of the right-hand,' Beniampel).—1. The youngest of the sons of Jacob. He was born between Bethel and Ephrath, and Rachel died in giving him birth. As she was at the point of death she named him Ben-oni (בְּנֵי אֹנִי 'son of my sorrow,' LXX υἱος ὀδυνης μου), but Jacob changed it to Benjamin, probably to avoid the evil omen of the name Benoni (Gn 35<sup>18</sup>). He and Joseph were full brothers, they being the only sons of Jacob by Rachel, and he was the only son of Jacob born in Canaan. That he is enumerated by P among the sons born in Paddan-aram (Gn 35<sup>24-26</sup>) need not be pressed. At the time of the famine (Gn 42 ff.) Joseph insisted that he should come down with his brethren on their second visit to Egypt to buy corn. Jacob is most reluctant to send him, but Judah (according to J, Reuben according to E) answers for his safety, and he goes. On his arrival, according to E, Joseph makes himself known to his brethren, and gives B.

300 pieces of silver and five changes of raiment. According to J, he gives B. a mess five times as large as that given to the others; then brings them back after their departure, and threatens to keep B. as his slave because the silver cup is found in his sack; and, moved by the eloquent appeal of Judah, declares who he is. At this time B. is represented as quite young, 'a little one,' and the pet of the family (Gn 44<sup>20</sup>). But in Gn 46<sup>21</sup> he is spoken of as the father of ten sons, who are unquestionably regarded as going down to Egypt with Jacob (Gn 46<sup>26</sup>). There is no need to reconcile these incompatible views, as the latter belongs to one of the latest strata in the Hex., being probably due to R.

It is held by many modern critics that B. is not a hist. character, but the eponymous ancestor of the tribe. If so, the account in Gn will throw light on the early history of the tribe. The tribal system, as we have it in the biblical history, is probably not earlier than the conquest of Canaan. Originally there were Leah tribes and Rachel tribes. To the latter belonged the tribes grouped under the name of Bilhah, and the tribe of Joseph. To the tribe of Joseph it would seem that B. originally belonged, but became a distinct tribe earlier than Manasseh and Ephraim, which were always recognised as belonging to Joseph, while B. was regarded as, like Joseph, a son of Jacob. But we find a trace of the earlier view in 2 S 19<sup>20</sup>, where Shimei, a Benjamite, speaks of himself as belonging to the house of Joseph. It is also probable that B. was the latest formed of the tribes, except Ephraim and Manasseh; and the record of the birth in Canaan (Gn 35<sup>18</sup>) is a reminiscence of this formation after the conquest.

The territory of the tribe adjoined that of Ephraim. Its limits and the towns in it are given in Jos 18<sup>11-28</sup>, a passage which belongs to the late document P. According to this, it was bounded on the E. by the Jordan, on the N. by a line passing from Jordan by Jericho on the N. to Bethel, and thence to Beth-horon; on the W. by a line passing from Beth-horon to Kiriath-jearim; and on the S. by a line reaching from Beth-horon to the N. bay at the Salt Sea, keeping Jerus. on the N. Twenty-six towns are mentioned, the chief of which are Jericho, Bethel, Geba, Gibeon, Ramah, Mizpeh, Jerusalem, Gibeath, and Kiriath. It is not certain, however, whether all these towns properly belonged to B. Bethel is regarded by Jg 1<sup>22</sup> as belonging to 'the house of Joseph,' and it certainly belonged to the N. kingdom, though this does not preclude the view that it was in the territory of B. The case of Jerus. is somewhat similar. It stood near the border line that divided B. from Judah, and the Jews spoke of the temple itself as in B., while its courts were in Judah. Till the time of David it was in the hands of the Jebusites. There are some indications that before the Exile Jerus. was reckoned to Judah. Thus (Jer 37<sup>12</sup>) 'Jeremiah went forth out of Jerusalem to go into the land of B.' On the other hand, in the blessing of Moses, the temple is certainly regarded as in B.: 'Of B. he said, The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him; he covereth him all the day long, and he dwelleth between his shoulders' (Dt 33<sup>12</sup>). Jer 6<sup>1</sup> 'Flee for safety, ye children of B., out of the midst of Jerus.,' has little bearing on the point.

The character of the country was fitted to breed a race of hardy warriors rather than peaceful agriculturists. The level of the country was more than 2000 ft. above the sea, and it was studded with many hills. G. A. Smith has thus described it: 'A desolate and fatiguing extent of rocky platforms and ridges, of moorland strewn with boulders, and fields of shallow soil thickly mixed with stone, they are a true border,—more fit for the building of barriers than the cultivation of food' (Hist. Geog. p. 290). This had its influence on the character of the tribe, which is graphically depicted in the blessing of Jacob: 'B. is a wolf that ravineth: in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at even he shall divide the spoil' (Gn 49<sup>27</sup>). And the character of the land helped B. to play its magnificent part in the warfare against the Philistines. Several important roads ran through it towards Judah and Jerus., and these were commanded by its fortresses. Michmash, Geba, Ramah, Adasa, Gibeon, formed 'a line of defence that was valid against the Aijalon and Ai ascents, as well as against the level approach from the N.' (Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 291), while Bethel commands the routes from Gophna and Shechem, and 'a road from the Jordan Valley through the passes of Mt. Ephraim.' From the E. and W. sides, passes strike up into the heart of the country, those on the E. side being much the more difficult. Through the western passes the Philistines delivered their attacks against the tribe.

The history of B. is important till the time of Saul only. The tribe took part in the campaign of Deborah and Barak against Sisera (Jg 5<sup>14</sup>). The narrative in Jg 19-21 also falls in the period of the Judges, but calls for special discussion. It was in connexion with the Philistine oppression that the greatest work of B. was done. The narrative is in parts concise and obscure, so that the exact development of events is hard to follow. But the movement for the deliverance of Israel that proved ultimately successful, seems to have originated in B. The anointing of a king was for the breaking of the Philistine yoke, and he was selected from the tribe of B. And it was within B. itself that the movement for freedom began. (See SAUL.)

On the death of Saul, his own tribe B. naturally remained faithful to his house. The army of Ishbosheth, commanded by Abner, seems to have consisted chiefly of Benjamites. In the ferocious combat, when twelve men of Abner engaged twelve of Joab's army, the former are spoken of as 'twelve for B.' (2 S 2<sup>15</sup>), and Abner's soldiers are referred to as 'the children of B.' (2<sup>25</sup>). In the subsequent negotiations between David and Abner, special mention is made of B. apart from the rest of Israel ('and Abner had communication with the elders of Israel . . . And Abner also spake in the ears of B.: and Abner went also to speak in the ears of David in Hebron all that seemed good to Israel and to the whole house of B.,' 2 S 3<sup>17-19</sup>). After Ishbosheth had been murdered by two Benjamites, David became king over the whole of Israel. But the hate of him was not dead in B. When he fled from Jerus. on the occasion of Absalom's rebellion, it was a Benjamite of the house of Saul, Shimei, who pursued him with curses (2 S 16<sup>5</sup>). And when, through David's unwise partiality for Judah, dispute arose between the latter and the other tribes, it was a Benjamite, Sheba, who raised the standard of revolt (2 S 19, 20).

It is therefore natural to expect that, when the revolt took place from Rehoboam, B. should throw in its lot with the seceding tribes, and not with Judah. It is, however, stated explicitly in some passages, that B. remained with Judah (1 K 12<sup>21, 23</sup>, 2 Ch 11<sup>10, 12, 23</sup> 14<sup>8</sup> 15<sup>2, 9</sup> etc.). But there are other passages which point another way. Thus in 1 K 12<sup>29</sup> we read 'there was none that followed the house of David but the tribe of Judah only.' The prophecy of Ahijah is a little ambiguous; the garment is rent into twelve pieces, of which ten are given to Jeroboam with the explanation that he is to have ten tribes. But the house of David is to have, not two tribes, but one (1 K 11<sup>20-27</sup>). If Levi is omitted, and Ephraim and Manasseh counted as one tribe, Israel would consist of eleven tribes, and B. would then be reckoned among the ten tribes. The truth is, probably, that B. as a whole joined the revolt. But owing to its nearness to Judah, and especially to the fact that Jerus., the capital city of Judah, was, even if not wholly in B., yet on the border, the S. part of the tribe can hardly have escaped union with Judah. After the overthrow of the N. kingdom, the territory of B. largely fell into the hands of Judah, and many Benjamites are mentioned among those who returned from exile. The Apostle Paul belonged to this tribe.

One incident in the history of the tribe has been left for separate examination. This is the outrage at Gibeah, and almost entire destruction of B., in consequence of its support of the perpetrators (Jg 19-21). The narrative as it stands presents insuperable difficulties. These are chiefly to be found in the account of the war with B. (Jg 20). Israel is spoken of as a 'congregation,' and represented as acting together as one man, unlike everything else we know of the period. The size of the army raised (400,000) is quite incredible, and the incidents of the campaign no less so. B. with 26,700 destroys in two days 40,000 Israelites, but does not lose a single man. On the third day the whole tribe of B. is destroyed, with the exception of 600 men. The date given for this is vague; it is said to have been in the days of Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron. This chapter presents close points of contact with P in the Hex. Critics are generally agreed that its representations are on that account unhistorical. But it is a matter of dispute whether this judgment should be passed on the whole story. Some (e.g. Wellhausen) regard it as a post-ex. fiction, intended to throw discredit on Saul and his tribe and family. The outrage takes place in Gibeah, a place specially connected with Saul; and that it is perpetrated on a Levite increases its heinousness; while the inhospitable character of the inhabitants comes out, not only in their disgraceful conduct, but in the fact that the only man who offers entertainment is not a native of the place. Saul's tribe consents to the crime, and refuses to surrender the authors of it. Jabesh-gilead, which Saul had rescued from the Ammonites, and whose inhabitants had rescued Saul's body from the Phil., is the only place which did not join in the holy war against B., and is destroyed for this. The details also recall the conduct of the men of Sodom. It is true that the coincidences with points in Saul's history are very striking. Yet it is difficult to resist the conviction that there must be a hist. basis for chs. 19 and 21, and for so much of ch. 20 as relates the extermination of a large part of the tribe. That the whole of Israel took part cannot be maintained; perhaps Judah (20<sup>18</sup>), to which the murdered woman belonged, took the chief part in inflicting vengeance. See Moore (Judges, in loc.), who argues forcibly for the view taken here.

Father of Balaam, Nu 22<sup>5</sup> 24<sup>15</sup> J, Jos 24<sup>9</sup> E (LXX omits), also Nu 31<sup>8</sup>, Dt 23<sup>4</sup>, Jos 13<sup>22</sup>, Mic 6<sup>5</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>15</sup> (Hosor, AV and RVm). 2. Father of Behu, king of Edom, Gn 36<sup>32</sup> J, 1 Ch 14<sup>2</sup>. G. H. BATTERSBY.

BERA (בְּרָא, etym. and meaning unknown).—King of Sodom at time of Chedorlaomer's invasion (Gn 14<sup>2</sup>).

BERACAH (בְּרָכָה 'blessing,' AV Berachah).—One of Saul's brethren who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12<sup>3</sup>).

BERACAH, Valley (בְּרָכָה), 2 Ch 20<sup>26</sup> only.—'The valley of blessing,' where Jehoshaphat gave thanks for victory over the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites, who had marched from Engedi to Tekoa (vv. 2-20). The name survives at the ruin Breikut on the main road from Jerusalem to Hebron, west of Tekoa. See further in Robinson, BE ii. 189; Thomson, Land and Book, i. 317; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. of Holy Land, 272; and SWP vol. iii. sheet xxi.

BERAIAH (בְּרִיאָה 'J' hath created').—A man of Benjamin (1 Ch 8<sup>21</sup>).

BEREA (Βερέα, 1 Mac 9<sup>4</sup>).—See BERGIA.

BEREAVE, now restricted to the loss of relatives or friends, once meant to deprive of any possession. Thus Ec 4<sup>8</sup> 'For whom do I labour, and b. (RV 'deprive,' Heb. כִּסֵּף) my soul of good?' In this sense 'bereft,' an alternative past tense and past ptp. with 'bereaved,' is still used. Bereft, not in AV, is given by RV at 1 Ti 6<sup>9</sup> 'b. of the truth' (AV 'destitute,' Gr. ἀπεστερημένος). RV also introduces bereavement, Is 49<sup>20</sup> 'The children of thy b.' בְּנֵי שִׁלְלָה, that is, says Cheyne, who adopts the same rendering, 'those born while Zion thought herself bereft of all her children'; AV 'the children which thou shalt have, after thou hast lost the other'. RV introduces further the very rare word bereaver, Ezk 36<sup>18</sup> 'a b. of thy nation,' of which the latest example found by Oxf. Eng. Dict. is in W. Hall, Man's Gt. Enemy (1624): 'Of soule and bodie's good hee's a bereauer.'

J. HASTINGS.

BERECHIAH (בְּרִכְיָה, abbrev. from בְּרִכְיָהוּ 'J' blesseth').—1. Father of Asaph (1 Ch 6<sup>30</sup>, AV Berachiah). 2. Son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3<sup>20</sup>). 3. Father of Meshullam, one of Nehemiah's chiefs (Neh 3<sup>4</sup>, 80 6<sup>13</sup>). 4. A Levite guard of the ark (1 Ch 9<sup>18</sup> 23<sup>20</sup>). 5. Father of the prophet Zechariah (Zec 1<sup>1</sup>). 6. An Ephraimite chief (2 Ch 28<sup>12</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

J. A. SELBIE.

BERED (Person).—See BECHER.

BERED (בְּרֵד 'hail'(?), Gn 16<sup>14</sup>).—1. A place between Beersheba and Beer-lahai-roi. The Targum of pseudo-Jonathan identifies it with Halusa, now Halusah, the Elusa of Ptolemy, where there are extensive ruins 13 miles south of Beersheba. The ecclesiastical history of Elusa in this era is given by Robinson, i. 201, 202. Jerome says the inhabitants in his time called it Barac. Possibly this was the correct name, as such a change is not likely to occur in speech, but could very easily indeed be made in writing by the change of ב into ר. At Halusah there is a distinct bend on the hills and the valley between them, such as might most naturally suggest the name בְּרֵד 'a knee.' See map in Trumbull's Kadesh Barnea.

A. HENDERSON.

W. H. BENNETT.

BERIAH (בְּרִיָּה).—The etymology is quite uncertain, the root ברע not being used in Hebrew. The root occurs in Arabic in the senses of mount, excel, be magnificent. The name may have meant distinguished, hero, or chieftain. The statement in 1 Ch 7<sup>23</sup> that Beriah 2 was so called 'because it went evil בְּרִיָּה, lit. 'in evil' with his house,' indicates what the name in course of time may have come to suggest, and does not give its original etymology. 1. A son of Asher, and the clan descended from him. Gn 46<sup>17</sup> (P, probably late stratum), Nu 26<sup>44-46</sup> (P), 1 Ch 7<sup>30, 31</sup> include B. among the sons of Asher, and make him the ancestor of the clans of Heber and Malchiel, who are mentioned as his sons. In the LXX, however, of Nu 26<sup>45</sup> (LXX 20) the clause 'of the sons of Beriah' is omitted, probably by an oversight, so that Heber and Malchiel appear as direct descendants of Asher. In Nu 26<sup>44</sup>, B. is the ancestor of 'the clan of the Berites' (בְּרִיתֵי הַבְּרִיָּה). 2. A son of Ephraim, and a clan descended from him. This clan in later times included large Benjamite elements. B. is not included in the list of Ephraimite clans in Nu 26<sup>35-37</sup> (P); but in 1 Ch 7<sup>20-23</sup> we read, 'And the sons of Ephraim; Shuthelah, and Bered his son, and Tahath his son, and Eleadah his son, and Tahath his son, and Zabab his son, and Shuthelah his son, and Ezer, and Elead, whom the men of Gath that were born in the land slew, because they came down to take away their cattle. And Ephraim, their father, mourned many days, and his brethren came in to comfort him. And he went in to his wife, and she conceived, and he called his name B., because it went evil with his house.' The mention of Ephraim at first sight suggests that this episode occurred at the beginning of the sojourn in Egypt; but Ezer and Elead appear to be brothers of the second Shuthelah, and six generations are mentioned between them and Ephraim. They came down to Gath, presumably from the neighbouring highlands of Ephraim. 'Ephraim' and 'his brethren' can scarcely mean the patriarchs, who lived and died in Egypt. Actual sons of Ephraim must have come from Egypt, across the desert, past Phil. and Can. towns. A simple and probable explanation seems to be that the chronicler is using a natural and common (cf. Jg 21<sup>6-9</sup>) figure to describe the distress in the tribe of Ephraim when two of its clans were cut off, the sympathy of the neighbouring tribes, and the fact that a new clan Beriah was formed to replace those that were cut off. This new clan was partly Benjamite. In 1 Ch 8<sup>18</sup> we read of two Benjamites, 'Beriah and Shema, who were heads of fathers' houses of the inhabitants of Aijalon, who put to flight the inhabitants of Gath.' The episode was probably somewhat as follows:—Two Ephraimite clans, Ezer and Elead, set out to drive the cattle 'of the men of Gath, who were born in the land,' i.e. of the aboriginal Avvites, who had been dispossessed by the Philistines, but still retained some pasture lands. The Ephraimites were defeated, and nearly all the fighting men of the two clans perished. The victors invaded Ephraim, whose border districts, stripped of their defenders, lay at the mercy of the enemy. The Benjamite clans Beriah and Shema, then occupying Aijalon, came to the rescue and drove back the invaders. The grateful Ephraimites invited their allies to occupy the vacant territory, and, in all probability, to marry the widows and daughters of their slaughtered kinsmen. Hence B. is sometimes reckoned as Ephraimite and sometimes as Benjamite. (Cf. Bertheau, also Expositor's Bible, on 1 Ch 7 and 8.) 3. A Levite of the clan Gershom, 1 Ch 23<sup>10, 11</sup>.

W. H. BENNETT.

BERITES (בְּרִיתִים) occurs only in the account of Joab's pursuit of the rebel Sheba, in the obscure and doubtful passage 2 S 20<sup>15-16</sup>. 'Joab . . . went through all the tribes of Israel unto Abel, and to Beth-maacah, and all the Berites: and they were gathered together, and went also after him. And they came and besieged him in Abel,' etc. (RV). The MT apparently intends to state that Joab came to the district of the Berites, possibly descendants of BERI, and that all the tribes of Israel gathered together, etc. According, however, to Driver, Text of Samuel, 264, the MT yields no intelligible sense if 'all the Berites' is coupled to what precedes; went after (וַתֵּלֶךְ אַחֲרָיו) must mean to go into a place after any one. He understands that Sheba went through all the tribes of Israel to Abel, and the Berites—or rather Bichrites (see below)—followed him into Abel as allies. Both Driver and Budde (Sam. in Haupt's Sacred Books of OT) follow Klostermann in reading בִּכְרִית Bichrites, for בְּרִית Berites, after the LXX ἐν Xappel. Sheba is styled 'ben Bikhri.' Many others read בְּכָרִים choice young men, after Vulg. virī electi.

BERNICE or BERENICE (Βερνίκη).—See HEROD.

BERCEA.—Two places bearing this name fall to be noticed, along with a third which appears as Berea. 1. Berea (Βέροια or Βέρροια), a Macedonian city, which was the scene of brief but fruitful missionary work by St. Paul, after Jewish hostility had driven him away from Thessalonica (Ac 17<sup>10-14</sup>). It was situated in the district called Emathia (Ptol. iii. 12), at the eastern base of Mount Bermius (Strabo, vii. 26), about 30 miles S. of Pella, and 50 S.W. of Thessalonica. It was an old town, whose natural advantages in a well-watered and fertile district gave to it considerable population and importance, which it still retains under the name of Verrin or Kara Fera (see the interesting description in Leake, NG iii. 290-292). The Jewish residents in St. Paul's time were not only numerous enough to have a synagogue, like those in Thessalonica, but are commended as nobler in disposition (ἐὐγενέστεροι) than they, in respect of their readiness to receive the word preached, and daily to examine what they heard by the light of their own Scriptures; so that many Jews believed, as well as not a few women of Greek nationality and 'honourable estate' (ἐσχατημέναι). When Jewish zealots from Thessalonica came thither and stirred up fresh troubles, the newly-converted 'brethren' at once sent St. Paul out of the city 'to go as far as to' (ἐως, rather than ὡς='as it were') the sea, by which he went on to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy behind at Berea. Sopater, another of St. Paul's associates, is designated as a Berean (Ac 20<sup>6</sup>). Tradition made Onesimus first bishop of the Church (Const. Ap. vii. 46).

2. In 2 Mac 13<sup>4</sup> Berea appears as the place at which Antiochus Eupator caused Menelaus, the former high priest, to be put to death. This Berea was the well-known Syrian town now called Haleb or Aleppo; it lay between Hicropolis and Antioch, about one and a half day's journey from either; it was named by Seleucus Nikator after the Macedonian city; it became in the Middle Ages the capital of a Saracenic power, resuming its earlier name of Haleb; and though it has suffered much during the present century from earthquake, plague, and cholera, it remains an imposing and important city of about 100,000 inhabitants.

3. At 1 Mac 9<sup>4</sup> Berea (Βερέα) is mentioned as a place to which Bacchides, after 'encamping against Jerusalem,' removed, while Judas lay encamped at Elasa prior to the battle in which the latter fell. It is now generally identified with Beeroth (Jos 9<sup>17</sup>) or Beroth (1 Es 5<sup>19</sup>), the modern Birch, situated about ten miles north of Jerus., on the main road to Nablus and the north. For description of ruined church there, see SWP vol. iii. p. 88 f.

BEROTH.—See BEEROTH.

BEROTHAH (בְּרוֹתָהָ, Ezk 47<sup>16</sup>; Berothal (בְּרוֹתָהָ), 2 S 8<sup>6</sup>, but in 1 Ch 18<sup>6</sup>, Cun (see Kittel, ad loc.).—A Syrian city. The first cited passage seems to show that Berōt is not intended, since the town lay between Hamath and Damascus. The name probably signifies 'fir trees,' and is thought to survive in Wady Brissa, on the eastern slope of Lebanon, near Kadash on the Orontes.

BEROTHITE (בְּרוֹתִי, 1 Ch 11<sup>30</sup>; Beerothite (בְּרוֹתִי), 2 S 42<sup>2, 5, 6</sup> 23<sup>37</sup>.—An inhabitant of Beeroth.

BERYL.—See STONES, PRECIOUS.

BERZELUS.—See ZORZELLEUS.

BESAI (בְּסַי).—'Children of B.,' Nethinim who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2<sup>40</sup>, Neh 7<sup>22</sup>; = Basthai, 1 Es 5<sup>21</sup>).

BESIDE, BESIDES.—These two forms seem to have been used in 1611 (and earlier) indifferently; cf. Mk 3<sup>21</sup> 'He is beside himself,' 2 Co 5<sup>13</sup> 'whether we be besides (so 1611) ourselves,' and Ac 26<sup>24</sup> 'Paul, thou art beside thyself'; again, as to Ac 26<sup>24</sup>, Tindale, who introduces this tr<sup>1</sup>, has 'besides,' Cranmer 'beside,' the Geneva 'besides,' AV 'beside.' Modern edd. of AV give 'beside' 125 times, 'besides' only 8 times, but in ed. of 1611 the relative proportion was closer.

Treating both forms as one word, then, b. is either an adv. or a prep., and the meaning is 'by the side of.' But the side may be reached either from a position that is farther off or from one that is still nearer. Compare Ps 23<sup>2</sup> 'He leadeth me b. (בְּ) the still waters,' Is 32<sup>20</sup> 'Blessed are ye that sow b. (בְּ) all waters,' or 1 S 19<sup>4</sup> 'I will go out and stand b. (בְּ) my father,' with Mt 14<sup>21</sup> 'five thousand men, b. (χρῶς) women and children,' or Gaule (1629), 'Oh, doe him not the wrong to look b. him, for if you see him not, hee comes by to no purpose'; or Foxe, Acts and Mon. ii. 384, 'He put the new Pope Alexander b. the cushion and was made pope himself.' Hence b. expresses either addition or separation.

1. ADDITION.—Gn 19<sup>12</sup> 'Hast thou here any b.?' (עִיר); Mt 25<sup>20</sup> 'I have gained b. (ἐπὶ) them five talents more'; Lk 24<sup>21</sup> 'Yea and b. (ὅν) all this'; 2 P 1<sup>5</sup> 'And b. this, . . . add to your faith virtue' (Gr. καὶ αὐτὸ τοῦτο δέ, RV 'Yea, and for this very cause'); Philem v.<sup>19</sup> 'thou owest unto me even thine own self b.' (προσopheλεις); Sir 17<sup>14</sup> 'B. this he gave them knowledge' (προσέθηκεν αὐτοῖς).

2. SEPARATION.—Jos 22<sup>29</sup> 'God forbid that we should rebel . . . to build an altar . . . b. (בְּ) 'separate from' the altar of the Lord our God that is before his tabernacle' (AV 'beside,' RV 'besides'); Is 43<sup>11</sup> 'b. me (בְּיָמֵינוּ) there is no Saviour.' Hence arises the expression 'beside oneself' which occurs three times, Mk 3<sup>21</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>13</sup> (both ἐξίσταμαι), Ac 26<sup>24</sup> (μαλιστα). Compare 'b. the mark'; 'b. the real issue' (Froude); 'Like an enchanted maid b. her wits' (Hood); 'I felt quite b. myself for joy and gratitude' (Q. Victoria); 'A Lye is properly an outward Signification of something contrary to, or, at least, b. the inward Sense of the Mind' (South).

J. HASTINGS.

BESODEIAH (בְּסוֹדֵיָהָ Neh 3<sup>6</sup>).—Meshullam, the son of Besodeiah, took part in repairing the Old Gate. The name means, perhaps, 'In the secret of J', בְּסוֹדֵי יְהוָה, cf. Jer 23<sup>18, 22</sup>.

II. A. WHITE.

BESOM.—Is 14<sup>23</sup> only, 'I will sweep it with the b. of destruction' (בְּסוֹמָם, from סָוַם tr<sup>1</sup> here 'sweep,' so lit. 'I will sweep it with the sweeper of destruction'; cf. סָוַם mud, mire; and for the simile Is 30<sup>28</sup> 'to sift the nations with the sieve of vanity' [RVm 'destruction,' Cheyne 'annihilation,' Heb. סָוַם]). The besom, though used in earlier Eng. and still locally as a mere synonym for 'broom' (cf. Lyly, Euphues, 1580, 'There is no more difference betweene them than between a Broome and a Beesome'), is properly made, not of broom, but of heath, in Devonshire called bisam or bassim.

J. HASTINGS.

BESOR, Brook (בְּסוֹר Neh 11<sup>30</sup>, 21).—A torrent apparently south or south-west of Ziklag, on the way to the country of the Amalekites and Egypt, in the Tih desert. The name has not been recovered. It is identified by Guérin with the Wady Razze, which flows into the sea S.W. of Gaza.

C. R. CONDER.

BESTEAD.—Is 8<sup>21</sup> only, 'hardly b. and hungry.' 'Bestead' (the proper spelling is bested, the other arose from a supposed connexion with bestead, to help) means simply 'placed,' and that is its meaning here. The Heb. is one word, נָקַד, niph. ptep. from נָקַד, to be hard. Amer. RV has 'sore distressed,' Cheyne 'hard-prest.' J. HASTINGS.

BESTIALITY.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

BESTOW (from bē or be and stow a place) means in mod. Eng. to confer as a gift, but is used in AV in other obsolete senses. 1. To place, 1 K 10<sup>28</sup> 'chariots and . . . horsemen whom he b<sup>d</sup> in the cities for chariots' (RV 'in the chariot cities'). Cf. Shaks. Temp. v. i. 299—

'Hence, and bestow your luggage where you found it.'

2. To lay up in store, to stow away, Lk 12<sup>17</sup> 'I have no room where to b. my fruits.' 3. To apply to a special use, 2 K 12<sup>15</sup> 'the money to be b<sup>d</sup> on workmen'; Dt 14<sup>26</sup> 'thou shalt b. that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after'; 1 Co 13<sup>3</sup> 'though I b. all my goods to feed the poor' (Gr. ψωμίζω to feed by giving morsels, from ψωμός a morsel). 4. To spend (without special application), 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup> 'those members of the body which we think to be less honourable, upon these we b. more abundant honour' (περιθymi, RVm 'put on'); Jn 4<sup>38</sup> 'I sent you to reap that whereon ye b<sup>d</sup> no labour' (κομιδω, RV 'whereon ye have not laboured'). Cf.—

'Fellow, wilt thou bestow thy time with me?'

Shaks. Jul. Cæs. v. v. 61.

J. HASTINGS.

BETAH (בֵּתָה), 2 S 8<sup>8</sup>.—See TIBHATH.

BETANE (Βαιτάνη), Jth 1<sup>9</sup>.—A place apparently south of Jerusalem, and not Bethany. It may be the same as Bethanath. C. R. CONDER.

BETEN (בֵּתֵן), Jos 19<sup>28</sup>.—A town of Asher, noticed next to Achshaph. The site is doubtful. In the fourth century (Onomasticon, s.v. Bathine) it was shown 8 Roman miles east of Ptolemais (Acco), and then called Bebeten or Bethbeten. The place intended appears to be the present village El Baneh, which would be suitable for the position of Beten. See SWP vol. i. sheet v.

C. R. CONDER.

BETH (בֵּת), the second letter of the Heb. alphabet (see ALPHABET). Beth is the heading or title of the second part of Ps 119, and each verse of that part begins with this letter (see PSALMS). In Heb. beth (בֵּת) is the construct form of bayith (בַּיִת) 'a house,' and enters into the composition of many place-names. See BAYITH, NAMES.

BETHABARA (Βηθαβάρ, Heb. בֵּית עֲבָרָה 'place of passing over,' Jn 1<sup>28</sup> AV only).—It was east of the river, and a day's distance at most from Cana of Galilee (2<sup>1</sup>). The reading in  $\aleph$  A B C is Bethany (so RV), as in the time of Origen, who, however, regarded this as incorrect. The traditional site, from the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v.) was at the ford east of Jericho; but this is clearly much too far south. The name survives at the ford called Abbarah, north-east of Bethshean, and this is the only place where this name occurs in Palestine. The site is as near to Cana as any point on the Jordan, and within a day's journey. See SWP vol. ii. sheet ix. C. R. CONDER.

BETH-ANATH (בֵּית-אַנָּת 'temple of Anath,' so Nestle, Baethgen, Meyer), Jos 19<sup>38</sup>, Jg 1<sup>38</sup>.—A town of Naphtali, now the village Ainatha, in the mountains of Upper Galilee. (SWP vol. i. sheet iv.) See DABERATH for the early Egyptian notice.

C. R. CONDER.

BETH-ANOTH (בֵּית-אַנֹּת, perhaps 'temple of 'Anath'), Jos 15<sup>39</sup>.—A town in the mountains of Judah near Gedor. It is the present Beit 'Ainān, S.E. of Halhul. SWP vol. iii. sheet xxi.

C. R. CONDER.

BETHANY (Βηθανία).—1. A village near Jerusalem (Mt 21<sup>17</sup>), near Bethphage, and at the Mount of Olives (Mk 11<sup>1</sup>, cf. 11<sup>12</sup>), where was Simon's house (14<sup>3</sup>), on the road from Jericho to Jerusalem by Olivet (Lk 19<sup>29</sup>); the home of Lazarus, about fifteen furlongs, or less than two English miles, from the city (Jn 11<sup>1-19</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>). The situation agrees with that of the village El Azertyeh, 'The place of Lazarus,' where it has been placed since the 4th cent. A.D. (See Onomasticon, s.v. Bethania.) The name means perhaps 'house of dates.' It is a small stone village, on the south-east slope of Olivet, north of the Jericho road, surrounded with fig-gardens and terrace-walls. The most conspicuous feature is the tall square tower in the centre of the village, which belonged to the convent of St. Lazarus, founded by queen Milcent in A.D. 1147 for Benedictine nuns. There is a vault below, converted into a diminutive rock-cut chapel by apses cut to the east. This is shown as the tomb of Lazarus. A church was shown at this spot in the 4th century, but the ancient rock-cut tombs are farther to the east beside the road. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii., and Neubauer, Geog. Tal. s.v., for the Talmudic notices. 2. RV of Jn 1<sup>28</sup>. See BASHAN, BETHABARA. C. R. CONDER.

BETH-ARABAH (בֵּית הָעֲרָבָה, 'place of the Arabah' (wh. see), Jos 15<sup>6, 21</sup> 18<sup>22</sup>; Arabah, 18<sup>18</sup>).—A place in the Jericho plain, apparently north of Beth-hoglah, in the 'wilderness.' In the last cited passage the district only is mentioned. The name has not been recovered. C. R. CONDER.

BETH-ARBEL (בֵּית אֲרֵבֶל), Hos 10<sup>14</sup> only.—The site is quite uncertain. It is said to have been spoiled by Shalman (perhaps Shalmaneser III.), and may have been in Syria. Two places called Arbela exist in Palestine, one (now Irbid) west of the Sea of Galilee (Jos. Ant. XII. xi. 1), the other (Irbia) in the extreme north of Gilead, both noticed in the 4th cent. A.D. (Onom. s.v. Arbela). (See Schrader, KAT 2 440 ff.; G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, 217, n. 5; Wellh., Kl. Proph. 123.)

C. R. CONDER.

BETHASMOTH (Βαιθασμῶθ), 1 Es 5<sup>18</sup>.—For Beth-azmaveth.

BETH-AVEN (בֵּית אֵוֶן 'house of iniquity,' or 'idolatry'?),—(Close to Ai (Jos 7<sup>2</sup>), by the wilderness (18<sup>12</sup>), north-west of Michmash (1 S 13<sup>2</sup>), and on the way to Aijalon (14<sup>23</sup>), still inhabited in the 8th cent. B.C. (Hos 5<sup>8</sup>). The 'calves of Bethaven' were probably those at Bethel close by (Hos 10<sup>8</sup>). Bethel is prob. meant also in Hos 4<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>8</sup> (see Am 5<sup>3</sup>) 10<sup>8</sup> (Aven). The name may have been altered from original בֵּית אֵוֶן 'house of wealth.' See BETHEL, p. 278<sup>a</sup>. C. R. CONDER.

BETH-BAAL-MEON (Jos 13<sup>17</sup>).—See BAAL-MEON.

BETH-BARAH (בֵּית בָּרָה, Jg 7<sup>24</sup>).—Near Jordan and the valley of Jezreel. Some suppose it to be the same as Bethabara, in which case the guttural has been lost in copying. The situation would suit. See BETHABARA. C. R. CONDER.

BETHBASI (Βαθβασί), 1 Mac 9<sup>22, 64</sup>.—Jos. (Ant. XIII. i. 5) reads Bethhoglah. The name has not been recovered. Jonathan and Simon the Hasmoneans here hid in the desert of Jericho. It may represent an ancient בית בצי, or 'place of marshes.'

C. R. CONDER.

BETH-BIRI (בֵּית בִּירָא), 1 Ch 4<sup>31</sup>.—A town of Simeon, perhaps textual error for בֵּית לִבְנָה Jos 19<sup>9</sup> = Lebaoth, Jos 15<sup>32</sup>. The ruin Bireh on the west slopes of the Debir hills may be intended. See SVP vol. iii. sheet xxiv.

C. R. CONDER.

BETH-CAR (בֵּית כָּר), 'place of a lamb,' 1 S 7<sup>11</sup>.—The Peshitta reads Beth-jashan (see SHEN). The whole topography of this episode is doubtful, for the sites of Mizpeh and Ebenezer are uncertain. Beth-car evidently stood above a valley by which the Philistines fled from the hills near Jerusalem. The present Ain Kârim, a village overlooking the upper part of the valley of Sorek, west of Jerusalem, would be a possible site. It is the later Carem (added verse, LXX Jos 15<sup>59</sup>). See BETH-HACCHEREM.

C. R. CONDER.

BETH-DAGON (בֵּית דָּגוֹן, 'house of Dagon,' Βηθ-δαγών, Βαγαδών).—The name of two different towns mentioned in OT. 1. One of these (Jos 15<sup>41</sup>) is in the territory of Judah, in the second of the four groups of the cities of the lowland or Shephelah, and is provisionally identified with Beit-dejan, about 4 miles S.E. of Joppa. 2. The other (Jos 19<sup>27</sup>) was one of the border cities of Asher, apparently to the E. of Carmel, and is not identified. There is another Beit-dejan, however, further to the N., and perhaps yet others (see G. A. Smith's Hist. Geog. p. 332 n., p. 403 n.), indicating that there were many Beth-dagons. Jos. mentions a Dagon 'beyond Jericho' (Wars, I. ii. 3; Ant. XIII. viii. 1). Perhaps this points to a time when the worship of Dagon was widely disseminated, both in and out of the Phil. country. However, the name may mean no more than 'corn house.' See DAGON. In the time of Hezekiah, Sennacherib captured the Beth-dagon near Joppa (Smith, Assyr. Disc. p. 303).

BETH-DIBLATHAIM (בֵּית דִּבְלַתַּיִם, 'house of two fig-cakes'?).—In Jer 48<sup>22</sup> mentioned with Dibon and Nebo, see ALMON-DIBLATHAIM; the next camp to Dibon before Nebo (Nu 33<sup>46</sup>). It is thought by some to be the Diblath of Ezk 6<sup>14</sup>; but this seems impossible. The name (which occurs on the Moabite Stone, l. 30) has not been found in Moab.

BETH-EDEN (Am 1<sup>5</sup> marg.).—See EDEN.

BETHEL (בֵּית הָאֵל, 'house of God,' LXX Βαθὴλ, Jos. Βηθὴλ, Βεθὴλ ἡ πόλις) is usually identified with the modern Bēṭin (PEF Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 305), about four hours N. of Jerusalem, on the Nablûs road (Jg 21<sup>19</sup>), though the ancient town may have lain farther N. than the present village (Baed. Palast. p. 215). The situation is high up (2880 ft.) in the central range; hence the mention of 'hill-country' (Gn 12<sup>8</sup>, Jos 16<sup>1</sup>, Jg 4<sup>5</sup>, 1 S 13<sup>2</sup>), and the use of the verb 'to go up,' in connexion with Bethel (Gn 35<sup>1</sup>, Jos 16<sup>1</sup>, Jg 12<sup>2</sup> 20<sup>18, 26, 31</sup>, 1 S 10<sup>8</sup>, Hos 4<sup>10</sup>).

* Dillmann, Genesis 8, p. 387. Jos 16<sup>2</sup> might be rendered 'from Bethel-Luza'; but this would imply that Bethel is determined by Luz, whereas everywhere else it is Luz that is determined by Bethel, the better-known place. 'Luza,' then, may be a gloss inserted to accommodate the passage to Jos 18<sup>13</sup>. The LXX has the name not here (16<sup>2</sup>), but at the end of v. 1. Dillm. Nom. Deut. Josh. 2 p. 559.

Eusebius, in the Onomasticon (s.v. Βουρά), places Luz of Joseph 9 miles from Neapolis, Jerome (Onomast. ib.), 'in tertio lapide Neapoleos'; but neither of these distances can be right. The Talmud mentions some curious legends in connexion with Luz: 'where blue wool is dyed; a place which neither Sennacherib nor Nebuchadrezzar could take, and where the angel of death is powerless,' etc.* Another town called Luz was founded by a man of Bethel in the land of the Hittites (Jg 1<sup>26</sup>).

The first mention of Bethel occurs in the account of Abraham's immigration: the patriarch pitches his tent in the neighbourhood of Bethel, builds an altar, and worships J†. He visits this sanctuary a second time, on his return from Egypt (Gn 12<sup>8</sup> 13<sup>4</sup> J). But the origin of the name, and the foundation of the sanctuary, is especially connected with a memorable episode in the life of Jacob. Two divergent accounts exist. According to the one, Jacob encounters the vision at Luz in the course of his flight to Haran (Gn 28<sup>10-22</sup>); this is the earlier narrative, and belongs to JE; according to the other, God appears to him on his return from Paddan-aram, many years later (Gn 35<sup>9-13, 15</sup>): this is the account of P.

a. To take the earlier narrative first. It is composite in structure. The two documents, J and E, are interwoven, and differ considerably in details. In J (vv. 13-16, 19a), J‡ appears standing beside Jacob, and repeats the promise made to Abraham (12<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>14-16</sup> J), adapting it to the circumstances of Jacob, whose words on awaking are, 'Surely J§ is in this place, and I knew it not. And he called the name of the place Bethel' (house of El).† In E (10-12, 17, 18, 20-22), on the other hand, we hear of the stone pillow, of the ladder, and of the angels; Jacob's exclamation is, 'This is none other but the house of God,' etc.; he sets up the stone as a pillar (mazzēba), anoints it with oil, and makes a solemn vow.

It is difficult to account for these divergences. Some authorities, such as Wellhausen,‡ suppose that J contained an independent narrative; others, as Kuenen,§ hold that we have here, not the work of J, but a passage expanded and modified from E by 'a follower of J'; according to the latter scholar, J probably carried back the consecration of Bethel to Abraham and not to Jacob (Gn 12<sup>8</sup>; cf. 13<sup>2</sup>).

b. In the later account of P (Gn 35<sup>9-13, 15</sup>) there is no mention of the characteristic features of the earlier narrative. The salient points here seem to be that God changes Jacob's name to Israel, and the name Bethel is given to the place because God spake with him there. God reveals Himself by the name El-Shaddai, and the promise (vv. 11, 12) is cast into the form characteristic of P. This account is referred to again in 48<sup>3</sup> P.

In Hos 12<sup>4</sup> the vision at Bethel comes after Jacob's wrestling, i.e. after his return from Paddan-aram, as in P, though not necessarily implying that Hosea used this narrative.¶ In the subsequent ‡ Comp. de Hex. p. 83. The variations which occur in the terms of the promise in v. 14 when compared with the other promises in J (Gn 12<sup>3</sup> 18<sup>14</sup> 18<sup>18</sup> 22<sup>16</sup>) are explained by supposing that J here has been worked over by a later hand.

§ Hexateuch, p. 147. The 'follower of J' incorporated 12<sup>8b</sup> almost word for word in v. 14, and modified E in v. 21b; thus vv. 13, 16 become homogeneous with 22<sup>14, 18</sup>. It will be noticed that both views involve a modification of J in a lesser or greater degree.

¶ Gn 35<sup>9-15</sup> has been expanded by the redactor with extracts from JE, e.g. in v. 14. The mazzēba and libation are quite foreign to P. The word 'again,' v. 9, is not original, but was inserted to harmonise with Gn 28<sup>10f.</sup> It is the second visit to Bethel recorded by E (35<sup>1, 8, 9, 7</sup>), once, perhaps, a fuller narrative, which lies behind the prophet's words. Kuen. ib. p. 228.

narrative E records the command to return to Bethel, where Jacob had set up and anointed a pillar; now he builds an altar in memory of the revelation years before (Gn 35<sup>1, 3, 6, 7</sup>). 'And he called the name of the place El-Bethel.'* Nothing is said of the fulfilment of the vow to dedicate a tenth promised in 28<sup>2b</sup>; but this particular is generally held to have been inserted later. On the occasion of this second visit Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, died, and was buried 'below Bethel, under the oak.'

Thus tradition connected Bethel with the patriarchal history; and the connexion is a witness to the high antiquity of the sanctuary. It has been supposed that, like many other sanctuaries, such as Jerusalem, Jericho, Shechem, Hebron, etc., Bethel was originally a Canaanite holy place, and that after it had passed into the hands of the Israelites it was adopted into Israelite traditions, and assigned a patriarchal consecration. On the other hand, there is no clear evidence that Bethel was a Canaanite sanctuary; all that the OT knows about its earlier history is that its ancient name was Luz; so we are justified in concluding that its sanctity was of purely Israelite origin.† At the same time, it possessed a sanctity independent of the dedication which Jacob is said to have given it. It was a haunt of angels, a place where a ladder was always fixed between earth and heaven; and when Jacob passed the night there he saw it.‡ It was not so much that J' found Jacob, as that Jacob was unconsciously guided to find J' there.

The setting up and anointing of the pillar in Bethel is important as illustrating primitive religious ideas. Several of these pillars are mentioned in the history of Jacob (Gn 31<sup>4b</sup> 35<sup>20</sup> E; cf. Jos 24<sup>26</sup> E), and the narratives give the impression that they were memorial-stones, marking the scene of a divine revelation. But this was not their primary significance. It is the stone of Bethel, not the place, that is called 'a house of God' (Gn 28<sup>22</sup>), the stone being regarded as the shrine of the Deity, and the symbol of His presence.§

In the Book of Joshua Bethel is mentioned several times in connexion with the capture of Ai (Jos 7<sup>2</sup> 8<sup>9, 12, 17</sup> JE); its inhabitants assisted those of Ai in attacking the Israelites (Jos 8<sup>17</sup>). The Deuteronomic compiler of Jos defines the situation of Ai by Bethel, showing the importance of the place in his day, and mentions a king of Bethel (Jos 12<sup>9, 16</sup> D<sup>2</sup>).

* That is, El of Bethel; a local name of J', pointing to a belief in a local deity inhabiting this particular spot. Cf. the name of the mazzeboi of Shechem, 'El God of Israel' (Gn 33<sup>20</sup>), and of the place where Abraham sacrificed the ram (Gn 22<sup>14</sup>); so, too, El-rol, the God of the well of Lulal-rol (Gn 16<sup>13</sup>); El Olam, the God of Beersheba (Gn 21<sup>33</sup>). Cf. the various local names of Baal. See Nowack, Hebr. Archäologie, ii. p. 9, and Stade, Geschichte d. V. Isr. i. p. 447. The LXX, Pesh. Vulg. omit the first El (Gn 35<sup>7</sup>), perhaps because the expression was not understood. There is no need to doubt its originality.

Thus בֵּיתֵל passed into Greek and Latin as Βεθελών and baetylus, the λίθοι λατρείας, λίθοι ἐν ψυχῇ (prob. aerolites), which were worshipped as divine. Curious information on this subject may be found in Euseb. Præp. Evang. i. 10, and in Photius, Bibliotheca, cexlii. p. 1062 f. Cf. also Lucian, Alex. 30; Tac. Hist. ii. 3; Olaus, *Alex. Abijah, king of Judah, is said to have taken Bethel from Jeroboam (2 Ch 13<sup>19</sup>).

After its capture and occupation by the house of Joseph (Jg 1<sup>22-25</sup>), Bethel became, together with Jericho, Ai, and Hebron, one of the principal settlements of the Israelites. Gilgal was the headquarters at the first stage in the occupation of the land, Bethel at the second (Jg 2<sup>1</sup> LXX: ἀπὸ Γαλγὰ ἐπὶ Βεθὲλ).

In the period of the Judges Bethel became the chief religious centre of the northern tribes. The ark was stationed there (Jg 20<sup>18</sup>); it was frequented as a place for sacrifice (Jg 2<sup>2b</sup> Budde, 1 S 10<sup>3</sup>), or for consulting the divine oracle (Jg 20<sup>18, 28</sup> 21<sup>2</sup>), and the sanctuary was rendered accessible by roads (Jg 20<sup>31</sup> 21<sup>19</sup>). In the neighbourhood was the palm under which Deborah the prophetess dwelt (Jg 4<sup>5</sup>); and, in a late passage, Samuel is said to have included Bethel in his yearly circuit (1 S 7<sup>16</sup>).

The importance of the sanctuary was greatly increased by Jeroboam I. Its geographical position combined with political expediency to make it the religious capital of the N. kingdom. Here and at Dan the golden calves or steers were set up, and a form of J'-worship organised in accordance with the practice of the popular religion (1 K 12<sup>29, 32</sup>).† This no doubt provoked a certain amount of opposition from the prophets; probably Ahijah disapproved of it (1 K 14<sup>26</sup>). The story of the 'man of God from Judah' who cried against the altar of Bethel is, however, much later than this period, so that we cannot be sure how far it represents the contemporary opinion of the prophets. The story is given in 1 K 13 ('Bethel,' vv. 1, 4, 10, 11, 22).‡ Elijah, Elisha, and Amos have nothing to say against the golden calves; Elijah himself was sent to Bethel by the Lord (2 K 2<sup>2</sup>).

In the reign of Ahab a Bethelite named Hiel rebuilt Jericho (1 K 16<sup>34</sup>).

The splendour and importance of the sanctuary increased with the prosperity of the N. kingdom. The worship instituted by Jeroboam had the support of Jehu (2 K 10<sup>26</sup>); but it was under Jeroboam II. that the great Ephraimite sanctuary reached the summit of its renown as 'a royal sanctuary and house of the kingdom' (Am 7<sup>13</sup>). It had its dignified priesthood (Am 7<sup>10</sup>) and college of prophets (2 K 2<sup>2</sup>; cf. 1 K 13<sup>1</sup>); the ritual, the sacrifices, the public feasts, attained a degree of luxurious splendour unparalleled before. But all this went along with a deep-seated degradation, moral and religious. Amos gives a vivid picture of Bethel at this period. The sanctuary itself had become the seat of cruelty and extortion; the sacred feasts, supported out of the tithes (4<sup>4</sup>),§ had degenerated into luxurious banquets for the nobles at the expense of the poor (5<sup>11</sup>). Hence the sanctuary of Bethel is denounced in unmeasured terms both by Amos and Hosea (Am 3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>, Hos 10<sup>15</sup>); it is threatened with severe visitation and overthrow of its altar (Am 9<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> 'Bethel shall come to nought' [Aven] 5<sup>5</sup>).|| In Hosea, Beth-aven has become the desecrated name of Beth-el ( $4^{15} 5^6 10^6$ ): * the calf-worship is for the first time emphatically denounced as the very root of Israel's sin.

The prophets' denunciations were soon fulfilled, for Bethel must have been involved in the general overthrow of the N. kingdom by the Assyrians in 722; cf. Jer 48<sup>13</sup>. According to Jewish tradition, Shalmaneser 'carried off the golden calf which was in Bethel, and departed to set it up.'†

During the Captivity Bethel is mentioned as the residence of a priest who was despatched by the conquerors to teach the strangers settled there 'how they should fear J' (2 K 17<sup>28</sup>).

The reforming zeal of Josiah was directed against so much of the sanctuary as had survived the Assyrian devastation. The king carried to Bethel the ashes of idolatrous vessels from Jerusalem; he defiled the altar which was still standing, but allowed the monument of the prophet, who had foretold the overthrow, to remain undisturbed (2 K 23<sup>4, 15, 17, 19</sup>).

Among the exiles who returned from Babylon 'the men of Bethel' are named (Ezr 2<sup>26</sup>=Neh 7<sup>32</sup>); and the ancient city was inhabited once more by the children of Benjamin (Neh 11<sup>31</sup>). In the fourth year of Darius a deputation was sent from Bethel to Jerusalem to inquire about the continuance of the stated fasts (Zec 7<sup>2</sup>).

In the wars of the Maccabees Bethel was one of the places fortified by Baechides (1 Mac 9<sup>30</sup>). Finally, it was captured by Vespasian in his campaign against Jerusalem (Jos. Jew. Wars, IV. ix. 9).

2. There was another Bethel in Judah, mentioned in 1 S 30<sup>27</sup>, Jos 19<sup>4</sup> בֵּיתֶל, and 1 Ch 4<sup>30</sup> בֵּיתֶל (cf. for the form בֵּיתֶל). It is mentioned in the Midrash (Ekha ii. 3) as one of the three places in which Hadrian placed garrisons to arrest deserters. The site is unknown.‡

BETHER (בֵּיתֶר 'mountains of cutting'—or 'of divisions,' Ca 2<sup>17</sup>).—If a proper name, the famous site of Bether near Jerusalem (see added verse of LXX Jos 15<sup>50</sup>) might be intended, the hill-ridge to the south being uncultivated land, near woods in which deer might have been found. Bether is celebrated for the resistance of the Jews to Hadrian under Bar-Cochba in A.D. 135 (see authorities quoted by Robinson, Bib. Res. vol. iii., and the account in Neubauer's Geog. Talm. s.v.). The site was recognised by Canon Williams at Bittir, south-west of Jerusalem—a village on a cliff in a strong position, with a ruin near it called 'Ruin of the Jews,' from a tradition of a great Jewish massacre at this place. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.

C. R. CONDER.

BETHESDA (Βηθεσδα, TR), Jn 5<sup>2</sup>.—A pool at Jerusalem, by the προβατική or 'sheep place' (market or gate), having five porches or cloisters. In * and L the name is given as Bethzatha (comp. the name of Bezetha for the north quarter of Jerusalem), in B it is Bethsaida. It appears to have had steps from the cloisters, and the water was at times 'troubled.' The account of the angel troubling the waters (v. 4) is omitted in * B and D, but occurs in A (C, the Vulgate, the Peshitta, etc.). It may therefore be thought that the troubling of the waters had a natural cause. The site is not definitely fixed by the description. The Sheep Gate was north of the Temple, but a place where the flocks were gathered for watering may be intended. The most probable derivation of the name seems to be from בֵּית שֶׁדַּי Bethshaday, 'house of the stream' (see under PISCAN, and Gesen. Lex. s.v.). The traditions as to Bethesda have varied. In the 4th century it was placed (Onomasticon, s.v. Bethesda) at the Twin Pools, in the ditch at the north-west angle of Antonia, one of these being the Sheep Pool and the other that with porches, the fifth of which was supposed to divide the two; but this pool was very probably made in the fosse at a later period (2nd or 6th century A.D.). In the 12th century Bethesda was shown farther north, at the Piscina Interior west of St. Anne. It is now shown at the Birket Israil, part of the northern fosse immediately east of the Twin Pools; but here, again, the masonry is of later date than that of the Herodian walls of the Temple. A more probable site for Bethesda is the Virgin's Pool (Gihon and En-rogel), the only natural spring of Jerusalem, at the foot of the Ophel slope south-east of the Temple, as proposed by Robinson. This answers the requirements that it still presents the phenomenon of intermittent 'troubling of the water,' which overflows from a natural syphon under the cave, and that it is still the custom of the Jews to bathe in the waters of the cave, when this overflow occurs, for the cure of rheumatism and of other disorders. It is also still the place where the flocks are gathered for watering. A long flight of steps leads to the cave, and the debris is heaped up round these, so that it is impossible to say whether any buildings existed round the cavern. A Greek text of late date was found by Tobler built into the masonry near. The name, 'house of the stream,' would be suitable for this site, whence a stream flowed to Siloam. See SWP, Jerusalem vol., s.v. Ain Umm ed Deraj; also Westcott and Hort's N.T. App. 76<sup>b</sup>.

Tradition fixed on Herodium south of Bethlehem, probably because it was a conspicuous site near Tekoa, with which it is noticed. A possible site is Ain Kārim west of Jerusalem, where there are vineyards. On the hill to the east are the remarkable stone cairns which stand above the valley of Rephaim. BETH-HARAM (בֵּית הָרָם, AV Beth-aram) was situated 'in the valley-plain of the Jordan' (Jos 13<sup>27</sup>). In Nu 32<sup>38</sup> Bethharan. Its site has been recovered at Tell Rameh at the mouth of the Wady Heshban, 6 miles east from the familiar bathing-place of pilgrims in the Jordan. According to Tristram it retains its old name, and is still known as Beit-Harran (Land of Moab, p. 348). Eusebius describes it as Betharamphtha. Jos. calls it Amathus (Ant. XVII. x. 6). It was rebuilt and fortified by Herod Antipas when he became tetrarch, and in honour of the Roman empress was called Livias or Libias. Merrill (East of the Jordan, p. 383) gives good reasons for believing that it was in the palace here that Herod celebrated his birthday by the feast recorded (Mt 14<sup>9-12</sup>, Mk 6<sup>21-28</sup>), and that the Baptist's head was brought hither from Macherus, some 20 miles south. BETH-HORON (בֵּית הָחֹרֶן) 'place of caves'?).—In 1 Ch 7<sup>24</sup> RV we read that Sheerah, daughter of Ephraim, built 'Beth-horon, the nether and the upper, and Uzzan-Sheerah'. Her name possibly survives in Beit-Sira = Uzzan-Sheerah, and certainly the other two places ascribed to her still exist, with their old appellations but little changed. Their survival and their historical importance are due to their position.

From the valley of Ajalon three gorges break through the steep wall of the western front of the central range of Palestine. The northernmost of these is the pass to El-Jib (Gibeon), up which, always the easiest approach from the west to the Jewish capital, a well-trodden path leads, in about fifty minutes, to Beit-ur el-Tahla or Lower Beth-horon. It stands on a ridge, about 1240 ft. above the sea, with the remains of a castle near. Crossing a small wady, and mounting a long and steep ascent, rocky and rough, but with the rock in places cut into steps, the traveller after an hour's climb reaches Beit-ur el-Foka or Upper Beth-horon, which stands 1730 ft. above the sea, on a mountain spur with a deep valley both to north and south. The village is small, but exhibits traces of ancient walls and foundations, and to the east of it is a reservoir, apparently of great antiquity.

So situated, the B.s could not fail to be connected with the march and retreat of armies. 'Throughout history we see hosts swarming up this avenue or swept down it in flight.' More than one memorable battle takes its name from B. (see below). Thrice the two towns were fortified—by Solomon (1 K 9<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ch 8<sup>3</sup>), by the Syrian general Baechides (1 Mac 9<sup>30</sup>, Jos. Ant. XIII. i. 3), and by the Jews against Holofernes (Jth 4<sup>4-5</sup>). It was by B. that Cestius Gallus advanced in the first onset of the Roman armies on Jerusalem, and down its gorge he was driven in rout by the insurgent Jews (Jos. Wars, II. xix. 1, 8). And B. saw the first Crusaders march to Jerusalem; and saw Richard, in the third Crusade, in vain try to force a passage by the same route.

A further importance attached to the two towns as frontier posts. Both Upper and Nether Beth-horon were either on, or close to, the boundary between Benjamin and Ephraim, being reckoned the possession of the latter tribe (Jos 16<sup>9</sup> 18<sup>13, 14</sup> 21<sup>22</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>9</sup>). After the rupture of the kingdom they naturally fell to Israel. The absence of mention of them in Ezra and Nehemiah may indicate that they did not form part of the Return settlement, though they must have been close on its frontier. If the designation of Sanballat ('the Horonite') connects him with B. (and not rather with Horonaim), this would be conclusive of its dependence on Samaria. But under the Maccabees, about B.C. 161, we find B. described as 'a village of Judæa' (Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 1), though it was not till sixteen years later that the district in which it lay was formally transferred by the Syrian monarch.

LITERATURE.—Robinson, BRP iii. 59, with references there to patristic and other writers; Smith, Hist. Geog. of the Holy Land, 210, 213, 254; Baedeker, Pal. and Syria, 142; Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 212.

BATTLES OF BETHHORON.—The Gibeonites, being besieged by the five kings, had summoned Joshua to their relief. By a forced march he obeyed the summons. At sunrise 'he was already in the open ground at the foot of the heights of Gibeon,' and the battle began. It had three stages.

The Canaanites were thrown into dismay by the shout and the sudden onset of Israel, and broke, flying up the rocky ascent to Upper B. (Jos 10<sup>10</sup>).

But they made no stay there, and we next see them in headlong flight down the other side of the ridge towards Lower B., while a terrible storm raged, and contributed more to their defeat than even the pursuit of the Israelites (v. 11).

It is here that the prose narrative is interrupted by the quotation from the Book of Jasher, where 'the hero appears in the ancient song of the Book of Heroes,' standing on the crest of the hill with outstretched hand and spear, calling to the sun to stand still upon Gibeon, and the moon in the valley of Ajalon (v. 12<sup>ff</sup>).

'In the lengthened day thus given to Joshua's prayer comes the third stage,' the hiding of the kings in the cave of Makkedah, where they were guarded while the pursuit of their beaten forces lasted, and were then put to death (vv. 16-27).

The second battle of Beth-horon was won by Judas Maccabæus over Seron, 'a prince of the army of Syria,' Judas, born at Modin, in the neighbourhood, must have foreseen his advantage from the nature of the ground, as he saw the Syrians 'coming near to the going up of Beth-horon.' But he trusted more to the help of J', and, encouraging his scanty host by reminding them that 'the victory of battle standeth not in the multitude of a host, but strength cometh from heaven,' he 'leapt suddenly' upon the foe, and drove them down to the plain. This was in B.C. 166. Five years later he won another victory on the same ground over Nicanor (1 Mac 3<sup>13-24</sup> 7<sup>39-50</sup>; Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 1, x. 5.).

BETHINK.—In 1 K 8<sup>47</sup>, 2 Ch 6<sup>37</sup> b. occurs as a reflex. verb in the absol. sense of 'to take thought,' 'to come to oneself': 'if they shall b. themselves . . . and repent' (חָשַׁב לְעַלְתָּם 'bring back to heart.' See the same phrase in Dt 4<sup>39</sup> 'consider it in thine heart,' RV 'lay it to thine heart'; 30<sup>1</sup> 'call to mind'; Is 44<sup>9</sup> 'none considereth in his heart,' RV 'calleteth to mind'; 46<sup>8</sup> [עַל] 'bring again to mind'; La 3<sup>21</sup> 'recall to mind'). Cf. Lk 15<sup>17</sup> 'when he came to himself' (Gr. eis éautón eldōn).

J. HASTINGS.

BETH-JESHIMOTH (in AV also Jesimoth) (בֵּית יֵשִׁמוֹת, 'the place of the desert'), the S. limit of the encampment on 'the plains of Moab' at the close of the journeyings, Nu 33<sup>49</sup>. In Jos 12<sup>8</sup> it is mentioned as in the S. of the Arabah towards the Dead Sea. In 13<sup>30</sup> it is assigned to Reuben, the 'slopes of Pisgah' being mentioned immediately before it; and in Ezk 25<sup>9</sup> it is spoken of as belonging to Moab. Eusebius places it 10 miles S. of Jericho, and Jos. (Jewish Wars, IV. vii. 6) refers to Βηθούλ in that direction. Some ruins and a well at the N.E. end of the Dead Sea bear the name of Sawaimah, which is considered as a modification of Jeshimoth; and this situation suits the requirements of the biblical narrative. A. T. CHAPMAN.

BETH-LE-APHRAH (בֵּית לֵאֶפְרַיִם), AV 'house of Ephrah'.—The name of a town apparently in Phil. territory, whose site is quite unknown (Mic 1<sup>10</sup>). In the call 'at B. roll thyself in the dust,' there is a double play upon words, 'Aphrah' containing a punning allusion to 'Aphar' (dust) and הָקַלְסִי (roll thyself) to הָקַלְסִי (Philistine). It seems out of the question to identify the place with Ophrah of Benjamin (Jos 18<sup>23</sup>). See G. A. SMITH, Twelve Prophets, 383 f. J. A. SELBIE.

BETH-LEBAOTH (בֵּית לֵבָאוֹת), Jos 19<sup>6</sup> 'house of lionesses'?—A town of Simeon near Sharuhin. Unknown. (See BETH-BIRI.)

BETHLEHEM (בֵּית לֶחֶם 'place of bread').—Two places so named in Palestine are noticed in the OT.

1. Bethlehem Judah, called also Ephrathah, the home of David, 5 miles S. of Jerusalem. It is now a small white town on a spur running out east from the watershed. The inhabitants are Christians, and wear a peculiar costume. At the east end of the town is the Church of the Nativity and attached monastery, standing above the orchards of figs and olives, and the vineyards which surround this prosperous village. The church is perhaps the oldest in existence founded for orthodox Greek rites: the pillars are those of Constantine's Basilica, commenced about A.D. 330; the mosaics on the wall above belong to the 12th cent. The oak roof was given by Edward III. To the north is the Latin chapel, and under this the cave-chapel, in which Jerome is said to have lived while writing the Vulgate. The Cave of the Nativity, under the choir of the ancient Basilica, is the only site (excepting the chapel on Olivet) connected with the history of Christ, which is noticed before the establishment of Christianity by Constantine. A cave in Bethlehem, supposed to mark the 'inn' of the Nativity, is noticed by Justin Martyr in the 2nd cent. A.D. (Trypho, 78): it was known to Origen, and appears to have been found, in the 4th century A.D., consecrated to Tammuz, and standing in a grove, which was cut down when the place was reconsecrated by queen Helena. An 'inn' at Bethlehem is possibly referred to in Jer 41<sup>17</sup> (RVm), the place being on one of the high-ways to the south. In the Hebron hills there are many rock-cut stables for cattle, which resemble the cave under the choir at Bethlehem, which possesses a rock-cut recess that may have been a manger.

Some scholars suppose Bethlehem to take its name from Lakhmu, a deity noticed in the Assyrian account of the Creation, but it is not known that he was adored in Palestine. Under the name Ephrath, B. is noticed in Jacob's time (Gn 35<sup>16, 19</sup> 48<sup>7</sup>, if the gloss 'the same is B.' is correct), but it is not mentioned in the Book of Joshua (except in the added verse, LXX Jos 15<sup>69</sup>). The name Bethlehem first occurs in 1 S 16<sup>4</sup>. The cemetery is noticed in 2 S 22<sup>2</sup>, and the well in 2 S 23<sup>4-16</sup>. The traditional site of this well is a rock-cut cistern north-west of the town. Bethlehem is ill supplied with water, and depends mainly on the Roman aqueduct tunnelled through the hill. The most probable site is a well to the south in the valley.

The family of Caleb spread to Bethlehem (1 Ch 2<sup>19, 24, 51, 54</sup>): the Philistines held the city in the time of Saul (2 S 23<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ch 11<sup>16, 17</sup>); the well is then described as being 'at the gate.' Bethlehem was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11<sup>9</sup>), and occupied by the Jews after the Captivity (Ezr 2<sup>21</sup>, Neh 7<sup>26</sup>). In the 8th cent. B.C. (Mic 5<sup>2</sup>) it appears to have been a small place, still known by its old name Ephrathah, as well as by the later (comp. Ru 2<sup>4, 41</sup>), but possessing cornfields and—in Jeremiah's age—an inn (?). Whether Bethlehem is intended in Ps 132<sup>6</sup> as a place where the ark was supposed to be, appears doubtful. The birth of Christ at Bethlehem is noticed in Mt 2<sup>1-6, 6, 8</sup>, Lk 24<sup>16</sup>. The manger was not in the inn (Lk 2<sup>7</sup>), but probably belonged to it. The Gospels refer to Micah (5<sup>2</sup>) as prophesying the birth of Messiah at the home of David.

The city was sacred to Christians from the earliest times, and the first care of the Crusaders was to secure the safety of its Christian population in A.D. 1099, before Jerusalem was taken. It was subsequently made a bishopric. One of the most remarkable Christian texts is that on the font in the Basilica, which is said, with true modesty, to have been presented by 'those whose names are known to the Lord.' The glass frescoes are of high interest, and were presented by Michael Comnenos in the 12th cent. A.D. The crests of knights who visited the church in the Middle Ages are drawn upon the shafts of the Basilica pillars. For a study of this church, see de Vogüé, Eglises de la Palestine, and SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii. For population, see PALESTINE.

2. Bethlehem of Zebulun. Jos 19<sup>15</sup>, and perhaps Jg 12<sup>8, 10</sup>.—Now the village Beit Lahm, in the low hills, 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth. SWP vol. ii. sh. v. C. R. CONDER.

BETHLEHEMITE (בֵּית הַלֶּחֶם), a native of Bethlehem, is applied to Jesse in 1 S 16<sup>1, 18</sup> 17<sup>28</sup>, and to Elhanan in 2 S 21<sup>19</sup>. In 1 Ch 20<sup>6</sup> also we should prob. read בֵּית הַלֶּחֶם for MT הָאֶלְהָנִי. See ELHANAN, LAHMI. J. A. SELBIE.

BETH-LOMON (Βαιθλωμών), 1 Es 5<sup>17</sup>.—For Bethlehem of Judah.

BETH-MAACAH (בֵּית מַעַכָּה).—A descriptive epithet of the city of Abel, 2 S 20<sup>14, 15</sup>, where 'Abel and B.' should be 'Abel of B.' (cf. 1 K 15<sup>20</sup>, 2 K 15<sup>29</sup>). See ABEL, No. 1.

BETH-MARCABOTH (בֵּית הַמַּרְקָבֹת 'place of chariots'), Jos 19<sup>6</sup>, 1 Ch 4<sup>31</sup>.—A city of Simeon in the southern plains, near Ziklag, deserted in David's time. The site is unknown.

BETH-MEON.—See BAAL-MEON.

BETH-MERHAK (בֵּית הַמֶּרְחָק), 2 S 15<sup>17</sup> RV, for the AV 'a place that was far off'; RVm 'the Far House.'—Stade and others understand it to mean the last house of the city. No town so called is known between Jerusalem and Jericho.

BETH-MILLO (Jg 9<sup>6</sup> RVm; 2 K 12<sup>20</sup> AVm, text 'house of Millo').—See MILLO.

BETH-NIMRAH (בֵּית נִמְרָה), 'place of leopard.' In Nu 32<sup>3</sup> Nimrah. See v. 36, Jos 13<sup>27</sup>.—The same as Nimrim, Is 15<sup>6</sup>. Now the ruined mound Tell Nimrin, at the foot of the mountains opposite Jericho. A good-sized stream flows N. of the mound to join the Jordan. The town, with others in the Shittim plain, belonged to Gad; the only city in this region assigned to Reuben being Beth-jeshimoth, south of the plain. In the 4th cent. A.D. Nimrim was known (Onomasticon, s.v. Betham- naram) as lying 5 Roman miles north of Livias (Tell er-Râmeh). See SEP vol. i. s.v. Tell Nimrin.

C. R. CONDER.

BETH-PAZZEZ (בֵּית פַּזֶּז), Jos 19<sup>21</sup>.—A town of Issachar near Engannim and Enhaddah. The name has not been recovered.

BETH-PEOR (בֵּית פְּעוֹר), Dt 3<sup>29</sup> 4<sup>40</sup> 34<sup>6</sup>, Jos 13<sup>20</sup>. See BAAL-PEOR (Nu 25<sup>3, 5</sup>) and PEOR (Nu 23<sup>28</sup>).—A Moabite town given to Reuben. The 'top of Peor' commanded a view of the Jeshimon west of the Dead Sea, and seven altars were here erected by Balak. The Shittim Valley was 'over against Beth-peor,' and from Nebo the body of Moses is said to have been taken to a valley in Moab, 'over against Beth-peor,' which was not the Arabah or Shittim Valley. The name of Peor has not been found east of Jordan, but the site is placed near Heshbon in the Onomasticon (s.v. Abarim and Fogor). There is no doubt that Beth-peor was named from Baal-peor (פְּעוֹר), the god of the Moabites and Midianites; and a possible site for the 'top of Peor' is the cliff at Minyeh, south of Wady Jedeideh (probably Bamoth Baal) and of Pisgah (Nebo). The three points of view of the Israelite camp (Nu 23) were evidently on the edge of the Moabite plateau, whence alone Shittim was visible; and the view from Nebo appears (v. 13) to have been less extensive than from the other two sites, so that ridges extending farther west than Nebo would meet the requirement. This applies to the ridge above Wady Jedeideh, and to the ridge of Minyeh, the latter being the most southern, and extending farthest west. From it we may suppose (Nu 24<sup>18-21</sup>) were seen Edom, Amalek, and the 'nest of the Kenite' on a crag, indicating a position in the south of Moab, whence Edom and the conspicuous knoll of Yukin (Cain) are seen. The name Minyeh is connected with a legend, and means 'wishing,' being the name of a deity, Meni (Is 65<sup>11</sup>). Seven circles, including central altar-stones, still exist at the edge of the cliff. Farther east is a remarkable circle, with three standing stones, at a place called el-Mareighât, or 'the smeared things'—evidently an ancient place of worship. Round the circle are numerous erect stones, and to the north a large group of cromlechs. This site, on the same ridge with Minyeh, may represent the old Beth-peor or 'temple of Peor,' while Minyeh itself represents the 'top of Peor.' To the south of the ridge is the fine ravine of the Zerka Mâ'in—probably Nahaliel or the 'valley of God,' and this would be a natural site for the burial of Moses in a valley 'over against Beth-peor.'

In the added verse of the LXX, after Jos 15<sup>50</sup>, a Peor in Judah is noticed. This was also known in the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Fogor) as near Bethlehem. It is the present ruin Faghâr, north-west of Bethlehem, and, though named from the same deity, is quite a distinct site.

LITERATURE.—Mem. East Pal. Survey, vol. i., for Minyeh and el-Mareighât, under those names, and Mem. West Pal. Survey, vol. iii. sheet xvii. for the Judean site. C. R. CONDER.

C. R. CONDER.

BETH-RAPHA (בֵּית רַפָּה), perhaps 'house of the giant,' 1 Ch 4<sup>13</sup>. Perhaps not a geographical name. See REPHAIM.

BETH-REHOB (בֵּית רְהוֹב), δ ἄλκος 'Paðß, Jg 18<sup>28</sup>, 2 S 10<sup>6</sup>, in v.<sup>8</sup> 'Rehob'; apparently also Rehob of Nu 13<sup>31</sup>.—A district of Syria near Hamath. From its situation in the valley in which lay Dan, or Laish (Jg 18<sup>27, 28</sup>), Robinson was led to suggest Hunin, which commands the plain of Hâleh. If Rehob means a 'broad place' or 'boulevard,' it could hardly be at Hunin. Thomson would place Beth-rehob at Banias. (See REHOB.)

A. HENDERSON.

BETHSAIDA (Βηθσαιδά, 'House of Sport,' or 'Fisher-home').—Opinion is much divided as to whether this was the name of two places, or only of one, on the northern shore of the Sea of Galilee. That one B. stood to the east of the Jordan, near its entrance into the lake, in the district of Lower Gaulonitis, is beyond dispute. It was this village, 'situated at the Lake of Gennesaret,' that Philip 'advanced to the dignity of a city, and called it by the name of Julius, the same name with Caesar's daughter' (Jos. Ant. XVIII. ii. 1; see also Ant. XVIII. iv. 6; BJ II. ix. 1; III. x. 7; Life, 71, 72, 73; and Jerome, Com. on Matthew, 16<sup>13</sup>). This corresponds to Bethsaida of Lk 9<sup>10</sup>, near which was the 'desert place' of Mt 14<sup>13</sup> and Mk 6<sup>31</sup>, where the 5000 were fed. Codex  $\alpha$  stands alone, possibly as the result of an interpolation, in describing the scene of this miracle as near 'to Tiberias.' In this neighbourhood also probably lay the 'desert place,' where the 4000 were also miraculously supplied, whence Jesus sailed with his disciples to 'the parts of Dalmanutha,' in 'the borders of Magadan' or 'Magdala,' returning thence 'to the other side,' 'to B.' (Mt 15<sup>32-39</sup>, Mk 8<sup>1-27</sup>).

As to the existence of a second B., west of the Jordan, on the lake shore, there is great diversity of opinion; but where such authorities as Reland, Robinson, Stanley, and Tristram agree, there is at least a presumption in their favour. Thomson (Land and Book, ii. p. 423) suggests that the Jordan may have divided the town, the western part being 'in Galilee,' the eastern part being that 'which Philip repaired and called Julius.' In Smith (DB, art. 'Bethsaida'), it is suggested that 'if there was only one B. it was probably near the mouth of the Jordan, and perhaps, like Kerak (Tarichæa), surrounded by the river, and so liable to be included at one period in Galilee, and at another in Gaulonitis.' G. A. Smith (Hist. Geog. p. 458) says: 'B. in Galilee need not mean that it lay W. of the Jordan, as the province of Galilee ran right round the lake, and included most of the level coast-land on the E.' But none of these suggestions quite satisfies the requirements of the Gospel story. The feeding of the 5000 took place on the other side of the sea from Capernaum, near B. Julius. Thence Jesus sent His disciples 'to go before him unto the other side, to B.' (Mk 6<sup>45</sup>). John (6<sup>17</sup>) describes them as going 'over the sea towards Capernaum.' B., whither they were sent, and Capernaum, were therefore practically in the same direction from the place where they embarked. This could not be true of B. Julius and Capernaum, even if the latter were at Tell Hâm, which is most unlikely (see CAPERNAUM). If, on the other hand, Capernaum were at Khân Minyeh, and B. say at et-Tâbghâ, the direction from the E. coast would be practically identical, and a very slight deflection from its course by the storm would be sufficient to bring the boat to land in Gennesaret. Again, it would be difficult to prove that the 'province of Galilee ran right round the lake.' Josephus is indeed guilty of confusion in speaking of Judas of Gamala, who headed a revolt against the Romans, now as a Gaulonite (Ant. XVIII. i. 1) and again as a Galilean (Ant. XVIII. i. 6), but nowhere does he indicate that the district of Gamala belonged to Galilee. It is true that subsequently, for military purposes, Gamala, 'as the strongest city in these parts,' was put under Josephus along with the two Galilees (BJ II. xx. 4), but he was careful to distinguish what belonged to the different provinces. Thus he says that along with other cities 'in Gaulonitis' he fortified Gamala (BJ II. xx. 6). Jesus retired to B. on hearing of the murder of John the Baptist, and the presumption is that he went out of the jurisdiction of Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee. If B. Julius had been in the province of Galilee, Philip would hardly have ventured to interfere with it. But Josephus explicitly says it was in 'Lower Gaulonitis' (BJ II. ix. 1). For 'B. of Galilee' we must therefore turn to westward of the Jordan.

B. Julius has usually been identified with et-Tell, a considerable ruin situated E. of the Jordan, just where the river leaves the hills, and enters the plain of el-Batûha. In the absence of any definite proof, however, it is natural to suppose that the city, 'Fisher-home,' stood much nearer the lake. This supposition is supported by the existence of an ancient site, by the mouth of the river, close to the shore, called Mas'adiyeh, wherein we may detect some resemblance to the old name. The remark of Josephus (BJ III. x. 7) that the Jordan 'passes by the city of Julius' into the Sea of Galilee would apply to either of these sites, but perhaps most appropriately to the latter. Attention may be drawn to the abounding grass, covering the rich plain, and running up like a wave of emerald over the lower slopes of the E. hills. There is no place round the lake where the natural luxuriance was so likely to call forth John's remark, 'now there was much grass in the place.' The Arab. barriyeh 'the wilderness,' or wild grazing land beyond the cultivated plots surrounding the town, doubtless corresponds to the 'desert place' of the Gospels.

The most probable site for 'B. of Galilee,' as yet suggested, is et-Tâbgha (Heptapegon?) on the N.W. shore of the Sea of Galilee. It lies in a little vale, bordering a beautiful curve in the beach, E. of the rocky promontory of Tell Arcineh,—the monkish 'Mensa Christi,'—which forms the N.E. boundary of the plain of Gennesaret. Capernaum (Khân Minyeh) to the south-west, and Chorazin (Karâseh) among the hills to the north-east, B. would here occupy the middle position, probably indicated by the order in which Jesus refers to these cities (Mt 11<sup>21-23</sup>). This seems to be confirmed by Willibald (A.D. 722), who, coming from Magdala through Gennesaret, passed first Capernaum, then B., whence he went on to Chorazin. Perhaps also a reminiscence of the ancient name is found in that of the local shrine of Sheikh 'Aly es-Saiyâdin 'Sheikh 'Aly of the Fishermen.' Copious streams of water from the warm springs on the E. edge of the vale served in time past to drive several mills on the shore, being conducted thither by aqueducts, now crumbling and covered with ferns and ivy. They also afforded supplies, led round the W. promontory, to water part of the plain of Gennesaret (see art. CAPERNAUM). The vale is extremely fertile, and has been chosen by the Prussian Catholic Pal. Society as the site of B., for the establishment of a religious colony. The shallow water round the little bay literally swarms with fish, attracted thither by the warm water from the springs. This place, and the coast of el-Batûha, near the other B., are to this day favourite haunts of the fishermen from Tiberias.

BETH-SHEAN (in OT בֵּית שֵׁאֵן or בֵּית שֵׁאֵן; in Apoc. Βαιθάν, 1 Mac 5<sup>92</sup> 12<sup>41</sup>, or Βεθσά, 1 Mac 12<sup>40</sup>, also Σκυθῶν πόλις, 2 Mac 12<sup>29</sup>, cf. v. 30 Jth 3<sup>10</sup>; in Jos. also Σκυθόπολις; in some class. writers, as Pliny, HN v. 74, and on coins Nysa. In modern Arab. Beisân).—A town between the Little Hermon and Gilboa ranges, on a plain about 300 ft. above the valley of the Jordan, and about 3 miles to the W. of that river. The old town was built on the basaltic plain now occupied by the small village of Beisân and the tell or mound to the N. of it. To the S. is a large extent of marsh, between which and the town runs an ancient road leading from the N. end of the Jordan to Jenin. The tell is bounded on the N. by the river Jalud, beyond which the ancient sepulchres still exist. Both mound and plain are covered with the ruins of temples, walls, and a large amphitheatre. In OT Beth-shean does not play an important part, apparently because, although according to 'the oldest book of Heb. history' it was apportioned to Manasseh (Jos 17<sup>11, 19</sup>, cf. 1 Ch 7<sup>29</sup>), it remained in the hands of its own people (Jg 1<sup>27</sup>). After the battle of Gilboa the bodies of Saul and his sons were carried by the Philistines to Beth-shean, and there fastened to the wall (or in the 'broad place'), whence they were removed later by the men of Jabesh-gilead (1 S 31<sup>10-13</sup>, 2 S 21<sup>12</sup>). In the reign of Solomon the city seems to have given its name to a district (1 K 4<sup>12</sup>).

The name Scythopolis given to this city as early as the 3rd cent. B.C. seems to contain a trace of an invasion of Scyths mentioned in Herodotus, i. 105 (cf. Pliny, HN v. 74), or to be due to the use of the word 'Scyths' to denote barbarians generally. In the 3rd cent. B.C. Scythopolis paid tribute to the Ptolemies. In 218 it surrendered to Antiochus the Great. About a century later it fell into the hands of John Hyrcanus, but was taken from the Jews by Pompey, restored by Gabinius, and became an independent town of the Rom. Emp. and one of the most important cities in the Decapolis. In the 4th cent. A.D. it was the seat of a bishopric.

LITERATURE.—For description of the site—SWP II. 101-114; Robinson, Later BR 326-332. For history—Schurer, HJP II. i. 110 ff.; Jos. Ant. and Jewish Wars.

BETH-SHEMESH (בֵּית שֵׁמֶשׁ 'temple of the sun').—Three places so named occur in the OT in Pal. 1. Jos 15<sup>10</sup> 21<sup>16</sup>, 1 S 6<sup>7-9</sup>, 1 K 4<sup>9</sup>, 2 K 14<sup>13</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>59</sup>, 2 Ch 28<sup>18</sup>=Irshemesh of Jos 19<sup>41</sup>, a city of Judah given to the Levites, and afterwards included in Dan. It was here that the ark rested by a stone (see ABEL), and it was a chief city of Solomon's province of Dan. Amaziah was here captured by Jehoash of Israel, and the Philistines took it in the time of Ahaz. It is the present ruin 'Ain Shems, in the valley of Sorek S.E. of Zorah. (SWP vol. III. sheet xvii.) 2. Jos 19<sup>39</sup>, a city of Naphtali in Upper Galilee. See Jg 1<sup>31</sup>. The site is unknown. 3. Jos 19<sup>22</sup>. A city in Issachar. The site is also doubtful. There is a Tell esh-Shemsiyeh in the Jordan Valley, but it seems to be too far north to be in Issachar, although its proximity to Tabor would perhaps suit (Pal. Survey Map, sheet ix.)

It is to be noted that No. 1 is specially noticed (2 K 14<sup>11</sup>) as belonging to Judah, to distinguish it from the other sites. Bethshemite occurs as gentile derivative from this name in 1 S 6<sup>14, 18</sup>.

BETH-SHEMESH.—'The pillars of Beth-she-mesh that is in the land of Egypt' (Jer 43<sup>13</sup>).—The LXX, being written in Egypt, gives simply τοὺς στύλους ἡλίου πόλεως τοῦ ἐν ἡγύπτῳ, 'the pillars of Heliopolis that are at On.' The place is therefore On in Lower Egypt. Like Heliopolis, 'city of the sun,' Beth-shemesh, 'house of the sun,' is here a translation of Per Ra, 'house of the sun,' the sacred or temple name of On. The pillars, στύλοι, מזבז, must be the obelisks characteristic of the worship of Ra, the sun-god. See AVEN and ON.

BETH-SHITTAH (בֵּית הַשִּׁטָּה), 'place of the acacia,' Jg 7<sup>22</sup>.—In the vicinity of Abel-meholah. It is the present Shutta, a village on a knoll, in the Jezreel Valley. See SWP vol. ii. sheet ix.

BETHSURA (Βαιθσοῦρα), 1 Mac 4<sup>29</sup>, 61 67, 26, 31, 49, 50 9<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>15</sup> 14<sup>7</sup>, 2 Mac. 13<sup>19</sup>, 22.—The Greek form of Bethzur. In 2 Mac 11<sup>5</sup> Bethsuron.

BETH-TAPPUAH (בֵּית תַּפּוּחַ), 'place of apples,' Jos 15<sup>53</sup>.—In the Hebron mountains, a town of Judah (see Tappuah in 1 Ch 2<sup>43</sup>). Now the village Taffah, west of Hebron. SWP vol. iii. sheet xxi.

BETHUEL (בֵּיתוּאֵל).—The son of Nahor and Milcah, nephew of Abraham, and father of Laban and Rebecca (Gn 22<sup>23</sup> 24<sup>15</sup> 24, 47, 50, 25<sup>20</sup> 28<sup>2</sup>, 5). In Gn 28<sup>9</sup> (P) he is called 'Bethuel the Syrian' (בֵּיתוּאֵל הַסִּינִי). While frequently mentioned, he only appears in person in the narrative of the betrothal of Rebecca to Isaac, and even then his son Laban is the principal agent in the transaction.* This may have been due to a usage which gave a brother a special interest in the reputation and disposal of his sister (cf. Gn 31<sup>2</sup> 11, 23, 2 S 13<sup>20</sup>, 22). Jos. (Ant. i. xvi. 2) speaks of Bethuel as dead at the time.

R. M. BOYD.

BETHULIA (Βαιθουλίαν), Jth 4<sup>6</sup>, 7 6<sup>11</sup>, 13, 14 7<sup>1</sup>, 7, 10, 13, 21 13<sup>10</sup>.—A town near Dothan, on a hill overlooking the plain, with springs in the valley. The site was unknown in later times, and placed at Safed, in Galilee, in the Middle Ages. The village of Mithilich answers in position to these requirements, being south of Dothan, on a hill at the edge of the plain. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xi.

C. R. CONDER.

BETH-ZACHARIAS (Βαιθζαχαρίας), 1 Mac 6<sup>34</sup>, 33.—A village on the mountain pass, south of Jerusalem and west of Bethlehem, now the ruin Beit Skaria. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.

BETH-ZUR (בֵּית צֹר), 'house of rock,' Jos 15<sup>58</sup>, 1 S 30<sup>27</sup> (in LXX), 1 Ch 2<sup>16</sup>, 2 Ch 11<sup>7</sup>, Neh 3<sup>16</sup>. The Bethsura of 1 Mac 4<sup>29</sup> etc. A town of Judah in the Hebron mountains, fortified by Rehoboam, and still important after the Captivity. Judas Maccabaeus here defeated the Greeks under Lysias in 165 B.C. The present ruined site, Beit Sir, on a cliff west of the Hebron road, near Halhul, is remarkable for a ruined tower, probably built in the 12th cent. A.D., and for more ancient rock-cut tombs. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xxi.

BETIMES is 'in good time,' as Pr 13<sup>24</sup> 'he that loveth him [his son] chasteneth him b.' (i.e. in early life); the Heb. is בִּקְרָא יְהוָה, lit. 'visits him [diligently] with chastisement,' the idea expressed by 'betimes' being contained in the verb, which however means 'to seek diligently' as RVm, rather than 'to seek early'; so Job 8<sup>24</sup>. In Gn 26<sup>31</sup> 'they rose up b. in the morning,' the idea expressed by 'b.' is again in the verb (צָבַח), and b. or 'early' is the correct idea; so 2 Ch 36<sup>15</sup> 'rising up b.' (RV 'early'). Besides the above, 'b.' occurs Sir 6 (heading) 'Seek wisdom b.' (in ref. to v. 18 'gather instruction from thy youth up'), 6<sup>30</sup> 51<sup>30</sup>, 1 Mac 4<sup>52</sup> 5<sup>30</sup> 11<sup>97</sup>. Betime is found only in Bel v. 16 'In the morning b. the king arose' (καὶ ὤρθρισεν ὁ βασιλεὺς τὸ πρωτῶ).

* In Gn 24<sup>50</sup> the words 'and Bethuel' were probably inserted by R. See Ball's note in Haupt's Heb. OT.

† On this double accus. see Davidson, Syntax, § 77.

J. HASTINGS.

BETOLION (Β Βετολίω, Α Βητ-, AV Betolius), 1 Es 5<sup>21</sup>.—52 persons of this place returned from captivity with Zerub. (See BETHUEL.) Ezr 2<sup>28</sup> has 'the men of Bethel and Ai' 223, and the number 52 belongs to the next named place, Nebo. 1 Es has perhaps dropped a line in the Hebrew.

II. ST. J. THACKERAY.

BETOMASTHAIM (Βαιτομασθαίμ, Jth 15<sup>4</sup>, AV Betomasthem); BETOMESTHAIM (Βετομεσθαίμ, 4<sup>6</sup>, AV Betomestham).—Apparently N. of Bethulia and facing Dothan. There is a site called Deir Massin W. of the Dothan plain, but the antiquity of this name is doubtful.

C. R. CONDER.

BETONIM (בֵּית נִימ), Jos 13<sup>28</sup>.—In N. Gilead. The name may survive in that of the Butin district, the extreme N. of Gilead.

BETRAYAL OF TRUST.—See CRIMES. BETROTHING.—See MARRIAGE.

BETTER.—As a subst. 'one's betters,' the word is not used in AV, but the adj. in Ph 2<sup>8</sup> shows how that expression arose: 'let each esteem other b. than themselves' (ὑπερέχοντας). The verb is found Mk 5<sup>20</sup> 'was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse' (i.e. made better, lit. 'profited,' ὠφελέω).

J. HASTINGS.

BETWEEN, BETWIXT.—'Between' was once used freely with a reflexive pronoun to express that which is confined to two (or more) persons. Thus Tindale's tr<sup>n</sup> of Jn 11<sup>36</sup> is 'and spake betwene themselves' (μετ' ἀλλήλων, AV 'among'). AV has 1k 23<sup>12</sup> 'they (Pilate and Herod) were at enmity b. themselves' (πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς TR, edd. mostly αὐτοὺς); Ac 26<sup>31</sup> 'they talked b. themselves' (πρὸς ἀλλήλους, RV 'they spake one to another'); Ro 12<sup>4</sup> 'to dishonour their own bodies b. themselves' (ἐν ἑαυτοῖς TR, edd. mostly αὐτοῖς; see Sanday and Headlam in loc.; RV 'among themselves'). We still retain the phrase 'b. ourselves!'

Between and betwixt were for a long time interchangeable; the latter is now archaic or local. Betwixt is used in Gn 17<sup>11</sup> 23<sup>15</sup> 26<sup>28</sup> 30<sup>38</sup> 31<sup>37</sup>, 60, 61, 62 32<sup>16</sup>, Job 9<sup>33</sup> 36<sup>32</sup>, Ca 1<sup>13</sup>, Is 5<sup>3</sup>, Jer 39<sup>4</sup>, 1 Mac 12<sup>44</sup> 16<sup>3</sup>, Ph 1<sup>23</sup>. RV retains all except Job 36<sup>32</sup> (see RV and Davidson in loc.), and adds Job 4<sup>20</sup> 'B. morning and evening' (AV 'from . . . to').

J. HASTINGS.

BEULAH (Heb. בְּעֻלָּה, 'married' (of a wife)).—Is 62<sup>4</sup>, 5. An allegorical name applied to Israel by the Deutero-Isaiah. She was no longer to be a wife deserted by God, as she had been during the Captivity, but married (1) to God, (2) by a strange application of the figure, to her own sons. In Hos 1, 2 the figure in its first application is reversed. There it is used to point out the faithlessness of Israel to her Spouse.

F. H. WOODS.

BEWAIL as a reflex. verb occurs only Jer 4<sup>31</sup> 'the daughter of Zion that beth herself' (בָּתְּהָא [all], 'to breathe,' hithp. 'gasp for breath,' as RV). In Lk 8<sup>52</sup> 23<sup>27</sup> the meaning is 'to beat the breast in grief' (κόπτομαι, used without an obj. in Mt 11<sup>17</sup> 'ye have not lamented,' RV 'did not mourn,' and 24<sup>30</sup>). See MOURNING.

J. HASTINGS.

BEWITCH.—Ac 8<sup>9</sup> 'Simon . . . used sorcery, and b<sup>d</sup> the people' (ἐξίστημι, RV 'amazed' as frequently, and as AV in v. 13; but see BESIDE); so 8<sup>11</sup>. In Gal 3<sup>1</sup> 'O foolish Galatians, who hath b<sup>d</sup> you?' (RV 'did b. you?'); the Gr. is βασκανῶ, 'to speak evil of,' next 'bring evil on,' and so, as here, 'lead into evil' (see Lightfoot, ad loc.); it is used here only in NT, but in LXX Dt 28<sup>54, 56</sup> (for נָקַד), Sir 14<sup>6, 8</sup>. Bewitching.—Wis 4<sup>12</sup> 'the b. of naughtiness' (βασκανία φαυλότητος, Vulg. fascinatio). It seems probable that in all these passages (as in 4 Mac 1<sup>26</sup> 2<sup>16</sup>, βασκανία) the reference is more or less consciously to 'the evil eye' (cf. θάσκανος for נָקַד Pr 23<sup>22</sup>). See DIVINATION, EYE. J. HASTINGS.

Bewray, distinct in origin and meaning from 'betray,' is to reveal, disclose. Cf. Adams, Works, ii. 238 'Well may he be hurt . . . and die, that will not bewray his disease, lest he betray his credit.' Pr 29<sup>24</sup> 'he heareth cursing, and bewrayeth it not' (RV 'he heareth the adjuration and uttereth nothing,' תִּקַּד 'shew,' 'tell'); 27<sup>16</sup> (קָרָא 'proclaim,' so RVm, but RV 'encountereth' from קָרָא 'light upon'); Is 16<sup>3</sup> 'hide the outcasts; b. not him that wandereth' (קָרָא 'uncover,' 'reveal'; Amer. RV 'betray.' Sir 27<sup>17</sup> 'if thou b<sup>d</sup> his secrets' (ἀποκαλύπτω; so 27<sup>21</sup>); Mt 26<sup>73</sup> 'thy speech b<sup>d</sup> thee' (δὴλον σε ποιεῖ, 'makes thee manifest'). Bewrayer, only 2 Mac 4<sup>1</sup> 'a b. of the money, and of his country' (ἐνδελκτης, 'one who reveals,' RV 'who had given information of the money, and had betrayed his country'). J. HASTINGS.

BEYOND.—1. This is in AV the occasional rendering of Heb. בְּעֵבֶר be'ebher, which, when attached to יַרְדֵּן 'the Jordan' (as it always is, except Jg 1<sup>18</sup>, 1 S 31<sup>7</sup>, Jer 25<sup>22</sup>) assumes considerable critical importance. In AV בְּעֵבֶר is tr<sup>1</sup> 'beyond Jordan' in Gn 50<sup>10, 11</sup>, Dt 3<sup>20, 25</sup>, Jos 9<sup>10</sup> 13<sup>8</sup>, Jg 5<sup>17</sup>; 'on this side J.' Dt 1<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>41, 46, 47</sup>, Jos 14<sup>15</sup> 9<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>7</sup> 22<sup>7</sup>; 'on the other side J.' Dt 1<sup>30</sup>, Jos 2<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>4</sup> 24<sup>2</sup>. 8. 14. 15, Jg 10<sup>8</sup>, 1 S 31<sup>7</sup>; and 'on the side of J.' Jos 5<sup>1</sup>. RV gives 'beyond J.' in every place. Again בְּעֵבֶר is used with יַרְדֵּן, Nu 22<sup>1</sup> 32<sup>10, 16, 32</sup> 34<sup>15</sup> 35<sup>14</sup>, Jos 13<sup>32</sup> 14<sup>8</sup> 17<sup>5</sup> 18<sup>7</sup> 22<sup>7</sup>, Jg 7<sup>25</sup>; and the simple עָבַר Dt 4<sup>49</sup> (AV 'on this side'), Jos 13<sup>27</sup> (AV 'on the other side'). Now it is true that the phrase may equally well be tr. 'across J.'; it is also true that it is used of either side of the Jordan (cf. Dt 3<sup>8</sup> east, with 3<sup>20, 25</sup> west); it even seems that 'beyond Jordan' may be used of that side of the Jordan on which the writer himself stands (Jos 5<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>7</sup>); but the critical importance of the phrase lies in this, that wherever the author of Deut. speaks in his own person (as Dt 1<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>41, 46, 47, 49</sup>) it refers to the country east of Jordan; wherever Moses is introduced as the speaker (as Dt 3<sup>20, 25</sup> 11<sup>30</sup>) it refers to the west.* From which the conclusion is drawn that the author (at least of Deut.) must have lived after Moses' day, from whom he is careful to distinguish himself.

BEZAI (בְּצֵי).—1. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10<sup>18</sup>). 2. The eponym of a family that returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2<sup>17</sup>, Neh 7<sup>23</sup>) = Bassai of 1 Es 5<sup>16</sup>.

* The only exception is Dt 3<sup>8</sup>, where, although in a passage attributed to Moses, 'beyond Jordan' means the land of Moab; but 'the long archaeological note' in which the phrase occurs is held to be a comment of the writer's or of some editor, not original to Moses. See Harper, Deut. p. 5.

BEZALEL (בְּזָלֵל, Βεζελελ, Bezelcel, AV Bezaleel).—1. The chief architect of the tabernacle. The name occurs only in the narrative of the Priests' Code and in the Bk of Chron. (1 Ch 2<sup>20</sup>, 2 Ch 1<sup>5</sup>). It probably signifies 'in the shadow' (i.e. under the protection) of El.<sup>2*</sup> In both the sources named, B. is given as 'the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah.' The various links in the genealogical chain will be found in 1 Ch 2<sup>18, 19, 20, 50</sup>. There is no ground for identifying the grandfather of B. with Hur, the companion of Moses (Ex 17<sup>10</sup>). According to P's representation, B. was expressly called (בְּזָלֵל הָרָאשִׁי by J' (Ex 31<sup>2</sup>) to superintend the erection of the 'tent of meeting,' and endowed with the special gifts required for the proper execution of his task (vv. 5-6). He was also charged with the construction of the furniture for court and tabernacle, as well as with the preparation of the priestly garments, and of the necessary oil and incense. Yet while B. is represented as, in the main, merely carrying out the Divine instructions, he is also said to be endowed with originality of invention as regards details (Ex 31<sup>3, 4</sup> 35<sup>32</sup>). Among the gifts thus bestowed upon him, not the least was the gift of teaching the arts of which he was himself a master, to his subordinates (Ex 35<sup>34</sup>), the chief of whom was Aholiab (Ex 31<sup>6</sup> 35<sup>34</sup> etc.). See TABERNACLE. 2. B. occurs in Ezr 10<sup>30</sup> as one of the eight sons of Pahath-moab that had married foreign wives in the days of Ezra.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BEZEK (בִּזְק).—Two places so called are perhaps to be distinguished in O.T. 1. Jg 1<sup>2</sup>. A place attacked by Judah after Joshua's death, probably Bezakah, a ruin W. of Jerusalem, in the lower hills. SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii. 2. 1 S 11<sup>5</sup>, where Saul gathered Israel before advancing on Jabesh-gilead. The most likely site in this connexion is the ruin Ibzik, N.E. of Shechem, opposite Jabesh. This site was known in the 4th cent. A.D. (Gnomasticon, s.v. Bezee), but identified with No. 1. It was 17 Rom. miles from Shechem, on the road to Scythopolis (Beisân), which is correct. (See Moore on Jg 1<sup>2</sup>.)

C. R. CONDER.

BEZER (בְּצֵר 'fortress').—A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7<sup>37</sup>).

BEZER (בְּצֵר, Βόσρ).—A city belonging to Reuben, situated 'in the wilderness, on the בְּשֵׁר, or flat table-land, E. of Jordan (Dt 4<sup>3</sup>, Jos 20<sup>8</sup>), a city of refuge (Ucc.), allotted, according to P, to the Merarites (Jos 21<sup>30</sup>, whence 1 Ch 6<sup>78</sup> (69)). It is mentioned also by Mesha' (Moab. Stone, l. 27), as being in ruins in his day, and as having been rebuilt by him, after his revolt from Ahab, and expulsion of the Israelites from the territory N. of the Arnon (which, though assigned formally to Reuben, was occupied by the Moabites; see MOAB). From its being described as being in the 'wilderness' (cf. Dt 2<sup>9</sup>)—i.e. in the great rolling plains of grass or scrub stretching out on the E. of Moab (Tristram, Moab, pp. 148, 169)—it may be inferred that it was situated towards the E. border of the Moabite table-land. The site has not yet been recovered. Euseb. (Onom. 232) identifies it wrongly with Βόστρα, in Bashan, the capital of the later province of 'Arabia' (G. A. Smith, Geogr. 624). Kusar Bshér, which has been suggested, about 15 miles S.E. of Dhiban (see the map in PEFS 1895, p. 204), is too far to the S., being on the S. side of the Arnon, and consequently not in the territory of Reuben at all (Jos 13<sup>16</sup>): the name, moreover, does not correspond phonetically as it ought to do. Bezer is not improbably identical with Bozrah (LXX Βορβ), one of the cities in the possession of Moab, mentioned by Jer (48<sup>24</sup>), and also, it is implied (v.<sup>21</sup>), situated on the 'table-land.'

* Cf. Sil-Bél, a king of Gaza in the time of Sennacherib and his successors, see COT under Jos 11<sup>22</sup>; also Iua-silli-Bél, Ges. Lez. 12).

S. R. DRIVER.

BEZETH (Βηζέθ), 1 Mac 7<sup>10</sup>.—A place apparently near Jerus. Jos. calls it Bethzetho (Ant. XII. x. 2), and mentions it as a village. The situation is doubtful. It may be a corruption for Berzetho.

A word or two of explanation may be desirable as to the purpose which the article 'Bible' in a Bible Dictionary is intended to fulfil. Its design is twofold, according as it has in view the internal or the external relations of the sacred volume. The whole Dictionary being intended to explain the form and illustrate the contents of the B., the special article should, as far as may be, afford the means of gathering the information thus supplied into the unity of a system, of exhibiting it in topical rather than alphabetical order, so that the usefulness of a systematic work may be, to some extent, combined with the convenience of the lexical arrangement. In particular, the article should give, in an abridged and ordered form, an account of the various parts of which the Bible consists, and the various forms in which it has appeared, including such subjects as Canon, Text, and Versions, referring to the special articles so entitled for details. In this way it will be of use to those who desire no more than an outline or summary of these subjects, or who wish to understand their mutual relations. It should include, of course, the particulars respecting the B. as a whole, such as its names and arrangement. Having thus, in the first part, surveyed its internal relations, the article should proceed in the second part to consider the B. as one of the sacred literatures of the world, its claims to uniqueness and authority, its reception in the Christian Church, and the position accorded to it there. Into the two divisions thus indicated, the present article will fall.

A. INTERNAL RELATIONS OF THE BIBLE.

I. NAMES.—The word 'Bible' is derived from the Greek. Ancient books were written upon the Byblus or Papyrus reed, and from this custom naturally came the Gr. name βιβλος (Mt 1<sup>1</sup>), in the diminutive form βιβλιον (Lk 4<sup>17</sup>) for a book. As the recognised records of Divine Revelation, the writings which made up their sacred volume became known to the Greek Christians as τὰ βιβλία, 'the books' par excellence. This expression is said to appear for the first time in this connexion in the 2nd Epistle (14<sup>2</sup>) falsely attributed to Clement of Rome, and written probably towards the middle of the 2nd cent.; but the word afterwards became very common, though generally qualified by an adjective such as 'holy,' 'divine,' 'canonical.' In its Latin form, however, by a misunderstanding in which there is not a little significance, the neuter plural 'biblia' (gen.

biblibrum) came to be regarded and treated as a fem. sing. (gen. biblie), the transition being no doubt assisted by the growing conception of the B. as the one utterance of God rather than as the multiplicity of voices speaking for Him. As a singular name, accordingly, it has been adopted into the language of the Western Church, and is employed in the tongues of modern Europe.

Another name, 'Bibliotheca,' appears to have been commonly used for the B. throughout the Middle Ages, as evidenced by the paronomasia—'Habeo bibliothecam in mea bibliotheca'—which was then current. It appears with this meaning in old English, and was technically employed by mediæval writers to designate a complete MS of OT and NT. When originally used by certain of the Lat. Fathers, such as Jerome, the adjective 'Divina' had been prefixed to 'Bibliotheca,' but this was ere long dispensed with, and, as in the case of 'the Books,' the Scriptures became pre-eminently 'the Library.' This change of the point of view from plurality to unity is, as we shall see afterwards, precisely that which modern thought and investigation find it necessary to some extent to reverse. But it is interesting to observe the process thus embodying itself in language.

The names employed in OT and in the Apoc. for the Jewish Scriptures are such as 'the books' (Dn 9<sup>2</sup>), 'the holy books' (1 Mac 12<sup>9</sup>), 'the book of the law' (1 Mac 1<sup>86</sup> 3<sup>48</sup>), 'the book of the testament' (1 Mac 1<sup>67</sup>). In the NT the usual term is αγραφα, 'the Scriptures' (Lat. scriptura), that is, the sacred writings (Mt 21<sup>42</sup> 22<sup>29</sup>, Lk 24<sup>32</sup>, Jn 5<sup>39</sup>, Ac 18<sup>24</sup>). It is to be noted, that while the Jewish Scriptures as a whole are thus designated, ἡ γραφή, in the singular, is always used for a special passage (Lk 4<sup>21</sup>, Jn 20<sup>9</sup>, Jn 2<sup>8</sup>), and not as with us, by whom Scripture is employed perhaps even more frequently in the collective than in the special sense. Occasionally for the simple αγραφα we find αγραφα ἀγία (Ro 1<sup>2</sup>) or τὰ ἐν τῇ γραμμᾷ (2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>). Another variant is when the leading (Jewish) divisions of OT are indicated, as 'the law, the prophets and the psalms' (Lk 24<sup>44</sup>), 'the law and the prophets' (Ac 28<sup>23</sup>), 'the law' (Jn 12<sup>84</sup>). The same practice is also common in rabbinical writings, though sometimes, instead of the divisions, the number of the books is given, and the OT is known as 'The Twenty-four'; sometimes, again, the simple term 'The Reading' is employed, which, in contrast with αγραφα, reminds us of the use of the Scriptures in the services of the synagogue. By the early Christians the most common designation for the whole B. was 'The Scriptures,' accompanied as a rule by some such adjective as in the case of Biblia.

The term 'Testament,' in the expression 'Old and New Testaments,' applied to the two great divisions of the B., has an interesting history. There can be no doubt that it is due to an accidental mistranslation of διαθήκη, which, originally meaning 'arrangement' or 'disposition,' came to signify a testament or will. But in the LXX the word was adopted as the tr. of the Heb. ברית or 'covenant,' and the 'new covenant' was in due time expressed by the same term. St. Paul speaks of the Heb. Scriptures read in the synagogue as the 'old covenant' (2 Co 3<sup>14</sup> RV), and of the ministers of Christ as 'ministers of a new covenant' (2 Co 3<sup>6</sup>). Only in He 9<sup>18.17</sup> is it possible to maintain that the sense of testamentary disposition is more probable than that of covenant. By the end of the 2nd cent., accordingly, we find ἡ παλαιὰ διαθήκη, the old covenant, and ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη, the new covenant, the established expressions for the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. Origen, in the beginning of the 3rd cent., mentions 'the divine Scriptures, the so-called Old and New Covenants' (De Princip. iv. 1).

In the Latin rendering of διαθήκη there was at first some hesitation between instrumentum and testamentum, both legal terms, the former denoting any authoritative or official document; the latter, as already indicated, meaning 'will' or 'disposition' (of property). Instrumentum is referred to by Tertullian as being used in Africa; but the other, through the authority of the Vulg., passed into more general use. When in the Vulg. Jerome is translating directly from the Heb., he uses fœdus or pactum for the Heb. bêrith; but when, as in NT and in certain portions of OT, he is revising the Old Lat. Version, he allows testamentum to remain. Thus, though in thought the Christian Church has never lost sight of the two great divisions of Scripture as the records of the two dispensations or covenants which God instituted for His people, the idea has been somewhat obscured by the titles appropriated to these groups of writings.

II. ORIGINAL LANGUAGES.—The language of by far the greater part of OT is Hebrew. The name Hebrew (עִבְרִי) is applied to Abraham (Gn 14<sup>13</sup>), either in respect of descent from an ancestor Heber (Gn 10<sup>21, 24, 25</sup>), or more probably because he came (Jos 24<sup>3</sup>) 'from the other side of the flood,' עֵבֶר הַיָּם. Hebrew is a branch of the great Semitic (so called from Shem, son of Noah) family of languages, and has its cognates in the Arabic, the Assyrian of the cuneiform inscriptions, the Aramaic, Phœnician, and Ethiopic tongues. Though traces of dialectic differences appear in the Scriptures themselves (compare the pronunciation of the word Shibboleth, Jg 12<sup>6</sup>), the comparative isolation of the Hebrews preserved their language more or less unaffected by foreign influences until after the Captivity, when other elements were introduced into it. The Hebrew (Aram.) dialect is referred to several times in NT (Jn 5<sup>2</sup> 19<sup>13, 17, 20</sup>, Ac 21<sup>40</sup> 22<sup>2</sup> 26<sup>14</sup>), and even (Mt 26<sup>73</sup>) a provincial (Galilæan) form of this. The exceptions to the general use of Hebrew in OT are Ezr 4<sup>8-6</sup> 6<sup>18</sup> 7<sup>12-26</sup>, Jer 10<sup>11</sup>, Dn 2<sup>4-7</sup> 28. These passages are written in an Aramaic dialect, which, however, differs from that in which the Targums were written, and also from Syriac.

The language of NT writers, on the other hand, is Greek, but in the form known as Hellenistic Greek, that is, the form which had come into use among the Hellenists or Jews of the Dispersion. From the time when Alexander the Great (B.C. 356-323) founded a Jewish colony in Alexandria, this dialect had established itself at all centres where Jew and Greek came into frequent contact. The OT had been translated into it, forming the version known as the Septuagint (LXX), and this 'Hebrew thought in Greek clothing,' as it has been termed, gave its tone and character to the language in which the NT is also written. At the time of Christ, Greek was the prevailing language throughout the Roman Empire, the language of educated men, and no less that of commercial life. It has been ably argued that Greek was the common language of Palestine in the days of our Lord, and that the Gospel records therefore present us with His discourses in the very words in which they were spoken. But the general consensus of opinion is against this hypothesis, and indeed there is reason to believe that the greater part, at least, of St. Matthew's Gospel, may have had an Aramaic original. The Greek of NT is the 'common dialect,' which had been formed out of Attic Greek by the introduction of provincialisms and the various modifications necessary to enable it to serve many purposes throughout a vast region. As it appears in our sacred writings it is largely influenced, as already indicated, by the LXX, and adapted for the communication of the religious ideas due to the special character of Christianity.

III. DIVISION AND ARRANGEMENT.—The great division of the B., as already mentioned, is into the Books of the OT and those of the NT. The former consists, in the Eng. B., of 39 books, but in the Heb. B. of 24 only—1 and 2 S, 1 and 2 K, 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr and Neh, and the 12 Minor Prophets being respectively counted as one book. The number, according to the account of Josephus, was in his time still further reduced by adding the Book of Ruth to Judges, and that of Lamentations to Jeremiah. This reckoning probably originated in a desire to bring the number of books, possibly as part of a general mnemonic scheme, into accordance with the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet. It was in use, according to the testimony of Origen, as late as the middle of the 3rd cent. Another enumeration is that of Epiphanius, who, by resolving Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles again into two books each, made of the twenty-four, twenty-seven books. A point of greater interest and importance is the grouping of these books. In the Heb. B. they fall into three main divisions:—1. The Law, or Torah (תּוֹרָה); 2. The Prophets, or Nebiim (נְבִיאִים); 3. The Holy Writings, or Kethubim (כְּתוּבִים, ἀγία γραφή). The Torah includes the five books (Pentateuch) associated with the name of Moses. The Nebiim are divided into the 'former prophets,' or historical books, and the 'latter prophets,' or prophetic writings in the stricter sense. The Kethubim include (a) the Poetical books—Ps, Pr, Job; (b) the five Megilloth or Rolls—Ca, Ru, Lu, Ec, Est; (c) other books, Dn, Ezr, Neh, 1 and 2 Ch. Within these divisions the order of the books sometimes varied, and other divisions of great antiquity are extant; but the one given is of special importance, as will be seen when we touch upon the history of the Canon. In LXX (A.) the arrangement is mainly determined by a consideration of the contents of the books: first come the Historical, then the Prophetic, and lastly the Poetical books. From the LXX this arrangement passed into the Vulg. and other versions.

The following has been given (Cambridge Companion, p. 7) as a useful classification of the OT books according to subject-matter. A. Historical: (1) Pentateuch and Joshua, the origin of the people, the foundation of the Israelite constitution, and the settlement in Palestine; (2) Jg, S, K, the history of the people to the downfall of the monarchy; (3) Ezr, Neh, personal memoirs of the Captivity and the Return; (4) Ru, Est, Ch, special incidents in, and aspects of, the history. B. Prophetic: Is, Jer, Ezk, Min. Proph. (except Jon). C. Poetical: (1) Ps and La (lyrical); (2) Canticles (idyllic). D. Didactic: (1) Job (dramatic); (2) Jon (allegorical). E. Sapiential: (1) Pr (gnomic); (2) Ec (speculative). F. Apocalyptic: Dn, and part of Ezk (40-48) and Zec (1-6<sup>3</sup>).

The NT presents no serious difficulty in regard to the arrangement of its books. These, 27 in number, fall naturally into the following groups. 1. The Gospels. 2. The Acts of the Apostles. 3. The Epistles of St. Paul, among which the Epistle to the Hebrews may for this purpose be included. 4. The General Epistles. 5. The Book of Revelation. This distribution, which has passed from the Vulg. into general acceptance by the Christian Church, is commended by its conformity with the order of contents of the several books. First, the Life of Christ; then the Activity of His Apostles, and the foundation of the Church of Christ; then the correspondence of those engaged in this work; and lastly, the sole monument of the apocalyptic spirit and its activity within the Church. The arrangement found in the MSS presents some interesting and suggestive variations, and has been held to point to an early division into four groups—the Gospels, the Acts and Catholic Epistles, the Pauline Epistles, and the Apocalypse. Usually the Catholic Epistles precede those of St. Paul, and among the latter the Epistle to the Hebrews is often found coming before the Pastoral Epistles. The order of the Gospels also varies; probably from a feeling that those written by apostles should have precedence of those by 'apostolic men,' they are frequently arranged (e.g. in Codex Bezae), Mt, Jn, Lk, Mk. For the purpose of following the development of thought and doctrine in the NT, it is desirable to keep in view not only the arrangement determined by contents, but approximately the chronological order in which its books appeared. The following is such an approximate order: the great Epistles of St. Paul to the Thess, Cor, Gal, and Rom; the Ep. of St. James; Ph, Eph, Col, Philm; 1 P, the Synoptic Gospels, Ac, the Pastoral Epistles, Jude, Rev, He—all prior to the destruction of Jerus. by Titus, A.D. 70. 2 P and the Gospel and three Epistles of St. John come after the destruction of Jerus., the last towards the end of the 1st cent.

Minor divisions of the sacred text, which are for the most part also modern divisions, have been made for two distinct purposes—(1) to adapt it for use in the public services, whether of the Synagogue or of the Church; and (2) for convenience of reference. Upon the elementary expedient of separating words and sentences by short spaces to promote facility in reading, or upon that of indicating the members of a poetical composition, either by an interval between them or by writing them on different lines, it is not necessary to dwell. It is only remarkable how long the inconvenient scriptio continua maintained itself, especially in the MSS of the Greek text. To the first of the two classes of divisions mentioned belong the Parashoth and Haphtaroth of the Hebrew Scriptures. The former (פָּרָשָׁה, sing. פָּרָשָׁה Parashah) are sections mainly of the Pentateuch, though extended in principle to other parts of the OT. They are distinguished as Smaller and Larger Parashoth, and the smaller are again divided into closed and open. Of the smaller there are 669 (379 closed and 290 open) in the Pentateuch; of the larger 64, the latter being commonly called Sabbath Parashoth, one being appointed to be read on each Sabbath of the year. In certain years, according to the Jewish reckoning, there were 54 Sabbath; when there were less than that number, two Parashoth were read on one Sabbath. The open Parashah (indicated by B, for פָּתוּחָה), generally introducing a subject of greater importance, was begun on a new line; the closed (indicated by C, for סְגוּלָה) might begin in the middle of a line. The Haphtaroth were selected sections from the prophetic writings, read in connexion with the appointed sections of the Law, and usually standing in some correspondence with the latter. They were analogous to the Pericopæ of later ecclesiastical usage. It was common to refer to these Hebrew sections by words denoting the subject,—as the Parashah Balaam, red heifer, etc., compare Mk 12:26 ἐν τῇ βετון, in the Bush; Ro 11:24 ἐν Ἰλίου, in Elijah (Ἰλιν),—or sometimes by the words beginning the section. Divisions more nearly corresponding to our present verses are referred to in the Talmud as Pesukim (פְּסוּקִים), and perhaps were early denoted by the Soph-pasuk (סוֹפ־פָּסוּק) now used at the end of verses in our Hebrew Bibles. There is some doubt as to how far Jerome's capitula and versus correspond to the Parashoth and Pesukim of the Jews. Sometimes his versus seem to indicate whole verses, sometimes only the στίχοι or members of a verse in the poetical books.

Turning to MSS of the NT, there is found even so early as the Codex Vaticanus (4th cent.) a marginal indication of sections divided according to the sense, and apparently constructed for purposes of reference. It bears traces of having been copied from a yet more ancient document. A division of the Gospels into larger chapters (κεφάλαια majora) is ascribed to Tatian, the disciple of Justin Martyr. These are also known as τίτλοι from the summary of the contents of the section commonly appended to the numeral indicating it. In Latin the κεφάλαια were termed breves and the summaries breviaria. The relations of the different narratives of the same event contained in the Gospels must early have attracted attention, and to exhibit these was the design of the κεφάλαια minor, attributed to Ammonius of Alexandria, who lived in the 3rd cent. Upon these Eusebius of Caesarea a century later founded his ten canons, by means of which it is possible to ascertain whether a passage occurs in one Gospel alone or in any combination of two or more. In the 5th cent. Euthalius, a deacon of Alexandria, published first St. Paul's Epistles and then the Acts and Catholic Epistles, divided into κεφάλαια similar to the τίτλοι of the Gospels; and Andreas, Archbishop of the Cappadocian Caesarea, completed the work so far by dividing the Apocalypse into twenty-four paragraphs (λόγοι), of which each was subdivided into three κεφάλαια. (But see Robinson, Euthaliana, 1895).

The modern division of the whole Bible into chapters has usually been attributed to Hugues de St. Cher (Hugo de Sancto Caro), Provincial of the Dominicans in France, afterwards Cardinal in Spain (died A.D. 1263), but recent investigations ascribe it with greater probability to Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, died 1227 (see Gregory, Prolegomena to Tischendorf's NT, ed. viii, p. 164; König, Einleit. in das Alte Test. p. 464). Engaged about 1248 in preparing a concordance, or index of declinable words, Hugo, adopting Langton's division into chapters, subdivided them by placing the letters A-G in the margin at equal distances from each other. The chapters were soon introduced into the Latin Vulgate, and thence into Greek MSS and printed editions circulating in the West. Scrivener (Introd. to the Crit. of NT) gives several instances of inappropriate division due to this arrangement, the sense being materially interrupted. The indication of minor divisions by marginal letters was soon found inadequate and inconvenient, and Robert Stephens in his Greek Testament of 1551 introduced the system of verse divisions which is still in use. Already about 1437 Rabbi Nathan had employed a similar system, along with Hugo's division into chapters, for the OT, in connexion with a concordance of the Hebrew Bible. This Stephens used as his model, but the work was executed hurriedly, inter equitandum ('while resting at the inns on the road,' interprets Scrivener), on a journey between Paris and Lyons, according to the information supplied by his son, Henry Stephens, in 1576. Stephens' verse-divisions were adopted in the Geneva English Bible of 1560, and subsequently in the AV of 1611. As they are found in practice to break up the sense of the text, the RV has printed the text in paragraphs, indicating chapter and verse in the margin only. The first printed edition of the Heb. Bible with chapters is that of Bomberg, 1525; the first with the verses numbered is that of Athias, 1601.

IV. CANON.—The word 'Canon' means 'pattern, rule'; probably in the first instance it denoted a measuring line. It does not appear to have had any religious application in pre-Christian times. Its use by the Christian Church for the 'rule of faith and life' was possibly suggested by such passages in the NT as Gal 6<sup>16</sup>, Ph 3<sup>16</sup>. Since the time of Origen it has been applied to the Holy Scriptures of OT and NT as being the recognised authority and court of appeal in regard to Christian faith and practice. It was the content, however, not the range of the Scriptures, which was thus designated. The application of the term involves Church recognition, that the Scriptures are separated from all other literature in virtue of the authority thus ascribed to them. Thus Rufinus translates the κανονικός of Origen by regularis or publicus, opposing the books of which the adjective is used to the Apoc. and Libri Ecclesiastici. Athanasius was among the first to apply it to the writings which contained the regulative content. Some have thought that the word Canon was used for the list of books appointed to be read in churches; but this appears inconsistent with the fact that the Libri Ecclesiastici were also used for this purpose. Nor does the suggestion that it was the practice of the Alexandrian grammarians to apply the term 'canonical,' in the sense of 'classical,' to certain Greek authors, appear to have an ascertained bearing upon the Christian usage.

i. OT Canon.—The formation of the Canon of OT is a subject involved in much obscurity. That the process was a long and gradual one lies in the nature of the case, but the trustworthy indications are few, and the way is thus opened for those efforts of criticism, working upon the contents of the sacred books, which have in recent years assumed such remarkable proportions. There can be no doubt that the large collection was formed by the aggregation of smaller ones, to which some have traced allusions in such OT passages as Dt 17<sup>18</sup> 31<sup>26</sup>, 1 S 10<sup>25</sup>, Pr 25<sup>1</sup>, and perhaps Zec 7<sup>12</sup>, though the last may refer to the oral rather than the written law. There are also references to the earlier prophets in the pages of the later. The grouping of the books in the Heb. Bible, which has been already adverted to, may further be taken as at least a rough indication of the growth of the Canon. In both the Heb. and LXX arrangement of the books the first place is occupied by the Pent., and this notwithstanding the great variations in the order of the later books. Here, therefore, we may fairly conclude that we have the starting-point of the process. This was the literature recognised as sacred when Ezra read the Torah in the hearing of the whole people (Neh 8). To this would be long be added such records of Israel's history and such portions of the writings of Israel's prophets as survived, forming the second of the great divisions. Then, finally, the miscellaneous collection known as the Hagiographa would be formed for the preservation of those works which were deemed worthy of being placed beside the Law and the Prophets. As to the occasions of these steps being taken, and in connexion with the whole subject, there are traditions, some of which were accepted in Christian times, but which are in general to be regarded with suspicion, even where they cannot be shown to be absolutely untrustworthy. Thus the second stage mentioned above is in 2 Mac 2<sup>18</sup> ascribed to Nehemiah, who is said to have 'founded a library' and 'gathered together the acts of the Kings and the Prophets, and the writings of David and the epistles of the Kings concerning the holy gifts.' The succeeding verse, 2<sup>14</sup>, mentions an effort of Judas Maccabæus to recover the documents which had 'fallen out' during the great war of independence, and it may have been on this occasion that the bulk of the Hagiographa was brought together. A more famous tradition is that of the Great Synagogue, which, beginning its work under the presidency of Ezra, still existed in the time of Simon the Just. To this body the formation of at least the first two divisions of the Canon was ascribed. These two had at any rate obtained general recognition, while the third was at least in course of construction when, probably in the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C., the Prologue to Ecclesiasticus speaks of 'the Law itself, the Prophets and the rest of the Books.' The reference in Josephus to the 22 Books is in terms which indicate that the Canon had already been for some time completed, and his Canon was evidently identical with ours. Though it is true that certain books, as Ec and Ca, were still disputed by the Jews themselves as late as A.D. 90, it may be held that, so far as historical indication goes, the OT Canon was practically completed a century before Christ. It was certainly the uniform tradition of the Jews that prophetic inspiration had ceased with Malachi, and it is worthy of remark that the very myths with which they ultimately surrounded the formation and close of the Canon could have arisen only in the course of a considerable period of time.

Before glancing at the way in which this problem has in modern times been attacked from another side, it may be well to refer to the so-called Alexandrian Canon and OT Apocrypha. The LXX (see below) was made up partly of translations from the Hebrew, partly of productions in the Greek language of later Jewish literature. The conclusion that there was a recognised Alex. Canon distinct from that of Pal. has found much favour with Rom. Cath. critics, as it seemed to give authority to the Apocrypha. These books were extensively used by the Church Fathers, and Jerome himself included Judith among the Hagiographa. But it is more probable that there was no intention to erect a separate standard of Canonicity, and that the additional books were admitted partly owing to the Canon of Palestine not having yet been definitely or authoritatively fixed, partly owing to a certain breadth of practical view. It is to be noted that the grandfather of Jesus Sirach indicates no knowledge of any other than the Heb. Canon, and that Philo, though he took a wide view of inspiration, is said, like NT itself, never to cite the apocryphal books. The books so named vary greatly both as to their contents and value. 1 and 2 Mac are histories—the former highly, the latter much less, trustworthy; others (1 Es, To, Jth, 3 and 4 Mac) are rather historical romances. Some (Wis, Sir) are collections of wise sayings or philosophical treatises; others are intended to supplement the canonical books, or to illustrate the acts and words of persons mentioned in the latter. It was by popular suffrage rather than formal acceptance that these books obtained their places in the Greek B., which, it must be remembered, was the B. of the apostolic age, and so formed part of the heritage of the Christian Church.

The problem of modern criticism has been, not so much the formation and completion of the Canon as an authoritative collection, regarding which it has been able to add little to the meagre historical indications already noticed, as the rise of OT as a literature and its relation to the religious life and thought of Israel. Certain features of the sacred narratives—such as, double accounts of the same event, differences of expression and phraseology, differences even of tone and modes of thinking, and, in the Pent., references to events long after the time of Moses—had been early noticed, and could scarcely fail to suggest that they had been compiled from still earlier documents, or had had notes and explanations inserted by later hands than those of the original authors or compilers. The serious analysis, esp. of the Pentateuchal writings, began when, in 1753, Astruc, a French physician, pointed out that the more remarkable of these lines of cleavage coincided with the respective use of Elohimi or J' as names of God. Astruc himself set the example, which was only too readily followed by succeeding critics, of excessive detail in his analysis, since he parcelled out the Book of Genesis among no fewer than twelve different writers. The phenomena, however, to which he called attention, being beyond dispute, obviously needed explanation, and, when they were found pervading other books, and esp. the Book of Joshua, seemed to prove, not only that these writings were of composite character, but that they belonged to a later date than had previously been assigned to them. His successors assumed at first that the Elohist, whose narrative begins with Gn 1<sup>1</sup>, was the earlier; and his writing was known as the basis or Grundschrift, the sections marked by the use of the name J' being held to have been inserted into this fundamental document as supplementary to it. A more careful investigation undertaken by Hupfeld, and published in 1853, showed not only that the Jahwistic portions belonged to a document which, originally independent, had been interwoven with the other, but that there were at least two Elohistes whose respective work could be distinguished, while one of them stood in the closest relation with the Jahwist. Taking these two together, it may be stated as a fact now generally accepted, that there are three great divisions discernible in the Pentateuch, or elements rather of which it consists—(1) The work of the Deuteronomist belonging mainly to the fifth book; (2) that of an Elohistie writer,—to which the name of Priestly Code, Priestercodez, is commonly given, beginning, as already mentioned, with Gn 1<sup>1</sup>; (3) the combined narrative of the Jahwist and a second Elohist. It is true that analysis, following the lines of Astruc, has often gone much further, and that OT criticism has been brought into disrepute in many quarters and laid itself open to counter-criticism, not only by this excess, but by the great divergence of view among the earlier critics, and the confidence, and even arrogance, with which they pronounced upon the smallest detail. But while the disagreements of critics show that their work is yet far from complete, and that there are probably many points as to which certainty is no longer attainable, the main results of their work cannot be ignored, and are no more to be disposed of by a general appeal to inspiration than Hugh Miller's question as to how the fossil shells came to be in the rocks was answered by the quarryman's explanation—'When God made the rocks, He made the shells in them.' Thirty years ago the problem of the Pent., and with it that of the whole OT, took a new phase, when not only linguistic and literary considerations were brought to its solution, but also considerations derived from a closer examination of Israel's history and of the progress of its religious thought and practice. The whole question has been made to turn on the chronological relation of the Priestly Code (P) to the Jahwistic-Elohistic document (JE). Formerly the author of P was regarded as the oldest writer, even by such critics as Hupfeld, Ewald, and Knobel; now he is regarded as the latest, not only by Kuenen, Wellhausen, and Reuss, but even by Delitzsch and Driver. Critics, however, when maintaining the late date of a writing in its present form, often admit that earlier documentary or traditional elements may be embodied in it. It is indeed sixty years since the view which has recently commended itself to so many was broached by W. Vatke. Vatke was led to his conclusions, however, mainly by à priori considerations, and his book lay long neglected in consequence of the philosophical and technical form in which it was written. A similar theory was independently developed by Reuss of Strassburg, and made public by two of his pupils, H. Graf in a work issued in 1866, and Kayser in one published in 1874. Kuenen followed up the same views in his great work on the Religion of Israel (1869-70), while Wellhausen in his publications of 1876 and 1878 carried them to the furthest point which they have yet reached. It is claimed as a special merit in Wellhausen's work that it 'excited interest in these questions outside the narrow circle of specialists by its skilful handling of the materials, and its almost perfect combination of wide historical considerations with the careful investigation of details.' The Grafian, or Graf-Wellhausen, hypothesis was made known, or at least popularised, in Britain through the writings of Robertson Smith. The starting-point of the theory is found in a study of the legislation contained in the Pent., and a comparison of the religious history and practice of Israel with what might have been expected had the whole of this legislation been known and observed from the beginning. It seemed to Vatke impossible 'that a whole nation should suddenly sink from a high stage of religious development to a lower one, as is asserted to have been so often the case in the times of the Judges and Kings.' It is claimed that the only explanation of the religious life of Israel is that many of the laws were either unknown or non-existent. Again, when the three components of the Pent. were examined, each was found to contain a distinct legislation in a historical setting. Of these the simplest and probably the earliest was that known as the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23), while the most complex, and therefore presumably the latest, was that of the Priestly Code. Between these came Deuteronomy. Not without exception perhaps, but in a sufficiently striking manner, the course of the history was found to reflect, and to be best explained by this order of the laws. The spiritual tide which lifted the life of Israel from stage to stage, leaving at each its memorial deposit of legislation, was due to the prophets, who, by their impassioned appeals and denunciations of abuses, were the means of purifying the religion of their people, and raising it to a point of elevation, after reaching which it unhappily fell into that petrification which is not only decay, but death. The Law is the product, not the antecedent, of the prophetic activity; to reverse the order is, in the words of Wellhausen, to begin with the roof instead of the foundation; but if the legislations fall into the order above indicated, it almost necessarily follows that the narratives in which they are respectively embedded must be regarded as originating in the same order. To separate the law from the history was the defect of Graf, corrected by Kuenen and Wellhausen. But to accept law and narrative as emerging in the portions and order supposed, is to revolutionise the whole conception previously entertained of Israel's history, and of its literary development. We conclude this brief account with the verdict pronounced upon the theory by a master in this department, A. B. Davidson of Edinburgh—'The strength of the theory lies in its correspondence with the practice, as we observe it in the historical books, and in the general outline of the religious history which it draws. Its weakness lies in the incapacity which as yet it has shown to deal with many important details, and particularly in the assumption, absolutely necessary to its case, that the ancient historical books have been edited from a Deuteronomic point of view.'

The following chronological scheme of OT literature, founded mainly upon Driver's Introduction, may be found useful:—*

13th-11th cent. B.C. (period of Judges). Song of Deborah, Blessing of Jacob, David's elegy (2 S 1).

10th-9th cent. B.C. Song of Solomon (?); sources incorporated in Judges and Samuel; J and E.

8th cent. B.C. Amos, 760-746; Hosea, 746-734; Zechariah (chaps. 9-11, which, however, include also post-exilic elements, if they are not, as some hold, wholly post-ex.); Isaiah (750-700), 721 marking the end of the kingdom of Israel; Micah.

7th cent. B.C. D; Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel (sources earlier); Ruth; Nahum (664-607); Zephaniah (earlier years of Josiah, i.e. 639-621); Jeremiah (called 626).

6th cent. Habakkuk (608-598); Jeremiah; 1 and 2 Kings (sources earlier); Lamentations; Obadiah (partly before and partly after 586, which marks the commencement of the Exile); Proverbs (partly before and partly after the Exile); Job; P; 11 Isaiah and fragments; Ezekiel (taken captive 597. The last three fall during the Exile, say, 589-536); Haggai (520 seq.); Zechariah (chaps. 1-8, 520 seq.).

5th cent. Joel (after Captivity); Jonah; Zec (12-14); Malachi (probably about 432). Memoirs of Ezra and Nehemiah (c. 450-430) incorporated in our Ezr-Neh.

4th cent. Ecclesiastes (not earlier than latter years of Persian rule, ending 332); Esther (early years of Greek period, beginning 332, or 3rd cent.); 1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezr-Neh in present form (shortly after 332, long subsequent to Ezra).

2nd cent. Daniel. The Psalms prob. belong to most of these periods, including even the Maccab. (168-165), but chiefly to the later ones (ex. and post-ex.).

ii. NT Canon.—The Jewish Scriptures became the B. of the early Christian Church. Round them in course of time gathered collections of Christian writings to which canonical authority was ultimately ascribed. But as in the case of OT the process was gradual. There was clearly no deliberate intention on the part of NT writers to make Scripture. The Jewish reverence for OT which the apostles inherited would prevent any such thought arising. That NT should have been written at all by men who shared in such a traditional feeling has been characterised by Westcott as a 'moral miracle of overwhelming dignity.' The writings were evidently called forth by the circumstances of the Church, and only as a second thought gathered together and invested with authority. In order of composition the Epistles naturally took precedence of the Gospels. The facts of the Gospel history formed the staple of the apostolic preaching, and, though in the earliest years communicated orally only, must have tended to assume a fixed traditional form. So long as the apostles survived, and the Church had not extended beyond the reach of their personal instruction, the necessity of committing this tradition to writing would be scarcely recognised. The conviction widely held during that first age, that the end of the world was near, would also tend to discourage any effort of this kind. With the extension of the Church, the rising doubts as to the impending catastrophe, and the removal of the apostles, the need for a permanent record would be felt and supplied. That small collections of memorabilia, notes of apostolic preaching, were made and circulated we know on the testimony of St. Luke, whose object is expressly declared to be the displacement of these by a more trustworthy account (Lk 1<sup>16</sup>). Meanwhile the apostles had supplemented their personal activity by epistolary communications, and thus the material for a new (Christian) Canon was accumulated. It is probable that all the books composing our NT were written by the end of the 1st cent. of our era. This, indeed, is generally acknowledged, except where, as in the case of Baur and the early Tübingen school, a speculative reconstruction of early Church History necessitates the ascription of later dates to certain of the books. The recognition, however, of NT books by the Church as of apostolic authorship and authority was a matter of much longer time. It is not until the 4th cent. that all the books of the present Canon are found included in any list. The Didaché, or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, an early treatise, the MS of which was discovered so recently as 1873, makes it clear that in the quarter whence it emanated in the end of the 1st or beginning of the 2nd cent. only a few of them were known. It was only to be expected, however, that certain books, or small collections of books, should be known and received within comparatively limited areas, from which they gradually passed into the use of the Church at large. Though there was no formal attempt to create a Canon, and for long no formal decree authorising it, a certain Christian wisdom and discretion is seen at work in the acknowledgment of writings both individually and collectively. The criterion was from the first apostolicity, immediate, or all but immediate, connexion with the apostles. Only those books were admitted which could be regarded as the most faithful records of the work of Christ and His apostles, and as the suitable foundation of Christian preaching. The need which was so soon felt, of exhibiting the truths characteristic of Christianity in opposition to the paganising mysticism of the gnostics and the fanatical developments of Montanism, hastened the process, by driving men to the study of the primitive records of the faith. For this purpose the oral teaching, which still continued, was insufficient, as gnosticism itself appealed to the written records. These accordingly ceased to be regarded as mere private and occasional writings; they became more than books which might be publicly read for edification; they were the recognised arbiters in a great doctrinal contest; to them both sides appealed, and the foundations of NT were laid.

* Compare the table given by Sanday, Inspiration, p. 435 ff.; and by Kautzsch, AT, of which a tr. is given in Expos. Times, vi. 517 ff.

The chief sources for the history of NT Canon in the period of its formation are the Christian writers, esp. those who took part in the great controversies with heretics during the 2nd and 3rd centuries, the fragments of the heretical writings themselves, the ancient versions, and sundry lists of recognised books which have come down to us. Westcott (Canon of the NT) divides the history of this period as follows:—I. A.D. 70–170, during which time, though the evidence admissible is fragmentary, it is of wide range, direct, uniform, and comprehensive; a margin still remained of books whose authority was disputed or at least unrecognised, and the idea of a Canon was implied rather than expressed. Its 'formation' may have been gradual, but it was certainly undisturbed. It was a growth and not a series of contests. II. A.D. 170–303, during which the available evidence is largely augmented and the consciousness of a collection of sacred books becomes more distinct. Still its work is 'to construct and not to define,' the age 'was an age of research and thought, but at the same time it was an age of freedom.' 'Even controversy failed to create a spirit of historical inquiry,' and thus the evidence gathered from writers of the 3rd cent. 'differs from that of earlier date in fulness rather than in kind.' III. A.D. 303–397, during which the Canon formed the subject of deliberation and decree at great Councils of the Church, at one of which, the third Council of Carthage, held in the year 397, the books of NT recognised 'are exactly those which are generally received at present.'

Some of the chief points of this development can alone be indicated here; further information will be found in the special article (NEW TESTAMENT CANON). Justin Martyr, the apologist, about A.D. 150, records the fact that certain apostolic writings were read along with the prophets on the Lord's Day in the churches both in city and country. Among these writings he especially refers to what he calls 'The Memoirs of the Apostles,' which almost without doubt were the Canonical Gospels. He refers to the Apocalypse by name, and evinces an acquaintance with several of St. Paul's Epistles. The list known as the Muratorian Fragment, from Muratori, who published it at Milan in 1740, which probably represents the view of the Roman Church towards the end of the 2nd cent., refers to the Gospels, to the Acts as the work of St. Luke, enumerates 13 Epp. of St. Paul, acknowledges St. Jude, 2 Epp. of St. John (probably the 2nd and 3rd), and the Apoc. The fragment is somewhat mutilated, and in this way the incompleteness of its reference to the Gospels, and its omission of 1 P and 1 Jn are possibly to be accounted for. It adds the Apoc. of St. Peter, though with an indication of doubt, and expressly excludes two Epistles which had been circulated under St. Paul's name—one to the Laodiceans, and the other to the Alexandrians. The Peshitta or Syriac Version of NT was the B. of the Syrian Christians of a period not later than the end of the 2nd cent. It included all the books of our Canon except 2 and 3 Jn, 2 P, Jude, and Rev. The old Lat. Version, also of the 2nd cent., omitted only He, Ja, and 2 P. The heretic Marcion, about the middle of the same cent., composed a Canon of his own in accordance with his peculiar views. This embraced the greater part of the Pauline Epp. and a modification of St. Luke. Tatian's Diatesaron, or 'Harmony of the Four Gospels,' which, as has recently been conclusively proved, were the four Gospels of our Canon, not only testifies to the existence of these, but signalises by this treatment of them their peculiar position and authority, which was similarly emphasized a little later by the fanciful analogy by which Irenaeus sought to show that there could be only four Gospels. By A.D. 250 we have the evidence of Irenaeus as representing the churches in Gaul, Clement of Alexandria and Origen representing the Egyptian churches, and Tertullian representing the churches of North Africa, practically concurring in their testimony to the contents of that body of Scripture which, with increasing distinctness, was taking its place as the authoritative Canon. Doubt still affected only Ja, 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, and Rev, while Hebrews was in the churches of Rome and Africa not recognised as Pauline. Eusebius in his Eccles. History, composed about A.D. 325, gives valuable information and testimony as to the state of the question in his time. He distinguishes the books which claimed to be authoritative as Homologoumena, or universally acknowledged books: Antilegomena, or disputed books; and Notha, or spurious books. The Antilegomena included Ja, Jude, 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, also Hebrews and Rev. Eusebius hazards the opinion that Hebrews may be a Greek tr. of a Heb. Pauline original. St. Jerome, towards the close of the 4th cent., gives much the same account of the state of opinion in his time, while he himself accepts all the books of our present Canon. St. Augustine likewise accepts the Canon in its present form, and was present at that Council of Carthage (397) at which, as already stated, ecclesiastical sanction was given to it. It must be admitted that this conclusion was reached rather on popular and consuetudinary than critical grounds, and it is no matter for surprise that the question of canonicity was reopened at the Reformation, and again within the last half century. Nothing, however, has been proved which affects the claim of the large majority of NT books, and those of chief interest and value, to be the record of the faith once delivered to the saints. The wisdom with which, on the whole, the line has been drawn is only made more apparent on a consideration of those books, such as the Epp. of Clement, the Ep. of Barnabas, and the Shepherd of Hermas, which long maintained a position on the very borders of Scripture, and are given at the conclusion of NT in certain very ancient MSS. It only remains to mention the large number of apocryphal Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypses (the Notha of Eusebius), of which some, as the Gospel of Nicodemus, the Acts of Paul and Thekla, have long been known, while of others, as the Gospel and Apocalypse of St. Peter, fragments have only recently (1886) been discovered.

V. TEXT.—i. Hebrew.—Until the invention of printing, in the 15th cent., the only mode of transmitting ancient books was by the slow and laborious method of copying one MS from another. Hand copying, like typography itself, is subject to special tendencies to error. Since any mistake may be confined to a single MS, though almost certain to be continued in any copies made from it, it is obvious that the work of tracing out the original text by a comparison of MSS is a difficult and delicate one. It forms the subject of a special study, called Textual Criticism, and demands no little ability, patience, and tact. For many centuries the rolls written for use in the synagogue have been prepared with scrupulous care, and the texts which they represent have been preserved, it may be said, free from variation. This applies to the books of the Law, the Haphtaroth or lessons from the Prophets, and the Megilloth, the five books (Ca, Ru, La, Ec, Est) read on the great festivals. It applies, however, only to the consonantal characters, since these rolls were written without points and accents, and does not apply to the period before the scribes of the Jewish tradition took the rolls under their special care, nor so strictly to the MSS intended for private use, which had the vowel points together with the Massoretic notes and commentary. It is said that the earliest Heb. MS of which the age is known dates from A.D. 916, but few are extant which have come down from an earlier period than the 12th cent., and these, as will readily be understood from what has been said, represent a single tradition, and are of no use for comparative purposes. The work, first of the Talmudists between the 1st and 5th centuries, and then of the Massoretes from the 6th to the 11th centuries, has fixed the Heb. text (hence called the Massoretic) to the utmost attainable degree of exactness. But that prior to the labours of the scribes the Heb. Scriptures had been subject to the ordinary conditions of MS copying, is evident from the numerous and important variations found in the Samaritan Pent. and the LXX. These agree together in many readings in regard to which both differ from the Heb. text, and they are comparatively independent witnesses—the one to the state of the text in possibly the 5th cent. B.C., the other to that in the 3rd.

ii. Greek.—Many ancient MSS contain the LXX version of OT along with the text of NT. It seems, therefore, more convenient to divide MSS into Hebrew and Greek than into OT and NT. Two facts in the early history of NT Scriptures are worthy of note. The one is the wholesale destruction of the sacred books during the persecution of Diocletian (A.D. 302), and the other that in A.D. 330 fifty large and carefully prepared copies of the Scriptures were made by order of the Emperor Constantine for the use of the churches of Constantinople. The former event is doubtless accountable for the fact that no MS exists which is older than the 4th cent. For a thousand years subsequently the sacred text may be traced in a continuous and increasing stream of MSS. About 100 of these are Uncials, written, that is, in capital letters—a mark of early date; the remainder, numbering nearly 2000, being Cursives, that is, in the smaller running hand which was used from the 9th cent. onwards. An interesting class of MSS are the Palimpsests, in which the sacred text has been more or less obliterated and some later work written over it. Short articles on the five leading uncials will be found under their respective symbols: viz. (1) the Codex Sinaiticus, known by the symbol S, (2) the Codex Vaticanus (B), (3) the Codex Alexandrinus (A), (4) the Codex Ephraemi (C), and (5) the Codex Bezae (D).

VI. VERSIONS.—Renderings of the Scriptures from the original into other tongues are not only interesting in themselves as giving us the form in which the B. brought its message to the various peoples of the earth, but (esp. those of ancient times) are of very great value for determining what the original text itself was. They tap, as it were, the stream of MS evidence at various points from which we have parallel and independent streams available for comparison with the parent stream and with each other. It is evident that, to derive the full benefit from this circumstance, a critical text of the VSS must be prepared with the same care as of the original. Given this, and it is obvious how important the VSS become in deciding between rival MS readings, as also for purposes of interpretation. The weakness of this branch of textual criticism is the defective state of the text of even the most important versions. Along with the VSS proper are justly reckoned those references in the writings of the early Fathers, which are in effect fragmentary MSS or VSS, according as they are quotations or translations.

Of OT the most important version is the Alexandrian, known as the Septuagint (LXX), from the tradition that the portion of it embracing the Law was made by 72 scribes or scholars sent by the high priest from Jerus. to Alexandria at the request of Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 285–247). This tradition, afterwards extended to the whole version, has not only been overlaid by many mythical elements, but originally rested upon a letter by one Aristas, which is now admitted to be a forgery. It is, moreover, contradicted by the differences in merit and value which distinguish the several books, as well as by the divergence in the methods of paraphrasing and interpretation employed. There can be no doubt that a succession of translators of varying capacity and skill were engaged upon this version. The work was carried on probably during the 3rd and 2nd cents. B.C., the greater part being completed at the latest by B.C. 132, the date alluded to in the preface to the Greek rendering of the Book of Ecclesiasticus. There were other Greek VSS, such as those of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus; but none of these was so widely influential or so extensively used as the LXX. It is of importance not only as an aid to the study of the Heb. OT, but as introductory to the Greek NT, the language of which is largely based upon it. From it sprang other VSS, such as the Itala or Old Latin Version, certain Syriac VSS, the Æthiopic, Coptic, Sahidic, Armenian, Georgian, Gothic, and Slavonic VSS, together with the Arabic VSS, which were not taken directly from the original. The Targums or intorpretations were rather paraphrases than translations. The necessity for them arose from the substitution of Aramaic for Heb. as the ordinary language of the Jews after their return from the Exile. The most important is the Targ. of Onkelos on the Pent., which keeps more closely to the original than the others, and is remarkable for careful as well as skilful work.

Of VSS which embrace both OT and NT, one of the earliest and most valuable is the Syriac Peshitta, the name meaning 'simple' or 'faithful.' Its relation to one or two VSS of equal or greater antiquity is still sub judice. It dates from the 2nd cent. A.D. Its place in the history of the Canon has already been mentioned. The Philoxenian or Monophysite Version is not an independent rendering, but a peculiar modification of the Peshitta. The Old Lat. Version (the Itala) prob. arose in N. Africa, was made (as already mentioned) from the Greek of the LXX, and is only known from citations in patristic writers. It was in the course of revising the Old Latin that Jerome conceived the design of making a new translation of OT direct from the Hebrew. This work, begun in A.D. 390, occupied him fourteen years, and was for long most unfavourably received. It was accused of being heretical, and even Augustine underrated it. It received ecclesiastical sanction first in Gaul; later it was recognised by Gregory the Great, but 200 years more elapsed before it became in the West the generally received and authoritative version, thenceforward known as the Vulgate or 'popular' version. The text of the Vulgate is in a very unsatisfactory condition, having been almost from the first corrupted owing to the existence and use along with it of the Old Latin, and the not unnatural transference of readings from the one into the other.

Of the multitude of modern VSS of the B. it is impossible here to speak. Our own English B. has a long and interesting history (see under art. VERSIONS). Most modern VSS differ from the ancient in the extent of the critical apparatus on which they are based. They do not depend upon a single MS or a single version in another tongue. This is esp. the case with the most recent revisions, which, as for instance our own RV, attempt to present, both in regard to text and interpretation, the nearest possible approach to the language of the original writers of the Scriptures.

B. THE EXTERNAL RELATIONS OF THE BIBLE.

Having now, so far as space permits, analysed the B., shown the parts of which it is made up, the forms in which it has appeared, their relations to each other, and their history up to the point at which this collection practically assumed its present form, we turn to its consideration as a whole, its character as a literature, and its relation to Christianity and the Christian Church. The B. is the sacred book of Christianity. Round it—its origin, history, and contents—circle many of the most important problems which affect the nature and claims of the Christian faith. As Christianity is admittedly the highest and purest form of religion known to man, it may be said that the religious destinies of the race depend upon the B. He, certainly, who would understand what Christianity is, must have a clear conception of what the B. is and teaches.

I. THE LITERATURE OF OTHER RELIGIONS.—As, however, there are other religions besides Christianity, there are other literatures which are regarded as sacred and authoritative by the adherents of these religions. Some of them, indeed, claim to be the vehicles of Divine Revelation. It may be well, therefore, to consider what a sacred book is, and how it acquires this character, and to give a brief account of the chief sacred books of the world. It is one great characteristic of them that they have in every case grown; they are collections, literatures, rather than books; not composed at once, or proceeding from one hand, but combining many diverse elements, and generally reflecting the history and developments of a religion through a considerable period of time. This is to a great extent true even of the Koran, which is more of the nature of a book than any of the others. With the exception again of the Koran, it is probable that large portions of their contents were handed down by tradition before being committed to writing. Religion began in custom rather than in thought, and was embodied in ceremonies before these were explained by means of doctrines. However simple the primitive worship might be, it naturally tended to assume fixed forms; the same words would be used in incantation and prayer, and these would be accompanied by the same acts and observances. When religious custom became more complicated and more highly organised, the tradition was preserved first by means of a sacred caste or priesthood, and then by writing down the tradition itself. Hence the most ancient portion of such literatures usually consists of liturgical formulas and ritual texts, where the former give the words to be used and the latter give the directions for the accompanying acts. The priestly class becoming naturally the learned class, and their writings remaining for a long time the only national literature, it was to be expected that many matters of interest would receive notice in that literature which could not be strictly and absolutely described as religious. Thus mythological and historical particulars which were already ancient, and because of their antiquity were held in reverence, would be carefully set down. Laws first of ceremonial purification and later of moral worthiness, the priestly wisdom in its exercise even about civil matters, histories, especially of the heroes of the nation and of the faith, genealogical and other registers,—all, in fact, which was regarded by those who were identified with the religion as having permanent value became a part of the sacred book. These features can be traced in OT itself, and are generally characteristic of what are known as the Bibles of mankind. The canonical position acquired by such writings is due to their acceptance by nations or religious communities as of decisive authority especially in matters affecting faith and worship, and is usually supported by ascribing to them a supernatural origin, or at least the authority due to them as the work of the founders of the respective religions, or as belonging to the period of development when the influence of the founder was still fresh and his initiative unimpaired.

For our present purpose it is only necessary to take account of the literary monuments of the chief ethnic religions. Fuller details may be found in such works as Chantepie de la Saussaye, Lehrbuch der Religionsgeschichte (of which the first volume has been translated); Tiele, Outlines of the History of Religion; Menzies, History of Religion; and in the literature as cited in these works. For a brief sketch of the religions themselves, see RELIGION.

The sacred books of China bring us face to face with the practical paradox, that, while none have ever been more influential in moulding the life of a people, no inspiration or supernatural authority is claimed for them. They are received with the reverence due to the sages from whom they proceeded, and their guardians are not so much priests as scholars. The five chief books of Confucianism are termed King,—i.e. classical, canonical,—and are partly the original work of the master, partly compilations and selections by him from pre-existing literature, with possibly, to some small extent, later additions. In character they range from extremely dry chronicles to the interpretation of magical formulas, rules of conduct, and sacred songs. The Li-Ki contains laws for domestic and social life at once comprehensive and minute, and by them the life of the whole Chinese Empire has been moulded to the present day. Its fundamental lesson is the inculcation of reverence, and it is full of finely conceived and inspiring thoughts. The four Shoo, or records of the philosophers, contain much that is of interest, particularly the Memorabilia of Confucius himself and the writings of Mencius, one of the most powerful and practical of Chinese thinkers. The teaching of the latter as to human nature has been compared with that of Bishop Butler, since it regards human nature in its ideal as a system or constitution in which the rightful ruler of the entire nature is the moral will. The Tao-ti-King is the sacred book of Taoism, which divides with Confucianism and a form of Buddhism the religious homage of the Chinese people. The author of this 'Book of Doctrine and Virtue' was the philosophic mystic Lao-tsze, who was born about half a century before Confucius (B.C. 600). Lao-tsze traces the origin of things to an impersonal reason, and directs men to seek the supreme good by way of contemplation and asceticism; at the same time many of his utterances are marked by great beauty and genuine moral insight.

In India we meet with a twofold stream of literature,—that of Brahmanism and that of Buddhism,—the former being the main factor in the development of modern Hinduism. The Brahmanic literature includes the Vedas proper, consisting of four books or collections of hymns, the Brahmanas, or ritualistic commentary upon these, and the Upanishads or speculative treatises containing the philosophy of the universe which the Vedic hymns seemed to imply. All these form part of the Veda, or knowledge par excellence, and belong to revelation or 'S'ruti' (hearing), as having been communicated to inspired men from a higher source. A second order of books is similarly termed 'Smriti' (recollection or tradition), and includes the law books, the great Epic poems, and the Puranas or ancient legends. Of these various works the most important and interesting from our present point of view are the Rigveda, the Laws of Menu, and the Epics. The Rigveda is of the greatest antiquity, and reveals much of the life and manner of thinking and feeling of the earliest invaders of India from the north of whom anything is known. The hymns are spirited and intensely national in tone. They were designed for use at the sacrifices, of the ritual of which they formed an essential part. The gods addressed in them are pre-eminently Nature deities, whose power is extolled and whose aid and favour are invoked. The Laws of Menu form one of those codes for the regulation of conduct which have gradually grown into shape. Much of it is believed to belong to prehistoric times, and the main body of the code is undoubtedly very ancient, though in its present form it is probably not older than the 2nd cent. A.D. It has been described as 'a kind of Indian Pentateuch, resting on the fundamental assumption that every part of life is essentially religious.' It originated either in a particular locality or with a particular school, but gradually extended its authority over the entire Hindu people. It consecrates the system of Caste, but, while it exalts asceticism, its regulation of ordinary life is touched with a fine spirit and marked by a practical morality. The great Epic poems, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, chiefly influenced the transition from the ancient Brahmanism to modern Hinduism. With their countless legends and deep personal interest, they appealed to those whom neither speculation nor ritual could move. They are the Bibles of the people, and celebrate the achievements of the ancient heroes, Rama and Krishna. The latter is regarded in the Mahabharata as an incarnation of Vishnu, one of the supreme Hindu deities. The idea of incarnation of deity is indeed the chief addition made by these poems to the religious thought of India, and was probably developed under the necessity of competing with Buddhism for popular favour. Turning to the sacred literature of Buddhism, it is best represented in what is known as the Southern Canon, the form in which the books are used by the Buddhists of Ceylon. They are written in Pāli, while those of the Northern Canon are in Sanskrit. They are otherwise termed the Tripitaka, or three baskets, from the manner of preserving the leaves in each volume, and were accepted as canonical about B.C. 250. The three 'baskets' are the Vinaya Pitaka, which gives the rules of Buddhism as a religious community, and especially of its monastic order; the Abhidharma Pitaka containing the philosophic or speculative doctrine of the faith; and the Sutta Pitaka consisting of reminiscences of the parables and sermons of Buddha, in which the religion is adapted to common life. To the last belong the Dhammapada, 'sentences of religion,' the most popular of all the Buddhist books. The Dhammapada and the Sutta-nipata are said to rank among the most impressive of the religious books of the world.

The religion specially identified with Persia is Zoroastrianism, and the B. of Zoroastrianism is commonly known as Zend-Avesta. Properly, however, 'Avesta' is the text, —like the Indian 'Veda' it means 'knowledge,'—and 'Zend' is the commentary or annotation upon it. The commentary is in a different language from the text. The latter consisted originally of 21 books, but practically only one of these has survived. It consists of three parts—the Yasna, a collection of liturgies along with some hymns; the Vispered, consisting of sacrificial litanies; and the Vendidad, an ancient law book, with which are incorporated a number of legendary narratives. While the prevailing character of the Zend-Avesta is that rather of a book of devotion than of the records of a religion, a Bible in our sense, there is discernible within it a variety of religious conceptions which illustrate its essentially composite character. At the same time it contains many passages of an extremely noble and spiritual character, and the religion of which it is the monument has had no inconsiderable influence upon both Judaism and Christianity.

The only other sacred book of the first rank which it is necessary for us to notice is the Koran of the Mohammedans. The name signifies 'reading.' It has already been remarked that the Koran differs from other sacred literatures in being the production of one man. Mohammed is its author, the revelations being written down by the followers of the prophet, after whose death the fragments were gathered together and formed, unfortunately with a total lack of arrangement, into the unity of a single book. The attempts of modern scholars to set the suras or chapters in chronological order has largely increased the interest of the book, and thrown light upon the spiritual development of the prophet himself. In such an arrangement the earliest utterances are seen to be full of emotional fire, brief, poetic, pointed. The later are longer and more prosaic, dealing with all varieties of subjects, personal and domestic, civil as well as religious. They contain also elements drawn from Jewish and Christian sources. Yet the Koran throughout claims to be inspired in the strictest sense, its words are the words of God Himself.

II. THE BIBLE IN RELATION TO THE LITERATURE OF OTHER RELIGIONS.—What, then, is the relation of the literature thus briefly described to the Christian Scriptures? It is not necessary to depreciate the former in order to exalt the latter. We have already noted that there is wisdom, truth, and spirituality in these books of non-Christian faiths. They and the religions with which they are connected have been the light of generations of human beings. They are associated with the civilisations of the world and its great historical epochs. What we have now to ask is, whether, apart from the question of Divine Revelation, to which we shall presently advert, any of them possess the qualities fitting them to become the sacred books of the world, or whether the B., from this point of view, has any manifest superiority over them? If we turn to Confucianism and its authoritative literature, we find everywhere a consecration of the past, even where it is not understood, which is the deadly enemy of progress; the life of the people is bound in fetters of habit and ceremony which political changes and revolutions have not sufficed to break. The characteristics of the Chinese mind, with its want of comprehensiveness, and excessive attention to minute detail, are reflected in its 'classics.' Moral and spiritual life is crushed out under the burden of external precepts and directions, and there is a determined adherence to the level of the purely human, an avoidance of all reference to the divine, which ignores and tends to mutilate the higher side of man's being, and to deprive him of an ideal. It is no wonder that the mysticism of the Tao-ti-King had an attraction for those out of whom the spiritual life was not wholly crushed. But Taoism, notwithstanding its philosophical and ethical excellences, 'as a religion is a dismal failure, and shows how little philosophy and morals can do without a historical religious framework to support them' (Menzies). The sacred literature of India is characterised not only by its immense extent, but by the great variety of standpoints represented in it. What failed to meet the wants of a single people can scarcely be expected to satisfy the entire human race. The Vedic hymns exhibit the instability of polytheism. The Brahmanic system endeavoured to meet this defect by means of its philosophical developments; but in so doing unfitted itself to be a popular religion. Hence India, during the supremacy of Brahmanism, had in reality two religions, the speculative and the idolatrous and mythical. The separation between the two tended to intensify their several peculiarities, as well as to degrade the popular faith—a difficulty which was only partially met by the incarnation ideas which emerge in the great Epics. Even Buddhism, which presents a personal object of affection and imitation to the worshipper, is condemned by its one-sidedness. If in Confucianism we have a religious positivism which will not look at the Divine, in Buddhism we have an agnosticism which cannot find it. It is a religion of despair; it cannot become the spring of human effort, promote civilisation, or contribute to social progress. The sacred books which have sprung up on soil like this, reflecting the peculiarities of their origin, must be held as falling short of the required conditions on which alone they could supersede all others. Zoroastrianism as a religion may be said to be already dead, modern Parsism being a comparatively unimportant modification of it. The Zend-Avesta is of interest, as we have seen, for the noble elements contained in it, and for the traces of its thought which are to be found in the teachings of other faiths; but even in the portions which have come down to us, it shows itself, like the literature of Brahmanism, a mixture of diverse views and standpoints. Its mainly liturgical character, and the view presented in it of the supreme Deity, so far as a dualistic system can be said to have a supreme Deity, prevented it from spreading much beyond the region of its origin. The Mohammedan Koran is equally unfitted to become the book of a universal religion. Like Confucianism, though in a different way, Islam is a foe to progress. 'Its ideas are bald and poor; it grew too fast; its doctrines and forms were stereotyped at the very outset of its career, and do not admit of change. Its morality is that of the stage at which men emerge from idolatry . . . its doctrine is after all no more than negative. Allah is but a negation of other gods. . . . He does not enter into humanity, and therefore he cannot render to humanity the highest services.'

Westcott, in an interesting article contributed to the Cambridge Companion to the B., distinguishes the sacred books of the pre-Christian ethnic religions from the OT Scriptures under three heads. 1. They are unhistorical. 'In no case is the revelation or authoritative rule given in them represented as embodied and wrought out step by step in the life of a people. The doctrine is announced and explained, and fenced in by comment and ritual; but it finds no prophets who unfold and apply the divine words to the varying circumstances of national growth, which at once fix their application and illuminate their meaning.' 2. They are retrogressive. 'The oldest portions of the several collections of the Chinese, Indian, and Persian Scriptures are confessedly the noblest in thought and aspiration; and, secondly, ritual in each case has finally overpowered the strivings after a personal and spiritual fellowship with God.' 3. They are partial. In their most complete form they may be said to be 'a Psalter completed by a law of ritual.' 'On the other hand, the B. contains every element which the representatives of different races have found to be the vehicle of religious teaching, and every element in its fullest and most fruitful form.'

If these features, we may add, are conspicuous on a comparison with the OT, the argument is strengthened when the NT is brought into view. There the highest reaches of doctrine and devotion are embedded in history; there the culmination of all the divine progress is attained; there in amplest measure are to be found the sources of man's purest and highest life. And the B. thus completely suggests a point of distinction which perhaps does not belong to the OT alone. The ethnic Scriptures are essentially national, or at least racial; they are bound by limits of place and time, the natural products of the circumstances in which they arose; the B. may be admirably adapted to the needs of place and time, it alone appeals to man as man, and most marvellously combines a truly historical character with an adaptability to be the religious guide and instructor of mankind. It has proved its power to travel and to speak to the hearts of men of varying countries and climes.

i. Revelation.—A usual feature of the sacred books we have been considering is the claim made by them, or on behalf of them, that they are vehicles of a divine Revelation. The Chinese alone do not claim that their books are inspired, though they regard them with a reverence as deep as anything connected with their religion calls forth. The three parts of the Veda, as we have seen, are distinguished as S'ruti, 'revelation,' from the Smṛiti, or 'tradition.' The Vedic hymns themselves were held to possess supernatural powers, and were raised to the rank of a divinity. The Avesta had been, according to the Persians, communicated to Zoroaster (Zoroaster) by Ahura, the good god, himself. The Koran, according to the Mohammedans, is an earthly copy of a heavenly original, which the angel of revelation made known to the prophet during his ecstasies; it was the subject of one of their greatest controversies whether the Koran as it stands, down to the very word and letter, was not uncreated and eternal, and free therefore from every possible imperfection. The motive of such conceptions lies upon the surface. If, on the one hand, it is man's way of expressing his boundless reverence for that which is ancient or of proved value, it is, on the other hand, due to the desire of feeling himself on solid ground in regard to the highest and most mysterious concerns of life, those which relate to the power above him and the future before him. Somewhat similar claims are made on behalf of the B. It also brings a revelation from God; it also is an inspired book. Are all such claims equally futile? Because they are made on behalf of many books, are they true or none? Such a conclusion would be obviously inept. If a revelation is necessary for man, and if it is in the highest degree unlikely that God would leave man without this necessary guidance,—points which we cannot fully discuss in this place,—it must be somewhere, and the fact that there are unfounded claims to its possession should stimulate the search for it, not lead to its abandonment. And these claims, if nothing more, are a pathetic confession of man's sense of helplessness in presence of the deeper problems of existence, of his felt need for higher guidance. Nor is it necessary to deny that the conviction so strongly held had a relative justification. A better and juster view of the religions of the world than that formerly entertained, leads us to see that in them also God was educating the world for Himself. In their higher phases, by means of their loftier spirits, a message was delivered to the nations, in which they were not wrong in recognising His voice. In comparison with Christianity they may be classed as 'natural' religions, but at least God was speaking in the worthier manifestations of the 'nature' which He had made. We are prepared, therefore, rather than unfitted by their study, to recognise in Christianity a divine revelation, and in the B. an inspired book, while the question of degree of Inspiration, and as to what Inspiration itself involves, is directly suggested by it.

ii. Inspiration.—The Christian doctrine of Inspiration was largely an inheritance from the Jews along with the OT, to which alone it at first applied. After the disappearance of Prophetism, and the reconstitution of the 'Church-people' of Israel on the basis of the written law, it is not surprising that rigid and even mechanical views of Inspiration prevailed. The Talmud, while admitting degrees of Inspiration, declared that the Pentateuch at least had been divinely dictated to Moses; while Alexandrian Judaism, doubtless under Platonic influences, and on the analogy of the heathen Mantic, held that it involved a total suspension of the human faculties. The first Christian writer to propound a theory of this kind is Justin Martyr, who could not conceive of the things above being made known to men otherwise than by the Divine Spirit using righteous men like a harp or lyre, from which the plectrum elicits what sound it will. This view was followed with more or less emphasis by such writers as Tertullian, Irenaeus, Origen; while others, like Chrysostom, Basil, Jerome, were disposed to recognise the individuality of the several writers as moulding their respective work. While Eusebius affirms that it would be rash to say that the sacred men could have substituted one word for another, and Augustine sometimes ascribes to them an absolute infallibility, the latter betrays some disposition to recognise the human element when he says that the evangelists wrote 'ut quisque meminerat et ut cuique cordi erat.' Two circumstances probably prevented the early Church from definitely adopting an extreme doctrine on this subject. One was the struggle with Montanism, which led to a clearer distinction being drawn between inspiration and ecstasy. The other was the authority still ascribed to the tradition of the Churches, which was so much on a level with that attributed to Scripture that Irenaeus could complain of the difficulty of dealing with heretics who could appeal from one to the other, as suited their purpose. The same duality of resource characterised the common practice of the Church of that age, whose bishops invoked now the B. and now tradition in favour of their judgments. In the succeeding period, the inspiration of the B. was in many quarters maintained in an uncompromising form, while practically the B. was more and more subordinated to tradition as embodied in the Church. On the one hand, it was held to be useless to inquire the name of the writer of a passage of Scripture since the Holy Spirit was the author of all Scripture, or it was asserted that the Holy Spirit formed the very words in the mouths of prophets and apostles; on the other, the Church placed itself between the individual Christian and the B., which gradually became comparatively unknown and inaccessible. Its authority was not so much disputed as ignored. This was practically the position maintained throughout the Middle Ages—a position definitely formulated by the Council of Trent and the later Roman Catholic theologians. It was the Reformers who revived the appeal to Scripture in opposition to the authority of the Roman Church and its traditions. This they did, however, without pronouncing upon the questions which the authority they ascribed to the B. seemed to a later age to involve. It was enough for them that the 'good news' was declared in it, that by its use a soul could draw near to God without priest or rite. Luther proposed to revise the Canon, or at least to estimate the value of the several books by the distinctness with which Christ was preached in them—a criterion which, it is evident, was at once too narrow and too wide, excluding some books which not only Christian antiquity, but devout usage, had consecrated, and including, if consistently carried out, masses of Christian literature. Zwingli and Calvin maintained as firmly as Luther the supremacy of the B., while also keeping an open mind as to its several parts. For them the substance and content was everything, the form of secondary importance. The Confessions of that epoch in general share this freedom of attitude, though those of the Reformed Churches are more explicit than the Lutheran. The 17th cent. was a period at once of violent controversy and of rigid definition. The Jesuits on the one hand, the Socinians and Arminians on the other, attacked the authority of Scripture in the interests of Ecclesiasticism or Rationalism. Protestant orthodoxy, whether in the Lutheran or Calvinistic form, intrenched itself on the foundation of the B., identifying inspiration with infallibility, and the record with the revelation it conveyed. The sacred writers were regarded as the passive instruments, the amanuenses, of the Divine Spirit. Inspiration was defined as including the impulsus ad scribendum, the suggestio rerum, and the suggestio verborum. The diversity of style apparent in Scripture was explained as the voluntary accommodation of Himself to the writers by the Holy Spirit. At the same time, with so exalted an authorship, the language could not be anything but pure and exact; no barbarisms or solecisms could enter into the Greek of the NT, and even the vowel points and accents of the Hebrew text were inspired—an opinion stamped as orthodox by the Swiss Formula Consensus of 1675. From the theory of inspiration thus formulated (and exaggerated) followed the attributes (affectiones seu proprietates Scripturae sacrae) which the dogmatic writers ascribed to the B. These are primary and secondary. The primary are: 1. Divina auctoritas, resting upon its external evidences and internal qualities; but, above all, upon the testimonium Spiritus Sancti, or the witness of God in the soul. This authority constitutes the Scriptures the sole tribunal in matters of faith and life. 2. Perfectio or sufficiencia; the B. contains all that is necessary to salvation. 3. Perspicuitas. The B. is self-explanatory. Passages may be more or less obscure, but these must be explained by means of the simpler and clearer declarations. Rightly used, it requires no other interpreter. 4. Efficacia. The B. is a means of grace, having the power of converting the sinful and consoling the sad. The secondary attributes are necessitas, integritas et perennitas, puritas et sinceritas fontium, authentica dignitas. These indicate generally that a revelation must be written, and that, in all respects, the B., as we have it, is the B. as it was intended to be.

It is unnecessary to pursue further the history of the idea of inspiration as applied to the B. Enough has been said to show the position which it held, and how it was liable to be modified according to the circumstances in which the Church of successive ages found itself placed. Before touching, however, upon the position accorded to the B. at the present day, attention must be directed for a moment to the relation in which the question of canonicity stands to that of inspiration, since these together have determined the manner in which the B. has been received in the Christian Church. The formation of a Canon at all implies that authority is attributed to the writings included in it. The history of the Canon has shown us that it was formed gradually, as the result of local usage, which fixed and extended itself, and not as the outcome of criticism or even formal determination on the part of the whole Church or its more important divisions. By the end of the 4th cent., as we have seen, the B. stood practically as we have it now. Yet its limits were not settled in such a way that the Reformers of the 16th cent. felt themselves precluded from rediscussing them. Their tendency was, in the first instance, to examine this and other accepted usages of the Church in the light of historical inquiry. But the opportunities and the material for a competent historical investigation were wanting. The questions at issue were largely decided upon the basis of feeling, either individual or general. The exigencies of controversy necessitated a rapid arrival at a decision which should be practical and readily intelligible. While, therefore, it was not upon the authority of the Church, but through an intuitive perception supposed to reside in the believing Christian, that the contents of the B. were received, the B. thus acknowledged was nevertheless the same B. as that of the 4th cent. And this once determined, the doctrine of Inspiration was frequently employed to lift it out of the region of historical criticism, and to make its limits and contents a matter of dogmatic definition. Thus we have the rather remarkable result that inspiration in the sense of a supernatural guarantee for their truth and authority is claimed for a series of writings, while no claim is, or can be, made for a supernatural determination of the precise writings which are to be included in the series. If the latter question is still open to historical criticism, and must be determined, as every book on Biblical Introduction proves to us anew, on grounds of historical investigation, it is impossible for a dogmatic definition of inspiration to be applied in more than a general way to such a series of books; and in that case the question, what inspiration is, and what are its limits or degrees, is again opened up. So long as inspiration cannot be claimed for the process by which canonicity is determined, canonicity cannot be held to fix the bounds of inspiration. It is true that, as Westcott remarks (Bible in the Church, pp. 293, 294), the usage which fixed the Canon 'is only another name for a divine instinct, a providential inspiration, a function of the Christian body'; that 'history teaches by the plainest examples that no one part of the B. could be set aside without great and permanent injury to the Church which refused a portion of the apostolic heritage. We are now in a position to estimate what would have been lost if the Epistle to the Hebrews or the Epistle of St. James or the Apocalypse had been excluded from the Canon. And, on the other hand, we can measure the evils which flow equally from canonising the Apocrypha of the OT, and denying to them all ecclesiastical use.'

In more recent times, and at the present day, cases may be pointed out of almost all the varieties of view on the subject which our brief historical sketch brought to light. Some carry inspiration to the extreme of literalism, some appear to deny it in any sense in which it is not applicable to poetry and other forms of art. Unreserved condemnation should not be poured upon either of these extremes. The first is held not only by the unthinking multitude,—'the indolence of human nature,' Mr. Gladstone remarks (Butler, iii. p. 17), 'would be greatly flattered by a scheme such as that of the verbal inspiration of Holy Scripture,'—but by thoughtful men who have seen in it the logical conclusion of their religious theories; the second, not only by those who are indifferent to religion, but by fine spirits who have not seen the possibility or perhaps the need of anything further. The large majority of inquirers, however, recognise frankly the true inspiration of the B., and also that the determination of its nature, degrees, and limits must be the result of an induction from all the available facts.

On the one hand, full weight must be given to that remarkable testimony of history which Westcott, in the passage quoted above, signalises. But a still more remarkable phenomenon of the same kind is apparent in the pages of the B. itself. From one point of view, nothing can be more unsystematic and fragmentary than its contents. It is full of contrasts and surface-discrepancies. It is made up of extracts from the lives of individuals and the experiences of a people. All forms of literature are represented in it (see The Literary Study of the Bible, by R. G. Moulton). It presents no systematised theology or ethics. Yet a closer observation reveals the unity underlying all this variety. A progress is discernible from the first page to the last. Revelation corresponds to revelation, like the outcropping of the same rock-stratum in different places. One thought, one plan, is seen to pervade the whole, and to make the B., if the product of many minds, the outcome of one Spirit,—not a 'library' only, as has been said, but a 'book.' Again, in so far as the B. is admitted to be inspired, its testimony to itself, the testimony of part to part, cannot be ignored. This is an argument which may easily be pushed too far and made to prove too much; its application in any absolute way would require, for example, the question of canonicity to be already settled. But the great argument for the real inspiration of the B. in a special sense is that it commends itself to the minds of those who devoutly receive it,—what the Reformers designated the testimonium Spiritus Sancti. The relation of this to other evidences for the unique authority of Scripture is expressed by the Westminster Confession (ch. i. 5) thus: 'We may be moved and induced by the testimony of the Church to an high and reverend esteem of the Holy Scripture, and the heavenliness of the matter, the efficacy of the doctrine, the majesty of the style, the consent of all the parts, the scope of the whole (which is to give all glory to God), the full discovery it makes of the only way of man's salvation, the many other incomparable excellences, and the entire perfection thereof, are arguments whereby it doth abundantly evidence itself to be the word of God; yet, notwithstanding, our full persuasion and assurance of the infallible truth, and divine authority thereof, is from the inward work of the Holy Spirit, bearing witness by and with the word in our hearts.' This is the religious test of the value of Scripture. But it obviously applies only to the knowledge of salvation, of which Scripture is the vehicle. It is religious, not speculative—still less historical or scientific. However real and important the fact to which it points, it bears upon it a stamp of individuality, subjectivity. As seen at work in Luther, for example, 'it is impossible to read his comments on Holy Scripture without feeling that he realises its actual historical work and consequent spiritual meaning in a way which was unknown before. For him the words of apostles and prophets are "living words," direct and immediate utterances of the Holy Spirit, penetrating to the inmost souls of men, and not mere premisses for arguments or proofs' (Westcott, l.c. pp. 245, 246). But a criterion which in Luther and other Reformers was compatible with a large degree of liberty, gave rise in its later and more formal application to the 'summary method,' as Westcott calls it, of cutting the knot of a difficulty, disposing of evidence by dogmatically pronouncing it superfluous, and assuming that history has been fully interrogated and has spoken its last word, and so converting a great truth into a fetter and a falsehood.

On the other hand, while the elements which thus make for the inspiration of the B. and its unique authority as a spiritual guide are widely and fully recognised, the human element in Scripture has in recent times forced itself upon the attention of the thoughtful. Here it is not merely that by evident signs the biblical writers show that they were not simply amanuenses writing to the dictation of a Spirit above them; it is not the occurrence of discrepancies and inconsistencies in the B. itself, or in connexion with external history and modern science: it is rather the recognition of a progressive revelation in the B., that it contains the history of the struggle between the Divine light and human ignorance and sin, that the revelation is conveyed to us in such measure and manner as each of the writers was able to apprehend it and give it forth. Thus the process traced in an earlier portion of this article, whereby the 'books' became the 'Book,' the change of the point of view from plurality to unity, is one which wisdom, thought, and investigation find it necessary, to some extent, to reverse. In order to understand even this unity aright, it is found essential to scrutinise the several parts of which it is made up, the manifold media through which the revelation has been given, the several stages through which the B. as we know it has been evolved. This side of it will fall to be more carefully considered in the article THEOLOGY; in the meantime it is needful to observe that, as Gladstone remarks, 'if any development of Divine Revelation be acknowledged, if any distinction of authority between different portions of the text be allowed, then, in order to deal with subjects so vast and difficult, we are at once compelled to assume so large a liberty as will enable us to meet all the consequences which follow from abandoning the theory of a purely verbal inspiration' (Butler, iii. 17).

The subject of Inspiration and the B. is in our time canvassed mainly in two connexions—the rights of criticism, and the question of authority in matters of faith. Christianity as a historical religion cannot be exempted from the application of the principles of historical inquiry, nor can the

B. as literature be exempted from the canons of criticism which apply to the other religions of the world and their sacred books. So far all reasonable persons may be said to be agreed. The difficulties which have arisen in connexion with criticism have resulted from the division of the critics into two schools, one of which assumes that all the phenomena of the sacred history and its record must be explained by natural causes only, that the history of the Hebrew people is exactly parallel with that of Athens or of Rome, that the life of Christ is strictly of the same order as that of Socrates; while the other school recognises and allows for the element of the supernatural when it is seen at work. The one studies the Christian development without sympathy, therefore without understanding; the other avoids presuppositions, and seeks to apprehend the facts from within as well as from without. But the latter, no less than the former, feels that the respect due to the Christian documents themselves imposes the duty of a careful examination and appreciation of them in the light of their history. The object of criticism is not destruction only, it is a means of ascertaining truth, and it is not true reverence which would place the B. outside of its sphere of operation.

More pressing, perhaps, than even the distrust of criticism which prevails in many quarters, is the search for authority. If the B. is not to be like an Act of Parliament, operative 'to the last and farthest extremity of its letter,' how is it to retain that quality which the Westminster Confession ascribes to it of being the final court of appeal in all controversies of religion? How is the divine and authoritative element to be separated from the human and fallible? How, in fact, is revelation, in the sense of communicated knowledge, possible by means of the Scriptures? We may briefly notice two recent attempts to meet this difficulty.

Denney (Studies in Theology, Lect. ix.) quotes with approval the words of Robertson Smith, in which he gives a modern rendering of the testimonium Spiritus Sancti: 'If I am asked why I receive Scripture as the word of God, and as the only perfect rule of faith and life, I answer with all the fathers of the Protestant Church, because the B. is the only record of the redeeming love of God, because in the B. alone I find God drawing near to man in Christ Jesus, and declaring to us in Him His will for our salvation. And this record I know to be true by the witness of His Spirit in my heart, whereby I am assured that none other than God Himself is able to speak such words to my soul.' Denney, however, clearly perceives what we have pointed out above, that this is 'a doctrine of the Divine message to man,' not 'a doctrine of the text of Scripture.' His view is that coming to Scripture 'without any presuppositions whatever,' without any 'antecedent conviction that it is inspired,' we become convinced that it is inspired because 'it asserts its authority over us as we read,' it has 'power to lodge in our minds Christianity and its doctrines as being not only generally but divinely true,'—its power to do this being 'precisely what we mean by inspiration.' A starting-point having been thus acquired, by 'working out from it the area of certitude may be gradually enlarged.' Having accepted the B. as in the main inspired and authoritative, the same conviction may be indirectly entertained regarding all which is not self-evidencing. The Canon is to be received on the general assumption that the Church as a whole is less likely to be mistaken than an individual inquirer. This is all that can be arrived at by the multitude of Christian believers, or can be urged upon those whose minds are perplexed upon the subject; for the rest 'the theologian will know how to distinguish between the letter of the record and God revealing Himself through it.'

Fairbairn (Christ in Modern Theology, p. 496 ff.) appears to rest the authority of the revelation given in the B. upon the inspiration of those through whom it came—inspiration being described as a possession of the spirit of man by the Spirit of God. This is the converse of the view last referred to, where the revelation and the response it awakens in the mind of the hearer or reader is the guarantee of the inspiration. Indeed, on Fairbairn's view the relations of inspiration and revelation seem to be reversed. 'God inspires, man reveals; inspiration is the process by which God gives; revelation is the mode or form—word, character, or institution—in which man embodies what he has received.' In this way a position is gained from which the adaptation of religious ideas to the circumstances of a people or age may be explained. But the attention and interests of men must ever be engaged with the revelation rather than the inspiration. The reality of the latter is a small matter apart from the character of the former. 'The essential function of inspiration is the formation of the personalities—both the minds for the religion and the thought for the minds—through whom the religion is to be realised; and the essential function of revelation is to embody in historical form—literature, character, worship, institution—what inspiration has created.' But it is surely a false distinction thus to make the inarticulate divine and the articulate human. How can the former be a guarantee for the latter? And in so far as inarticulate, how is the inspiration of Hebrew prophets and Christian apostles to be distinguished from that of Hindu or Persian poet or sage? It is true that 'the inspiration of the men who read' is made 'as intrinsic and integral an element in the idea of revelation as the inspiration of the men who wrote.' But in both cases the theory proposes a test which has all the subjectivity of the appeal to the testimonium Spiritus Sancti without the recognition of the divine quality of the revelation itself which enters into the latter. It seems open also to the same kind of criticism which Sir Wm. Hamilton, in a well-known essay, applied to Schelling's metaphysical theory: the intellectual intuition being only possible in the absence of consciousness, is no help to the conscious apprehension of what it alone can give assurance of; it is 'in the state of personality, and non-intuition of the Absolute, that the philosopher writes; in writing therefore about the Absolute, he writes of what is to him as zero.' What, in like manner, is to connect the revelation which man gives to man, with the inspiration, the state of possession, in which it is supposed to be received?

These instances serve to illustrate the difficulties surrounding the question. It is probable that no theory of inspiration will ever solve all these difficulties or be regarded as entirely satisfactory. It may be fully and freely recognised that the B. has a unique excellence of its own, qualities which set it apart from even the greatest literary achievements of the race, while yet it has been constructed in such a way that the human element, the peculiarities and even the limitations of its writers, have been consistently maintained. In two respects, we of this age are perhaps in a more favourable position for dealing with the question than those who have gone before us. On the one hand, it is possible to compare the Christian religion and its Scriptures with the non-Christian religions and their sacred books with both a knowledge and a sympathy which in earlier times were undreamt of. On the other, a closer and more intimate knowledge of the Bible itself as a living book and not as a mere repertory of proof texts, is one of the marks of our time. 'Criticism has, by bringing the sacred books into relation with sacred history, done something to restore them to their real and living significance . . . by binding the book and the people together, and then connecting both with the providential order of the world, it has given us back the idea of the God who lives in history through His people, and a people who live for Him through His word' (Fairbairn, l.c. p. 508). Whatever be the results of the literary analysis of the biblical books, or the bearing of archaeological discovery upon the history they record, this is the aim of historical criticism, and it can scarcely be doubted that the service it has rendered to classical and Oriental literature may be, and must be, rendered to the B. also. As a part of it, that practice which we have noticed of studying the thought of the B. in its development, and tracing it through its successive representations, is of the highest significance and value. In any case it is to be remembered that the B. contains the most ancient and most authentic documents bearing upon the origin, the nature, and the characteristic features of the Christian religion, and especially upon the person and work of its Founder. This gives to it an interest, if not an authority, which cannot be disputed. Of the revelation which we believe to have come through Christ, it is the early and reliable record. To it, therefore, the Church of later ages has naturally turned to correct her aberrations, and to obtain a renewal of her life. What the B. has been to individuals cannot be told. If the history of the world has a meaning, and is not a succession of fortuitous circumstances, we cannot fail to recognise the centre of that history in Christ, and the animating force of its later stages in the spiritual movement He inaugurated. Without the B. this movement could not be understood, or its influence continued and extended. We cannot doubt, therefore, that the God whose providence has ruled and shaped the history, whose Spirit moved and spoke in Christ, has also inspired the B. and made it what it is—the vehicle of the highest spiritual thought, the purest moral guidance man has known. It itself invites inquiry, and takes its place in the historical development. Sacred scholarship must finish the work upon it which it has begun. But withal the B. remains, and will remain, the most precious heritage of mankind.

LITERATURE.—The Literature relating to the first part of this article will be found in connexion with the several special articles (CANON, TEXT, etc.) to which reference is made. On the subjects of Revelation and Inspiration, any of the great dogmatic works, or any History of Doctrines, may be consulted, as well as articles in such Encyclopedias as the Encycl. Brit., Herzog, Lichtenberger. Among monographs may be mentioned: Lee, Inspiration of Holy Scripture; Bannerman, Inspiration; Gausson, Theopneustie; Jameson, Bala's Lectures; Horton, Revelation and the Bible; and Sanday, Bampton Lectures, in which, after dealing with the early history and application of the doctrine, the writer compares in his concluding Lecture the traditional and inductive Theories of Inspiration.

A. STEWART.

BICHRI (בִּחְרִי).—In 2 S 20<sup>1</sup> Sheba is called 'the son of Bichri'; translate rather 'the Bichrite,' i.e. a member of the clan which traced its descent to Becher, the son of Benjamin (Gn 46<sup>21</sup>).

J. F. STENNING.

BID, bade, bid (2 K 5<sup>13</sup>, Zeph 1<sup>7</sup>) or bidden (Mt and Lk passim), 'to invite' to a feast, etc. (now archaic or local); 1 S 9<sup>13, 22</sup> (סָבַד), Zeph 1<sup>7</sup> 'he hath bid his guests' (סָבַדָּה, RV 'sanctified' with a ref. to 1 S 16<sup>7</sup>); Mt 23<sup>3</sup> 'sent for his servants to call (καλέω) them that were bidden (also καλέω, but in perf. ptcp.) to the wedding' (RV 'marriage feast'). In 1 Co 10<sup>27</sup> 'If any of them that believe not bid you to a feast' (καλέω, with no word for 'feast'); Lk 14<sup>12</sup> 'lest they also bid thee again' (ἀντικαλέω).

To bid—to command, is common; but notice Lk 9<sup>61</sup>, Ac 18<sup>21</sup> 'bid farewell' (ἀποτάσσομαι, used in Mk 6<sup>46</sup> 'when he had sent them away,' RV 'taken leave of them'; Ac 18<sup>18</sup> 'took his leave of'; 2 Co 2<sup>13</sup> 'taking my leave of'; Lk 14<sup>33</sup> 'forsaketh,' RV 'renounceth').

J. HASTINGS.

BIDE, Wis 8<sup>12</sup> 'they shall bide my leisure' (περιμένω, translated 'wait for' Ac 1<sup>4</sup>, so RV here). 'Bide' is mostly replaced in mod. Eng. by 'abide' (which see).

J. HASTINGS.

BIDKAR (בִּדְקָר, possibly for בִּדְקָרָה; but this and similar contractions are highly uncertain).—A chief officer of Ahab and subsequently of Jehu (2 K 9<sup>26</sup>).

C. F. BURNEY.

BIER.—See BURIAL.

BIGTHA (בִּגְתָּה Est 1<sup>10</sup>).—One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of king Ahasuerus. For the name compare Abagtha (ib.) and Bigthan (2<sup>21</sup>). In the LXX the names are different, Βασιλ, Βασιλῆ B, 'Οαρεβωά A, taking the place of Bigtha.

H. A. WHITE.

BIGHTHAN (בִּגְתָּנָה Est 2<sup>21</sup>), BIGHTHANA (בִּגְתָּנָה 6<sup>2</sup>).—One of two chamberlains or eunuchs of Ahasuerus (Xerxes) who conspired against the king's life. Their treachery was discovered and foiled by Mordecai.

R. M. BOYD.

BIGVAI (בִּגְוַי).—1. A companion of Zerub. (Ezr 2<sup>2</sup>=Neh 7<sup>7</sup>, cf. Ezr 2<sup>14</sup>=Neh 7<sup>19</sup>, Ezr 8<sup>14</sup>, where the name appears as the head of a family of returning exiles). 2. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10<sup>16</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

J. A. SELBIE.

BILDAD (בִּלְדָּד, LXX Βαλδάδ, 'Bel hath loved'?).—Described in Job 21 as one of Job's three friends. He is called 'the Shuhite,' indicating his descent from Shuah (שׁוּא), son of Abraham and Keturah (Gn 25<sup>2</sup>). Abraham is described as sending Shuah, with other sons of concubines, to 'the East country,' and his descendants probably lived in a district of Arabia not far from Idumaea. The region is not to be confounded with the trans-Hauran Schukka, or the Sakkala of Ptolemy, to the east of Batanea. The LXX describes B. as τῶν Σαυχαίων τῆρανός. For a description of the part taken by B. in the colloquies, see JOB, BOOK OF. It may be here briefly said that his position is in every sense intermediary between Eliphaz and Zophar. He speaks after the one and before the other; his speeches are shorter than those of Eliphaz, longer than those of Zophar. He is also more violent than the older and graver Eliphaz, but less blunt and coarse than the third spokesman who follows him. He speaks three times, in chapters 8, 18, and 25, the last time very briefly.

W. T. DAVIDSON.

C. R. CONDER.

BILGAH (בִּלְגָּה, 'cheerfulness').—1. Head of the 15th course of priests (1 Ch 24<sup>14</sup>). 2. A priest who returned with Zerub. (Neh 12<sup>25, 18</sup>). The same as Bilgai (Neh 10<sup>8</sup>).

H. A. WHITE.

BILGAI.—See BILGAH.

BILHAH, PERSON (בִּלְהָה, Βάλλα; in B of 1 Ch 7<sup>13</sup> Βαλάμ; Bala, Bara).—A slave-girl given to Rachel by Laban, Gn 29<sup>20</sup> (P), and by her to Jacob as a concubine, Gn 30<sup>3, 4</sup> (JE); the mother of Dan and Naphtali, Gn 30<sup>4, 7</sup> (JE) 35<sup>20</sup> (P) 46<sup>20</sup> (R), 1 Ch 7<sup>13</sup>. She was guilty of incest with Reuben, Gn 35<sup>22</sup> (P). The etymology is uncertain. These narratives and genealogies are to be regarded as embodying early traditions as to the origin and mutual relations of the tribes, rather than personal history. Tribes are traced to a concubine ancestress, because they were a late accession to Israel.

BILL.—1. A bill of divorce or divorcement, Dt 24<sup>1, 3</sup>, Is 50<sup>1</sup>, Jer 3<sup>8</sup> (בִּטְוּלָה šēpher kērithūth, lit. 'a writ of cutting off' (see Driver on Dt 24<sup>1</sup>, who compares Sir 25<sup>26</sup> ἀπόστευ αὐτήν, 'cut her off'); Mk 10<sup>4</sup> (βιβλίον ἀποσταλόν, the LXX τῶν of šēpher kērithūth; also used Mt 5<sup>31</sup> AV, RV 'writing of divorcement'; and 19<sup>7</sup>, AV as 5<sup>31</sup>, RV as Mk 10<sup>4</sup>). See MARRIAGE.

2. A debtor's written account, Lk 16<sup>6, 7</sup> (TR τὸ γράμμα, edd. τὰ γράμματα, RV 'bond'). Edersheim (Jesus the Messiah, ii. 272 f.) points out that the Gr. word here employed was sometimes used in rabbinical writings (Hebraised gerammaton), and corresponded with the Syr. shilre, which denotes 'writings' that were either formal, when they were signed by witnesses and the Sanhedrin of three; or informal, when only the debtor himself signed. The latter were most frequently written on wax, and thus easily altered. See DEBT.

BIMHAL (בִּמְחָל for בִּמְחָק 'son of circumcision'?).—A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7<sup>38</sup>).

BINEA (בִּנְיָה).—A descendant of Jonathan (1 Ch 8<sup>37, 9<sup>43</sup></sup>).

BINNUI (בִּנְיָי, 'a building').—1. Head of a family that returned with Zerub. (Neh 7<sup>18</sup> = Bani of Ezr 2<sup>10</sup>). 2. A Levite (Ezr 8<sup>38</sup> (prob. = Bani of Neh 8<sup>7</sup> and Bunni of Neh 9<sup>4</sup>), Neh 12<sup>28</sup>). 3. A son of Pahath-moab (Ezr 10<sup>30</sup> = Balnuus of 1 Es 9<sup>31</sup>). 4. A son of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10<sup>38</sup>). There appears to be a confusion in some instances between the similar names בִּנְיָי, בִּנְיָי, בִּנְיָי. See BAVVAI, GENEALOGY.

BIRTH.—Among the Hebrews, as among the Orientals generally (comp. Herod. i. 136, of the Persians), a high value was placed upon the possession of children (see, e.g., Gn 16<sup>2</sup> 29<sup>1, 34</sup> 30<sup>1</sup>, 1 S 1<sup>6, 20</sup>, 2 K 4<sup>14</sup>, Ps 127<sup>3, 5</sup>), and especially of sons (see 1 S 1<sup>11</sup>, Jer 20<sup>15</sup>, Job 3<sup>3</sup>), while childlessness was regarded as a heavy reproach (Gn 30<sup>23</sup>, Lk 1<sup>26</sup>) and punishment (2 S 6<sup>23</sup>, Hos 9<sup>11, 14</sup>). Parturition seems generally to have been easy (Ex 1<sup>19</sup>, yet see Gn 3<sup>10</sup>), as it is with Syrian and Arabian women at the present day, and cases in which the mother died in childbirth (Gn 35<sup>18</sup>, 1 S 4<sup>20</sup>) were probably quite exceptional. From the phrase used in Gn 50<sup>23</sup>, cf. 30<sup>7</sup>, it has been supposed that in early times the child was actually born upon its father's knees (see Nowack, Heb. Archäol. i. 165), according to customs of which traces are found in several primitive peoples (Ploss, Das Weib,<sup>2</sup> ii. 177 ff.); or at least that the newly-born infant was placed in its father's lap as a token of recognition and adoption. We find, however, no clear reference to such customs in historical times. Indeed, the father was not present at the birth of the child (Jer 20<sup>15</sup>); the mother was attended by other women (1 S 4<sup>20</sup>), and the assistance of a midwife was often called in (Gn 35<sup>17</sup> 38<sup>28</sup>, Ex 1<sup>18</sup>). Compare article MIDWIFE. The newly-born infant, after its navel-cord had been cut, was bathed in water, rubbed with salt, and wrapped in swaddling-clothes (Ezk 16<sup>4</sup>, Lk 2<sup>7</sup>). The practice of rubbing infants with salt is still retained among the fellahen of Pal., who believe that children are strengthened and hardened by this means (ZDPV iv. p. 63). The child received its name from the mother (Gn 29<sup>32</sup>, 30, 1 S 1<sup>20</sup>, 1 Ch 4<sup>9</sup>) or from the father (Gn 16<sup>18</sup> 17<sup>19</sup>, Ex 2<sup>22</sup>, Hos 1<sup>4</sup>); see especially Gn 35<sup>18</sup>), the choice of name being often determined by special circumstances attending the birth. In later times, at any rate, a boy received his name at his circumcision on the eighth day (Lk 1<sup>59</sup> 2<sup>21</sup>). The mother was regarded as unclean for the space of seven + thirty-three days after the birth of a son, or for fourteen + sixty-six days after the birth of a daughter (Lv 12). This difference may probably be explained from the belief, which existed also elsewhere, that the symptoms of a puerperal state continued longer in the latter case (Hippocr. ed. Kühn, i. 392; Dillmann on Lv 12<sup>5</sup>). See PURIFICATION. The

BIRTHDAY.—The custom of observing a birthday as a festival seems to have been widely spread in ancient times. Herodotus (i. 133) speaks of this practice among the Persians. In Gn 40<sup>20</sup> we hear of the celebration of the birthday of the king of Egypt, and in the times of the Ptolemies the inscriptions of Rosetta and Canopus bear witness to the same custom. 'The birthdays of the kings were celebrated with great pomp. They were looked upon as holy, no business was done upon them, and all classes indulged in festivities suitable to the occasion' (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, 1847, v. 290). For Roman birthdays, cf. Marquardt, Privatleben d. Römer, i. 244 f. According to 2 Mac 6<sup>7</sup> the birthdays of the Syrian kings were commemorated every month by means of sacrifices, of which, in the times of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Jews were forced to partake. In the Gospels (Mt 14<sup>6</sup>, Mk 6<sup>21</sup>) we read of the feast made by Herod Antipas to his nobles on his birthday, on which occasion the daughter of Herodias danced before the guests. The proper Greek term for such festival is τὰ γενέθλια (cf. Jos. Ant. II. v. 3), τὰ γενέθλια being used to denote a feast commemorating a person's death (Herod. iv. 26); but in later Greek we find τὰ γενέθλια and similar phrases used in the sense of birthday (Dio Cassius, xlvii. 18, lvi. 46, lxxvii. 2; Alciphro, iii. 18, 55; cf. Jos. Ant. XII. iv. 7: τὴν γενέθλιον ἡμέραν). The meaning of τὰ γενέθλια in the Gospels has indeed been disputed, many commentators referring the word to the anniversary of the king's accession—a day which we know to have been observed by some of the Herodian princes (Jos. Ant. XV. xi. 6: τὴν ἡμέραν τῆς ἀρχῆς). In support of this view appeal is made to the Mishna (Ab. Sar. i. 3), where by the side of the 'γενέθλια of the kings' (יְמֵי לֵבָיִם לְמַלְכֵי), mention is also made of יְמֵי הַיּוֹם לְיֵם הַיּוֹם, i.e. 'the day of birth and the day of death.' So Wieseler, Beiträge, p. 182; Hausrath, New Testament Times (E.T. 1880), ii. 122; Eidersheim, Life and Times (1891), i. 672. But no certain instance can be quoted from Greek literature to support the supposed meaning of τὰ γενέθλια; and the Pal. Gemara (Ser. Ab. Sar. i. 39c) explains יְמֵי לֵבָיִם as equivalent to birthday. In the Bab. Gemara indeed (Ab. Sar. 10a), where the meaning of the word is discussed, the final decision is in favour of the interpretation 'day of accession'; but from the context it appears highly probable that here, as elsewhere, the Talmudists were guessing at the meaning of an unknown word. BIRZAITH (בִּרְזַיִת Kethibh, בִּרְזַת Kerē, AV Birza-vith), 1 Ch 7<sup>31</sup>.—Apparently a town of Asher, probably Bir-az-Zeit, near Tyre. C. R. CONDER.

BISHLAM (בִּשְׁלָם=בִּשְׁלָם 'peaceful'?).—An officer of Artaxerxes in Pal. at the time of the return from captivity under Zerub., Ezr 4<sup>7</sup>. Called BELEMUS in 1 Es 2<sup>14</sup>. The LXX renders the name by ἐν εἰρήνῃ, in peace, as if it were the greeting at the beginning of the letter which follows. H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

BISHOP (ἐπίσκοπος) and ELDER (πρεσβύτερος).—The words are too closely connected in NT and sub-apostolic writings to be separated here. First, to trace their use outside the churches.

1. ἐπίσκοπος is common in the general sense of an overseer; rarer as an official title. We have (a) in the flourishing age of Athens, ἐπ. sent to regulate new colonies or subject cities like Spartan harmosts. They were called ἐπιμεληταί in Rom. times. (b) After Alexander, two ἐπ. at Thera are directed to receive some money and put it at interest; and ἐπ. at Rhodes are municipal officers whose duties are unknown. (c) In 1.XX ἐπ. are taskmasters, as Is 60<sup>17</sup> (שָׂרִים), or minor officers, as Neh 11<sup>9</sup> (קָרָן), or 1 Mac 1<sup>21</sup> the commissioners of Antiochus who enforced idolatry. In LXX also, as Ps 108<sup>8</sup>, we first find the office denoted by ἐπισκοπή. (d) In the 3rd cent. A.D. we have ἐπ. as municipal officers in about ten inscriptions from Batanara, the Decapolis, and those parts, where they seem to have had some authority over sacred revenues (τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ). Of its use (e) for the treasurers of private associations there are no very clear traces. The common word was ἐπιμελητής, as with the Essenes.

2. πρεσβύτερος. The city councils in Rom. times were commonly called βουλαι, not γερουσίαι or πρεσβυτέρια. The γερουσίαι, of which πρεσβύτεροι were members, were not private societies, but corporations for purposes like the games, or the worship of the city-god, or the burial of their members. Their officers were προστάται, ἄρχοντες, προηγούμενοι. (b) The Jewish cities of Pal. were governed by a βουλή of 7, or, in larger places, 23 πρ. (συν). These formed a court of justice, and may have managed the synagogue. The organisation of the Jews in Antioch, Alexandria, etc. was on the same lines, except that in Rome there were several such corporations.

Now, though the Lord commanded His disciples to form a society, there is no indication that either He or His apostles ever prescribed any definite form for it. We should therefore expect to find them following existing models till the new spirit of the society began to express itself in new forms.

In NT we have fairly frequent mention of bishops and elders (passages collected in art. CHURCH GOVERNMENT), and the two offices seem much the same. This is proved thus:—(1) Bishops and elders are never joined together, like bishops and deacons, as separate classes of officials. (2) Ph 1<sup>1</sup> 'to bishops and deacons' (no article). If there had been a distinct order of elders, it could scarcely have been omitted. So 1 Ti 3 passes over the elders, though (5<sup>17</sup>) there certainly were elders at Ephesus, and had been (Ac 20<sup>17</sup>) for some time past. Conversely, Tit 1<sup>7</sup> passes over bishops, describing elders in their place, and in nearly the same words. (3) The bishops described to Timothy, the elders of 1 Ti 5<sup>17</sup>, and those of 1 P 5<sup>2</sup>, have distinctly pastoral functions. So, too, have the elders of Ac 20 and those described to Titus. (4) The same persons seem to be called bishops and elders (Ac 20<sup>17, 28</sup>, Tit 1<sup>5, 7</sup> ἡνα κατὰσθῆς πρεσβυτέρους . . . δέι γὰρ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον κ.τ.λ.). The words are also synonyms in Clement ad Cor. xlii. 44, and (by implication) in Teaching, xv., and Polycarp, Phil. i. It is only in Ignatius that the bishop takes a distinct position. The general equivalence of the two offices in the apostolic age seems undeniable, though so far we must not assume that every bishop was an elder or vice versa, or that there never were any minor differences between them. The difference of name may of itself point to some difference of origin: and this is our next question. As regards elders, it seems likely that the name comes from Jewish sources. The office is already half hinted at in Lk 22<sup>26</sup> (hardly in Ac 5<sup>6</sup> νεώτεροι: cf. <sup>10</sup> νεώτεροι); and we have every reason to think that the churches (even those not of Jewish origin) largely followed the arrangements of the synagogue. Their meeting is actually called συναγωγή in Ja 2<sup>3</sup>, and the Ebionites retained the name even in the 4th cent. It may, however, be noted at once, that if the office and the name were adopted from the Jews, it does not follow that the duties were even originally quite those of the synagogue.

The origin of bishops is more doubtful. The name may perfectly well be Jewish, though the early connexion of the word with Gentile churches is against this. The LXX use of ἐπισκοπος and ἐπισκοπή may have suggested it; but Gentile Christians might have found a still readier hint in the general meaning of the word, combined with its freedom from special associations with idolatry. Yet on the other side is the connexion of bishops with deacons, and Clement's direct appeal to Is 60<sup>17</sup>. The question is best left undecided.

APPOINTMENT.—In the first age popular election and apostolic institution seem to have been co-ordinate. The Seven (Ac 6<sup>3-6</sup>) are chosen by the people, and instituted by the apostles with prayer and laying on of hands. Something similar seems indicated for the Lycaonian elders, though χειροτονήσαντες (Ac 14<sup>23</sup>) grammatically refers to the apostles who by prayer with fastings commended them to the Lord. The elders in Crete are appointed (Tit 1<sup>5</sup> ἵνα καταστήσῃς) by Titus, and apparently the bishops at Ephesus by Timothy in like manner, though 1 Ti 5<sup>22</sup>, He 6<sup>2</sup> seem not specially concerned with the matter; but it does not follow that there was no popular election. In any case Timothy or Titus would have to approve the candidate before instituting him: so that the particular description of his qualifications need not mean that they had to select him in the first instance. As soon as we get outside NT (Teaching, xv., Clement, xlv. liv.) popular election becomes very conspicuous, though neither does this exclude a formal institution. The elders are already attached to the apostle even in the conveyance of special gifts (1 Ti 4<sup>4</sup>, where the contrast of μετὰ with the διά of 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup> may indicate their secondary position); and when the unlocal ministry died out, they would not alone in the institution to local office. How soon an episcopate was developed is a further question; and very much a question of words, if the development was from below.

In conclusion, it would seem that the outline of the process was much the same in all church offices—first designation, then institution by prayer with (at least commonly) its symbolic accompaniments of laying on of hands and fasting. But there is one all-important distinction, that if the designation to local office was by popular election, that to unlocal office was by the will of the Holy Spirit (Ac 13<sup>2</sup>, of Apostles; 1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup> 1<sup>12</sup>, apparently of an Evangelist, 2 Ti 4<sup>6</sup>).

Under this head we may place the share taken by the elders (a) at Jerus., in the deliberations of the apostles (Ac 15<sup>6</sup>) and in the reception held by James (Ac 21<sup>18</sup>); (b) elsewhere, in the laying of hands on Timothy, 1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>.

(2) Teaching.—1 Th 5<sup>12</sup> προϊστάμενοι admonishing in the Lord, 1 Ti 3<sup>2</sup> the bishop apt to teach, 5<sup>17</sup> elders who toil in word and teaching, Tit 1<sup>9</sup> the elder or bishop must be able to teach, and to convince the gainsayers.

Preaching is rather connected with the unlocal ministry; but in its absence the whole function of public worship would necessarily devolve on the local. This may be hinted He 13<sup>7-24</sup> (no officers named but ἡγούμενοι), and in any case it is plain enough in Teaching, xv., and Clement speaks of bishops προσερχόμενοι τὰ δάπα, which must not be limited to the Lord's Supper.

(3) Pastoral Care.—This is everywhere so conspicuous that references are hardly needed.

To it we may refer (a) visiting of the sick, with a view (Ja 5<sup>14</sup>) to anointing and cure; (b) care of strangers and à fortiori of the poor, 1 Ti 3<sup>2</sup>, Tit 1<sup>8</sup>, the bishop to be φιλόθεος.

So far we have not discriminated the duties of bishops and elders. But was there any difference at all? Harnack thinks that while bishops and deacons had the care of public worship and the poor, elders rather formed a court attached to the church, and as such were occupied with government and discipline. The apparent identity of the offices would then be no more than an identity of persons. The weightiest members of the church would naturally hold both offices, and give the tone to both. This theory explains points like the difference of names and the marked separation between the two classes. It may contain more than a germ of the truth; but it cannot be accepted without important reservations. (a) It is not likely that duties were quite so definitely separated. If the elders began with discipline and general oversight, they would be likely soon to take up more spiritual duties, as the Seven did. Those who had gifts to minister the word and teaching, would rather be honoured than hindered; so that many of them might easily be doing pastoral work (esp. if they were bishops also) before the end of the apostolic age. In any case (b) bishops and elders are identical in the Pastoral Epistles, so that the distinction must by that time have been nearly lost. This, however, depends on their date. Harnack (Chronologie, 1897, p. 484) still places the relevant passages in the middle of the 2nd cent.

BISHOPRICK.—Ac 1<sup>20</sup> 'His b. let another take' (RV 'office' with marg. 'Gr. overseership.') The Gr. is ἐπισκοπή, which here and in 1 Ti 3<sup>1</sup> means the office or work of an ἐπισκοπος (see BISHOP); but primarily and chiefly in NT describes God's visitation, as Lk 19<sup>44</sup> 'the time of thy visitation,' 1 P 2<sup>12</sup> 'the day of v.' The same office is described in Ac 1<sup>20</sup> as 'ministry and apostleship' (διακονία καὶ ἀποστολή).

J. HASTINGS.

BIT, BRIDLE (ἵψη, ἡνῆ, ὄλεση, χαλινός).—The distinction between these words is not maintained in AV and RV. 1. ἵψη rezen (Arab. rasam) is a halter. Thus in Job 30<sup>11</sup> RV, 'they have cast off the bridle before me,' the reference is to a horse or mule that has slipped off the halter with which he was tied, and is frisking about in the rough glee of discovered freedom. Such had become the behaviour of the rabble before Job. So in Is 30<sup>28</sup>, instead of 'a bridle in the jaws of the people,' read 'a halter on the jaws of the peoples' (סָמָךְ עַל הַיָּדָיִם).

3. מִשְׁסָּם mishsom, is a muzzle. Hence, 'I will keep my mouth with a bridle' (Ps 39<sup>1</sup>) should clearly be 'with a muzzle,' as in RVm. To lose the distinction is here to lose the meaning, which is enforced silence. A bridle is not used to keep a horse from biting. The muzzle is the basket of rope network that was not to be put on the oxen of the threshing-floor, but must be put over the mouth of the horse, mule, or donkey that bites its companions, the other baggage-animals, and causes disarrangement of their loads. G. M. MACKIE.

BITHIAH (בִּיתְיָה 'daughter,' i.e. worshipper, 'of J').—The daughter of a Pharaoh, who became the wife of Mered, a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4<sup>18</sup>). Whether Pharaoh is to be taken here as the Egypt. royal title or as a Heb. proper name, it is difficult to determine. The name B. may indicate one who had become a convert to the worship of J', which would favour the first supposition (but LXX B reads Πειάδ). If the other wife of Mered is distinguished as 'the Jewess,' RV (AV Jehudijah), this would still further strengthen the supposition. But the text of 1 Ch 4<sup>17-18</sup> appears to be defective, and does not afford ground for more than conjecture. (See Kittel, ad loc. in Haupt.)

BITHRON (בִּיתְרוֹן), 2 S 2<sup>20</sup>, 'the gorge,' probably not a proper name,—a ravine leading to Mahanaim.

BITHYNIA (Βιθυνία), a country in the north of Asia Minor, bordering on the Propontis (Sea of Marmora), the Bosphorus, and the Euxine (Black Sea), was bequeathed to the Romans in B.C. 74 by the last king, Nicomedes III. The coast of Pontus was united with it in a single province by Pompey in B.C. 65, and the joint province was administered according to the principles embodied in a lex Pompeia. But the two parts of the province always retained a certain distinction from one another; the official name was regularly double (Bithynia et Pontus); there were two high priests, the Bithyniarch and the Pontarch (like Asiarch, Galatarch, Lykiarch, etc.); and hence Pontus and B. are mentioned separately in 1 P 1<sup>1</sup>. Bithynia adjoined Asia, and hence, when Paul and Silas were prevented from preaching in Asia (Ac 16<sup>6</sup>), they naturally proceeded towards B., but, coming near the frontier, were not permitted to enter it; and they kept on towards the W. through Mysia till they came out at Troas. B. was a senatorial province, governed like Achaia (which see); but Pliny governed it on a special mission from the emperor, 111-3, and wrote the reports to Trajan which give so much information about the province and the Christians in it. B. was a rich, fertile, peaceful, and highly civilised province. Jews in B. are mentioned by Philo, Legatio ad Gaium, § 36 (Mang. ii. 587); but they are not noticed in the list given in Ac 2<sup>9-11</sup>. It is remarkable that Byzantium (Constantinople), along with, doubtless, the peninsula at the end of which it was situated, was included in the province of Bithynia et Pontus, as we learn from Pliny, ad Traj. Ep. 43, 44. Two great roads traversed B., one connecting Nikomedia and Nicæa (the two chief cities) with Dorylaion and Phrygia in general, the other connecting them with Ancyra direct—a road which in later times became important as the route of European pilgrims by land to Jerusalem.

BITTER, BITTERNESS.—In the literal sense of b. to the taste, the word occurs in such passages as Pr 27<sup>7</sup> (of food, opposed to sweet), Ex 15<sup>23</sup>, Ja 3<sup>11</sup> Rev 8<sup>11</sup> (of water), and Is 21<sup>9</sup> (of strong drink). See also article BITTER HERBS. In most of the passages, however, where the words above given are used in Scripture, it is in a figurative or tropical sense. The examples that follow do not claim to be exhaustive.

i. We may note, in the first place, the use of 'bitter' in an objective sense, of cruel, biting words (cf. πικροὶ λόγοι), Ps. 64<sup>3</sup>; of the keenness of the misery which results from forsaking God, Jer 2<sup>19</sup>; from a life of sin in general, Jer 4<sup>18</sup>, and of impurity in particular, Pr 5<sup>4</sup>. It is applied to the misery of servitude, Ex 1<sup>4</sup>; and to the misfortunes due to bereavement, Ru 1<sup>20</sup>, Am 8<sup>10</sup>.

ii. In a more subjective sense, bitter and bitterness describe such emotions as sympathy in bereavement, Ru 1<sup>13</sup>, and misfortune, Ezk 27<sup>31</sup>; the poignant sorrow of childlessness, 1 S 1<sup>10</sup>, and penitence, Mt 26<sup>75</sup>; the keenness of disappointment, Gn 27<sup>34</sup>; and the general feeling of misery and wretchedness, Job 3<sup>20</sup>; emotions often relieved by a corresponding 'b. cry,' Gn 27<sup>34</sup>, Est 4<sup>1</sup> etc., and by the shedding of 'bitter tears' (cf. Homer's πικρὸν δάκρυον), Mt 26<sup>75</sup> and often.

Under this head may be classed the cases where 'bitter' in the original refers rather to fierceness of disposition, as in 2 S 17<sup>8</sup> ('as a bear robbed of her whelps'), allied with a readiness to take offence.

iii. Another set of fig. applications belongs rather to the sphere of ethics than to that of psychology. Thus Isaiah characterizes those who would subvert the fundamental distinction of right and wrong as putting 'b. for sweet, and sweet for b.' (5<sup>20</sup>). So also Dt 32<sup>32</sup>, where the reference is to the moral poison exhaled by the corrupt nations of Canaan. The same idea of moral depravity is somewhat differently expressed in Dt 29<sup>18</sup> (47), from which (see LXX rendering) are derived the expressions 'gall of bitterness,' Ac 8<sup>23</sup>, and 'root of bitterness,' He 12<sup>15</sup>.

iv. Finally, there is to be noted the term, techn. 'the water of bitterness that causeth the curse' Nu 5<sup>16a</sup>. RV (cf. Kautzsch's tr.: das fluchbringende Wasser des bitteren Wehs), which plays so important a part in the ordeal there described.

BITTER HERBS (מֵרֹרִים môrôrîm, μικρὸς, lactuca agrestes).—It is hardly possible for an Oriental to dine without a salad, and these salads are composed of many kinds of herbs, some mucilaginous, as the purslane, Portulaca oleracea, L.; others crisp, as the cucumber; others aromatic, as parsley; others bitter, as the watercress, Nasturtium officinale, L.; the pepper grass, Lepidium sativum, L.; the endive, Cichorium Intybus, L.; the lettuce, Lactuca sativa, L. Such as these and many others like them can be found everywhere, and suit the requirements of the Passover ordinance (Ex 12<sup>8</sup>, Nu 9<sup>11</sup>). More bitter still are the numerous medicinal plants, as colocynth, wormwood, scammony, poppy, and many others which were in the prophet's eye when he said (La 3<sup>15</sup> m), 'He hath filled me with bitteresses (môrôrîm); he hath made me drunken with wormwood.'

The use of bitter herbs at the Passover was not to remind the Israelites of the bitterness of their bondage (Ex 12<sup>4</sup>), but, as in the case of bread without leaven, to remind them of the haste with which they fled. A meal of unleavened bread, roast lamb, and a salad of bitter herbs, was the simplest and quickest that could be prepared.

BITTERN (קִפּוֹד, קִפּוֹר kippôd, εχίνος, ericius).—Gesenius regards kippôd as the same as the Arab. kunfudh, the porcupine; and with him agree most of the VSS. Tristram, Houghton, and others favour the rendering bittern of the AV. They argue as follows:—(1) That the porcupine has not been noted as an inhabitant of ruins. But this is equally true of the bittern, and it is far less probable that it should be said of the bittern than of the porcupine. The bittern is a swamp bird, and would not choose ruins, but reeds and fens, for a residence. The porcupine, however, is a shy solitary animal, and might easily choose its home among the fallen columns of Babylon (Is 14<sup>23</sup>), Nineveh (Zeph 2<sup>14</sup>), or Idumea (Is 34<sup>14</sup>). (2) That the porcupine could not climb to the capitals of columns. This is not essential, however, as the allusion is rather to the fallen stones of a ruin than to the capital of a standing column. (3) That 'their voice shall sing in the windows' (Zeph 2<sup>14</sup>). Their, however, is not in the original, and we may quite as well supply a, and understand by 'a voice' the sighing of the wind among the fallen stones and through the empty casements, rather than the grunt of a porcupine, or the booming of a bittern, neither of which can be called singing. (4) That porcupines do not frequent water pools (Is 14<sup>23</sup>). This, however, is inconclusive, since Babylon was to be a possession for the kippôd, and (not in) pools of water—i.e. desolate ruins, where kippôd could live, and marshes.

The passages in which the name kippôd occurs are intended to express desolation and the absence of human residence. They are parallel to a large number of similar ones in which the desolation is symbolised by the residence of various beasts and birds. These are usually chosen because of their shyness, and the certainty that where they are man is far away. It by no means follows that in every case all of them, or perhaps any of the particular ones, should dwell in the ruin. It is quite contrary to the habits of the bittern to dwell in ruins. The porcupine, as a man-fearing animal, like the cormorant (RV pelican), owl, raven, dragon (RV jackal), owl (RV ostrich), wild beasts of the desert, wild beasts of the island (RV wolves), satyr (probably wild goat), screech owl (RV night monster), great owl (RV arrowsnake), and vulture, represents the idea of desolation in its concrete form. In the spirit of poetic exaggeration it is said (Is 34<sup>16</sup>), 'no one of these shall fail, none shall want her mate.' To bind down this exalted imagery to literalism would convert every ruin into a menagerie, tenanted by a motley array of fabulous as well as actual beasts and birds. With the philological evidence in favour of the kunfudh (porcupine), and with the unsoundness of the foregoing zoological objections, we may safely follow the RV, which makes it porcupine.

PORCUPINE.

In the foreground, under the larger animal, are a full-grown and a young hedgehog.

The porcupine, Hystrix cristata, L., is found along the sea-coast, and in the lower mountain districts of Pal. and Syria. It feeds on roots, bark, fruits, and vegetables. It inhabits holes and subterranean clefts, and might well find a retreat among ruins. The flesh is eaten by the natives, who know it by its classical name kunfudh. It is about 2 feet in length, independently of the tail, which measures 5 to 6 in. It is covered with the familiar quills. When the animal is tranquil they lie appressed to its body. When it is excited they are erected. It is nocturnal in its habits, and seldom seen by man.

BITUMEN (Gn 11<sup>3</sup> קָח, ἀσφαλτος, RV 'slime,' RVm 'bitumen').—The mineral substance which has given to the Dead Sea the name Lacus Asphaltites (Jos. Ant. i. ix.), in which case it is mineral pitch of the group of the hydrocarbons. This mineral is abundant in several Eastern countries, and was used in very early times as a substitute for mortar in the buildings of Chaldaea.* It is found in Persia, Assam, Upper Burma, particularly at Rangoon, at Baku, near the Caspian, and in the valleys leading down from the west to the Dead Sea, especially Wadies Derejeh and Mahawat, in company with sulphur.†

The bitumen in the Dead Sea basin is probably derived from the bituminous limestones of the Cretaceous series, and reaches the surface through fissures in the rock. In the case of marine limestones or shales containing large quantities of animal or vegetable matter, either of terrestrial or of aquatic origin, bitumenization may take place under suitable conditions of temperature and moisture, giving rise to springs of bitumen or petroleum, and from such a source the bitumen of the Dead Sea basin may be supposed to have its origin.

BIZIOTHIAH (βιζιθια), Jos 15<sup>28</sup>.—A corruption for βιζα 'her villages,' referring to Beersheba, as the LXX at κωμὰς αὐτῶν indicates (cf. also Neh 11<sup>27</sup>).

BIZTHA (βιζθα, Est 1<sup>10</sup>).—One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of king Ahasuerus. A suggested etymology is the Persian besteh, 'bound,' hence perhaps 'eunuch.' The LXX here reads Μαζάν Β, Βαζάν κ.-*, Βαζέ Α. H. A. WHITE.

BLACK.—See COLOURS. As a subst. b. is found in Sir 19<sup>26</sup> AVm, and Jer 14<sup>2</sup> 'they sit in b. upon the ground.' As a verb, Bar 6<sup>21</sup> 'their faces are b<sup>d</sup> through the smoke that cometh out of the temple' (μελαίνω). Blackish, Job 6<sup>16</sup> 'b. by reason of the ice' (ἄγχι), used here of a turbid torrent, RV 'black'). J. HASTINGS.

BLAINS.—See MEDICINE.

BLASPHEMY (βλασφημία, vb. βλασφημεῖν, adj. and subst. βλάσφημος) is derived as to its second element from φῆμι, speech, but the etymology of the first element is still quite uncertain, opinions being divided among βλάπτω I injure (the form would then, properly, be βλαψιφημία), βλάξ stick, doltish, βάλλω I hit in throwing (Eustath. ad. Hom. II. 2, p. 219, ὁ ταῖς φήμας βάλλων, λολδορος), and φαῖδος worthless (root, bhles). The usage, however, is distinct enough. In classical and NT Greek (as also in EV) the word is not restricted, as in ordinary Eng. phraseology and Eng. law, to the divine relation, but has the general sense of slanderous, contumelious speech against either God or man. As a matter of fact, in classical Greek the human relation is the rule, βλασφημία being only by transference applied to the gods (Plato, Rep. 381 E); and, as often as not, in this connexion, it signifies a word not so much of irreverence as of ill-omen (opp. to εὐφημία), a word amiss, an unlucky word, as when one unintentionally prays for evil instead of good (Eur. Ion, 1189; Plato, Legg. 800, 801). In the Heb. OT (mostly in the form gidleph, the word selected by Delitzsch in his Hebrew NT) and in the LXX there is always a notion of contemptuous sacrilege in word or act (1 Mac 2<sup>9</sup>) towards God (2 K 19<sup>4</sup>, cf. 18<sup>22</sup>) directly or indirectly, through men or things connected with Him, e.g. His people (Is 52<sup>5</sup>, Ps 74<sup>18</sup>), His champions (2 Mac 12<sup>14</sup>), His holy land (Ezk 35<sup>12</sup>), His temple (1 Mac 7<sup>30</sup>); once, by transference, towards a heathen god (Bel<sup>9</sup>). In NT the wider classical usage appears, and there is not always the same clear connotation of divine connexion, the word being sometimes equivalent to aggravated contumely, or slander (cf. Dem. pro Cor. iv. 12. 3, εἰς τοῦτον πολλάκις ἀπέσκηψε καὶ μέχρι αἰσχρᾶς βλασ-

A special use in NT touches the human assumption of what is God's, the degradation of the infinite glory of the unapproachable God to the finite nature of the creature. Thus the word is put into the mouths of the Jewish accusers of Christ (Mt 9<sup>3</sup> 26<sup>68</sup>, Jn 10<sup>30</sup>, Lk 5<sup>21</sup>), and is employed likewise conversely by the NT writers and speakers to depict the sacrilegious and insulting denial by the Jews to Christ of what was His due status (Mt 27<sup>39</sup>, Lk 22<sup>65</sup> 23<sup>30</sup>), and their equally sacrilegious and insulting charges against Him (Ac 13<sup>45</sup> 18<sup>6</sup> 26<sup>11</sup>).

The punishment of those who blasphemed, i.e. sinned in word or act 'with a high hand,' i.e. in impious rebellion against J<sup>n</sup>, not in thoughtlessness and weakness of the flesh (see Keil, Bib. Arch. ii. 377, Eng. tr., on Sins of Ignorance), but wilfully and presumptuously, was 'cutting off' (Nu 15<sup>30</sup>) or death by stoning (Lv 24<sup>11-16</sup>). Instances of blasphemy in act are the profanation of the Sabbath by work (Ex 31<sup>14</sup>), the neglect of circumcision (Gn 17<sup>14</sup>), and idolatry in all its relations (Ex 22<sup>19</sup>, 1 Mac 2<sup>6</sup>). It was on the ground of blasphemy that Christ was handed over for execution to the Romans (Mt 26<sup>64</sup>, Jn 19<sup>7</sup>), and that Stephen was stoned in an irregular outbreak of priests and people (Ac 6<sup>11</sup> 7<sup>57</sup>). To the ordinary sins of blasphemy the Jews added the more technical sin of the 'pronunciation' of the name J<sup>n</sup>, through a misinterpretation of 'pronounce' in Lv 24<sup>16</sup> apart from its limitative context. For this reason the LXX rendered J<sup>n</sup> by ὁ κύριος, and the Hebrew Jews substituted Adonai or Elohim, as they do to the present day.

According to the teaching of Christ in the Synoptists (Mt 12<sup>31</sup>, Mk 3<sup>28</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>), the 'blasphemy against the Holy Ghost' was a sin of such surpassing heinousness that it was unpardonable. Not so, He says, the blasphemy against the Son of Man. Now, the Son of Man was God's Messiah, His pre-eminent representative; and blasphemy against Him would have been, in theocratic conception, put parallel with blasphemy against God Himself (Ex 22<sup>28</sup>). What, then, was this blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, this sin of unwonted aggravation, so heinous that, contrary to Jewish notions, even death brought the sinner no nearer to pardon (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Mt 12<sup>32</sup>)? In the context Christ is referring to special acts of His in which the Holy Spirit, as a moral power, manifested Himself obviously and unmistakably. Any man who, with such demonstration before his eyes, declared this power to be immoral (Mk 3<sup>30</sup>), openly denouncing as evil that which was plainly good, exhibited a state of heart which was hopeless and beyond the scope of divine illumination or divine influence; he was the most high-handed, wilful, presumptuous despoiler of the divine. In his position of blasphemer he could not be forgiven; for God to put such a sin behind His back was in the moral nature of things a contradiction and an impossibility. Not so culpable was the blasphemy even against the Son of Man; for in His state of humiliation, with the mists of the flesh about Him, His dignity was not so obvious, so unmistakable, so irresistibly convincing. In this case there might be 'defect'; in the other there was 'defiance.' So much for the strict context and the special occasion. When we reach out beyond these and seek to find a more general application, we have need of great diffidence. One point.

† Tristram, Land of Israel, pp. 281, 358.

however, seems clear: the context debars us from making the blasphemy simply the equivalent of continued impenitence in any sin, as if Christ had meant to say that any conscious sin, persisted in, becomes blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. It is hard to conceive that Christ in these words merely put into another form the maxim 'no repentance, no pardon.' At the same time we cannot wholly agree with those who assert that there is 'no connexion' whatever between the blasphemy against the manifest Holy Ghost and the sin against the light of spiritual experience in He 6<sup>4-6</sup>, and that these sins are 'altogether dissimilar' (S. Davidson in Kitto, Encyc., s.v. 'Blasphemy'). Nor do we know enough to be sure that the 'sin unto death' in 1 Jn 5<sup>16</sup> 'stands apart' entirely from the sin with which Christ is dealing. Yet, on the whole, it seems reasonable and consistent with the OT sacrificial theory (cf. Keil, as above) to affirm that any sin which is explainable by the defect of the flesh, its mere willingness and its weakness, is not to be classed with the wilful, strong-armed, arrogant blaspheming of good as evil. And it is observable that the crucifixion of Christ, which in He 6<sup>6</sup> is a metaphor for apostasy, is in Ac 3<sup>17</sup>, in its literal sense, attributed by St. Peter to ἀγνοια, ignorance. Doubtless, there is a time and a place wherein willingness shades off into wilfulness, and weakness into presumption; neglect of the divine illumination is the inclined plane towards the detestation of it; and when the heart can deliberately say, 'Evil, be thou my good,' its utterance is not far from blasphemy of the Holy Ghost.

BLAST (from blasen 'to blow') is used in AV: 1. Of the blowing of a wind instrument, Jos 6<sup>5</sup> 'when they make a long b. with the ram's horn.' 2. The blowing of the breath of J<sup>n</sup>, Ex 15<sup>8</sup> 'with the b. of thy nostrils the waters were gathered together' (Heb. עַר רִיחָה, 'breath'; cf. Is 30<sup>28</sup> 'breath,' 33<sup>11</sup> 'breath,' 37<sup>7</sup> AV 'blast,' RV 'spirit,' 2 K 19<sup>7</sup> AV 'blast,' RV 'spirit'). 3. The breath, i.e. the tyranny of violent peoples, Is 25<sup>4</sup> (עַר). 4. Blowing that withers or curses, 2 S 22<sup>16</sup>, Job 4<sup>9</sup>, Ps 18<sup>15</sup> (נֶשֶׁח; nēshānah). So blasted = 'blighted' Gn 41<sup>6, 23, 27</sup>, 2 K 19<sup>28</sup>, Is 37<sup>27</sup>; and blasting = 'blight' Dt 28<sup>22</sup>, 1 K 8<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ch 6<sup>28</sup>, Am 4<sup>3</sup>, Hag 2<sup>17</sup>. The reference is to the effect of the sirocco east wind. See Hos 13<sup>15</sup> for its effect on water, and Jon 4<sup>8</sup> on man. Says Thomson, 'it rushes down every gorge, bending and breaking the trees, and tugging at each individual leaf. . . The eyes inflame, the lips blister, and the moisture of the body evaporates, . . . you become languid, nervous, irritable, and despairing' (Land and Book, ii. 262). In Ps 18<sup>15</sup>, Pr. Bk. 'blasting' = blast.

BLASTUS (Βλάστος).—A chamberlain of HEROD AGRIPPA I. (wh. see), mentioned Ac 12<sup>20</sup>. It was through his intervention, presumably secured by bribery, that the people of Tyre and Sidon prevailed upon the king to receive an embassy from them at Caesarea. He is described as 'chamberlain,' τὸν ἐπὶ τοῦ καὶνῶτος τοῦ βασιλέως. Neither the name nor the incident of the embassy occurs in Josephus—a proof of the complete independence of the two accounts (but see on the other side, Krenkel, Josephus und Lucas, p. 203). A. C. BLAZE.—Mk 1<sup>48</sup> 'to blaze abroad the matter' (RV 'spread abroad,' Gr. διαφημίζω, in Mt 28<sup>15</sup> tr<sup>d</sup> 'commonly reported,' RV 'was spread abroad'; in Mt 9<sup>31</sup> διαφημίσαν αὐτόν, 'they spread abroad his fame'). This verb blaze = 'to blow,' then 'proclaim,' 'publish,' is to be distinguished from blaze = burn. See Oxf. Eng. Dict. J. HASTINGS.

BLESSEDNESS.—The word 'blessedness' is not found in the OT, and it only appears three times in the NT (AV), and then as the translation of a word (μακαρισμός) which indicates the ascription of blessing, not the state of the blessed, so that the Revisers have rightly expunged it, substituting 'blessing' in the first two cases (Ro 4<sup>8, 9</sup>), and 'gratulation' in the third (Gal 4<sup>16</sup>). Nevertheless, the idea which it conveys is the result of a legitimate generalisation from biblical statements. By the term 'blessedness' we understand the Summum Bonum regarded as a gift from God, or as enjoyed in some divine relationship—a divine Summum Bonum. Throughout the Bible this is centred in the idea of life, in its more elementary stages as the normal human existence on earth, in its more advanced condition as eternal life (ζωὴ αἰώνιος). The Hebrew seems to have regarded length of days as a supreme object of desire (e.g. Ps 21<sup>4</sup>). Hence, while it is a most terrible curse for a man to be cut off in the midst of his days (e.g. Ps 55<sup>23</sup>), for his life to be spared is a blessing devoutly sought after (e.g. Ps 39<sup>13</sup>), so that to live on to a ripe old age is the crowning mercy (e.g. 1 Ch 29<sup>28</sup>). The OT idea of blessedness is largely temporal and external, though mingled with higher spiritual thoughts as in Ps 16<sup>10, 11</sup>. Next to the life of the individual is the extension of that life in his family and the perpetuation of it through his descendants, so that the natural human instinct for immortality is in a measure satisfied by contemplating the prospect of an endless posterity. For this reason, as also because of the present good which the possession of a family is to a man, that is an important item in the OT notion of blessedness. Earthly prosperity enters into the notion, not merely on its own account, but also as a sign of God's favour, although the latter point is disputed throughout the Book of Job. In the Proverbs, abundance of goods—one's barns filled with plenty (Pr 3<sup>10</sup>)—is treated as a great sign of prosperity, but wisdom is there regarded as the Summum Bonum (Pr 4<sup>7</sup>). In Messianic prophecy the thought of blessedness is expanded to signify the national weal rather than purely individual prosperity. This is to come in a golden age of widespread plenty and general happiness, following a triumph over the enemies of Israel. In particular, justice will take the place of tyranny and robbery, good order will be maintained, and universal peace prevail (e.g. Is 11<sup>1-9</sup>, 65<sup>17-25</sup>). It is principally through the two ideas of righteousness and peace that the ideal is advanced to a more spiritual conception (e.g. Ps 119<sup>106</sup>). In the NT the idea of blessedness is greatly elevated. According to the Synoptists, Jesus Christ speaks of eternal life as the supreme boon of the future (e.g. Lk 18<sup>30</sup>). According to the Fourth Gospel, He dwells much more largely on this subject, and treats it as a present possession (e.g. Jn 6<sup>47</sup>). St. Paul follows, accentuating the blessedness of eternal life as God's gift to man (Ro 6<sup>23</sup>). In the beatitudes with which He opens the Sermon on the Mount, our Lord describes, not only the characters that will be blessed, but also the nature of the highest good. The blessed are, according to St. Luke, the poor, they that hunger and weep now, and they who are hated, separated, and reproached by men; and their blessedness is to possess the kingdom of God, and to be filled and laugh (Lk 6<sup>20-22</sup>). According to St. Matthew, they are more spiritually regarded as the poor in spirit, they that mourn, the meek, they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemakers, and they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake; while their blessedness consists respectively in having the kingdom of heaven—elsewhere described as a pearl of great price (Mt 13<sup>46</sup>)—in being comforted, inheriting the earth, being filled, obtaining mercy, seeing God, being called the children of God (Mt 5<sup>9-12</sup>). In the Parable of the Talents, future blessedness takes the form of high honour together with enlarged service (Mt 25<sup>21</sup>). The Apoc. describes the blessedness of the Church in the victory and reign of Christ and the coming of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev 21. 22). See also BEATITUDE, HAPPINESS. W. F. ADENEY.

BLESSING (ברכה, εὐλογία).—Throughout the Bible we meet with two forms of blessing. (1) Blessing by God. This is either (a) a direct and immediate act of God in conferring some boon, as expressed by the phrase, 'The Lord blessed Obadedom and all his household' (2 S 6<sup>11</sup>); or (b) a divine utterance expressing the will of God to confer future favour, and thus approaching the general usage of the word, which is indicative of benediction, or speaking with a wish for the good of the persons concerned, e.g. 'God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful, etc. (Gn 1<sup>22</sup>). The blessing of God is primarily of persons, and secondarily of things, as implied in the phrase, 'Bless, Lord, his substance' (Dt 33<sup>11</sup>). The secondary blessing is attached to a day in the benediction of the Sabbath, e.g. 'God blessed the seventh day' (Gn 2<sup>3</sup>). (2) Blessing by man. This is really an appeal for the first form of blessing, a prayer that God will confer His own blessing on the object of the speaker's good wishes. But it comes to be regarded as in some way directly beneficial, just as the evil eye is supposed to blight directly, while the curse proper is an appeal to Heaven to smite its object, as the true blessing is an appeal to Heaven to confer some boon. This seems to be the case with the patriarchal blessings, Isaac directly determining the destiny of Jacob; and yet the language employed shows that the actual source of the boons spoken of is looked for in God (Gn 27<sup>28, 29</sup>). In such a case the peculiar privilege of conferring a blessing resolves itself into a peculiar right to seek certain favours of God. A similar condition may be discovered in Balaam's benediction of Israel. While the narrative implies a belief on the part of Balak that the seer has peculiar mystic powers of cursing and blessing, Balaam's utterances are simply prophetic, declaring the will of J<sup>h</sup> and predicting the destiny of Israel (Nu 23. 24). A man who is exceptionally blessed is taken as the model and type of blessing, and is then said to be 'a blessing' (Gn 12<sup>2</sup>); and others are said to bless themselves by him, in the sense that they appeal to the blessing he has received as a specimen of what they desire for themselves, e.g. 'The nations shall bless themselves in him'—i.e. by Him, by reference to His blessing (Jer 4<sup>2</sup>). When our Lord is described in the Gospels as blessing, no doubt the idea is analogous to the second form of blessing, the appeal to Heaven to confer favour, with the associated thought that Jesus Christ had especial power in making this appeal. Thus we must understand the action of the mothers who brought their children to Him for a blessing as they might have brought them to a holy Rabbi (Buxtorf, Syn. Jud. p. 138). But with those who perceived His divine nature, the act of blessing by Jesus Christ must have passed over into the primary and immediate act of God in conferring grace, e.g. in the final benediction (Lk 24<sup>49</sup>). The blessing of bread, of which we read in the Gospels, is equivalent to giving thanks for it, the thought being that good received gratefully comes as a blessing (compare εὐλόγησεν in Mt 14<sup>19</sup> and εὐλογήσας αὐτὰ in Mk 8<sup>7</sup> with εὐχαριστήσας in Mt 15<sup>36</sup>). To bless God is to praise Him with acknowledgment of His goodness and expressed desires for His glory. The act of blessing was usually performed by the imposition of hands (e.g. Gn 48<sup>17-19</sup>, Mt 19<sup>13</sup>); or, where a number of persons were concerned, with uplifted hands (e.g. Lv 9<sup>4</sup>, Lk 24<sup>30</sup>). The priests pronounced a benediction after every morning and evening sacrifice, according to a triple formula (Nu 6<sup>22-26</sup>; Keil, Biblical Archaeol. ii. p. 457). A more primitive form of blessing seems to have been used under the kings (e.g. 1 K 8<sup>14, 55</sup>; Ewald, Antiq. pp. 15, 132). A benediction was regularly pronounced at the close of the synagogue service (Buxtorf, Syn. Jud., note subjoined to index).

BLINDING.—See CRIMES. BLINDNESS.—See MEDICINE.

BLOOD.—By the Hebrews, as by other peoples of antiquity, the blood, both of man and of beast, was regarded as the seat of the soul (נֶפֶשׁ), that is, of the vital principle common to all sentient organisms (Lv 17<sup>11</sup> 'the life [EV, Heb. nephesh, 'soul'] of the flesh is in the blood,' and parll. pass.). When we reflect how little we know even now, notwithstanding all our advance in physiology and allied sciences, of the mystery of life and death, we can in some measure realise the emotions of awe and dread—not without a large admixture of the superstitious element—with which the early Semites must have regarded the shedding of blood.

Inasmuch as all slaughter was originally sacrifice, the real significance of the provision, carried back by Heb. tradition to the days of Noah (Gn 9<sup>4</sup>), that the blood of animals slain for human food was forbidden or taboo, will demand careful investigation under the article SACRIFICE (see also FOOD). To the same art. belongs the study of the peculiar or expiatory efficacy of blood, which finds expression in the familiar words: 'Without shedding of blood is no remission' (He 9<sup>22</sup>).

Akin hereto is the cathartic or purificatory use of blood in the Jewish ceremonial system for cases of uncleanness of the highest degree, such as leprosy (Lv 14<sup>50, 50a</sup>), the discussion of which belongs to the art. on PURIFICATION (which see also for the uncleanness caused by blood in the cases enumerated in Lv 12<sup>1a, 15<sup>10a</sup></sup>).

For another and very ancient blood-rite, the essential significance of which survives even in the most sacred rite of Christian worship (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>), see COVENANT.

Among all nations blood has played a conspicuous part in magical rites, but the only trace of its superstitious use in the OT seems to be the incident recorded in 1 K 22<sup>38</sup>, and already explained in the art. BATHING (§ 3). (See Strack, Der Blut- aberglaube; Trumbull, The Threshold Covenant.)

BLOOD, AVENGER OF.—See GOELL.

BLOODGUILTINESS.—In AV only Ps 51<sup>14</sup> 'Deliver me from b., O God' (נֶפֶשׁ, plu. of נֶפֶשׁ 'blood'). RV adds Ex 22<sup>3</sup> (Heb. v. 1. 2), 1 S 25<sup>30, 33</sup>, the Heb. being the same. W. R. Smith (OTJC p. 441) points to Ezk 18<sup>18</sup> as proving that the Heb. phrase does not necessarily mean the guilt of murder, but any mortal sin, such sin as, if it remains unatoned, withdraws God's favour from His land and people (Dt 21<sup>18</sup>, Is 1<sup>15</sup>), a remark which has an obvious bearing on the occasion of the 51st psalm. J. HASTINGS.

BLOODSHEDDING.—Sir 27<sup>15</sup> only (ἐκχυσις αἵματος); but He 9<sup>22</sup> 'without shedding of blood is no remission' (ἀμαρτεχυσις).

adds Ps 5<sup>6</sup> 55<sup>22</sup> 139<sup>19</sup>, the Heb. being the same, AV 'bloody'; RV more literally 'man of blood' 2 S 16<sup>7-8</sup>, 'men of blood' Ps 26<sup>9</sup>. Cf. Ex 4<sup>25-26</sup> 'bridegroom of blood' (AV 'bloody husband').

Blueness, Pr 20<sup>30</sup> 'the b. of a wound cleanseth away evil' (חַבְבִּירֹת habbīrōth, 'stripes,' RV 'stripes that wound'). See MEDICINE. J. HASTINGS.

BOANERGES (Βοανηργές, deriv. uncertain, 'sons of thunder') is the surname given by our Lord to His disciples James and John. Considerable obscurity gathers round the question why it was given to the sons of Zebedee. It is mentioned only in Mk 3<sup>17</sup>, and never seems to have prevailed as Simon Peter's new name did. It is not likely either that it was meant as a perpetual rebuke of their unregulated zeal (Mk 9<sup>38</sup> 10<sup>37</sup>, Lk 9<sup>54</sup>), or that it refers specially to their thundering forth the gospel. The likelihood is that it is both descriptive and prophetic of the union of the passionate and vehement with the gentle and loving in their character, and of the fact that once and again tempests of long-restrained emotion would burst forth out of the deep stillness of their strong reserved natures.

BOAZ (בּוֹאֵז = 'swiftness,' from a root בּוּז not occurring in Heb., not as was supposed בּוּז = 'in him is strength,' Bōs, Bōz).—The head of the Hebronites who lived at Beth-lehem-judah, after Elimelech's departure into the country of Moab (Ru 2<sup>1</sup>). He is described as a mighty man of wealth (RVm 'valour'). His fields lay apparently at some little distance from Beth-lehem (v. 4). It was in them that he first caught sight of Ruth as she was gleaning. He had heard of her already as a faithful and loving daughter, and begged her to remain in his fields, assuring her of his protection, and inviting her to partake of some food in the field (vv. 5<sup>22</sup>). One night, whilst B. was sleeping in his threshing-floor, Ruth, instructed by her mother-in-law, came, and by placing herself at his feet claimed to be taken under his protection. Thereupon he promised that if the kinsman who was nearer than he would not do his duty to her as next of kin, he would take that duty upon himself (ch. 3). B. therefore bought the right of redemption from the next of kin, including in it the right to take Ruth to be his wife to raise up seed to Mahlon (4<sup>10</sup>). The marriage was celebrated, and in due course a son was born to B. and Ruth, called Obed, who, according to the genealogy at the end of the Bk of Ruth and in 1 Ch 2<sup>12-15</sup>, was the grandfather of David. How far this is an instance of the use of what is called the law of the Levirate will be found discussed in another article (RUTH). B. has a further interest for us, as his name occurs in both the genealogies of our Lord (Mt 1<sup>6</sup>, Lk 3<sup>32</sup>). According to the Jewish authorities he was the same as Ibzan of Jg 12<sup>6-10</sup> (see Moore, Judges, p. 310). The difficulties of the chronology of the genealogy from Perez to David have not yet been satisfactorily cleared up. The narrator of B.'s marriage does not hint at any irregularity in it such as we should expect if Ezr 9<sup>1-2</sup> and Neh 13<sup>2</sup> or even Dt 23<sup>3-4</sup> were known to him.

BOAZ (בּוֹאֵז, LXX Βαλδᾶς in B, and Βοῶς in A of 1 K 7<sup>21</sup>; in 2 Ch 3<sup>17</sup> the LXX has 'ισχύς 'strength').—The name of one of the two pillars erected in the porch of Solomon's temple, the other being Jachin, 1 K 7<sup>21</sup>, 2 Ch 3<sup>17</sup>, Jer 52<sup>21-22</sup>. 'Boaz' stood on the left looking eastward, i.e. it was on the north side of the entrance of the temple. Its height was 18 cubits, its circumference 12, its diameter being consequently 3 $\frac{1}{2}$  cubits. Surmounting it was a chapter 5 cubits high, ornamented with network and with pomegranates (Jer 52<sup>22-23</sup>). There is, however, a good deal of confusion as to the ornamentation of the chapters, though all agree that they were lily-shaped at the top. The apparent discrepancy as to its height is owing to the fact that the ornament uniting the shaft to the chapter is sometimes included in the reckoning, and sometimes not. 'Jachin' and 'Boaz' were exactly of the same form and size; both were hollow and made of brass, the thickness of the brass being four fingers, i.e. 4 inches (Jer 52<sup>21</sup>).

Ewald, Thénius, Merx, and Nowack are of opinion that these pillars served for supports to the roof of the house. Nowack (Bib. Arch. ii. 33) refers to Ezk 40-49 as showing that the pillars of Ezekiel's temple were supports; but the passage does not prove that they were more than ornaments. On the other hand, Hirt, Stieglitz, Cugler, Schmause (all architects), Bahr, Riehm, Keil, and Lumby argue that the pillars stood in the porch, unconnected at the top, and that the only function they served was that of ornamentation. (See Keil, Bib. Arch. i. 169 f.). In favour of this opinion are the following points: (1) The ornamentation on the top already mentioned. (2) Their height was 23 (18+5) cubits. Now the porch was, according to 2 Ch 3<sup>4</sup> and Jos. (Ant. viii. iii. 2), 120 cubits; according to Bertheau 30; but in the opinion of most critics it was 20 cubits high, answering to the length (see PORCH). None of those measurements would suit if the pillars stood under and supported the roof of the porch. (3) The pillars were hollow. (4) Hiram's work was to decorate, and not to build any essential part of the temple.

But, though no more than ornaments to the Israelites, the origin of these pillars must be sought among the Syrians and Phœnicians, who commonly erected such pillars in front of their temples. In front of his temple at Tyre, the Syrian god, Melkart, is represented by two pillars (Herod. 2. 44). Before the temples of Paphos and Hierapolis there were likewise two pillars. In these cases, the pillars stood for deity, and they formed a part of that Phallic worship of which we are finding more and more traces in the ancient world (see Dudley, Naology, p. 130 f.; W. R. Cobb, Origines Judaicae, pp. 207-238; and Trumbull, Threshold Covenant, p. 230 n.). Nowack (ii. 34) and W. R. Smith (ES p. 191, note 1) incline to believe that even to the Israelites these pillars were symbols of J', so that, if they are right, the true God was set forth by these Phallic emblems, as in the northern kingdom He was worshipped in the form of a young bull (בָּזָג ʿegel). But it is unlikely, to say the least, that if these pillars stood for J' we should have no intimation of it in the writings of the OT. Benzinger (Bib. Arch. p. 385) points out that pillars of this kind are found in the front of the temple of Amon in Egypt (cf. p. 250 of the same work).

But why two pillars, if but one deity is thus represented? Among the Semites and other primitive peoples, gods went in pairs, male and female, as Baal and Ashoreth, Osiris and Isis, etc. Possibly the two pillars stood for male and female, the active and passive principle in nature. This is not necessarily opposed to the Phallic origin of the symbol, since at this stage their origin might have been wholly unknown, the mere fact of their representing deity being possibly the only thought in the mind of the people.

The words 'Jachin' and 'Boaz' are certainly proper names. The LXX so regards them in 1 K 7<sup>21</sup>, but in 2 Ch 3<sup>7</sup> the words are translated Karôpôwris (a setting right) and ἰσχύς (strength).

Gesenius explains the words as names of the donors or builders. This is only a guess. No other part of the temple is designated in this way except Solomon's porch, which belongs to the time of Herod. Ewald (Gesch. iii. 4) holds that they are names of honoured men, perhaps sons of Solomon. This is not more likely than Gesenius's opinion. Keil follows Kimchi in making the names ('He will establish,' 'In Him is strength') symbols of the solidity and strength of the kingdom of God among Israel, as having its central point in the temple. Klostermann (Komm.) translates and explains by 'Stand-halter und der Trotz-bieter,' the 'firm and defying one,' referring to God. Thienius (Komm.) joins both words to make the expression 'He will establish by strength'; but the text is against it, and so is the fact that there are two pillars, each with a name of its own.

BODY.—1. Early biblical usage had no fixed term for the human body as an entire organism, and, consequently, none to use, as such, in precise antithesis to 'soul' or 'spirit.' An assortment of terms was employed, each of which strictly denotes only one part or element of the bodily nature, such as trunk, bones, belly, bowels, reins, flesh. The last is by far the most prominent, probably as supplying to the body its form, colour, and beauty. Flesh is used through both Testaments for the corporeal nature of man in connexion with and contrast to the inner or spiritual nature. (See FLESH.) Of the other terms, קֶרֶב (once in late Heb., 1 Ch 10<sup>12</sup> קֶרֶב) originally probably the cavity containing the vitals, most nearly denotes the whole, and is applied both to the living body (Gn 47<sup>18</sup>) and to the corpse (1 S 31<sup>10</sup>); Bones (עצ, עֲצָם) once, Ps 139<sup>15</sup> prob. collectively, 'my bony frame.' The word is suggestively used to denote the reality or strength of a thing, i.e. the thing itself (Ex 24<sup>10</sup>, Job 21<sup>23</sup>). Some of these ancient terms for the bodily parts have passed over into the NT, and indeed into all popular speech with certain definite psychical connotations. Thus Belly (קֶרֶב, κοιλία) stands throughout Scripture for the seat of appetite and of the carnal affections (e.g. Ro 16<sup>18</sup>, Ph 3<sup>19</sup>), yet also connotes the inward nature, the innermost of the soul (cf. Pr 18<sup>20</sup> 20<sup>27</sup>, 22<sup>29</sup>, Jn 7<sup>38</sup>). So Bowels (כִּסְיֵי, κῆτος), besides its literal, or first meaning, is plentifully used, metonymically, for the sympathetic or compassionate affections (Gn 43<sup>30</sup>, 1 K 3<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>12</sup> 7<sup>18</sup>, Ph 2<sup>1</sup>, Col 3<sup>12</sup>). That the same kind of transference from the bodily to the mental region has taken place with the terms Heart and Reins goes without saying.

2. Later OT writers may have come under the influence of Greek thought in constraining the whole body or outer man as the dwelling, clothing, or integument of the soul. If the expression (Job 4<sup>19</sup>) בָּתֵּי עֹמָר 'houses of clay,' refers, as is commonly thought, to human bodies, it is an instance closely imitated by the Apoc. writer (Wis 9<sup>15</sup>) in the phrase 'earthly tabernacle' or 'frame' (RV), and which reappears in 2 Co 5<sup>1</sup>. In Daniel the Aramaic word עַרְוָה is used for body (Dn 3<sup>27</sup> 4<sup>30</sup> [Heb.] 5<sup>21</sup>), and another Aramaic word (of Persian origin) גִּבְרָה is used along with עַרְוָה (7<sup>19</sup>) in exactly the figurative manner so familiar to later thought, 'My spirit was grieved in the midst of my body' (lit. 'of his sheath').

3. In the NT, body (σῶμα) signifies the complete organism with all its members (1 Co 12<sup>14</sup> etc.), and stands in clear and constant antithesis to 'soul' and 'spirit.' Throughout the whole of Scripture the place of the body as an integral constituent of man's nature is insisted on. This must be made prominent in our Bible doctrine of man as contrasted with philosophic and other notions depreciatory of his bodily nature. But for this, as well as for the Bible Dualism or Dichotomy, see art. PSYCHOLOGY. J. LAIDLAW.

BODYGUARD.—1 Es 3<sup>4</sup> RV only. See GUARD.

BOHAN (בֹּהַן, perhaps 'covering').—A son of Benben, acc. to Jos 15<sup>8</sup> 18<sup>17</sup> (both P). The stone of B. is mentioned in these two passages as forming a mark of division between Judah and Benjamin. It is impossible to identify the site where it stood.

BOILS.—See MEDICINE.

BOLDNESS.—In OT 'bold' is given as tr<sup>n</sup> of בָּטַח batah to trust, Pr 28<sup>1</sup> 'the righteous are b. as a lion.' In Gn 34<sup>25</sup> 'Simeon and Levi . . . came upon the city boldly,' the Heb. is the noun בְּטָחָה betah from batah, and is applied, not to Simeon and Levi, but to the inhabitants of the city, 'they came upon the city (dwelling) securely' (so RV, but RVm 'boldly'). In Ec 8<sup>1</sup> 'boldness' is lit. 'strength' (יִצְחָק), and is tr<sup>n</sup> 'haudness' in RV.

In Apoc. 'bold' occurs in a bad sense, Sir 8<sup>15</sup> 'Travel not by the way with a b. fellow' (τολμαρὸς RV 'rash man'), and 19<sup>3</sup> 'a bold man shall be taken away' (ψυχὴ τολμαρά, RV 'a reckless soul').

The adj. τολμαρὸς occurs in NT only Ro 15<sup>15</sup> 'I write the more boldly unto you' (Tr<sup>s</sup> τολμαρῶτερον, WH τολμαρῶς); and τολμαρῆς 'an audacious person,' only 2 P 2<sup>10</sup> (AV 'presumptuous,' RV 'daring'); but τολμαῶ is frequent, the most interesting occurrence being 2 Co 10<sup>2</sup> where the apostle uses first θάρρα and then τολμαῶ, both tr<sup>d</sup> 'be bold' in AV, but in RV 'that I may not when present show courage with the confidence wherewith I count to be bold against some.' Thayer says that θ. denotes confidence in one's own strength or capacity, τ. boldness or daring in undertaking; θ. has reference more to the character, τ. to its manifestation (NT Lex. p. 628; cf. Sanday and Headlam on Ro 15<sup>15</sup>; 'the boldness of which St. Paul accuses himself is not in sentiment, but in manner'). The Ionic form of θ. (θάρρα) occurs in LXX and NT only as imperat. 'take courage,' 'fear not,' etc. Thus, Sir 19<sup>10</sup> 'If thou hast heard a word, let it die with thee; and be bold (θάρρα), it will not hurt thee'; Mt 14<sup>27</sup> 'Be of good cheer' (θάρρα). The only compound of these verbs in NT is ἀποτολμαῶ, Ro 10<sup>12</sup> only, 'Isaiah is very bold,' lit. 'is bold by himself.'

But there is a nobler boldness in the NT than these. In the Gr. it is expressed by παρρησία (lit. 'fulness' or 'freedom of speech,' πάν ῥήσις) and παρρησιάζομαι; and although these words are used by classical authors and the LXX, this b. reaches a higher manifestation under the Gospel, which is its very foundation. Thus Eph 3<sup>12</sup> 'Christ

Jesus our Lord, in whom we have b. and access'; He 10<sup>19</sup> 'Having therefore, brethren, b. to enter into the holy place by the blood of Jesus'; 1 Jn 4<sup>17</sup> 'that we may have b. in the day of judgment'; He 4<sup>16</sup> 'Let us therefore come boldly (RV 'draw near with b.') unto the throne of grace.' For the most part it is boldness of speech, but its foundation is the same: Jn 7<sup>28</sup> 'He speaketh boldly' (RV 'openly'); Ac 4<sup>31</sup> 'they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they spake the word of God with b.'; 13<sup>46</sup> 'Paul and Barnabas waxed bold (RV 'spoke out boldly') and said'; 1 Th 2<sup>2</sup> 'we were bold (RV 'waxed bold') in our God to speak unto you the Gospel of God.' See COURAGE.

J. HASTINGS.

BOLLED.—Ex 3<sup>91</sup> 'the barley was in the ear, and the flax was bolled' (RVm 'was in bloom'; Heb. גִּבְהֹל, gibh'ol, lit. 'was bud,' i.e. was in bud). The Eng. word boll (originally something swollen) is a seed vessel, a pod; hence 'was bolled' (= 'was in seed') expresses a further stage of growth than the Heb. warrants.

J. HASTINGS.

BOLSTER (something 'swollen,' cf. 'bolled') is now used of the longer and firmer cushion under the pillows, but was formerly often syn. with pillow. It occurs in AV of 1 S 19<sup>13, 16</sup>, 26<sup>7, 11, 12, 16</sup>, where RV always 'head'; thus 1 S 19<sup>13</sup> 'Michal . . . put a pillow of goats' hair for his b.' (RV 'at the head thereof'). The same Heb. (קַרְבַּיִם) is tr<sup>d</sup> 'pillows' Gn 28<sup>11, 18</sup>, and in 1 K 19<sup>6</sup> [all] 'head,' marg. 'bolster'; RV always 'head.' (For the peculiar reading קַרְבַּיִם 1 S 26<sup>12</sup>, Budde gives קַרְבַּיִם in agreement with other passages and the LXX here.)

Bondmaid, a female slave, Lv 19<sup>20</sup> (קַדְשָׁה); 25<sup>44, 46</sup> (קַדְשָׁה, tr<sup>d</sup> 'maid' in v.<sup>6</sup>); Gal 4<sup>22</sup> (παῖδισκα, tr. 'bondwoman' 4<sup>22, 30, 30, 31</sup>), all of Hagar, RV 'handmaid'; π. is used also of the maid who recognised Peter, Mt 26<sup>69</sup>, Mk 14<sup>66, 69</sup>, Lk 22<sup>66</sup>, Jn 18<sup>17</sup> [see DAMSEL], of Rhoda, Ac 12<sup>18</sup>, and of the Philippian fortune-teller, 16<sup>16</sup>). Bondman and Bondwoman = slave, are frequent. Bondservant occurs in AV only once, Lv 25<sup>39</sup>; but where the Gr. is δούλος, slave, RV often turns 'servant' of AV into 'bondservant' (in favour of 'slave' see Horwill, Contemp. Rev. May 1896, p. 707). Bondservice, 1 K 9<sup>21</sup> 'upon those did Solomon levy a tribute of b. (עֲבָדִים, RV 'raise a levy of bondservants'). Bondslave, 1 Mac 2<sup>11</sup> (δούλῳ, not in NT, but freq. in LXX, RV 'bondwoman'). See SLAVERY.

Both terms apparently refer to the same part of the head-dress of the ordinary priests. Its distinctive importance, with regard to the priestly office and rank, is implied in Is 61<sup>10</sup> כִּנְיָה וּפָאָר, 'as a bridegroom makes his head-ornament like a priest's,' which Dillm. and Del. understand of winding it up into a conical point (cf. Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 117).

In determining what the bonnet was: (1) we find it distinguished from the miznepheth or turban of the high priest, on the compactly folded front of which the gold plate lay fastened with a cord (לֵבָשׁ Ex 28<sup>36, 37</sup>), a less ornate form being worn on the Great Day of Atonement (Lv 16<sup>4</sup>). (2) It was highly ornamental 'for glory and beauty' (Ex 28<sup>40</sup>). (3) It was of fine linen (Ex 39<sup>28</sup>). (4) It was one of the items of elaborate female attire (Is 3<sup>20</sup>).

These allusions seem to converge towards an article of outdoor wear, needed where service exposed to the sun, and yet having a distinctly decorative purpose. These conditions are best met by the loose kerchief for head and neck, which is still a striking feature in Oriental dress; and in its protective usefulness and dignified elegance is an accommodation at once to the climate and the character.

While this bonnet or head-tire among the Bedawin is simply a square of black or blue cotton, and the day-labourer improvises anything to cover the back of the head and neck, that worn by the men of the towns and villages is a fabric about a yard square of the finest white silk, usually edged with bright stripes, and called a kefiyyeh.

The corresponding art. of female dress is the graceful outdoor veil for the head and neck, called a turhah.

This would connect קַנְיָה with קַנְיָה, and the Arab. kubba'ah 'cowl.' According to this interpretation, a survival of the article in a modified form may be seen in the drapery that droops in light loose folds from the high turban of the Oriental priest; and, by its connexion with the monk's hood and the conventual veil, is still among the insignia of priestly dress. (See DRESS.) G. M. MACKIE.

TURBAN OF ORIENTAL (GREEK) PRIEST.

BOOK.—See WRITING.

BOOTH.—At the season when the fruits of field and orchard are ripening, the Syrian peasant often finds it prudent to leave his home in the village and take up his abode for a time in 'the portion of the field' belonging to him, for the double purpose of guarding his produce against ill-disposed neighbours, and of more effectively carrying on the work of the grain and fruit harvests. To shelter him and his from the noonday heat and from the dews of night (cf. Is 4<sup>6</sup>), a small hut is hastily constructed of leafy branches from the nearest trees. Such an erection is called in Heb. ḥuppâ, by AV variously rendered 'booth,' 'tabernacle,' 'pavilion,' etc. Jonah's b. was of this description (4<sup>6</sup>), and so were those in which Jacob sheltered his cattle (whence the name Succoth), Gn 33<sup>17</sup>. The army in the field was similarly protected by booths, 2 S 11<sup>11</sup>, 1 K 20<sup>12, 16</sup> (RV 'pavilions').

In the East the custom still prevails, whereby the owners of small adjoining vineyards combine to secure the services of a watcher to protect the ripening grapes from robbers and wild beasts. For the more efficient discharge of his duty the watchman is provided with a more elaborate booth. Four stout poles are fixed in the soil a few feet apart; to these uprights four cross pieces are firmly secured, some six or more feet from the ground. Boards resting on the cross-pieces form the floor, while the roof is made in a similar way of boughs of trees or matting. In this elevated watch-tower the watchman spends his nights, gun in hand, the open sides allowing an uninterrupted view of the area to be observed. This is the 'b. that the keeper maketh' to which Job refers (27<sup>18</sup>), and the 'cottage (RV booth) in a vineyard' to which Isaiah compares the desolate daughter of Zion. See illust. under CUCUMBER. For booths as used at the FEAST OF TABERNACLES, see that article.

BOOTY.—See WAR.

BORDER OF THE GARMENT.—See DRESS, FRINGE. Borderer, 2 Mac 9<sup>28</sup> 'the princes that are borderers and neighbours' (οἱ παρακείμενοι). The word is now almost restricted in Eng. to those who dwell on the Border between England and Scotland. Here it is an accurate tr., in the sense of one whose country touches another's.

BORITH (2 Es 1<sup>2</sup>).—One of the ancestors of Ezra, called in 1 Es 8<sup>2</sup> Boccas, and in 1 Ch 6<sup>50, 61</sup>, Ezr 7<sup>4</sup> BUKKI (which see).

BORN, BORNE.—1. The Oxf. Eng. Dict. discovers 43 different senses in which the verb 'to bear' is used; the last being 'to give birth to,' spoken of female mammals, and esp. women. The past ptep. of this verb is either 'borne' or 'born' (rarely 'bore'), and these forms were at first used indiscriminately for all the senses of the verb. About 1660 'borne' was generally abandoned, and 'born' retained in all senses. But about 1775 'borne' was re-established and used for all the senses of the verb but one, 'born' being restricted to 'brought into the world.' And 'born' is even in that restricted sense confined to the passive voice and a kind of neuter signification; it is not used when the mother is spoken of.

'Borne' was the invariable spelling of 1611, but later edd. and printers introduced 'born' wherever the meaning is 'brought forth.' RV has carefully restored 'borne' wherever the signification is active; thus Gn 21<sup>3</sup> 'his son that was born unto him,' AV and RV; but 21<sup>7</sup> 'I have born him a son in his old age,' RV 'borne'. See also HOMEBORN.

3. In 1 Co 15<sup>8</sup> 'one b. out of due time,' the Gr. is a single word, ἐκτρώμα, an untimely birth, an abortion.*

BOSOM.—See ABRAHAM'S BOSOM.

BOSOR (Βοσόρ), 1 Mac 5<sup>26, 36</sup>.—A town in Gilead. The site is uncertain.

BOSORA (Βοσώρα), 1 Mac 5<sup>26, 28</sup>.—Mentioned with Bosor. Apparently the great city of Bozrah—the Roman Bostra on the E. of Bashan, which is not mentioned in the Bible. C. R. CONDER.

BOSS (Job 15<sup>26</sup>).—Bucklers and shields were made of successive skins stretched over a frame, a layer of metal being superimposed on the whole. To break the force of a blow, metal studs or bosses were affixed in addition. ἀσπίδες ὀμφαλόεσσαι were known to Homer (Il. iv. 448). The Heb. word גִּבְבִּים gubbin, 'bosses,' properly means things rounded, e.g. the back of an animal or the fellow of a wheel. Possibly in Job 15<sup>26</sup> the true meaning is simply the convex (back-like) side of a shield, or again it might be the metal rim ('fellow'), 'thick,' perhaps, because threefold, as in the shield of Achilles (Il. xviii. 479, περὶ δ' ἀντιγὰ βάλλε φαεινὴν τρίπλακα).

BOTANY.—See PLANTS.

BOTCH, a swelling (the same word orig. as 'boss'), but confined to disease, an eruption in the skin, Dt 28<sup>27</sup> 'the b. of Egypt,' and <sup>36</sup> 'a sore b.' (קִרְבָּ, RV 'boil,' as elsewhere in AV Ex 9<sup>9, 10, 11</sup>, Lv 13<sup>18, 19, 20, 23</sup> [1611 'bile'], 2 K 20<sup>7</sup>, Job 2<sup>7</sup>, Is 38<sup>21</sup> [all]). See MEDICINE. J. HASTINGS.

BOTTLE (בִּטְיָה, נָבִי, נֶבֶךְ, אִיב, ἀσκάς; RV skin, wine-skin).—The multiplicity of names is suggestive of its manifold use, serving as a receptacle at once for a tear (Ps 56<sup>8</sup>) and a thunderstorm (Job 38<sup>27</sup>). The mention of bottle in connexion with the Gibeonites, Hagar, David, etc., refers to both pastoral and agricultural life (Jos 9<sup>3</sup>, Gn 21<sup>19</sup>, 1 S 25<sup>18</sup>). The bottle was a leathern bag made from the skins of the young kid, goat, cow, or buffalo. The largest ones were roughly squared and sewn up. The smaller were drawn off entire, thus retaining the shape of the animal with the legs removed. Those for holding water, milk, butter, and cheese usually had the hair left on, but for wine and oil the tanning had to be more thoroughly done. This was by means of oak-bark and seasoning in smoke, a process that gave a pitchy astringency of flavour to the wine contained in them. The distension that the leather underwent once, and once only, during fermentation, gave the parable that each age must interpret for itself with regard to the new treatment of new truths (Mt 9<sup>17</sup>, Mk 2<sup>22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>37</sup>).

The skin-bottle, being portable and unbreakable, was admirably suited for the deep stone-built well, the shepherd's troughs, and the encampment of the traveller in waterless districts. The carrying of water for sale for household purposes has often been an emblem of servitude, and is chiefly done by the aged and infirm. One of the characteristic figures in Oriental towns during summer is the man who sells from his dripping goat-skin the refreshing drink of iced-water flavoured with lemon, rose, or liquorice, temptingly clapping his brass cups, and crying 'Drink, drink, thirsty one' (cf. Is 55<sup>1</sup>). While the bottle is highly prized, and its water is a grateful necessity, the luxury of the East belongs to the spring itself, to the draught from the fountain of living waters. Hence the comparison at Jacob's well (Jn 4<sup>14</sup>), and the one blessed terminus of all the Shepherd's leading (Rev 7<sup>17</sup>).

BOTTOM.—1. Common enough for the deep of the sea, 'bottom' is used in Zec 1<sup>8</sup> for a deep place in the land, a valley: 'the myrtle trees that were in the b.' (RVm 'shady place,' Heb. TR שְׁטֵט, Baer שְׁטֵט; the pl. is used of the depths of the sea Jon 2<sup>6</sup>, of a river Zec 10<sup>11</sup>, and of miry places Ps 69<sup>2</sup>; see Wright on Zec 1<sup>8</sup>). Compare—

'West of this place, down in the neighbour bottom.'

Shaks. As You Like It, iv. ii. 79.

The word is still used locally in this sense. 2. The pl. 'bottoms' occurs Jon 2<sup>6</sup> 'I went down to the b. of the mountains' (שְׁטֵט, lit. 'a cutting off,' as AVm); Wis 17<sup>14</sup> 'out of the bottoms of inevitable hell' (ἐξ ἀδυσάτου ὕδου μυχῶν).

3. Bottomless Pit is the AV tr<sup>n</sup> of φάραγ τῆς ἀβύσσου, Rev 9<sup>1,2</sup> (RV 'pit of the abyss'), and of ἀβύσσος alone, 9<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>7</sup> 17<sup>8</sup> 20<sup>1,3</sup> (RV 'abyss'). See ABYSS.

J. HASTINGS.

BOUGH.—Dt 24<sup>20</sup> AVm, 'when thou beatest thine olive tree, thou shalt not bough it' (text 'thou shalt not go over the boughs again'). This is the only example of a verb 'b.' in this sense, and it has been missed by Oxf. Eng. Diet. It is formed directly from the noun in imitation of the Heb. (בֹּשֶׁת from בֹּשֶׁת a bough).

J. HASTINGS.

BOUGHT.—1 S 25<sup>20</sup> AVm 'in the midst of the b. of a sling.' The b. is the loop or 'bowed' part of the sling on which the stone was laid. Bow, as most modern versions of AV have it, was never used in this sense. 'Bout' is another spelling, as Milton, L'Allegro, 140—

'In notes, with many a winding bout
Of linked sweetness long drawn out.'

J. HASTINGS.

BOW.—1. In archery, see next article. 2. See RAINBOW. 3. Bow as a verb is of frequent occurrence, rendering many Heb. and Gr. words. Most usages are clear, but notice: 'Bow,' or 'bow the knee,' now obsolete or archaic, as Jg 5<sup>27</sup> 'At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay' (Moore, 'sank down, fell, lay still,' who explains that בָּרַךְ is properly 'bend the knees,' kneel, crouch, squat on the heels, said of a mortally wounded man whose knees fail under him, 2 K 9<sup>24</sup>); the same Heb. in Est 3<sup>2</sup> 'Mordecai b<sup>d</sup> nor did him reverence,' i.e. neither b<sup>d</sup> the knee nor fell prostrate; and in Ps 22<sup>29</sup> 'All they that go down to the dust shall b. before him,' which Del. explains: all that for want are ready to die (the 'dust,' עָפָר, being the grave), go down upon their knees, because they are esteemed worthy of a place at this table; and Is 45<sup>23</sup> 'unto me every knee shall bow,' quoted in Ro 14<sup>11</sup>, Ph 2<sup>10</sup> (κάμπτω). In Mt 27<sup>29</sup> 'they bowed the knee before him,' RV 'kneeled,' the Gr. is γονυπετώ from γόνυ, knee, and πτω, i.e. πτω, full. Of Gn 41<sup>43</sup> 'they cried before him, Bow the knee,' the Heb. אָסַף is separately discussed under ABRECH.

Besides 'bow the knee' we have bow the head, Is 58<sup>8</sup> 'to bow down his head as a rush,' Jn 19<sup>30</sup> 'he bowed his head and gave up the ghost'; bow the face, Lk 24<sup>5</sup> 'they were afraid, and bowed down their faces to the earth'; bow the back, Ro 11<sup>10</sup>; bow the shoulder, Gn 49<sup>18</sup> 'he bowed his shoulder to bear'; bow the neck, Sir 33<sup>26</sup> 'A yoke and a collar do bow the neck'; bow the loins, Sir 47<sup>19</sup> 'thou didst bow thy loins unto women'; bow the ear, 2 K 19<sup>16</sup> 'LORD, bow down thine ear (RV 'incline thine ear'), and hear'; and bow the heart, 2 S 19<sup>14</sup> 'he bowed the heart of all the men of Judah'; 'Bow the heavens,' a strongly transitive use, is found 2 S 22<sup>30</sup>—Ps 18<sup>9</sup>, and 144<sup>5</sup> (the Heb. is the common verb נָתַת, nātāh, to bend, and the figure is that J<sup>r</sup> caused the clouds to descend with Him as He descended to judgment). See BOWING.

J. HASTINGS.

BOW.—'Battle-bows,' so named (Zec 9<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>4</sup>), were probably of bronze (נְחֹשֶׁת nēhosheth), a metal harder than copper, being composed of copper and tin, different therefore from our brass, which is a mixture of copper and zinc. Such bows needed great strength to bend (Ps 18<sup>34</sup> RV, which, however, reads 'bow of brass.' Cf. 2 K 9<sup>24</sup>). Bows might also be made of two straight horns joined together (Homer, Il. iv. 105-111), or again of wood.

'A deceitful bow' is used (Ps 78<sup>57</sup>, Hos 7<sup>16</sup>) as a figure for a person who disappoints the hopes formed of him. A bow might be 'deceitful' through simply missing its mark, or through breaking, and so missing. Teucer's bow-string breaks (Homer, Il. xv. 463-465), and the arrow wanders from the mark. 'Deceitful' (רִמְיָה rēmīyah) might also be rendered 'slack,' so that possibly a badly-strung bow may be meant.

W. F. BARNES.

BOWELS.—1. Literally, as 2 Ch 21<sup>18</sup> 'the LORD smote him in his bowels (עֲוֵרָה) with an incurable disease'; * Ac 1<sup>18</sup> 'he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels (σπλάγχνα) gushed out.' 2. Figuratively as the seat of deep-felt emotions: (a) with נִפְּחַת—murmur or thrill, of affection or sympathy, Is 16<sup>11</sup> 63<sup>15</sup> (the cogn. subst. AV paraphrases 'yearning') Jer 31<sup>20</sup>, Ca 5<sup>4</sup>; (b) Ps 40<sup>8</sup> 'Thy law is in the midst of my bowels,' i.e. the object of my innermost affections; (c) of distressing emotions, Job 30<sup>37</sup> (see Davidson, ad loc.), La 1<sup>20</sup> 2<sup>11</sup> (lit. 'are in ferment'). See BODY and MEDICINE.

J. HASTINGS.

BOWING (עָבַד), Ps 62<sup>3</sup>, meaning bulged, burst, overthrown.—The ref. is to the effect of a sudden and heavy fall of rain, the 'overflowing shower' of Ezk 13<sup>11</sup> 38<sup>22</sup>, which in an hour sometimes converts a garden into a sheet of water. To obviate such pressure, garden walls in Syria are built with openings to let off the water.

G. M. MACKIE.

BOWL.—i. A vessel of this sort, a hollow dish in which to receive the milk of the flock and present the simple family meal, is indispensable for even the lowest stage of nomad life. For these purposes the primitive Hebrews, like the wandering tribes of to-day, doubtless used bowls of wood instead of fragile earthenware. It was in such a dish, 'a b. fit for lords' (AV 'a lordly dish'), that Jael offered Sisera a draught of sour milk (Jg 5<sup>26</sup>). The same word (בֶּשֶׂל, LXX λεκάδην, (A), λεκάδην), see Moore, Judges, pp. 164 f.) denotes the b. into which Gideon wrung the water from his fleece (Jg 6<sup>30</sup>). From both these passages it may be inferred that the בֶּשֶׂל was a dish of at least medium size; in Gideon's case it may have been of the porous earthenware (see POTTERY) which has been in use among the settled population of Canaan from the earliest times. Many specimens of this ware were found by the officers of the Pal. Expl. Fund, and more recently by Flinders Petrie and Bliss in the mound of Tell el-Hesi (see Petrie, Lachish, and Bliss, A Mound of Many Cities, passim).

ii. The large silver bowls presented by 'the princes of the congregation' (Nu 7<sup>18</sup>) have been mentioned under BASON. The same word (בִּקְיָה) is applied by Am (6<sup>6</sup>) to the large and costly bowls

* Cf. 2 Mac 95 of Antiochus Epiphanes: 'But the Lord Almighty, the God of Israel, smote him with an incurable and invisible plague; for as soon as he had spoken these words, a pain of the bowels that was remediless came upon him, and sore torments of the inner parts; and that most justly, for he had tormented other men's bowels with many and strange torments.'

used by the nobles of Samaria for their debauches. Jer. mentions a still larger b. (כִּיכָ, AV 'pot'—Gn 44<sup>22</sup> of Joseph's 'cup'), corresponding to the crater, from which the drinking cups (כִּסְמָה) were replenished (Jer 35<sup>5</sup>). The material was no doubt silver.

iii. In AV bowl is the rendering of נִבְיָע as applied to the cup (RV) or calyx of beaten work used as an ornament on the stem and branches of the golden candlestick (see under TABERNACLE).

iv. נֶבֶל Zec 4<sup>3</sup>, also in correct text of v.<sup>2</sup>, is the bowl or receptacle for oil in the candlestick of Zechariah's vision, and is used in the same sense with ref. to the 'lamp of life' (Ec 12<sup>6</sup>). It also denotes the bowl-shaped or spherical capitals of Jachin and Boaz (1 K 7<sup>41, 42</sup>, 2 Ch 4<sup>12, 13</sup>).

v. In Is 51<sup>17, 22</sup>, for 'dregs of the cup,' etc., RV renders 'b. of the cup' (קֶבֶץ כִּס); the second word, however, is best regarded as a gloss to explain the preceding unusual word. In Rev passim RV adopts 'bowl' as the equivalent of φιάλη (AV 'vial'). For other changes of RV (including נֶבֶל, AV 'basin,' RV 'bowl'), see BASON. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BOX.—In 2 K 9<sup>1, 2</sup> AV, a box (בֹּקֶס) of oil is mentioned, RV vial. In 1 S 10<sup>1</sup> it is said that Samuel 'took the vial (בֹּקֶס) of oil,' in 16<sup>1</sup> God's command to Samuel is 'fill thy horn (קֶרֶן) with oil.' It seems probable that horn is the true meaning, as, being closed at the tip, it could easily be sealed up at the other end and carried about. Perfume boxes (בֹּקֶס־שֶׁמֶן) are spoken of in Is 3<sup>30</sup> RV. In Van Dyck's Arab. tr. they are called hūnājir, the common word for small pots of earthenware for carrying ointments. In Mt 26<sup>7</sup>, Mk 14<sup>3</sup>, Lk 7<sup>37</sup> 'alabaster box (RV cruse) of ointment' (ἀλάβαστρον) is mentioned. The word used in Arabic is kārūrah, which may mean a small vase or jar of earthenware or other material. In Syria olive oil is often kept sealed up in small earthen jars. The word alabaster, though originally applied to vases made of that substance, seems to have been often used for a vessel containing an unguent without special regard to the material of which it was made. As the ointment referred to is said to have been very precious, it is probable that the vase may have been alabaster. The breaking refers, of course, to the seal, not to the vase. W. CARSLAW.

BOX TREE (תְּאֵשֶׁשׁ tēashshūr, λεύκη, κέδρος, Aq. Th. baasōip, buzus, pinus).—The only species of box found in Bible lands is Buzus longifolia, Boiss., which is a shrub from 2 to 3 ft. high. It does not grow south of Mt. Cassius, and it is unlikely that it did in historical times. It is improbable that it was at all familiar to the Hebrews.

The other trees alluded to in the three passages in which the tēashshūr is mentioned (Is 41<sup>19</sup> 60<sup>13</sup>, Ezk 27<sup>6</sup>) were familiar. They are the cedar, shittah (RV acacia), myrtle, fir, oak, pine (?). It is unlikely that an unfamiliar and insignificant bush would be associated with these, which, with the exception of the myrtle, the emblem of greenness and triumph, were all lordly trees, and familiar to those who heard the prophecy. Its name signifies erectness or tallness, which indicates that it also was a stately tree. Unfortunately, philology gives us no help in solving the question, as the word tēashshūr has not been preserved in the Arabic. The old Arab. VS gives sherbin, which is one name for the wild form of Cupressus sempervirens, L., the cypress. This is a stately tree, and every way suitable. There are a number of other fine evergreens in Bible lands, as the Cilician spruce, Abies Cilicica, Boiss.; the alpine juniper, Juniperus excelsa, L. (Arab. lizzāb); the large-fruited juniper, J. macrocarpa, Sibth. et Sm.; the plum-fruited juniper, J. drupacea, Lab.; any one of which would do for tēashshūr. It is useless to come to the LXX for light, as it translates the word in one passage λεύκη, the white poplar, and in another κέδρος, the cedar. The positive determination of the tree is hopeless. It would be better to transliterate it, as in the case of the algum, and call it the tēashshūr.

BOY.—See CHILDREN.

BOZEZ (בִּזְעַז, 1 S 14<sup>1</sup>).—A steep cliff on one side of the Michmash gorge opposite Sench. It seems to be the northern cliff, a remarkable bastion of rock E. of Michmash. The valley is precipitous, and the S. cliff is in shade during most of the day, while the N. is exposed to the noonday sun.

C. R. CONDER.

BOZKATH (בִּזְקָת).—A town of Judah, Jos 15<sup>29</sup>, 2 K 22<sup>1</sup>, in the plain near Iachish and Egion. Unknown.

BOZRAH (בִּזְרָה, 'a fortification').—There were several places of this name, and the effort to identify them has resulted in some confusion. In Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, ed. 1893, the letterpress rules out Bozrah in Haurān; yet a picture of this city is given as an illustration of Bozrah. Bozrah of Edom was a city of great antiquity (Gn 36<sup>33</sup>=1 Ch 14<sup>1</sup>). Its fate is identified with that of Edom (Is 34<sup>6</sup>, Jer 49<sup>13</sup>, Am 1<sup>12</sup>). It is referred to again in Is 63<sup>1</sup>, and probably in Mic 2<sup>12</sup>. El-Buseireh, 7 miles S.W. of Tufīleh, the ancient Tophel (Dt 1<sup>1</sup>), on the main road N. from Petra, suits the geographical conditions; but the ruins are insignificant. Another possible identification is Kusūr Bashair. These towers lie about 15 miles S.E. of Dibon (Dhibān), and more probably represent Bezer—בְּצֶר—'in the wilderness,' the city of refuge (Dt 4<sup>43</sup>), and the Bezer of the Moabite Stone. (See, however, BEZER.)

There remains the question of Bozrah in Moab (Jer 48<sup>24</sup>). Some (e.g. Dillmann on Deut.) identify this with Bezer; but the great city Bozrah esh-Shām in Haurān has also many advocates. This latter is certainly the Bosora of 1 Mac 5<sup>20, 28</sup>. The case for Bozrah rests chiefly on the identification of Umm el-Jemāl, 15 miles S., with Beth-gamāl, and El-Kuriyeh, 7 miles E., with Kerioth, named with Bozrah in this passage. Beth-gamāl, however, may be identical with Jemāl, 8 miles E. of Dibon, while Beth-meon is almost certainly Mu'in S.W. of Medeba. It is also contended that Bozrah being in the Mishōr, Bozrah is too far north. But Aphek is in the Mishōr; so probably was Bozrah, lying to the S.E. The cities of Moab, 'far and near,' are included in this judgment. Bozrah is just about the same distance from Nebo as el-Buseireh, viz. about 60 miles, and it may quite possibly have been in the hands of Moab at that time. W. EWING.

BRACELET (צַדִּיקָה, קֶרֶן, חֶסֶד, חֶסֶד, חֶסֶד).—The bracelet has always been a favourite ornament in the East. It is found of many designs: plain ring, flat band, of twisted wires, interlinked rings, and connected squares, solid or perforated, with or without pendants. Bracelets are made of gold, silver, copper, brass, glass, and even enamelled earthenware. While highly ornamental, they had, when in the possession of women, the further recommendation of being inalienable: not to be taken by the husband, nor seized for his debts.

The bracelet of Gn 38<sup>18</sup> is in RV 'cord,' referring probably to the cord of softly-twisted wool for the shepherd's head-dress. The bracelets of Ex 35<sup>22</sup>, RV 'brooches' (unoriental), were most likely nose-rings.

The bracelet appears, together with the crown, as one of the royal insignia in 2 S 1<sup>10</sup>. It is probable that in 2 K 11<sup>12</sup> also we ought, with Wellhausen and W. R. Smith (OTJC<sup>2</sup>, 311 n.), to read 'bracelets' (רַמְתָּיִם) for 'testimony' (תְּמִינָה). G. M. MACKIE.

BRAG.—Jth 10<sup>6</sup> 'He bragged' (ἐπεν, RV 'he said') that he would burn up my borders'; Sir 11 (heading) 'Brag not of thy wealth'; 2 Mac 9<sup>7</sup> 'he nothing at all ceased from his bragging' (ἀγροῦχλα, RV 'rude insolence'); and 15<sup>32</sup> 'with proud brags' (ἐμεγαλαῶχε, so RV). This is probably one of the undignified words in the Apocrypha of 1611, of which Scrivener complains. 'Even when their predecessor (the Bishops' Bible) sets them a better example, they resort to undignified, mean, almost vulgar words and phrases; and, on the whole, they convey to the reader's mind the painful impression of having disparaged the importance of their own work, or of having imperfectly realised the truth that what is worth doing at all is worth doing well'—Intro. to Camb. Paragraph Bible, p. lxxv. The word is still in use, and still somewhat undignified. J. HASTINGS.

BRAMBLE.—See THORNS AND THISTLES.

BRAN.—In Bar 6<sup>8</sup> 'The women . . . burn bran for perfume' (τὰ πίτρυα). See PERFUME.

BRANCH is the tr. in OT of a variety of Heb. words, of which those that chiefly concern us are —1. זֶרַע (from זָרַע 'trim' or 'prune'), used of the branch of a grape-vine, Nu 13<sup>23</sup>, Ezk 15<sup>2</sup>, and figuratively of Israel in Nah 2<sup>3</sup>. It is this term that is employed in Ezk 8<sup>17</sup>, where the words, 'They put the branch to their nose,' apparently describe some ceremony connected with sun-worship. Little, however, is known with certainty regarding the custom referred to, even if the text is not corrupt. (See commentaries of Smend and of A. B. Davidson, ad loc.) The same word also occurs in the phrase זֶרַע חֵטְא 'strange slips,' of Is 17<sup>10</sup>. See ADONIS. 2. נֶחֱלֶה, lit. 'sucker' Job 14<sup>7</sup>, used of Israel under the figure of a cedar Ezk 17<sup>22</sup>, an olive Hos 14<sup>6</sup>, a vine Ps 80<sup>4</sup> (RV 'shoot'), of the wicked under the figure of a tree Job 8<sup>16</sup> (RV 'shoot') 15<sup>30</sup>. Vigorous, widely-spreading branches are a symbol of prosperity (cf. Ps 37<sup>35</sup>, where the wicked man is spoken of as 'spreading himself like a green tree in its native soil'). 3. נֶחֱלֶה Job 15<sup>32</sup>, properly 'palm-branch' as in RV of Is 9<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>16</sup>, where 'palm-branch' and 'rush' are parallel respectively to 'head' and 'tail,' the rulers and the rabble (cf. Del. ad loc.). 4. רֶנֶּח, lit. a little fresh green twig, as in Is 11<sup>1</sup> 60<sup>2</sup>, Dn 11<sup>7</sup>. The word is used in the cde on the king of Babylon, Is 14<sup>19</sup>, where the words 'an abominable branch' (נֶחֱלֶה רֶנֶּח) apparently designate a useless shoot cut off and left to rot (cf. Jn 15<sup>6</sup> ἐβλήθη ἔξω ὡς τὸ κλῆμα καὶ ἐξηράνθη, 'he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered'). 5. נֶחֱלֶה. The chief interest of this term lies in its employment in Messianic prophecies. Instead of 'branch,' W. R. Smith and G. A. Smith prefer to render it 'spring.' RVm offers a choice amongst the renderings 'shoot,' 'sprout,' 'bud.' In the earliest passage where נֶחֱלֶה occurs with a Messianic reference, Is 4<sup>2</sup>, it has manifestly no personal sense. 'The spring of J', the God-given fruits of the earth, are the true glory of the remnant of Israel, the best of blessings, because they come straight from heaven, and are the true basis of a peaceful and God-fearing life' (W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, 329). The language both of Is 4<sup>2</sup> and of 11<sup>1</sup> seems to underlie Jeremiah's reference to the Messianic king as the 'Righteous Branch' (נֶחֱלֶה) or 'Branch of Righteousness' (נֶחֱלֶה נָכוֹן), Jer 23<sup>5</sup> 33<sup>16</sup>. נֶחֱלֶה reaches, finally, the rank of a personal name of the Messiah in Zec 3<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>12</sup> 'my Servant the Branch,' 'the man whose name is the Branch.'

6. נֶחֱלֶה is used repeatedly by P of the 'branches' of the golden candlestick in the tabernacle, Ex 25<sup>32</sup> 37<sup>18</sup> etc.

In NT four Gr. words are tr. 'branch.' 1. βάλαν, Jn 12<sup>13</sup> (cf. 1 Mac 13<sup>21</sup>). Palm Sunday is called in the Greek Church ἡ κυριακὴ τῶν βαλάν. 2. κλάδος, Mt 13<sup>32</sup> etc., used figuratively of descendants, e.g. of Israel as the 'natural branches,' Ro 11<sup>16</sup> 17. 18. 19. 21 (cf. Sir 23<sup>25</sup> 40<sup>12</sup>). 3. κλήμα, used especially of a vine-branch, Jn 15<sup>2-6</sup>, where Christ is the vine and His disciples are the branches. 4. σπῆδος, Mk 11<sup>8</sup>, a ἄπ' αὐτοῦ. It is remarkable that Matthew, Mark, and John, in describing Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerus., each use a different word for 'branch,' namely, κλάδος, σπῆδος, and βάλαν respectively. J. A. SELBIE.

BRAND. 1. Zec 3<sup>2</sup> 'a b. plucked out of the fire' (אֵשׁ אֵיל, perhaps orig. a bent stick used to stir the fire, Oxf. Heb. Lex.; tr. 'firebrand,' Is 7<sup>4</sup> 'these two tails [i.e. stumps] of smoking fire-brands'; and Am 4<sup>11</sup> 'a firebrand' [RV 'brand,' to keep up connexion with Zec] plucked out of the burning'). 2. Jg 15<sup>5</sup> 'when he had set the brands on fire' (רִמְתִּי, tr. 'firebrand' 15<sup>4</sup>). Samson's 'fire-brand' was a stick of wood wrapped with some absorbent material and saturated with oil (Moore, Judges, p. 311). It is the same Heb. word that is used of the 'lamps' (RV 'torches'), which Gideon's men carried in their pitchers, Jg 7<sup>16</sup>. The name of Deborah's husband, Lappidoth (Jg 4<sup>4</sup>), is a plu. of the same word. See LAMP. For Branding, see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

BRASS (נֶחֱלֶה, χαλκός).—Brass is composed of copper and zinc in the proportion of 2 of the former to 1 of the latter. The word is of frequent use in the Bible, but it is uncertain whether in any instance it means the alloy just described, as brass is very rarely found amongst the remains of early cities; while, on the other hand, weapons and implements of copper and bronze are abundant, associated with those of stone and, less frequently, of iron. The expression in Dt 8<sup>9</sup> 'a land . . . out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass,' shows that the word was used for copper. That the latter was worked largely in Arabia Petraea is well known (see MINES, MINING). The abundance of bronze, which is an alloy of copper and tin, amongst the early nations both of Asia and Europe is the more remarkable as tin is of rare occurrence; but its value in giving hardness and other qualities to copper was discovered more than 2000 years B.C. Thus knives, hatchets, hammers, spears, and other articles, both of copper and of bronze, have been discovered amongst the ruins of Chaldaea dating back to about B.C. 2286.* The use of copper, bronze, and other metals was known to the ancient Egyptians before the Exodus, and they appear to have understood the art both of hardening bronze and of making it flexible to a degree unknown to us.† The art of making bronze is clearly referred to by Homer in his description of the fashioning of the shield of Achilles by Vulcan (Il. xviii. 474, where copper and tin [χαλκός τε σίδηρος] are both melted in the furnace); and amongst the ruins of Troy, brought to light by the memorable labours of Schliemann, battle-axes, lances, knives, arrow-heads, and various ornaments both of copper and of bronze, were discovered, together with the moulds of mica-schist and sandstone in which some of these weapons were cast.‡ Copper and bronze cels have been discovered by di Cesnola

BIBLE REFERENCES.—In the Bible 'brass' (i.e. copper or bronze) is referred to both actually and symbolically; and it may be desirable to consider the passages under these two heads—

(A) Actual.—1. In Gn 4<sup>22</sup> Tubal-cain is described as the 'forger of every cutting instrument of brass and iron,' RVm 'copper and iron.' This is the earliest record of the use of these metals. Some doubt has been thrown by Evans on the word iron, and he suggests that it has been introduced at a later period during transcription, and that it does not necessarily belong to the age in which Tubal-cain lived.† 2. BRAVERY.—Although b. is used in the modern sense of courage as early as in any other, it had two other meanings which have now been lost. 1. Connected probably with 'brag' etymologically, it expressed boasting, as 'No Man is an Atheist, however he pretend it, and serve the Company with his Braveries'—Donne (1631); and esp. a military display, as 'The whole Campe (not perceiving that this was but a bravery) fled amaine'—Raleigh (1614), Hist. of World, iii. 93. 2. It expressed splendour, often passing into ostentation (so still locally), as 'The braverie of this world . . . likened is to flowre of grasse'—Tusser (1573). This is the meaning of b. in Is 3<sup>18</sup> 'the b. of their tinkling ornaments' (מְהִלָּה Amer. RV 'beauty'). Cf. Shaks. Taming of Shrew, iv. iii. 57—

'With scarfs and fans and double change of bravery.'

Bravely occurs Jth 10<sup>4</sup> ('Judith) decked herself bravely (εκαλλωπισατο σφόδρα) to allure the eyes of all men that should see her.' It is the general sense of 'finely,' 'handsomely.' Cf. Celia's jesting words in As You Like It, iii. iv. 43: 'O, that's a

BRAWLER.—To brawl in its earliest use, and till the beg. of the 17th cent., was simply to quarrel or fight (without the 'noisily and indecently' of Johnson); and this seems to be the meaning in AV. Brawl as subst. occurs Sir 27<sup>14</sup> 'their brawls make one stop his ears' (μάχη, RV 'strife'). Brawling as subst. Sir 31<sup>29</sup>; as adj. Pr 21<sup>9</sup> 25<sup>24</sup> 'a b. (RV 'contentious') woman' (עִיִּיִּץ נָקָה, trd 'contentious woman' 27<sup>16</sup>; cf. 'contentious man' 26<sup>21</sup>). Brawler occurs in AV 1 Ti 3<sup>3</sup>, Tit 3<sup>3</sup> (Gr. δμαχος, RV 'contentious'). RV gives 'brawler' for AV 'given to wine' 1 Ti 3<sup>3</sup>, Tit 1<sup>7</sup> (Gr. πῶποιος, RVm 'quarrelsome over wine').

BRAY.—There are two distinct words, and both occur.

1. To make a harsh cry, once used of horses and other animals (cf. Job 30<sup>7</sup> 'Among the bushes they bray,' spoken of Job's mockers who are 'dogs of the flock,' and Ps 42<sup>1</sup> Geneva Bible, 'As the hart brayeth for the rivers of water,' retained in AVm), now used only of the ass: Job 6<sup>3</sup> 'Doth the wild ass b. when he hath grass?'

2. To beat small, to pound, still in use but freq. (if not always) with ref. to its (only) occurrence in AV, Pr 27<sup>22</sup>, which is Coverdale's tr<sup>n</sup> (1535), 'Though thou shouldst bray a foole with a pestell in a mortar like otmeell, yet wil not his foolishnesse go from him.' Cf. Stalibes (1583), 'The word of God is not preached vnto them, and as it were braied, punned, interpreted, and expounded.'

A place that is broken, as Is 30<sup>13</sup>, 'a b. ready to fall' (perez); Lv 24<sup>20</sup> 'B. for b., eye for eye, tooth for tooth' (שֵׁבֶר shebher); or the gap that is 'thus made (the mod. use), as Am 4<sup>3</sup> 'Ye shall go out at the b.', every one straight before her' (perez); Jg 5<sup>17</sup> 'Asher continued on the seashore, and abode in his b.' BREAD (לֶחֶם lechem, ἄρτος).—i. A word used in the Bible in several senses—

2. The kind of food which comes forth from the earth, vegetable food, as in Job 23<sup>5</sup>, Is 30<sup>23</sup>, and 55<sup>10</sup>, contrasted with bēsar or flesh in 1 K 17<sup>16</sup>.

3. Lechem is used as the name of the miraculous food where-with the Israelites were fed in the wilderness, Ex 16<sup>4-22</sup>, called interrogatively 'manna' or 'what?' 'bread of heaven,' in Ps 105<sup>40</sup>. In Nu 21<sup>9</sup> this bread is called kikēl, 'mean or insignificant.'

such an abundance is promised to Asher as fatness of b. (Gn 49<sup>20</sup>). Personal poverty is described as want of b. (Is 51<sup>14</sup>, Lu 11<sup>1</sup>, 4<sup>4</sup>). Such poverty may be a punishment, as in the curse pronounced on the descendants of Joab (2 S 3<sup>29</sup>) and Eli (1 S 2<sup>36</sup>), or on the wicked in general (Job 27<sup>13</sup>), but may be due to misfortune, not crime (Ec 9<sup>11</sup>). The Psalmist, however, never found the children of the righteous in this plight (Ps 37<sup>25</sup>). The poor are described as 'wandering for b.' (Job 15<sup>23</sup>). Abstinence from b. may be the token of a vow, as in the case of David (2 S 3<sup>35</sup>); and the asceticism of John the Baptist is expressed by Christ by the phrase 'neither eating b. nor drinking wine' (Lk 7<sup>33</sup>).

5. The hastily prepared food offered to a stranger or wayfarer in token of welcome and hospitality is called b., as in Gn 14<sup>18</sup> 18<sup>5</sup>. So Joseph bade his servants 'set on b.' for his brethren (Gn 43<sup>9</sup>); and the witch of Endor thus entertained Saul (1 S 28<sup>22</sup>). For want of this hospitality, the Succothites were punished by Gideon (Jg 8<sup>13</sup>), and the Ammonites and Moabites were excluded from the congreg. of Isr. (Dt 23<sup>4</sup>, Neh 13<sup>2</sup>). Such hospitality was customary among the Bedawin (Is 21<sup>14</sup>), as all travellers have testified from Sinuhat (RP vi. 131) to Doughty (Arabia Deserta, 1885). Our Lord bade His apostles not to take bread with them, but to partake of hospitality on their missionary journeys (Lk 9<sup>3</sup>). On such occasions the host breaks the b. for his guests; so Christ did for the multitude whom He fed by miracle (Mt 14<sup>19</sup> etc.), and for His disciples at the Last Supper (Lk 22<sup>19</sup> etc.). So St. Paul acted as host to his shipmates during the storm (Ac 27<sup>3</sup>). Breaking of b. became the early name of the communion feast of the primitive Church (Ac 24<sup>36</sup> 26<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>16</sup> 11<sup>25</sup>). The breaking has special relevancy to the common form of the Jewish bread.

6. B. was the most convenient form in which to give food to the poor; hence giving (literally breaking) b. to the hungry is a common expression for the dispensing of charity (Pr 22<sup>27</sup>, Is 58<sup>7</sup>, Ezk 18<sup>16</sup>). To withhold this was a crime (Job 22<sup>7</sup>). In the judgment chapter of the Egypt. Bk. of the Dead (cxxx. 1. 38) it is said of the righteous man that he has given b. to the hungry; and this claim is occasionally found in funeral inscriptions (RP ii. 14). In Ps 132<sup>15</sup> God promises to satisfy the poor of His people with bread.

7. B. made from corn, being dry and portable, was the best food for a journey. With it Hagar was victualled for her return to Egypt (Gn 21<sup>14</sup>), and Saul when in search of the lost asses (1 S 17<sup>5</sup>). The Gibeonites imposed on Joshua by showing that their bread had become dry and crumbled. Nikkud signifies a crumb, and the nikkudim were crumbs rather than mould-points. LXX, however, renders it σπέρμιον, as also Theod. and Kimchi (Jos 9<sup>5</sup>).

8. B. was used to aid in eating soft food, so Jacob gave Esau b. with his pottage (Gn 25<sup>34</sup>), and Rebekah prepared b. for Isaac's savoury meal (Gn 27<sup>17</sup>). The ψαμίδιον given by our Lord to Judas was probably a sop of bread.

ii. The materials of which bread was made were barley, wheat, spelt, millet, and lentiles. (See articles under these titles.)

The best bread was made of wheat, חֵטֶה (Gn 30<sup>14</sup>), which when ground was called חֵטֶה or meal (Jg 6<sup>19</sup>, 1 S 12<sup>4</sup>, 1 K 4<sup>42</sup> 17<sup>12-14</sup>). In Egypt wheat was called hi or ha; when growing it was called ketti, and when cut and winnowed khakha. Several kinds were grown, the common (Triticum vulgare) and the many-eared (T. compositum), which sometimes has seven ears on a stalk (Gn 41<sup>6</sup>). Two kinds are distinguished by Jewish authors, the light-coloured and the dark (Peah 2<sup>5-6</sup>; see also Tristram, Land of Israel, 584). The word for an ear of corn, חֵטֶה, in the Ephraimite dialect was pronounced shibboleth (Jg 12<sup>6</sup>); in rabbinical writings shibboleth sho'al is used for Ægilops or wild oats, and shiphon for another kind of oats, which are not mentioned in the Bible. When full but not quite ripe, these ears were often roasted or boiled, the 'parched corn' of the Bible (Lv 23<sup>14</sup>, 1 S 17<sup>17</sup>, 2 S 17<sup>28</sup>), and called by the Arabs ferik (see also 2 K 4<sup>42</sup>), the best ears for the purpose being grown in highly cultivated garden-land (Lv 21<sup>4</sup>, Targ. Ibn Ganach). The word hitah in the singular usually means the cereal as growing, and is used in the plural for the cut and winnowed grain. It was sown either broadcast (Mt 13<sup>3</sup>) or in rows, שָׂרָה (Is 28<sup>25</sup>), translated 'principal' in AV. The wheat harvest was usually in May, and the grain was reaped with a sickle, as in Egypt (Dt 16<sup>9</sup>, Joel 3<sup>13</sup>, Rev 14<sup>14</sup>), and bound in sheaves, or cut off short by the ears in the Picenian mode (Job 21<sup>24</sup>; see Varro, de re rustica, i. 50), or pulled up by the arm (Is 17<sup>5</sup>, see also Peah, 4. 10, and Maundrell's Journey, p. 144). The sheaves, called חֵטֶה from being bound (Gn 37<sup>7</sup>, 1 S 12<sup>6</sup>), or חֵטֶה (Ru 2<sup>16</sup>), or חֵטֶה (Lv 23<sup>10</sup>, Dt 24<sup>18</sup>, Ru 2<sup>15</sup>, Job 24<sup>10</sup>) from being collected in bundles, were piled in heaps (חֵטֶה; Ex 22<sup>6</sup>, Jg 15<sup>5</sup>), and were carted to the threshing-floor (Am 2<sup>13</sup>; see AGRICULTURE), a flat, well-levelled surface in a high place, exposed to the wind, preferably the S. or S.E. wind from the wilderness, and therefore dry. Such threshing-floors were permanent landmarks (Gn 50<sup>10-11</sup>, 2 S 24<sup>16-18</sup>), on which the grain was trampled by oxen, or run over by a haruz (Is 28<sup>27</sup>), morag, or sledge (Is 41<sup>18</sup>, 2 S 24<sup>22</sup>, 1 Ch 21<sup>23</sup>), called morerj at the present day. Gideon, being afraid to go to a public threshing-floor, beat his grain with a flail in private (Jg 6<sup>11</sup>). The corn, winnowed with a fork and shovel or fan, was collected and stored in a cache, or underground chamber, or dry well with clay walls (2 S 17<sup>19</sup>, Jer 41<sup>8</sup>), or in an inner room. Thomson (Land and Book, i. 90) speaks of these underground receptacles as specially useful in protecting the grain from ants. It is remarkable that there is no reference to these grain cisterns in the Mishna. Barns or granaries were also used (Job 39<sup>12</sup>, Mt 13<sup>30</sup>, 1 K 3<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>18</sup>). The first sheaf cut was presented as a wave sheaf before the Lord (Lv 23<sup>10</sup>), and sometimes decorated with lilies and other flowers (Ca 7<sup>2</sup>. See for similar ceremonies Frazer, Golden Bough, i. 334). There were several qualities of wheat; that of Minnith being esteemed the best (Ezk 27<sup>17</sup>). Pannag, given as a place-name in AV, is rendered cassia in the LXX and millet in the Peshitta, but is left untranslated in RV. It was prob. some kind of aromatic or spice. Mielmash and Zandah were also famous for wheat, as was Ephraim, where the straw grew so long that the proverb 'bringing straw to Ephraim' = 'bringing coals to Newcastle' (Menach, 85. a. 5). The meal used in the offerings is called חֵטֶה, or finely ground (Ex 29<sup>20</sup>, Lv 2<sup>5</sup>, Nu 7<sup>12</sup> etc.), to distinguish it from the חֵטֶה or ordinary meal. The best is called heleb kilith hitah, 'fat of kidneys of wheat' (1 K 32<sup>14</sup>). This fine flour was the food of the wealthy (1 K 4<sup>22</sup>, 2 K 7<sup>1</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>13-19</sup>, Rev 18<sup>13</sup>).

Another material used in making bread was חֵטֶה (Ezk 4<sup>9</sup>), which is the Arab. dukhan. This was a smaller grain, probably dhurah (Sorghum vulgare), which is extensively grown in Bible lands, and used as a food-stuff by the peasantry. It is the chief cereal of the poor in Arabia; but dhurah bread is not generally relished by Europeans.

חֵטֶה or spelt (Triticum spelta) is another coarse grain, with coarse strong straw and prickly heads, often sown on the borders of barley fields to enclose them (Is 28<sup>25</sup>). See Surenhusius (Mishnah, Kilaim Amst. i. 121). The grains of spelt do not easily separate from the husk when rubbed in the hands, as do those of wheat (1 K 6<sup>1</sup>). It ripens later than barley, and so escaped the plague of hail (Ex 9<sup>22</sup>). The word is tr<sup>4</sup> 'rye' in AV in this place, and 'fitches' in Ezk 4<sup>9</sup>; but these are certainly incorrect. In LXX it is rendered olupa, which was in Greece used as food for horses (Homer, Il. v. 196). Ag. and Theod. tr. it zeta, which is a different species of grain, Triticum zea (Dioscorides, ii. cxi.; Theophrastus, HP viii. 1. 3; Sprengel, Geschichte Botan. p. 36). Ibn Ganach tr<sup>4</sup> it 'vetch.' zeta was also a cattle food, see Olyss. iv. 41. 604. LXX calls Elijah's cake (1 K 19<sup>6</sup>) oluritis. Herodotus says that the Egypt. bread was made of olyra (ii. 36. 77) and in the Book of the Dead spelt (bot) is the grain represented as growing in the fields of the under-world (cix. 5); but the monuments show that wheat was also a common food-stuff (Ex 9<sup>22</sup>). The genuine rye (Secale cereale) was probably not cultivated in Bible lands; it is called in Gemara neshman by a paronomasia on Is 28<sup>25</sup>.

Beans, בִּישָׁא, were used as an ingredient in bread (Ezk 4<sup>9</sup>), and were also eaten roasted or parched (חֵטֶה); see 2 S 17<sup>28</sup>. Lentiles, חֵטֶה, were also made into bread (Ezk 4<sup>9</sup>); the small red lentile or 'adas is still used for this purpose among the poorest classes in Egypt (Sonnini). Lentiles and beans were probably among the רָעוּסִים or 'pulse' on which Daniel and his companions were fed (Dn 1<sup>16</sup>); but the word means vegetables in general. The flamen dialis among the Romans was forbidden to use beans as food (Aulus Gell. Noct. Attic. 10. xv. 12).

iii. Bread-corn of any sort is called קֶרֶן, and this word is often associated with wine as descriptive of fertility (Gn 27<sup>28, 37</sup>, Dt 7<sup>13</sup> 11<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>4</sup> 28<sup>61</sup> 33<sup>28</sup>, 2 K 18<sup>32</sup>, 2 Ch 31<sup>5</sup> 32<sup>28</sup>, Ps 47, Is 36<sup>17</sup>, La 2<sup>12</sup>, Hos 2<sup>28, 22</sup> 7<sup>14</sup>, Hag 1<sup>11</sup>, Zec 9<sup>17</sup>, Jl 1<sup>10, 17</sup>, Neh 5<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>39</sup>). Grain when winnowed and stored is called קֶרֶן, as Gn 41<sup>35</sup> 42<sup>26</sup>, Pr 11<sup>26</sup>, Am 8<sup>5</sup>. This word is rarely used of grain on the stalk (as Ps 65<sup>9</sup> 72<sup>16</sup>), and in Jer 23<sup>28</sup> is used of grain as contrasted with the husk or straw. מְנוּחָה is also used in the Talmud to indicate the grain as distinguished from the straw (Sabb. 18<sup>1</sup>, Brn 6<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>). Standing corn was commonly distinguished as קֶרֶן.

Corn was prepared by bruising in a mortar or grinding in a mill; in the former case it is called רִפְּיָה, as in 2 S 17<sup>19</sup>, Pr 27<sup>22</sup>, where the point of the figure seems to be, that though the fool be associated with wise men he does not lose his characteristic folly. The mortar or maktesh and the pestle or eli were usually of stone.

The mills in common use were called מְחִימִין, the dual form referring to the two stones. They were in shape like the bradh or quern in use until comparatively recent times in the Hebrides and West of Ireland, and consisted of a nether millstone or sekeb, which was fixed, and convex on its upper surface, upon which the upper millstone or rekeb ('the chariot,' in Arabic the rakib, 'rider') rotated. In this was a central hole through which the grain was poured, while the stone was being rotated by means of a handle fixed in its upper surface, near its edge. The upper millstone is made of a porous unpolishing lava from the Hauran, while the nether (proverbially hard) is either of the same material, or else of compact sandstone, limestone, or basalt. The history and references to such mills are given at length in Goetz, de molis et pistrinis veterum; Hoheisel in Ugolini's Thesaurus, xxix. ; and Heringius, de molis veterum. The corn was daily ground by women (Mt 24<sup>41</sup>), usually by a pair of slaves (Ex 11<sup>5</sup>, Is 47<sup>2</sup>. Cf. Plantus, Mercat. ii. 3. 62; Odyss. xx. 105), who sat on the ground, facing each other, and worked together. Among the poor it was done by the wife (Shabbath vii. 2); hence the expression in Job 31<sup>10</sup> means to become another's concubine (cf. Ausonius, Epig. lxxi. 7, and the Horatian 'non alienas permolere uxores,' Sat. i. 2. 34). Captives were thus employed in grinding (Jg 16<sup>21</sup>).

Cessation of the noise of the mills was a sign of desolation (Jer 25<sup>10</sup>, Rev 18<sup>22</sup>). The sound of the grinding in Ec 12<sup>4</sup> may be the chant of the women (Odyss. xx. 105. 119; see also Aristoph. Thesmophor. 480). In later days mills became larger, and were moved by animal power, or wind or water, and grinding became a trade (Demai iii. 4). Asses are mentioned in rabbinical writings as used for this purpose, and an ass in a mill was a proverbial phrase (in Mischar hapenninim, quoted by Buxtorf, Florileg. Hebr. 309). The great millstone in Mt 18<sup>6</sup> is μῶλος δνικός, either a millstone turned by an ass (RVm), or else a nether millstone (Ludolf, in loco; see Hoheisel, p. 67; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in Luc. xvii.) called 'the ass,' because it bore the burden of the top stone.

The meal or flour, when ground, was next mixed with water, and kneaded into dough. In Egypt this was done by the feet (Herod. ii. 36) as represented on the tomb of Ramses III., but among the Jews usually in kneading-troughs (mishereth).

These were shallow wooden bowls (Ex 8<sup>3</sup>), which could easily be bound up in their clothes (Ex 12<sup>24</sup>). Harmer has conjectured that the word refers to a leathern bag or bread-wallet, often carried by the Arabs (iv. 366); but this is improbable. Bread-making was at first a family occupation, done by the wife (Gn 18<sup>6</sup>), the sister (2 S 13<sup>3</sup>), the female servants (1 S 8<sup>13</sup>) or other female member of the household (1 S 28<sup>24</sup>, Jer 7<sup>18</sup> 44<sup>19</sup>, Mt 13<sup>33</sup>). In later days baking became a trade (Hos 7<sup>4, 6</sup>); and in towns the breadsellers occupied a definite place in the bazaar, 'the bakers' street' (Jer 37<sup>21</sup>). This place may be referred to Neh 3<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>28</sup>, where the 'tower of the ovens' is mentioned, as tannur is used for a baker's oven in Lv 24<sup>11, 26</sup> 26<sup>10</sup>, Hos 7<sup>4</sup>. Josephus speaks of the bakers in Jewish towns (Ant. xv. ix. 2).

In the family, bread was baked daily as wanted, as it became tough and unpalatable when stale (Gn 18<sup>6</sup>). It has been conjectured that this daily preparation is referred to in the Lord's Prayer; but the petition rather refers to quantity than quality (for signification of ἐπιούσιον see Lightfoot, Revision, 195; and art. LORD'S PRAYER). The amount of a daily baking was an ephah (=3 seahs or measures of meal=4½ pecks), as in Gn 18<sup>6</sup>, Mt 13<sup>33</sup>, Jg 6<sup>10</sup>, 1 S 12<sup>4</sup>. Probably this was proportional to the size of the oven, and the amount was smaller in time of famine (Lv 26<sup>26</sup>). Salt was mixed with the dough (Ezr 6<sup>9</sup> 7<sup>22</sup>), which was then ready for the rapid preparation of unleavened bread or for leavening. In the latter case a small portion of old fermented dough, מֵצָה, was mixed with the kneaded dough or פֶּתַח (as in Ex 12<sup>34, 39</sup>). This rapidly induced panary fermentation in the whole mass, and 'raised' the bread, then called מֵצָה hametz or soured bread (Ex 12<sup>39</sup>, Hos 7<sup>4</sup>), as opposed to מֵצָה mazzoth or unleavened bread, so called because in flat cakes. The dough was usually left in the kneading-trough to ferment; and this took some time, during which the baker could sleep (Hos 7<sup>4</sup>), when he had left a low unstirred fire to keep it warm to encourage the process. Leaven was used as a symbol of that which is old (Schneider, Zeitsch. f. Theol. 1883, 333); and sometimes for that which is corrupt, the leaven of the Pharisees or of Herod (Mt 16<sup>6</sup>, Mk 8<sup>15</sup>, Lk 12<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>); or that which exercises a secretly dominating influence (Mt 13<sup>43</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>6</sup>, Gal 5<sup>9</sup>; see Petrus Chrysologus, Sermo xciv.). Leaven was prohibited in those offerings made by fire to the Lord (Lv 2<sup>11</sup> 7<sup>12</sup> 8<sup>2</sup>, Ex 29<sup>2</sup>, Nu 6<sup>15</sup>), as the sacrifice should consist of what is fresh and pure; but in such offerings as the peace-offering (Lv 7<sup>13</sup>) and the pentecostal loaves (Lv 23<sup>17</sup>) leavened bread might be used, for these were to be eaten by the priests. The use of leavened bread was prohibited during the Passover week; and all leaven was to be burnt before the 14th Nisan, as during the Theocracy the eating of leavened b. at this time was a capital offence, as was the burning of leavened b. in the daily sacrifice. Hence Amos sarcastically bids the Isr. increase their sin by offering leaven in the thanksgiving (4<sup>5</sup>). This idea of leaven being an emblem of corruption was known to the classics. Persius uses fermentum in this sense (1<sup>34</sup>); and A. Gellius (Noct. Attic. x. 15. 19) tells us that the flamen dialis was not allowed to touch flour mixed with leaven. Bread was sometimes fermented with wine-lees in place of leaven; see Pesachim iii. 1.

The first dough of the new harvest was made into a cake, and offered as a heave-offering (Nu 15<sup>20</sup>). This מֵצָה was leavened; some have supposed it to be coarse meal, but the rabbinical authorities understand it as leavened dough (see Halla). This offering is referred to in Neh 10<sup>37</sup> and Ezk 44<sup>30</sup>, where it is stated to be for the use of the priest; for superstitious uses of this see Otho, Lexicon Talm. under the word Challa, p. 495.

The cakes or loaves were usually flat and circular, a span in diameter, and about an inch thick; these are called, from their shape, כֶּרֶם (Ex 29<sup>23</sup>, Jg 8<sup>5</sup>, 1 S 10<sup>3</sup>, Pr 6<sup>20</sup>). In Jg 7<sup>19</sup> the word is כֶּרֶם (Kēthibh, for which Kēre has 5<sup>75</sup>); such cakes were like flat stones (Mt 7<sup>9</sup>, Lk 11<sup>3</sup>). Three such loaves were a meal for one person (Lk 11<sup>3</sup>), and one was prison fare (Jer 37<sup>21</sup>), or a charity dole (1 S 2<sup>36</sup>). At the average price of barley in NT times, as well as it can be estimated, 200 pennyworths of barley bread would have been about 5000 loaves—a mouthful to each of the multitude (Jn 6<sup>7</sup>). Abigail's 200 loaves, the fill of the pannier baskets of an ass, would serve for a reasonable feast for David and his men (1 S 25<sup>18</sup>, 2 S 16<sup>1</sup>). Other kinds of bread were כֶּרֶם, Nu 15<sup>20</sup>, Lv 8<sup>26</sup>, probably also cylindrical or round cakes; possibly these may be, as has been suggested, punctured cakes, the punctures being depressions made by the smooth pebbles in the oven (cf. the κόλλις of the Greeks; LXX renders cake in 2 S 6<sup>19</sup> 13<sup>6</sup> by κόλλις); כֶּרֶם, folded or rolled-up cakes, something like pancakes, supposed by some to be heart-shaped (2 S 13<sup>6</sup>), possibly a cake with aromatic seeds added as a carminative. For these finer cakes the dough was twice kneaded. כֶּרֶם were round cakes also (Gn 18<sup>6</sup>, 1 K 17<sup>13</sup>, Ezk 4<sup>12</sup>). כֶּרֶם, tr. cracknels (1 K 14<sup>3</sup> AV), were probably cakes sprinkled on the surface with aromatic seeds, like the barm-brack of the Irish (literally arven breac, spotted bread). The widow of Zarephath calls cakes by what was probably a provincial name, כֶּרֶם.

The methods of baking were various. The earliest mentioned is baking upon the hearth (Gn 18<sup>6</sup>), that is, on the heated stones of the hearth, the embers being drawn aside and around it. This was probably the Passover method (Ex 12<sup>23</sup>). Elijah's cake was baked on the hot embers (1 K 19<sup>6</sup>); so the bread in Jn 21<sup>6</sup>. B. thus baked was the ἐγκυρπίας ἄρτος of Hippocrates, as in LXX. The common method of baking in later times was in ovens, of which there were several kinds. Fixed ovens were commonly hollows in the floor, often of the principal room, about 4'×3', coated with clay, and heated by being filled with burning fuel. Such were possibly the כֶּרֶם of Lv 11<sup>36</sup>. Portable ovens, כֶּרֶם, were earthen or stone jars, about 3 ft. high, heated inwardly with wood (1 K 17<sup>12</sup>, Is 44<sup>16</sup>, Jer 7<sup>18</sup>) or dried grass and herbage, χόρτος (Mt 6<sup>30</sup>); in the absence of other fuel, dried camel dung or cow dung was used (Ezk 4<sup>12</sup>, 10). When the oven was fully heated the cakes were put in. Then dough was sometimes spread on the outside of the oven; and such a cake, like one baked on a hot hearthstone, requires to be turned, or else it remains raw on one side, while burnt on the other (Hos 7<sup>8</sup>). Ovens of both kinds are still in use in Bible lands. Sometimes cakes were baked in a pan or כֶּרֶם, which was a flat plate of metal or earthenware, like a 'girdle,' which could be made to stand on its edge (Ezk 4<sup>3</sup>). This was placed over the fire, with the cake laid upon it (Lv 6<sup>21</sup> 7<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ch 23<sup>29</sup>). Tamar's pan was כֶּרֶם, probably a deeper, concave one, out of which the cakes were poured in a heap (2 S 13<sup>3</sup>), like the τάγγων of Aristophanes (Eq. 929). The כֶּרֶם of Lv 27<sup>7</sup>, which is distinguished in the latter passage from the mahabath or flat pan, was probably some kind of shallow pot for boiling the meal for the offering, which is mingled with oil, and not a frying-pan, as in both RV and AV. A mess of food thus prepared is still known among some Bedawin tribes, and is called ftita. This may be the meal offering 'which is soaked' of 1 Ch 23<sup>29</sup>.

Unleavened bread was, and still is, made into thin flat cakes, כֶּרֶם (Ex 29<sup>2</sup>, Lv 24<sup>5</sup>); hence they are called wafers. In Ex 29<sup>2</sup> the cakes made with oil (ἀδάνα) are contrasted with the wafers anointed with oil. These were both made in or upon an oven (Lv 24<sup>5</sup>); a third kind, the fritta of the Latin writers, were made in a mahabath (27). Unleavened bread is called כֶּרֶם, as in Ex 12<sup>15</sup>, when contrasted with leavened bread irrespective of shape. All forms of bread were broken when being used,—not cut (Mt 14<sup>19</sup> 26<sup>26</sup>, Lk 24<sup>36</sup>, Ac 2<sup>42</sup>), the pieces being κλάσματα, broken pieces. It was smeared with olive oil (1 K 17<sup>12</sup>), as we now use butter; occasionally with honey, which was sometimes mixed in the dough (Ex 16<sup>31</sup>), as in the μελαττώματα of Dioscorides (4<sup>64</sup>), or the ceremonial πυραμοῦντες (Ephippus, Εφρηβ. 13). Butter as well as honey was used with bread (2 S 17<sup>20</sup>, Is 7<sup>10</sup>); but honey, being a fermentable substance, was prohibited in burnt-offerings (Lv 21<sup>1</sup>). In Egypt the forms of bread were equally varied; and in the picture of the baker's workshop referred to there are conical loaves, flat cakes, rolled-up cakes, and cakes spotted with seeds. In the list of offerings in the great Harris papyrus and other lists there are enumerated kelushtu (= hulloth), mes, san or sannu, funeral cakes; kiki or pyramids, like the kikkaroth; hebenn, or cakes for offering; baat, kemhu, hefa, and telet cakes. The commonest form was the conical, of which clay models were commonly placed in tombs as symbols of funeral food. Egypt. bread is represented monumentally as carried in baskets on the head of the baker, as in the chief baker's dream (Gn 40<sup>17</sup>). The words there used, כֶּרֶם, rendered 'white baskets' in AV, and 'baskets of white b.' LXX, Aq. Syr. and RV, is possibly the Egypt. kheru, used of the food for a funeral offering. For mode of carrying see Herod. ii. 35.

iv. Breaking bread was part of the funeral feast among the Jews, as among other nations (Jer 16<sup>7</sup> RV, Ezk 24<sup>17</sup>, Hos 9<sup>4</sup>). Thus the funeral feast for Abner was kept at Hebron (2 S 3<sup>36</sup>). The funeral feast is also mentioned in the apoc. Ep. of Jer (Bar 6<sup>31</sup>); and Tobit bids his son to 'pour out his b. on the burial of the just' (4<sup>17</sup>). For the Egypt. funeral feasts see Budge, The Mummy, p. 172; for other references see Garmannus, de Pane Lugentium, Ugolini, xxxiii. Sometimes coarse barley bread was used in these feasts, 'non pro deliciis apponitur sed tantum ut servilis fames relevetur' (Petrus Cellensis, Liber de Panibus, Migne, cclii. 917).

v. Bread formed part of certain offerings, as the pentecostal loaves, and the peace- and trespass-offerings, in which form it is called the b. of their God (Lv 21<sup>6</sup>). Most of this was eaten by the priests after being offered (Lv 21<sup>17</sup>, 21). The special b.-offering was the pile of shewbread (b. of the presence, כֶּרֶם, ἄρτοι τῆς προθέσεως, Ex 25<sup>30</sup> 35<sup>13</sup>, 1 S 21<sup>6</sup>, 1 K 7<sup>48</sup>), which was placed on a pure table of acacia wood in the Holy Place of the tabernacle, with frankincense (cf. Jos. Ant. iii. x. 7; Schürer, HJP ii. i. 235 f.). Twelve of these cakes, each made of  $\frac{2}{3}$  of a peck of flour, were placed in two piles, six in each pile, every Sabbath morning, 'on behalf of the children of Israel'; the old cakes being eaten by the priests in a sacred place, when the new cakes were brought in; and the frankincense was burned when the cakes were changed (Lv 24<sup>5</sup>). The duty of making these was laid on the sons of Kohath (1 Ch 9<sup>32</sup>). The table was covered with a blue cloth, and had on it certain dishes on which the cakes were set in order (Nu 4<sup>7</sup>). In the temple this table was overlaid with gold (1 K 7<sup>48</sup>). In 2 Ch 4<sup>19</sup> tables in the plural are mentioned. It was this holy b. which Ahimelech gave to David, contrary to the law (1 S 21<sup>6</sup>, Mt 12<sup>4</sup>). Probably the allowances, afterwards so liberally provided for the priests in the Priestly Code, were, during the troubled times of Saul, scanty, erratic, and often omitted; contrast the liberal temple allowance by Ramses III. in the Harris papyrus, LP vi. When the shewbread was reinstituted by Neh. a poll-tax of  $\frac{1}{3}$  shekel was laid on the Jews (Neh 10<sup>32</sup>, Mt 17<sup>24</sup>). In the corrupt days of the kingdom the table had become polluted, and it and its vessels were cleansed in the days of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29<sup>18</sup>, Ezk 44<sup>7</sup>); but in later days they were equally careless (Mal 1<sup>7</sup>). For further particulars and pictures see Abraham ben David, De Templo, Ugolini's Thesaurus, ix. p. 298, and the references; Otho's Lex. Talmud. sub voce, p. 496.

vi. The word Bread is used metaphorically: (a) As expressing the perquisites of an office (Neh 9<sup>15</sup>). (b) The legitimate spoil of conquest (Nu 14<sup>9</sup>). (c) Those who do not earn their livelihood are said to eat the bread of idleness (Pr 31<sup>27</sup>). (d) The profit of sinful courses is called the b. of wickedness (Pr 4<sup>17</sup>); and the short-lived advantages gained by falsehood are called b. of deceit (Pr 20<sup>17</sup>). Secret sin is compared to 'b. eaten in secret' (Pr 9<sup>17</sup>). (e) Suffering and sorrow are called eating the b. of adversity (Is 30<sup>20</sup>), or of affliction (Dt 16<sup>3</sup>, 1 K 22<sup>27</sup>, 2 Ch 18<sup>20</sup>), or of tears (Ps 80<sup>6</sup>). Sorrow is also expressed as eating ashes as bread (Ps 102<sup>9</sup>).

A. MACALISTER.

BREASTPLATE.—1. ḥoshen, a plate worn as part of the high priest's dress (see next art.). 2. ḥiryān, ḥōpāz. Both the Heb. and Gr. words probably described a cuirass rather than a simple breastplate. Such a cuirass as worn by the Greeks protected the back as well as the breast and stomach. In addition, it often gave protection to the neck and to the hips. It was well suited to suggest the many-sidedness of 'righteousness' (Is 59<sup>17</sup>=Eph 6<sup>14</sup>). Another form of the word, shiryōn, is usually rendered 'coat of mail.' The phrase 'coat of mail of righteousness' is awkward, but it is more accurate than 'breastplate of righteousness' in both places cited above. In 1 Th 5<sup>8</sup> faith and love form the ḥōpāz, perhaps with a hint at the two parts, front and back, of which it was usually made. The Rom. lorica (= ḥōpāz) was of various kinds. It was sometimes (a) a simple jacket of leather reaching to the middle of the thighs with double thickness at the shoulders, or (b) an arrangement of iron or brass rings which could be worn over a leathern jacket, or (c) a vest made of small metal plates overlapping one another, or, lastly, (d) when called segmentata it consisted of two broad pieces for the back and breast respectively, of five or six bands fastened on to the 'breast-plate' and 'back-plate' and running round the lower part of the body, and, lastly, of four such bands over each shoulder. The 'segments' are stated to have been of leather; and the fact that no broad plates of iron have been found among the many remains of Rom. armour which have been brought to light, is against the modern theory that the lorica segmentata was of iron. See also Polybius 'F' quoted under ARMOUR.

BREASTPLATE OF THE HIGH PRIEST.—The most important part of the distinctive dress of the high priest, according to the Priests' Code, was the pectoral or breastplate (ḥoshen, more fully ḥōpāz) "n, Targ. ḥōpāz (Arab. ḥuṣn ed-dīn, 'excellency of judgment') LXX λόγιον (var. λογεῖον) τῆς κλεψῶς or τ. κλεψῶς (but once περι- σῆθιον, Ex 28<sup>9</sup>), Vulg. rationale, r. judicii). The orig. signification of the Heb. word has been lost. Of the various suggested etymologies only two deserve mention. The one is Ewald's (Antiq. of Isr. p. 294), that ḥōpāz is 'a dialectic form of ḥōpāz, i.e. pocket,' etc. (from a root ḥōpāz to store up), hence ḥōpāz would probably mean 'the pouch of the oracle.'* The other possible root is ḥōpāz, Arab. ḥasan, to be beautiful, 'hence possibly ḥōpāz, either as chief ornament of ephod, or as the most excellent precious article of high priest's attire' (Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.).

The directions for the construction of the b. are given in Ex 28<sup>12-30</sup>, with which the parallel section 39<sup>6-21</sup> may be compared. The material was the same as that of the ephod (see EPHOD), the richest and most artistic of the textile fabrics of P ('of gold, of blue, of purple, and of scarlet, and of fine twined linen,' 28<sup>15</sup> RV). A cubit's length of this material was required, the width being a span or half-cubit; when folded in two, it formed a square, measuring a span each way. Into one of the faces of this square—henceforth to be the outer side of the b.—were inserted by means of gold settings, probably of filigree work, four rows of jewels, three in a row. The identification of these twelve jewels must start from the renderings of the LXX, and is still in some cases little more than probable (see art. STONES, PRECIOUS, also the Comm. in loco, and the literature infra, esp. the learned work of Braun, pp. 627-745). On each jewel was engraved the name of one of the twelve tribes of Israel. All that has been written as to the order in which the names were arranged is mere speculation. The whole, however, had a fine significance: for thus the high priest wore 'upon his heart the names of the children of Israel, for a memorial before J' continually' (28<sup>29</sup>).

The b. was kept in position by the foll. simple device. At the right and left top corners, respectively, of the outer jewelled square, was fixed a gold ring, through which was passed a gold chain, or rather cord (for it had no links) 'of wreathen work.' These chains were then passed over, or through, or otherwise attached to, a couple of gold ornaments (AV 'ouches')—probably rosettes (LXX ἀσπίδοι) of gold filigree—which had previously (v. 12) been fixed to the shoulder-pieces of the ephod in front. Similarly, at the right and left bottom corners of the inner square were fixed two gold rings, through each of which was passed a ribbon or 'lace of blue' (RV). Corresponding to these two rings on the b. were two of the same material, attached, like the rosettes above mentioned, to the shoulder-pieces of the ephod. Their precise position, however, is difficult to determine, owing to the want of clearness in the existing description of the ephod (Ex 28<sup>8-12</sup>). They may, perhaps, be best thought of as sewed to the shoulder-pieces of the ephod at points lower than the rosettes by the length of the chains and square, so that, in short, the rings of the ephod and those of the b. were in immediate contact, and fastened together by the blue lace.† The latter, in this way, would be entirely hidden by the b., which would account for the inferior material of the lower fastening compared with that of the upper. By this means the b. was securely held in its place, so that it should rest just 'above the cunningly woven band of the ephod' (v. 28). The main purpose of the b., there can scarcely be any longer a doubt, was to provide a receptacle for the sacred lot, the mysterious URIM and THUMMIM (wh. see). It should be added

* So Kautzsch, 'Orakel-Tasche.' Cf. λόγιον (oracle) of LXX.

† The latest representation, in Nowack's Archäologie, ii. p. 119 (from Riehm's HWB i. 402), cannot be correct. If the laces were attached so high as there represented, the b., so far from being kept from shifting, would fall forward every time the high priest had occasion to bend his body.

that the description of the b. by Jos. (Ant. III. vii. 5, and Wars, v. v. 7) must be used with caution.

BREATH.—See SPIRIT.

BREECHES (כִּטְמוֹת, perispermata, feminalia: for illustr. of last, see Rich, Dict. of Antiq.).—This is the name given to the undergarment ordered by Ezk (44<sup>18</sup>), and the legislation of P (Ex 28<sup>42</sup> 39<sup>28</sup>, Lv 6<sup>10</sup> 16<sup>4</sup>) to be worn on grounds of modesty (כִּטְמוֹת in above pass. is a euphemism, see under BATH) by the priests when engaged in the more solemn duties of their office. The b., more accurately drawers, were made of white linen, were very short, like our modern bathing drawers, reaching to below the loins and fastening round the waist. The Egypt. priests are said to have worn a similar garment (Wilkinson in Rawlinson's Herod. II. 113). Jos. gives a description of it as worn in his time (Ant. III. vii. 1. Cf. Kalisch on Ex 28<sup>4</sup>; Braun, De Vest. Sacerd. Hebr. 1680, lib. ii. cap. i. De כִּטְמוֹת Brachis Sacerdotum, with illustr. p. 450).

BRETHREN OF THE LORD.—The phrase 'brother' or 'brethren' of the Lord is used several times in the NT of James and other persons. There has been much controversy as to the actual relationship implied, whether we are to understand 'brethren' literally as meaning sons of the mother and reputed father of Jesus (the Helvidian view), or sons of Joseph by a former marriage (the Epiphianian view), or sons of Clopas or Alphaeus, the husband of a sister of the mother of Jesus (the Hieronymian view).

I think that any one reading these passages, without any preconceived idea on the subject, would naturally draw the conclusion that Mary was the true wife of Joseph, and bore to him at least four sons (James, Joseph, Judas, and Simon) and two daughters; that the sons were not included among the twelve apostles, but were, on the contrary, disbelievers in the Messiahship of Christ, and inclined at one time to entertain doubts as to His sanity, though after His death they threw in their lot with His disciples. Setting aside the apocryphal books of the NT, the earliest reference to this subject in the post-apostolic writers is found in Hegesippus (about A.D. 160). His testimony, preserved by Eusebius (HE iv. 22), is quite consistent with the conclusion to which we are led by the language of Scripture, while it is totally opposed to the Hieronymian view. It is to the effect that 'after the martyrdom of James the Just on the same charge as the Lord, his paternal uncle's child, Symeon the son of Clopas, was next made Bishop of Jerus., being put forward by all as the second in succession, seeing that he was a cousin of the Lord.' Cf. this with HE iii. 22, where Symeon is said to have succeeded the brother of the Lord as bishop, and c. 20, where Jude also is called brother of the Lord.

Tertullian (d. A.D. 220) is, however, the first who distinctly asserts that the 'brethren' were uterine brothers of Jesus. Arguing against Marcion, who had made use of the text, 'Who is my mother, and who my brother?' to prove that Christ was not really man, he says: Nos contrario dicimus, primo, non potuisse illi annuntiare quod mater et fratres ejus foris starent . . . si nulli illi mater et fratres nulli fuissent. . . . At vere mater et fratres ejus foris stabant. . . . Tum proximas personis foris stare, extraneis intus defixis ad sermones ejus . . . merito indignatus est. Transtulit sanguinis nomina in alios, quos magis proximos pro fide judicaret. . . . in semet ipso docens, qui patrem aut matrem aut fratres praeponeret verbo Dei, non esse dignum discipulum (Adv. Marc. iv. 19). Similarly arguing from the same text against the Marcionite Apelles, he says 'the words are not inconsistent with the truth of His humanity. No one would have told Him that His mother and His brethren stood without, qui non certus esset habere illum matrem et fratres. . . . Omnes nascimur, et tamen non omnes aut fratres habemus aut matrem. Adhuc potest et patrem magis habere quam matrem, et avunculos magis quam fratres. . . . Fratres Domini non crediderunt in illum. . . . Mater eque non demonstratur adhaesisse ei. . . . Hoc denique in loco apparet incredulitas eorum' (De Carne Christi, 7). As Tertullian in these passages gives no hint that the brothers of Jesus stood to Him in any other relation than other men's brothers do to them, or that His relationship to them was not as real as that to His mother, so in other treatises he takes it for granted that Mary ceased to be a virgin after the birth of Christ (De Monogamia, 8): Duae nobis antistites Christianae sanctitatis occurrunt, monogamia et continentia. Et Christum quidem virgo enixa est, semel nuptura post partum ('being about to defer her marriage union till after the birth of her son', lit. 'being about to marry first after her delivery') ut uterque titulus sanctitatis in Christi sensu dispungeretur per matrem et virginem et univiram; and in even plainer words (De Virg. Vel. 6), where he discusses the meaning of the salutation benedicta tu inter mulieres. 'Was she called mulier, and not virgo, because she was espoused? We need not, at any rate, suppose a prophetic reference to her future state as a married woman': non enim poterat posteriorem mulierem nominare, de qua Christus nasci non habebat, id est virum passam sed illa (illam?) quae erat praesens, quae erat virgo ('for the angel could not be referring to the wife that was to be, for Christ was not to be born of a wife, i.e. of one who had known a husband; but he referred to her who was before him, who was a virgin').

These words of Tertullian, himself strongly ascetic, which were written about the end of the 2nd cent., do not betray any consciousness that he is controverting an established tradition in favour of the perpetual virginity. And Origen (d. 253 A.D.), though upholding the virginity, and objecting to the phrase used above by Tertullian (quod asserunt eam nupsisse post partum, unde approbent non habent. Com. in Luc. 7), does not claim any authority for his own view, but only argues that it is admissible.* For the statement that the 'brethren' were sons of Joseph by a predeceased wife, he refers to two apocryphal books, dating from about the middle of the 2nd cent., as the authority for his view that the 'brethren' were sons of Joseph by a predeceased wife. One of these books is the Gospel of Peter, which, as we learn from Eusebius (HE vi. 12), Serapion, bishop of Antioch at the end of the 2nd cent., forbade to be used in a Cilician church, on the ground that it favoured the heretical views of the Docetae. The latter portion of this Gospel (of course not containing the passage referred to by Origen) was discovered in a fragmentary condition in Egypt a few years ago, the Editio Princeps being published in 1892. The other book to which Origen refers is still extant, the Protocangelium Jacobi. It contains the story of Anna and Joachim, the parents of Mary, of her miraculous birth and betrothal to Joseph to be her guardian, he having been designated for this honour, against his will, out of all the widowers of Israel, by the dove which issued from his rod. The names of Joseph's sons are variously given in the MSS as Simon, Samuel, James.

I think that these facts prove that the belief in the Perpetual Virginity, which was growing up during the 2nd cent. and established itself in the 3rd cent., was founded, not upon historic evidence, but simply on sentimental grounds, which may have gained additional strength from opposition to the Ebionites, who denied the miraculous birth of the Lord (Orig. c. Cels. v. 61). Even Basil the Great, who died in A.D. 379, in discussing the meaning of Mt 1<sup>20</sup>, still holds the belief in the Virginity, not as a necessary article of faith, but merely as a pious opinion.* It is unnecessary to give the names of others who held that the 'brethren' were sons of Joseph by a former wife. The chief supporter of this view is Epiphanius, who wrote against the Antidicomarianites about the year A.D. 370. The view of Tertullian was reasserted by Helvidius, Bonosus, and Jovinianus, about the year A.D. 380.

B. Jerome's answer to Helvidius, which fastened on the Western Church the doctrine of the Perpetual Virginity and the interpretation of 'brethren' in the sense of 'cousins,' appeared about the year A.D. 383. He begins by identifying James the Lord's brother with James the son of Alphaeus, one of the Twelve. Otherwise, he says, there would be three disciples called James, but the distinctive epithet minor attached to one of them in Mk 15<sup>40</sup> implies that there could be only two. Moreover, St. Paul calls him an apostle in Gal 1<sup>19</sup> 'other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother.' Again, in Mk 6<sup>3</sup> we find a James and Josès amongst the brethren of Jesus, and in Mk 15<sup>40</sup> we read that Mary, the mother of James and Josès, was present at the crucifixion; but in Jn 19<sup>25</sup> this Mary (whom, as mother of James, we know to be wife of Alphaeus) is called Mary of Clopas, sister of the Lord's mother. James is therefore the cousin of the Lord; the word brother being used for kinsman. Later writers carried the theory further by identifying Alphaeus and Clopas as double forms of the Aramaic Chulphai, and by identifying 'Judas of James,' who occurs in St. Luke's list of the apostles (Lk 6<sup>16</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>), with the writer of the Epistle (who calls himself 'brother of James'), and also with the brother of Josès, James, and Simon, in Mk 6<sup>3</sup>. Simon is further identified with Simon Zelotes, who is joined with James and Judas in the list of the apostles; and some hold that Matthew, being identical with Levi, son of Alphaeus, must belong to the same family. Bp. Lightfoot calls attention to the fact that not only does Jerome make no pretence to any traditional support for this view, but that he is himself by no means consistent in holding it. Thus in his comment on the Galatians, written about A.D. 387, he says: 'James was called the Lord's brother on account of his high character, his incomparable faith, and his extraordinary wisdom; but the other apostles are also called brothers (Jn 20<sup>17</sup>), but he pre-eminently so, to whom the Lord at His departure had committed the sons of His mother (i.e. the members of the Church at Jerusalem).' In a later work still, the Epistle to Hedibia, written about 406, he speaks of Mary of Cleophas (Clopas) the aunt of our Lord, and Mary the mother of James and Josès, as distinct persons, 'although some contend that the mother of James and Josès was His aunt.'

(1) In the above argument of Jerome it is assumed that the word 'brother' (ἀδελφός) may be used in the sense of cousin (ἀνεψιός, found in Col 4<sup>10</sup>). The supporters of this theory do not offer any parallel from the NT, but they appeal to classical use both in Greek and Latin, and to the OT. The examples cited from classical Greek are merely expressive of warm affection, or else metaphorical, as Plato, Crito, § 16, where the laws of Athens are made to speak of οἱ ἡμέτεροι ἀδελφοὶ οἱ ἐν Αἰδοῦ νόμοι. There is no instance in classical Greek, as far as I know, of ἀδελφός being used to denote a cousin. In Latin frater may stand for frater patruelis, where there is no danger of being misunderstood (cf. Cic. ad Att. i. 5. 1). The Heb. word is used loosely to include cousin, as in Gn 14<sup>14-16</sup> (of Abraham and Lot), where the LXX has ἀδελφοὶ; in Lv 10<sup>4</sup>, where the first cousins of Aaron are called brethren (ἀδελφοί) of his sons, Nadab and Abihu; in 1 Ch 23<sup>21-22</sup> ('The sons of Mahli, Eleazar and Kish. And Eleazar died, and had no sons, but daughters; and their brethren the sons of Kish took them') where also the LXX has ἀδελφοί. These passages seem to me to be hardly covered by the general rule laid down by Bishop Lightfoot (p. 281): 'In an affectionate and earnest appeal intended to move the sympathies of the hearer, a speaker might not unnaturally address a relation or a friend or even a fellow-countryman as his "brother"; and even when speaking of such to a third person he might through warmth of feeling and under certain aspects so designate him.' I think, however, the Bishop is entirely right when he goes on to say: 'It is scarcely conceivable that the cousins of any one should be commonly and indeed exclusively styled his "brothers" by indifferent persons; still less, that one cousin in particular should be singled out and described in this loose way, "James, the Lord's brother." If we remark, too, the care with which Hegesippus (quoted above) employs the term ἀδελφός of St. James and St. Jude, the brothers of the Lord, while he keeps the term ἀνεψιός for Symeon, the cousin of the Lord and second bishop of Jerusalem, we shall feel that there is a strong probability against the use of ἀδελφοί in NT to denote anything but brothers.

(2) Jerome's main argument is that James the Lord's brother was one of the Twelve, and therefore identical with James the son of Alphaeus. He grounds this assertion on a single passage in St. Paul, which I shall presently examine. Bishop Lightfoot and others have shown that it is not a necessary consequence of St. Paul's language, and that it is opposed to the distinction everywhere made in the NT between the brethren of the Lord and the Twelve. Thus in Ac 1<sup>14</sup>, after the list of the Eleven including James the son of Alphaeus, we read, 'these all continued instant in prayer' σὺν γυναιξίν καὶ Μαρίας τῇ μητρὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ καὶ τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς αὐτοῦ. Again, in Jn 2<sup>12</sup> we read that Jesus went down to Capernaum αὐτὸς καὶ ἡ μήτηρ αὐτοῦ καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ καὶ οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐκεῖ ἔμειναν οὐ πολλὰς ἡμέρας; and in Mt 12<sup>47-48</sup> 'One said to him' Ἰδοὺ ἡ μήτηρ σου καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ σου ἔσω ἐστήκασιν ζητοῦντές σοι λαλῆσαι . . . 'and stretching forth his hand to his disciples he saith' Ἰδοὺ ἡ μήτηρ μου καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοί μου ὅτις γὰρ ἂν ποιῇ τὸ θέλημα τοῦ Πατρὸς μου, τοῦ ἐν οὐρανοῖς, αὐτὸς μοι ἀδελφός καὶ ἀδελφὴ καὶ μήτηρ ἐστίν. In the last passage there is the same strong antithesis between natural earthly ties and His duty to His Father in heaven, which we observe in the words spoken by Him when found as a boy in the temple. Notice also that there is in this passage not only a distinction made between the brethren of Jesus and His disciples, but a certain opposition is implied, which is brought out more clearly in St. Mark's narrative of the same event (3<sup>21-35</sup>). From the latter it appears that the reason why they of His family (οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ) desired to speak with Him was because the rumour which had reached them of His incessant labours led them to believe that His mind was overstrained. As St. Mark goes on to say (v.<sup>22</sup>) that the scribes accused Jesus of casting out devils through Beelzebub, and as we further read in St. John (10<sup>20-8</sup>) that many said, 'He hath a devil, and is mad,' it would seem, though it is not expressly stated, that these calumnious reports of His enemies had not been without effect on some members of His own family. At all events, they went out prepared κατῆσαι αὐτόν, i.e. to put Him under some restraint. This narrative gives additional point to the words in Mk 6, spoken with immediate reference to the unbelief of the people of Nazareth, οὐκ ἔστιν προφήτης ἄνθρωπος ἐν τῇ πατρίδι αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐν τοῖς συγγενεῖσιν αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ αὐτοῦ. If it were simply the disbelief of townspeople not immediately related to Him, there seems no need for the addition 'in his own kinsfolk and in his own house.' This inference, which we naturally draw from the words of St. Mark, is confirmed by the express statement of St. John (7<sup>3-6</sup>), οὐδὲ γὰρ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ αὐτοῦ ἐπίστευον εἰς αὐτόν, and by our Lord's words addressed to them (v.<sup>7</sup>), οὐ δύναται ὁ κόσμος μισεῖν ὑμᾶς ἔμε δὲ μισεῖ, ὅτι ἐγὼ μαρτυρῶ περὶ αὐτοῦ ὅτι τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ πονηρὰ ἔστιν. Compare this with the words spoken shortly afterwards to the disciples (15<sup>19</sup>), εἰ ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου ἦτε, ὁ κόσμος ἂν τὸ ἴδιον ἐφίλει· ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου οὐκ ἔστε, ἀλλ' ἐγὼ ἐξέλεξα ὑμᾶς ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου, διὰ τοῦτο μισεῖ ὑμᾶς ὁ κόσμος.

The words on which Jerome lays stress are Gal 1<sup>18, 19</sup> ἀνῆλθον εἰς Ἱερουσόλυμα ἱστορῆσαι Κηφᾶν καὶ ἐπέμεινα πρὸς αὐτὸν ἡμέρας δεκάπεντε· ἕτερον δὲ τῶν ἀποστόλων οὐκ εἶδον, εἰ μὴ Ἰάκωβον τὸν ἀδελφὸν τοῦ Κυρίου. But even if we give its usual force to εἰ μὴ, it will not follow that St. James was included in the Twelve, for there can be no doubt that in Gal 1<sup>19</sup> ἕτερον looks backward to Κηφᾶν, not forward to Ἰάκωβον. The sentence would have been complete at εἶδον, 'I saw Peter and none other of the apostles.' Then it strikes St. Paul, as an afterthought, that the position of James, as president of the Church at Jerusalem, was not inferior to that of the apostles, and he adds 'unless you reckon James among them.' That the term 'apostle' was not strictly confined to the Twelve appears from another passage in which James is mentioned, 1 Co 15<sup>47</sup>. Here it is said that Jesus after His resurrection 'appeared to Cephas, then to the Twelve, then to above five hundred brethren at once, then to James, then to all the apostles,' where we should perhaps consider the term to include the Seventy, according to the view of Irenaeus and other early writers. At any rate there can be no doubt as to St. Paul's apostleship. Barnabas also is called an apostle (Ac 14<sup>14</sup>), probably also Andronicus and Junias (Ro 16<sup>7</sup>) and Silvanus (1 Th 2<sup>6</sup>).* The most natural interpretation of the two passages just dealt with is that which concedes the name 'apostle' in the wider sense to St. James, but makes a distinction between him and the Twelve.

(3) Scarcely less strong is the argument against the Hieronymian view drawn from what we read of the relation of the brethren of the Lord to His mother. Though, according to this view, their own mother Mary was living at the time of the crucifixion, and though there is nothing to show that their father was not also living, yet they are never found in the company of their parents or parent, but always with the Virgin. They move with her and her divine Son to Capernaum and form one household there (Jn 12<sup>12</sup>); they take upon themselves to control and check the actions of Jesus; they go with Mary 'to take him,' when it is feared that His mind is becoming unlinged. They are referred to by the neighbours as members of His family in exactly the same terms as His mother and His reputed father. It is suggested indeed that the Virgin and her sister were both widows at this time, and had agreed to form one household; but this is mere hypothesis, and is scarcely consistent with the remarks of the neighbours, who endeavour to satisfy themselves that Jesus was not entitled to speak as He had done, by calling to mind those nearest to Him in blood.

(4) That Mary of Clopas was the sister of Mary the mother of the Lord is not only most improbable in itself (for where do we find two sisters with the same name?), but is not the most natural interpretation of Jn 19<sup>25</sup> εἰστήκεισαν δὲ παρὰ τῷ σταυρῷ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἡ μήτηρ αὐτοῦ καὶ ἡ ἀδελφὴ τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ, Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ καὶ Μαρία ἡ Μαγδαληνῆ (translated in the Peshitta, 'His mother and his mother's sister, and Mary of Cleopha and Mary Magdalene'). If we compare this verse with Mk 15<sup>40</sup> and Mt 27<sup>56</sup>, we find that, of the three women named as present in addition to the mother of Jesus, Mary Magdalene occurs in all three lists; 'Mary the mother of James and Joseph' of the two synoptic Gospels is generally identified with 'Mary of Clopas'; and we then have left in Matthew 'the mother of the sons of Zebedee,' in Mark 'Salome,' and in John 'his mother's sister.' Salome is generally identified with 'the mother of the sons of Zebedee,' and there seems good reason also for identifying her with 'his mother's sister' in the Fourth Gospel. It does not seem likely that St. John would omit the name of his own mother; and the indirect way in which he describes her is very similar to the way in which he refers to himself as 'the disciple whom Jesus loved.' If we are right in this supposition, it is natural that the two sisters should be paired together, and then the two other Marys, just as we have the apostles arranged in pairs without a connecting particle in Mt 10<sup>3-4</sup>. If the sons of Zebedee were so nearly related to our Lord, it helps us to understand Salome's request that they might sit on His right hand and on His left hand in His glory, as well as the commendation by our Lord of His mother to one, who was not only His best-loved disciple, but her own nephew. If, however, this interpretation is correct, if the sister of the Lord's mother is not the mother of James and Joseph, but the mother of the sons of Zebedee, then the foundation-stone of the Hieronymian theory is removed, and the whole fabric topples to the ground.

(5) I take next two minor identifications, that of 'James the Less' with the 'brother of the Lord,' and that of Ἰουδᾶς Ἰακώβου, of Lk 6<sup>16</sup> and Ac 1<sup>13</sup>, with Jude the writer of the Epistle, who calls himself 'brother of James.' We have seen that Mary the mother of James τοῦ μικροῦ and of Joseph, in Mk 15<sup>40</sup>, is probably the same as Mary of Clopas, and that we have no reason for inferring from the Gospels that she was related to Jesus. If so, there is an end to the supposition that James the Less is James the brother of the Lord. But it is worth while to notice the mistranslation in which Jerome imagined that he found a further argument for the identification of our James with the son of Alphaeus. The comparative minor, he says, suggests two persons, viz. the two apostles of this name. But the Greek has no comparative, simply τοῦ μικροῦ, 'the little,' which no more implies a comparison with only one person than any other descriptive epithet, such as εὐεργέτης or φιλᾶδελφος. As to 'Ιούδας Ἰακώβου, no instance is cited for such an omission of the word ἀδελφός, and we must therefore translate 'Judas son of James' with the RV. Independently of this, if James, Judas, and Simon are all sons of Alphaeus, what a strange way is this of introducing their names in the list of the apostles, 'James of Alphaeus, Simon Zelotes, Judas of James'! Why not speak of all as 'sons of Alphaeus,' or of the two latter as 'brothers of James'? Why not speak of all as 'brethren of the Lord'? It is especially strange that, if Judas were really known as such, he should have been distinguished in John (14<sup>22</sup>) merely by a negative, 'Judas not Iscariot,' and in the other Gospels by the appellation 'Lebbeus' or 'Thaddaeus' (Mt 10<sup>3</sup>, Mk 3<sup>18</sup>).

C. We have still to examine two crucial passages which have to be set aside before we can accept either the Epiphanian or the Hieronymian theory: Mt 12<sup>4</sup> Ἰωσήφ . . . παρέλαβεν τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ καὶ οὐκ ἐγίνωσκεν αὐτὴν ἕως οὗ ἔτεκεν υἱόν, and Lk 27 καὶ ἔτεκεν τὸν υἱὸν αὐτῆς τὸν πρωτότοκον. Reading these in connexion with those other passages which speak of the brothers and sisters of Jesus, it is hard to believe that the evangelists meant us to understand, or indeed that it ever entered their heads that the words could be understood to mean, anything else than that these brothers were sons of the mother and the reputed father of the Lord. It has been attempted, however, to prove that we need not take the passages referred to in their ordinary and natural sense. Thus Pearson, treating of the phrase ἕως οὗ, tells us that 'the manner of the Scripture language produceth no such inference' as that, from a limit assigned to a negative, we may imply a subsequent affirmative; and he cites the following instances in proof. 'When God said to Jacob, "I will not leave thee until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of" (Gn 28<sup>15</sup>), it followeth not that, when that was done, the God of Jacob left him. When the conclusion of Deuteronomy was written it was said of Moses, "No man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day" (Dt 34<sup>6</sup>), but it were a weak argument to infer from thence that the sepulchre of Moses has been known ever since. When Samuel had delivered a severe prediction unto Saul, he "came no more to see him unto the day of his death" (1 S 15<sup>35</sup>); but it were a strange collection to infer, that he therefore gave him a visit after he was dead. "Michal the daughter of Saul had no child unto the day of her death" (2 S 6<sup>23</sup>); and yet it were a ridiculous stupidity to dream of any midwifery in the grave. Christ promised His presence to the apostles "until the end of the world" (Mt 28<sup>20</sup>); who ever made so unhappy a construction, as to infer from thence that for ever after He would be absent from them?' (Creed, Art. III. Chap. iii. p. 174).

It is difficult to believe that a man of Pearson's ability can have been blind to the difference between two kinds of limit, the mention of one of which suggests, while the mention of the other negatives, the future occurrence of the action spoken of. If we read 'the debate was adjourned till the papers should be in the hands of the members,' it as certainly implies the intention to resume the debate at a subsequent period, as the phrase 'the debate was adjourned till that day six months,' or 'till the Gr. Kalends,' implies the contrary. So when it is said 'to the day of his death,' 'to the end of the world,' this is only a more vivid way of saying in saecula saeculorum. In like manner the phrase 'unto this day' implies that a certain state of things continued up to the very last moment known to the writer: the suggestion is, of course, that it will still continue. The remaining instance is that found in Gn 28<sup>15</sup>.

This is a promise of continued help on the part of God until a certain end is secured. When that end is secured God is no further bound by His promise, however much the patriarch might be justified in looking for further help from his general knowledge of the character and goodness of God. To take now a case similar to that in hand: supposing we read 'Michal had no child till she left David and became the wife of Phaltiel,' we should naturally assume that after that she did have a child. So in Mt 12<sup>4</sup> the limit is not one beyond which the action becomes naturally and palpably impossible; on the contrary, it is just that point of time when under ordinary circumstances the action would become both possible and natural,* when, therefore, the reader, without warning to the contrary, might naturally be expected to assume that it did actually occur. Whether this assumption on the part of the reader, natural under ordinary circumstances, may become unnatural under the very extraordinary circumstances of the case, will be discussed further on. I confine myself here to the argument from language.†

The natural inference drawn from the use of the word πρωτότοκον in Lk 27 is that other brothers or sisters were born subsequently; otherwise why should not the word μονογενής have been used as in To 3<sup>15</sup> μονογενής εἰμι τῷ πατρί μου, Lk 7<sup>12</sup> 8<sup>42</sup> etc.? In Ro 8<sup>29</sup> the word is used metaphorically, but retains its natural connotation, πρωτότοκον ἐν πολλοῖς ἀδελφοῖς, and so in every instance of its occurrence in the NT. It occurs many times in its literal use in the LXX, e.g. Gn 27<sup>19</sup>, 22 43<sup>34</sup>, Dt 21<sup>15</sup>, 1 K 16<sup>34</sup>, 1 Ch 5<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>10</sup>, but, so far as I have observed, never of an only son. There are also circumstances connected with one remarkable episode in our Lord's childhood which are more easily explicable if we suppose Him not to have been His mother's only son. Is it likely that Mary and Joseph would have been so little solicitous about an only son, and that son the promised Messiah, as to begin their homeward journey after the feast of the Passover at Jerusalem, and to travel for a whole day, without taking the pains to ascertain whether He was in their company or not? If they had several younger children to attend to, we can understand that their first thoughts would have been given to the latter; otherwise is it conceivable that Mary, however complete her confidence in her eldest son, should first have lost Him from her side, and then have allowed so long a time to elapse without an effort to find Him?

D. There are, however, some difficulties which must be grappled with before we can accept the Helvidian theory as satisfactory. (1) If the mother of Jesus had had other sons, would He have commended her to the care of a disciple rather than to that of a brother? (2) Is not the behaviour of the brethren towards Jesus that of elders towards a younger? (3) The theory is opposed to the Church tradition. (4) It is abhorrent to Christian sentiment.

(1) Bishop Lightfoot regards the first objection as fatal to the theory. 'Is it conceivable,' he says, 'that our Lord would thus have snapped asunder the most sacred ties of natural affection?' (p. 272). The usual answer to this is that the disbelief of the Lord's brothers would naturally separate them from His mother. But as this disbelief was even then on the point of being changed into undoubting faith; and as the separation (if it ever existed, of which there is no evidence) was, at any rate, to be changed in a day or two into the closest union with all true followers of the Lord; and as the preparation for this change must have been long perceptible to the eye of Jesus, it seems necessary to find another way of meeting the objection, if it is to be met at all. I think, however, that Bp. Lightfoot goes a little too far when he speaks just below of this hypothesis requiring us to believe that the mother, though 'living in the same city' with her sons, 'and joining with them in a common worship (Ac 1st), is consigned to the care of a stranger, of whose house she becomes henceforth the inmate.' We have seen that there is reason for believing Salome to have been the sister of Mary, and John therefore her nephew; but however this may be, in any case, as her Son's dearest friend, he must have been well known to her. And if we try to picture to ourselves the circumstances of the case, it is not difficult to imagine contingencies which would make it a very natural arrangement. It is generally supposed (from 1 Co 9th) that the brothers of the Lord were married men: the usual age for marriage among the Jews was about eighteen: supposing them to have been born before the visit to the temple of the child Jesus, they would probably have married before His crucifixion. If, then, all her children were dispersed in their several homes, and if, as we naturally infer, her nephew John was unmarried, and living in a house of his own, is there anything unaccountable in the Lord's mother finding a home with the beloved disciple? Could this be regarded in any way as a slight by her other sons? Must they not have felt that the busy life of a family was not suited for the quiet pondering which now more than ever would characterise their mother? and, further, that this communion between the mother and the disciple was likely to be, not only a source of comfort to both, but also most profitable to the Church at large?

* Compare Plut. Qu. Conv. viii. 1; Diog. F. 29, quoted in Wetstein's note, in loco; Athenag. Apol. 33: ὡς γὰρ ὁ γίωργος καταβάλλων εἰς γῆν τὰ σπέρματα ἄμωτον περιμένει, οὐκ ἐπισπεύρει, καὶ ὅταν μέτρον ἐπιβουλίας ἢ παιδοποιΐας, Const. Apost. vi. 28. 5: οὐκ ἐπὶ μὲν ἱκανοποιούσας ἐμμελίζουσιν (ταῖς γυναῖκιν οἱ ἄνδρες), οὐκ ἐπὶ παιδῶν γὰρ γίνεσθαι ταῦτα ποιῶσιν, ἀλλ' ὁδεῖς χάριν. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. p. 543) calls this a law of nature.

(2) It depends more upon the positive age than the relative age of brothers, whether the interference of a younger with an elder is probable or improbable. When all have reached manhood and have settled in their different spheres, a few years' difference in age does not count for much. It might, however, be thought that those who had grown up with one like Jesus must have felt such love and reverence for Him, that they could never dream of blaming or criticising what He thought best to do. Yet we know that His mother, to whom had been vouchsafed a much fuller revelation than was possible in their case as to the true nature of her Son, did nevertheless on more than one occasion draw upon herself His reproof for ventured interference. If we remember how little even those whom He chose out as His apostles were able to appreciate His aims and methods up to the very end of His life, how different was their idea of the kingdom of heaven and the office of the Messiah from His, we shall not wonder if His younger brothers, with all their admiration for His genius and goodness, were at times puzzled and bewildered at the words that fell from His lips; if they regarded Him as a self-forgetting idealist and enthusiast, wanting in knowledge of the world as it was, and needing the constant care of His more practical friends to provide Him with the ordinary comforts and necessities of life. Thus much, I think, is certain from the known facts of the case; and we need nothing more than this to explain their fear that His mind might be overstrained, and their attempt to dictate the measures He should adopt in going up to the Feast, just as His mother had attempted to dictate to Him at their arriage at Cana.

(3) We have seen that, so far as we can speak of a tradition on this subject, it was in favour of the Epiphanian theory from about the end of the second century till it was unceremoniously driven out of the field by Jerome in the year 383: we have seen, too, that Jerome himself abandoned his own theory in his later writings. But it was so much in accordance with the ascetic views of the time, that it was adopted by Augustine and the Latin Fathers generally; while in the Eastern Church, Chrysostom, who, in his earlier writings, favours the Epiphanian view, comes round to Jerome in the later, and Theodoret may be mentioned on the same side. The later Greek Fathers are, however, almost all on the side of Epiphanius; and the Greek, Syrian, and Coptic Calendars mark the distinction between James the brother of the Lord and James the son of Alphaeus by assigning a separate day to each. This distinction is also maintained, apart from any statement as to the exact relationship implied by the term 'brother,' in the Clementine Homilies and Recognitions of the second cent., and the Apostolic Constitutions of the third.

Historical tradition, therefore, on this subject there was properly none when Jerome wrote, any more than there is now, but there was a growing feeling in favour of the perpetual virginity, which took definite shape in the title ἀειπαρθένος used of Mary by Athanasius; and the apocryphal fictions were eagerly embraced as affording a support for this belief.

We cannot doubt that those who were agitating for a stricter rule would make use of the example of the Virgin, insisting on the name as implying a permanent state, and would endeavour to give an artificial strength to their cause by the addition of imaginary circumstances to the simple narrative of the gospel. Thus it was not enough to suppose the brethren of the Lord to be sons of Joseph by a former wife; Joseph's age must be increased so as to make it impossible for him to have had children by his second wife, though this supposition contradicts what the upholders of this view maintain to be the very purpose of Mary's marriage, viz. to screen her from all injurious imputations. How could the marriage effect this, if the husband were above eighty years of age, as Epiphanius says, following the apocryphal Gospels? Again, if this were the case, why should not the evangelist have stated it simply, instead of using the cautionary phrases πρὶν ἢ συνελθεῖν and οὐκ ἐγινώσκεν αὐτὴν ἕως οὗ ἔτεκεν? But even this was not enough for the ascetic spirit. Further barriers must be raised between the contamination of matrimony and the virgin ideal. Joseph himself becomes a type of virginity: the 'brethren' are no longer his sons, but sons of Clopas, who was either his brother by one tradition, or his wife's sister's husband by another. Mary is made the child of promise and of miracle like Isaac, though not yet exalted to the honours of the Immaculate Conception; and we see Epiphanius already feeling his way to the doctrine of her Assumption, which was accepted by Gregory of Tours in the 6th cent. One other development may be noticed, as it is found in the Protevangelium, c. 20, though not mentioned by Epiphanius, viz. that not only the Conception but the Birth of our Lord was miraculous; in the words of Jeremy Taylor: 'He that came from His grave fast tied with a stone and signature, and into the college of the apostles, the doors being shut . . . came also (as the Church piously believes) into the world so without doing violence to the virginal and pure body of His mother, that He did also leave her virginity entire.* This miracle, superfluous as it is, and directly opposed to the words of St. Luke (2<sup>23</sup>), is yet accepted by Jerome and his followers, and the allegorical method of interpretation is pressed to the utmost in order to gain some support from the OT for the doctrine of the ἀειπαρθενία. Thus we find Pearson (Creed, p. 326) citing, as a proof of it, Ezk 44<sup>2</sup> 'This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened, and no man shall enter in by it; because the Lord, the God of Israel, hath entered in by it, therefore it shall be shut.' It would surely have been more to the point to cite the words of the Messianic psalm (69<sup>9</sup>): 'I have become a stranger to my brethren and an alien unto my mother's children'; this psalm being used to illustrate the earthly life of our Lord, both by St. John: 'The zeal of thy house has eaten me up; they gave me also gall for my meat, and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink'; and by St. Luke: 'Let their habitation be desolate.'

(4) We go on, however, to consider that which has been all along the real obstacle in the way of a literal acceptance of the Scripture narrative, viz. the objection on the ground of Christian sentiment. It is 'the tendency,' says Dr. Mill (l.c. p. 301), 'of the Christian mystery, God manifest in the flesh, when heartily received, to generate an unwillingness to believe that the womb thus divinely honoured should have given birth to other merely human progeny.' 'The sentiment of veneration for this august vessel of grace which has ever animated Christians . . . could not have been wanting to the highly-favoured Joseph.' 'On the impossibility of refuting these sentiments . . . the truly Catholic Christian will have pleasure in reposing.' So Epiphanius, Jerome, and other ancient writers speak of this as a 'pious belief,' and the same is reiterated by Hammond and Jeremy Taylor cited by Mill (p. 309). In answer to this I would say that, unless we are prepared to admit all the beliefs of the mediæval Church, we must beware of allowing too much authority to pious opinions. Is there any extreme of superstition which cannot plead a 'pious opinion' in its favour? Of course it is right in studying history, whether sacred or profane, to put ourselves in the position of the actors, to imagine how they must have felt and acted; but this is not quite the same thing as imagining how we ourselves should have felt and acted under their circumstances, until at least we have done our best to strip off all that differentiates the mind of one century from the mind of another. If we could arrive at the real feeling of Joseph in respect to his wife, and of Mary in respect to her Son before and after His birth, this would undoubtedly be an element of the highest importance for the determination of the question before us; but to assume that they must have felt as a monk, or nun, or celibate priest of the Middle Ages; to assume even, with Dr. Mill, that they fully understood the mystery 'God manifest in the flesh,' is not merely to make an unauthorised assumption, it is to assume what is palpably contrary to fact. Mary and Joseph were religious Jews, espoused to one another, as it is natural to suppose, in the belief prevalent among the Jews that marriage was a duty, and that a special blessing attached to a prolific union. To both it is revealed from heaven that the Messiah should be born of Mary by a miraculous conception. Joseph is told that 'his name is to be called Jesus, because he shall save his people from their sins.'

Mary is told, in addition, that 'he shall be called the Son of the Highest, and that the Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever.' There is surely nothing in these words which would disclose the Christian mystery 'God manifest in the flesh.' They point to a greater Moses, or David, or Solomon, or Samuel. Mary's hymn of praise is founded on the recollection of Hannah's exultation at the fulfilment of prophecy in the birth of her son. Her mind would naturally turn to other miraculous births, to that of Isaac under the old dispensation, to that now impending in the case of her cousin Elisabeth. And as there was nothing in the announcement made to them which could enable them to realise the astounding truth that He who was to be born of Mary was Very God of Very God, so there is nothing in the subsequent life of Mary which would lead us to believe that she, any more than His apostles, had realised it before His resurrection. On the contrary, it is plain that such a belief fully realised would have made it impossible for her to fulfil, I do not say her duties towards her husband, but her duties towards the Lord Himself during His infancy and childhood. It is hard enough even now to hold together the ideas of the humanity and divinity of Christ without doing violence to either; but to those who knew Him in the flesh we may safely say it was impossible until the Comforter had come and revealed it unto them. As to what should be the relations between the husband and wife after the birth of the promised Child there is one thing we may be sure of, viz. that these would be determined, not by personal considerations, but either by immediate inspiration, as the journey to Egypt and other events had been, or, in the absence of this, by the one desire to do what they believed to be best for the bringing up of the Child entrusted to them. We can imagine their feeling it to be a duty to abstain from bringing other children into the world, in order that they might devote themselves more exclusively to the nurture and training of Jesus. On the other hand, the greatest prophets and saints had not been brought up in solitude. Moses, Samuel, and David had had brothers and sisters. It might be God's will that the Messiah should experience in this, as in other things, the common lot of man. Whichever way the Divine guidance might lead them, we may be sure that the response of Mary would be still as before: 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word.' Even if the language of the Gospels had been entirely neutral on this matter, it would surely have been a piece of high presumption on our part to assume that God's providence must always follow the lines suggested by our notions of what is seemly; but when every conceivable barrier has been placed in the way of this interpretation by the frequent mention of brothers of the Lord, living with His mother and in constant attendance upon her; when He is called her firstborn son, and when St. Matthew goes into what we might have been inclined to think almost unnecessary detail in fixing a limit to the separation between husband and wife,—can we characterise it otherwise than as a contumacious setting up of an artificial tradition above the written Word, if we insist upon it that 'brother' must mean, not brother, but either cousin or one who is no blood-relation at all; that 'firstborn' does not imply other children subsequently born; that the limit fixed to separation does not imply subsequent union?

* Chrys. Hom. cxlvi. (ap. Sulzer, ii. p. 806): ὁ Χριστὸς προήλθεν ἐν μήτρᾳ καὶ ἄλως ἡμῶν ἡ μήτρα. This was affirmed in the 7th Canon of the Council in Trullo towards the end of the 7th cent.

LITERATURE.—Fuller information may be found in Bishop Lightfoot's dissertation on the Brethren of the Lord, admirable alike for thoroughness, clearness, and fairness, which is contained in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, ed. 10, pp.

252-291. It is from him I have borrowed the terms Hieronymian, Epiphonian, Hekydian, to classify the main theories which have been put forward on the subject. He himself held the second theory. The first is advocated by Dr. Mill (Pantheistic Principles, pt. ii pp. 220-316), and in a less extreme form by Dr. P. Schegg (Jakobus, der Bruder des Herrn, München, 1883). The argument for the third is given in Credner's Einführung, Laurent's Neuest. Studien, Farrar's Early Days of Christianity, ch. xix., the articles 'Maria' and 'Jakobus' in Herzog's Encycl. f. prof. Theol., and the introduction to my Commentary on the Epistle of St. James, from which the present article is chiefly taken. J. B. MAYOR.

BRICK (טִבְנָה).—The usual material for building throughout all Eastern countries is mud brick. In rainless Egypt this is a perfect substance for walls, and the great defences of towns and sanctuaries were immensely massive walls of dried mud, up to 80 ft. in thickness. The same was used for arches and domes and for pillars, as in the great hall of 700 pillars of Akhenaten. In Babylonia as wide a use of mud brick is found, walls, ramparts, and zikkurats being entirely made of it, from the earliest Bab. age downward. In Persia, India, China, and Mexico, mud brick is a universal material; it has sheltered far the greater part of the human race, and the use of red or burnt brick is quite an exception in history. In Pal. mud brick was largely used in Amorite times, thick fortifications being made of it. The form was more like the Babylonian, being a square tile, whereas the Egyptians used a brick of our present shape. Throughout the Jewish period, mud brick was generally used, faced with stone jambs and lintels at the doorways, and plastered white all over. Such was the Egyptian method. In Philistia, down to the present time, the villages are of mud-brick houses domed, and the rainfall is absorbed by a thick crop of grass which grows on the roof, and is the pasture ground of the goats.

In the OT there is allusion to burning bricks for the tower of Babel (Gn 11<sup>3</sup>); and such burnt bricks were largely used in Babylonia, owing to the wetness of the soil and climate. They were very rare in Egypt until Roman times, but became general in the age of Constantine.

The brick-making in Egypt was a common occupation for captives, and the celebrated picture at Thebes of the foreign brickmakers, guarded by an Egypt. overseer, is very well known. The black Nile soil of the country is first dug down into a hole already made at any convenient spot near the water; it is then mixed with sufficient sand, if a good quality is desired, and with chopped straw, which is cut up thus by the threshing rollers used at harvest. Water is poured over it, and it is tramped into a smooth paste. Baskets of this paste are then carried out to the moulding ground, a smooth clear space near at hand. The moulder places his wooden mould on the ground, lifts a double handful of the mud, and drops it in, presses it down, and wipes off the surplus; he then lifts the mould frame by its handle, and leaves the brick on the ground to dry; the frame is then placed close to it, and another is moulded, until the ground is covered with bricks in regular rows. These remain for a week or more to dry in the sun, and are then ready for building. From the 18th to 21st dynasties the bricks for government buildings often bear a stamp of the king's name, and sometimes a special stamp naming the particular building for which they were intended. The wooden stamps for this purpose have been found, as well as the moulding frames.

In the celebrated question of the straw (Ex 5<sup>7-19</sup>), which has passed into an English proverb, there is something to be said on the Egypt. side. Straw was not by any means universally used, often plain mud and sand, or mud and pebbles, were used; and it was far more important to get the tale of bricks done than to be too particular about the straw. Next, the chopped straw regularly kept in stock and supplied (the tibn of the present day) is a very valuable cattle food, and the main support of animals during the inundation, as it is more sweet and grassy than Eng. straw. Hence to restrict its use for brick-making, and to require waste material, such as stubble, to be found, was quite customary; and many more bricks are to be seen made with waste than those containing good food tibn. We may note that the taskmasters were the Egypt. overseers, while the officers were Hebrews, chiefs of the gangs, held responsible for the quantity delivered. Considering the well-known character of the Hebrews (Nu 11<sup>4</sup> 21<sup>6</sup>), we must not take their grievances too seriously. They had at least in Egypt a good and full diet, by their own confession (Nu 11<sup>6</sup>), as good as, or better than, that of the Egypt. peasant of the present day.

BRIDE.—In patriarchal times the bride is commonly chosen, not by the bridegroom, but by his parents or friends, and they do not necessarily consult him. Abraham sends a confidential servant to find a bride for Isaac (Gn 24). Judah takes Tamar as a bride for his son Er (38<sup>6</sup>). Isaac instructs Jacob as to his choice (28<sup>7</sup>). And, in the absence of the father, Hagar takes a wife for Ishmael (21<sup>2</sup>). Where the bridegroom chooses, it is his father who makes the proposal, as in the cases of Shechem (34<sup>8</sup>) and Samson (Jg 14<sup>2-10</sup>). Whether the consent of the bride was usually asked, is not clear; Gn 24<sup>68</sup> is not evidence. Perhaps Rebekah was only asked whether she would go at once; it had been previously agreed that she was to go. And these patriarchal customs have not undergone much change in the East: a bride may know nothing of the bridegroom till the wedding.

The bride was commonly paid for; i.e. her father received money or service in return for his consent to part with her (Gn 31<sup>15</sup> 34<sup>12</sup>, 1 S 18<sup>25-27</sup> etc.). The bride herself received no dowry; and To 7<sup>14</sup> is the earliest mention of a marriage contract, which perhaps was of the nature of a settlement.

Betrothal was much more serious than 'engagement' is with us. Unfaithfulness on the part of the bride during the interval between betrothal and marriage was regarded as adultery, and might be punished with death (Dt 22<sup>23-24</sup>). She was to be stoned, not strangled; and this makes it probable that the 'woman taken in adultery' was betrothed and not yet married ([Jn] 8<sup>4-6</sup>). Nothing of the kind is found in Greek or Roman law, according to which betrothal was a mere promise on the part of the bride to marry the bridegroom, and did not create any legal obligation. There was no penalty for breach of promise (Smith, Dict. of Ant. 3rd ed. ii. p. 140a).

The main feature in the marriage ceremony, which was a legal formality rather than a religious rite, was the fetching of the bride from the house of her father to the house of the bridegroom or his father. Among the Greeks the bride prepared herself for the wedding by a bath; and at Athens the water for λουτρὸν νυμφικόν was taken from the fountain Callirrhoe. There is reason for believing that Jewish brides did the like, and that there is allusion to this custom (Ru 3<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 23<sup>40</sup>, Eph 5<sup>26, 27</sup>). If the last reference is correct, the allusion is very striking. At the wedding the bride wore a veil, which entirely covered her, a sash, and a crown. 'Attire' in Jer 2<sup>22</sup> prob. means the bridal sash (cf. Is 3<sup>20</sup> RVm, 49<sup>18</sup>), and kallah, the Heb. word for bride, is by some connected with the crown.* The bride remained veiled throughout; and thus Jacob did not detect the substitution of Leah for Rachel (Gn 29<sup>20-25</sup>). Embroidery, perfumes, and jewels were usual with those who could afford them (Ps 45<sup>8, 13, 14</sup>, Is 49<sup>18</sup> 61<sup>10</sup>, Rev 21<sup>2</sup>).

In the NT 'the bride' is the Church, and the bridegroom is Christ (2 Co 11<sup>2</sup>, Rev 19<sup>7</sup> 21<sup>2, 9</sup>, Mt 9<sup>15</sup>, Jn 3<sup>29</sup>); and in the Apoc. the bride is usually the ideal Church, the heavenly Jerusalem. But in Rev 22<sup>17</sup> we have 'the bride' used of 'the Church militant here on earth,' praying to her Lord to return to her. Here again, also, an apostate Church is regarded as a harlot (17<sup>1-6</sup>).

BRIDEGROOM.—Much that might be said under this head has been anticipated in the article BRIDE. To this day in the East the bridegroom has, as a rule, little to do with the choice of the bride. Love matches are rare, and in many cases are impossible. In the OT we see that where the son chose his own bride independently of his parents, his relations with the latter were not happy (Gn 29<sup>34, 35</sup> 27<sup>30</sup>). Jehoiada the priest chooses wives for the orphan king, Joash (2 Ch 24<sup>1</sup>, comp. 25<sup>18</sup>). The interval between betrothal and marriage might be of any duration, for the espousal of children to one another has always been common in the East; but a year for maidens and a month for widows seems to have been customary.

On the wedding day the bridegroom wore a garland (Ca 3<sup>1</sup>, comp. Is 61<sup>10</sup>) as well as the bride, and was often profusely perfumed (Ca 3<sup>3</sup>). Weddings commonly took place in the evening; and at the proper time the bridegroom sets out, along with his 'companions' (Jg 14<sup>11</sup>), the 'sons of the bride-chamber' (Mk 2<sup>19</sup>, Lk 5<sup>34</sup>), with lights (2 Es 10<sup>1, 2</sup>) and music (1 Mac 9<sup>39</sup>), to fetch the bride. She also is accompanied by companions, maidens, some of whom start with her from her father's house (Ps 45<sup>15</sup>), while others join the bridal party afterwards, all of them provided with lamps (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>). Thus they go to meet the bridegroom, who conducts the whole party to the wedding feast, which might last many days (Jg 14<sup>2</sup>, To 8<sup>19</sup>). The details of the ceremony would vary, esp. as regards magnificence; but there was not of necessity any religious rite. The essential act was the bridegroom's fetching the bride from her home to his. Of the custom of providing wedding garments for guests nothing is known with certainty (Mt 22<sup>11, 12</sup>), for Jg 14<sup>18</sup> is not in point; but rich clothing is in the East one of the commonest of presents. A bridegroom was exempt from military service between betrothal and marriage (Dt 20<sup>7</sup>), and for a year after marriage (Dt 24<sup>2</sup>, comp. Lk 14<sup>20</sup>). This points to the conclusion that in the case of adults the time of betrothal did not usually exceed a year.

For the relation of bridegroom to bride as typical of the spiritual relationship between J<sup>h</sup> and Israel, and between Christ and the Church, see the article BRIDE.

A. PLUMMER.

BRIDEGROOM'S FRIEND.—The Jewish custom of having a special 'friend of the bridegroom' (ὁ φίλος τοῦ νυμφίου) is alluded to only once in Scripture (Jn 3<sup>29</sup>), where John the Baptist is contrasting his own position with that of Christ. His disciples must not be jealous of the success of Christ, for Christ is the Bridegroom who is the possessor of the bride, while John is only the Bridegroom's friend, who prepares for the marriage, and has his reward in the joyous expression of the Bridegroom's satisfaction. The importance of the friend of the Bridegroom comes to an end when the marriage is over, but that of the Bridegroom continues to increase.

This 'friend of the bridegroom' must not be confounded with 'the sons of the bride-chamber' (οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφῶνος), who were very numerous (Mt 9<sup>15</sup>, Mk 2<sup>19</sup>, Lk 5<sup>34</sup>). Indeed any wedding guest might be included in the expression, or even any one who took part in the bridal procession. The 'friend' was somewhat analogous to our 'best man,' but he had far more onerous and delicate duties. Sometimes he took the place of a parent in negotiating the marriage at the outset. He was the chief agency of communication between the betrothed parties in the interval between espousals and marriage. He made the preparations for the wedding, and in some cases presided at the marriage feast. He conducted the married pair to the bridal chamber.

The custom of having groomsmen of this kind seems to have prevailed in Judaea, but not in Galilee. In this, as in other things, the customs of Galilee were more modest and simple. And it is worth noting that at the marriage in Cana of Galilee there is no mention of any Shoshebheyna or groomsmen, a point which confirms the accuracy of the narrative. The 'ruler of the feast' is evidently not the 'friend of the bridegroom,' for he compliments the bridegroom upon the pleasing surprise of excellent wine towards the end of the feast. Had he been the 'friend of the bridegroom,' the arrangements would have been his own, and his remark would have been different. When the Baptist speaks of the 'friend of the Bridegroom,' he is not in Galilee, and being a Judæan his language is in accordance with Judæan customs (see Edersheim, Life and Times of the Messiah, i. pp. 354, 355, and notes 663, 664).

The Talmud frees the 'friends of the bridegroom' and all the 'sons of the bride-chamber' from the duty of dwelling in booths at the Feast of Tabernacles. Almost everything is to give way to the duty of making glad the bridal pair. They are not to be made to fast or mourn; and if in the wedding procession they meet a funeral, it is the funeral that must turn aside.

John the Baptist came to make overtures from the Bridegroom to His people (οἱ ἔθνη), to prepare them for espousal with Him, to present them to Him when any were ready, to point Him out to them (Jn 1<sup>29-36</sup>). St. Paul claims to hold a similar office in reference to his converts. 'I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy: for I espoused you to one Husband, that I might present you as a pure virgin to Christ' (2 Co 11<sup>2</sup>). The time until the Second Advent is the interval between betrothal and marriage; and, until the marriage of the Lamb takes place, the apostle feels that he is in a large measure responsible for the conduct of the bride.

BRIDGE.—The word is not found in OT or NT (although LXX of Is 37<sup>23</sup> has kal lōgha ḡlōphav), occurring only in 2 Mac 12<sup>15</sup> AV, in connexion with the siege of Caspis by Judas. The rarity of the bridge was due to the foll. circumstances: (1) Rivers often served as tribal boundaries and military barriers. (2) Most of the streams were torrents in winter that were apt to sweep away bridges, and in summer were easily forded. (3) The roads on each side were not usually meant for vehicles, but were bridle-paths for such baggage-animals as camels, mules, and donkeys. Recent excavations have proved that at Nippur, in Babylonia, the arch of burnt brick was in use as early as 4000 B.C. (See BABYLONIA, p. 219<sup>b</sup>.)

BRIGANDINE (ἱστὶς siyōn, Jer 46<sup>4</sup> 51<sup>3</sup> AV).—A mail-shirt worn by a brigand, i.e. in its original sense, a light-armed soldier. RV has 'coat of mail.' See BREASTPLATE. W. E. BARNES.

BRIMSTONE (ἡψίς, hēps).—Sulphur is one of the most widely distributed of mineral substances. It occurs in combination with various metals, forming sulphurets and sulphates, and in combination with lime, producing gypsum; it is also found in all volcanic countries, often in a pure state and in large masses; as, for example, in Sicily, Italy, Volcano (one of the Lipari Islands), Teneriffe, Iceland, etc. The exhalations of volcanoes include, generally, sulphurous acid and sulphurated hydrogen, two gases which, if moist, readily decompose each other into water and sulphur. In Palestine sulphur is present in most, if not all, of the hot springs which break out along the valley of the Jordan and Dead Sea, while gypseous sands are abundant amongst the deposits which form the terraces of the valley, and were portions of the bed of the Jordan valley lake at a time when the waters of the Dead Sea stood at a level of several hundred feet above its present surface.* On the east side of the present lake there are several hot sulphur springs, the most important of which are the Zerka Ma'in (Callirrhoe) and Wady Ghuweir.† The former, described by Josephus,‡ has a maximum temperature of 143° F. according to Canon Tristram.§ On the western side of the Dead Sea there are several sulphur springs, sometimes rising at the margin of the waters, such as those of Shukif, near 'Ain Jidi, and S. of Wady Khuderah, and at Wady Maharat; all these have a high temperature.|| The Hammāmāt near Tiberias are well known, and are still largely used for the cure of rheumatism and other disorders. The temperature as determined by Anderson reaches 143° F.; the waters are highly sulphurous.¶ Next to the above the most important sulphur springs near the Jordan valley are those of the Yarmuk, N. of Umm Keis (Gadara), described by Robinson; ** the temperature reaches 109° F., and the remains of the Roman baths are still standing. There can be no doubt that the high temperature of the springs in the valleys of the Jordan and the Yarmuk is due to the passage of the waters through volcanic rocks belonging to late Tertiary periods which still retain some of their original heat at various depths below the surface; and, as Lartet observes, most of the springs on the east side of the Jordan rise from the great line of fault which ranges along the base of the Moabite table-land * (see ARABIA).

Brimstone is, besides in the narrative of Gn 19<sup>24</sup>, repeatedly referred to in connexion with denunciations of the wrath of God on the wicked, whether nations (Dt 29<sup>23</sup>, Is 34<sup>9</sup>) or individuals (Ps 11<sup>6</sup>). The extensive occurrence of sulphur in the depression of the Dead Sea indicates that this substance may have contributed towards the destruction of the Cities of the Plain.

BRING.—There are many obsolete or archaic uses of the verb 'to bring' in AV, of which the following deserve attention. 1. 'Bring on the way,' i.e. to escort, Gn 18<sup>16</sup> 'Abraham went with them, to b. them on the way' (ἡγῶν); Ac 21<sup>5</sup> 'they all brought us on our way . . . till we were out of the city' (προσέμειω, so Ac 15<sup>3</sup>, Ro 15<sup>24</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>16</sup>). Or 'to bring on one's journey,' Tit 3<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>6</sup> 'that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go' (προσέμειω, RV 'b. forward on my j.', as 3 Jn<sup>6</sup> AV, RV). Cf. Tourneur (1611) 'The skie is dark; we'll bring you o'er the fields.' Similar is the phrase 'to bring by a way,' Is 42<sup>16</sup> 'I will bring the blind by a way that they know not'; and cf. 2 S 7<sup>18</sup> 'thou hast brought me hitherto.' 2. Bring about occurs only twice, and not in the mod. sense of 'cause to happen,' but 'cause to come round' (Heb. 227), 1 S 5<sup>10</sup> 'they have brought about the ark of the God of Israel to us'; 2 S 3<sup>12</sup> 'to b. about all Israel unto thee.' Cf. Shaks. 3 Henry IV. II. v. 27—

'How many hours bring about the day?'

3. Bring again, in the sense of 'bring back,' is frequent (Heb. mostly הָשִׁיב). In Gn 14<sup>10</sup> 'b. back' and 'b. again' are used in turn, showing that the phrases were identical in meaning and indifferent in use, 'And he brought back (הָשִׁיב) all the goods, and also brought again (וַיָּשֶׁב) his brother Lot.' A favourite expression is 'b. again the captivity,' always of J<sup>r</sup> ('again' is used with the first person, Jer 30<sup>8</sup> 48<sup>17</sup> 49<sup>30</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>33</sup> 29<sup>14</sup> 39<sup>26</sup>, Jl 3<sup>1</sup>, Am 9<sup>14</sup>; 'back' with the 2nd and 3rd pers., Ps 147<sup>53</sup> 85<sup>7</sup>). 'Back' is omitted in AV, but introduced by RV, in Ec 3<sup>22</sup> 'who shall b. him to see (RV 'b. him back to see') what shall be after him?' See AGAIN. 4. Bring forth is the tr<sup>a</sup> of a great variety of expressions whose shade of meaning ought not to be obliterated. Notice esp. Is 41<sup>2</sup> 'bring forth your strong reasons,' the only example of the obsol. meaning 'to adduce,' 'express'; cf. More (1532) 'The places of Scripture whiche Helvidius broughte furtle for the contrarye.' 5. Bring up. Besides the use of this phrase literally, as 'to bring up out of Egypt,' Gn 46<sup>4</sup> 'I will go down with thee into Egypt; and I will also surely bring thee up again'; or 'up to Jerus.' in ref. to its height, 2 S 6<sup>15</sup> 'David . . . brought up the ark of the LORD with shouting,' Ezr 1<sup>11</sup> 'All these did Sheshbazzar bring up, when they of the captivity were brought up from Babylon unto Jerusalem'; or to the temple in ref. to its elevated situation, Neh 10<sup>38</sup> 'the Levites shall bring up the tithe of the tithes unto the house of our God'; or 'up out of the earth,' 1 S 28<sup>8</sup> 'and he (Saul) said, I pray thee, divine unto me by the familiar spirit, and bring me up whomsoever I

BROID, BROIDER.—1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup> 'with broided hair' (ἐν πλέγμασιν, 'in plaits'). RV gives the mod. spelling 'braided,' as AV in Jth 10<sup>8</sup> 'braided the hair of her head,' for Coverdale's 'broyded.' Cf.—

'Hir yelow heer was broyded in a tresse
Behind hire back.'

Broidered is given Ex 28<sup>4</sup> as tr. of תַּשְׁבֵּז tashbēz, 'a b. coat' (RV 'coat of chequer work'); and seven times in Ezk (16<sup>10. 13. 18. 26<sup>18</sup> 27<sup>16. 24</sup></sup>) as tr. of רִקְמָה riqmāh. 'Broid,' which means to weave or plait, and 'broider,' which means to adorn with needle-work (mod. 'embroider'), have no connexion in etymology or meaning (though they were often confounded in the 16th cent.), yet most mod. edd. of AV give 'broidered' for 'broided' in 1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>.

BROKENHEARTED.—Three words (mistakenly spelt with hyphen in mod. edd. AV) are (1) 'brokenfooted,' Lv 21<sup>19</sup>, (2) 'brokenhanded,' 21<sup>19</sup> (רָגַל, רָגַל, which Oxf. Heb. Lex. takes to mean fracture of the leg and of the arm), and (3) 'brokenhearted,' Is 61<sup>1</sup> (נִשְׁבָּרֵי לֵב), Lk 4<sup>18</sup> (συντρυμνός τὴν καρδίαν, exactly as LXX of Is 61<sup>1</sup>). BROOCH, Ex 35<sup>22</sup> RV.—See BRACELET, BUCKLE.

BROOK (נָחַל).—There is no absolute distinction between a brook and a river, except as regards size, and this distinction will vary with each country. Perhaps the only stream in Palestine to which the term 'river' is applicable is the Jordan; but in the AV the term is applied to a few other streams such as the Kishon (Jg 4<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>21</sup>; in 1 K 18<sup>40</sup> it is called a 'brook'), and the 'River of Egypt' AV (Wādy el-Arish), Nu 34<sup>5</sup>, is translated 'Brook of Egypt,' RV. נָחַל has no proper Eng. equivalent, 'brook' suggesting something too small. It corresponds exactly to Wady.

Palestine, regarded in the widest sense of the term, is remarkable for its 'brook' courses. Many of them, however, are now dry, or only occasionally contain water; but they testify by their depth and extent to the existence of a former period when the rainfall was much greater than it is at the present day. This observation applies especially to the valleys of the Sinaitic peninsula and the great limestone plateau, known as the Badiet et-Tih, extending from the southern limits of the territory of Judah along the Bahr es-Saba to the Sinaitic mountains. Most of the 'brooks' of Northern and Western Palestine are perennial (being fed in dry weather by the springs which issue forth from the limestone strata or other permeable formation, such as the basaltic sheets of the Haurān and Jaulān), and give rise to many fine streams, of which the Hieromak (Yarmūk) is the most important.

Western Palestine. The brooks of the region lying to the west of the Jordan valley take their rise near the centre of the plateau in springs, and thence descend to the shores of the Mediterranean on the one hand, or to the Jordan and Dead Sea on the other. The former commence with a rapid fall through deep and narrow channels, and then, on reaching the maritime plain, they follow a sluggish course to the sea-coast. It is otherwise, however, with the brooks entering the Jordanic valley; for, in consequence of their sources being less distant from their outlets than is the case with the Mediterranean tributaries, and the vertical fall being much greater, they have eroded their channels sometimes to extraordinary depths, and issue forth on the Jordanic plain through ravines bounded by lofty walls of rock which are continuous with the cliffs and escarpments forming the margin of the plain itself. As examples of these may be mentioned (a) the Wādy el-Aujeh, which has its source at a height of about 3000 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, and descends to its outlet in the Jordan valley to a depth of 1200 feet below the same plane; the total fall being 4200 feet within a distance of about 15 miles, or at the rate of 280 feet per mile; (b) the Kelt, which, rising in springs at Birch (Beeroth) at a level of about 2800 feet, reaches the Jordan at a level of 1170 feet below the same plane within a distance of 21 miles; the fall being at the rate of 190 feet per mile; and (c) the brook Kidron (Wādy el-Nahr), which, rising at the Virgin's Fountain, E. of Jerusalem, at a level of about 2400 feet, enters the Dead Sea through the remarkable gorge of Mar Saba, at a level of 1300 feet below the same plane; the total fall being at the rate of 264 feet per mile. These examples will suffice to give some idea of the character of the brook channels to the east of the ridge, or plateau, of Western Palestine. Some of those that enter the Jordanic depression from the Moabite plateau pass through remarkably deep channels, of which the Callirrhōs (Zerka' Ma'in) and the Arnon (Mojib) are examples.

BROTHERLY LOVE.—Brotherly love (φιλὰδελφία) is the love which Christians cherish for each other as 'brothers.' The word 'brother' has, according to Grimm, four senses in the NT. It is (1) brother by natural birth, as in Mt 4<sup>18</sup>; (2) member of the same nation, as in Ro 9<sup>1</sup>; (3) fellow-man, as in Mt 5<sup>22. 24</sup>, though it may be questioned whether the sense is not in this passage and in Mt 7<sup>3</sup> fellow-citizen in the kingdom of God; and (4) fellow-Christian. The last sense is the prevailing and characteristic one in the NT. The people who call God 'Father,' and Jesus 'Lord,' call each other 'brother' and 'sister' (Ja 2<sup>15</sup>, Ro 16<sup>1</sup>). A collective name for the whole body from this point of view is ἀδελφότης, the brotherhood (1 P 5<sup>9</sup>). In 1 P 2<sup>17</sup> the commandment to honour all is followed by that to love the brotherhood. The verb used in this case, and in most similar cases, is ἀγαπᾶν; but the substantive for brotherly love is φιλὰδελφία. It is the fundamental and all-inclusive duty of Christians as related to each other. It goes back to express words of Christ, as in Jn 13<sup>35</sup> 'In this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.' In St. John's Epistles (1 Jn 2<sup>9ff.</sup> 3<sup>10. 14</sup> 4<sup>7. 11. 20</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>) it is made the criterion, both to Christians themselves and to the world, of the reality of their faith, 'we know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren.' In St. Paul's earliest Epistle (1 Th 4<sup>9</sup>) it is referred to as a thing which may be taken for granted among Christians: 'Concerning φιλὰδελφία you have no need that any one should write to you; for you yourselves are taught of God to love one another.' In other words, it is an instinct of the new nature

In the Epistle to the Romans (12<sup>10</sup>) St Paul bids Christians in their brotherly love be φιλάνθρωποι, i.e. love one another with the unforced natural affection of those who really are members of the same family. St. Peter in his first Epistle (1<sup>22</sup>) makes φιλadelphía ἀντιδρόμος, 'undissembled brotherly love,' the very end in view when believers sanctify their souls in obedience to the truth. To receive the divine message in the gospel is to consecrate the soul for a life ruled by love. The writer's own fervid spirit inspires his words when he adds, 'love one another from the heart ardently.' In the second Epistle (1<sup>7</sup>) φιλὰδελφία and ἀγάπη are combined to complete the garland of Christian virtues. φιλὰδελφία, the mutual love of Christians, is to be added to εὐσέβεια, since a religion which does not unite its devotees by bonds of reciprocal affection is fatally one-sided; and φιλὰδ. is to be supplemented by ἀγάπη, the love of the members in the household of faith for each other, by a larger love which excludes none. Wherever there is fellowship of life there must be fellowship of love as well. The tie is as real between man and man as between Christian and Christian, but in the nature of things it cannot be so close. Brotherly love will vary in its manifestations with the varying necessities of human life, but in He 13<sup>1-3</sup> ('Let φιλὰδελφία continue,' or 'abide') two modes of its manifestation are urged which were specially important in NT times. The first is hospitality. This was the more to be enforced on the Hebrews, because they might be tempted even by surviving religious scruples to shut their doors on those who were really their brethren in Christ though aliens to their traditions. But its importance as an element in φιλὰδελφία is shown also by such passages as 1 P 4<sup>9</sup>, Ro 12<sup>13</sup>. The other is assistance to persons enduring persecution for the gospel. The Hebrews are praised (He 6<sup>10</sup> and 10<sup>32-4</sup>) for what they have already done in this way; and here the duty is finally commended to them by the consideration that they themselves are also 'in the (a) body,' and therefore liable to the same calamities, and possibly soon to need the same consideration. The actual devotion of Christians to both these forms of brotherly love—hospitality and care of prisoners—is curiously illustrated in Lucian, De Morte Peregrini, § 12. 16. See Bleek on He 13<sup>1-3</sup>.

BROWN is used only in Gn 30<sup>32, 33, 35, 40</sup> (J) to describe certain of Laban's sheep (צֶהָלִים, RV 'black'). See COLOURS.

BRUIT.—Jer 10<sup>22</sup> 'the noise of the bruit is come' (רִמְמוֹם RV 'rumour,' Amer. RV 'tidings'); and Nah 3<sup>10</sup> 'all that hear the bruit of thee' (so RV, Amer. RV 'report,' Heb. רָמָם. Both Heb. words from רָמַם to hear). B. occurs also 2 Mac 4<sup>39</sup> 'the b. thereof was spread abroad' (φήμη, RV as AV); 8<sup>7</sup> 'the b. of his manliness was spread everywhere' (λαλέα, RV 'his courage was loudly talked of everywhere'). In all these places b. (which is the Fr. bruit from bruire to make a noise, roar) means simply report. The word is pronounced as brute, as indeed it was very often spelt. J. HASTINGS.

BRUTE, BRUTISH.—'Brute beasts' (2 P 2<sup>12</sup>, Jude v.<sup>10</sup>) is a more forcible tr. than the 'creatures without reason' of RV, and it is an exact rendering of the Gr. (ἀλογα ἑώα*); for 'brute' is from Lat. brutus heavy, dull, irrational. Cf. Lupton (1580), 'more senseless than the senselest or brutest beast in the world.' In the Pref. to AV occurs 'Bruit†-beasts led with sensuality.' In

† 'Bruit' was the spelling of AV ed. 1611 in 2 P 2<sup>12</sup>, but brute in Jude v.<sup>10</sup>.

2 P 2<sup>12</sup> Wyclif and Rheims NT have 'unreasonable beasts,' Tindale, Cranmer, Geneva, and AV 'brute beasts'; but in Jude v.<sup>10</sup> while Wyclif and Rheims have 'dumb beasts,' Tindale, Cranmer, and Geneva give 'beasts which are without reason.'

British is given in Ps 94<sup>8</sup>, Is 10<sup>11</sup>, Jer 10<sup>8, 14, 21</sup> 51<sup>17</sup>, Ezk 21<sup>31</sup> as tr. of the verb נָצַח bā'ar 'to be stupid'; and in Ps 49<sup>10</sup> 92<sup>9</sup>, Pr 12<sup>1</sup> 30<sup>2</sup>, to which RV adds Ps 73<sup>22</sup> as tr. of the noun נָצַח bā'ar 'brutishness.' The idea is thoughtless ignorance like that of beasts. J. HASTINGS.

BUCKET.—See under FOOD.

BUCKLE, or rather brooch (πόρπη, fibula), on the same principle as a modern safety-pin, by which the over-garment or wrap (χλαίνα, palla, sagum) was pinned at the shoulder. In the Rom. world presents often took the form of brooches (Plaut. Epul. v. i. 33; Mil. Glor. iv. i. 13), as presents of jewellery are made amongst us. The rewards for valour, distinguished service, etc., in the Rom. army, took sometimes the shape of brooches (Arch. Epigr. Mitth. iii. p. 51), which came to resemble modern epaulettes and served as military decorations. In the Western Provinces of the Rom. Empire golden brooches were common, and have survived to our day in great numbers. In the Oriental Provinces, however, as appears from 1 Mac 10<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>58</sup> 14<sup>4</sup>, only kings or king-priests were allowed the use of gold. This restriction of the use of gold (as of purple) is probably a survival of one of the 'royal and priestly' taboos, found all over the world. But, when taken up into the political system of the Empire, it produced a sort of Order of the Buckle, which may be compared with our Order of the Garter, though no myth was invented to account for the origin of the former.

BUCKLER (נֶזֶר māgēn).—The buckler was a round shield, small and easily carried, whereas the true shield, Heb. נָזַר zinnah (= thopels in Eph 6<sup>16</sup>), was large and oblong, sometimes carried by a bearer (1 S 17<sup>7</sup>), sometimes used as a screen behind which an archer might shoot against the defenders of a wall (Ezk 26<sup>8</sup>, where the tr. should be 'shall set up shields'). Polybius describes the shield as having a double framework of wood fastened together with glue and with a covering on the outer surface, first of linen and then of calf's skin. It had also round the edge, above and below, an iron rim, so that it could meet sword-cuts from above, or again be fixed firmly against the ground without injury (Polyb. vi. 23. Cf. the rest of the passage (a) quoted under ARMOUR).

It was this true shield, just described, which was carried by the legionaries, and to which St. Paul alludes: Eph 6<sup>16</sup> 'the shield of faith.' Cf. Ps 91<sup>4</sup> 'His truth is a shield and a buckler' RV, where, however, 'buckler' should be 'enclosing-shield,' סֶהֱרָה soherah, a synonym of zinnah. God's faithfulness meeting man's faith makes man's defence perfect.

BUFFET, a dim. from buff 'a blow' (still existent in blind man's buff), is (1) noun—a blow, as Jn 19<sup>3</sup> Wyc. 'thei gaven to hym buffattis,' and (2) verb—give blows, beat, as Pilgr. Perf. (1526) 259, 'When he was buffeted and beten for vs.' In AV the verb only is used, and always as tr. of κολαφίζω (Mt 26<sup>67</sup>, Mk 14<sup>65</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>11</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>20</sup>), which means to strike with the fist, a word found only in NT and later eccles. writers. RV gives 'buffet' as tr. also of ὑπωπιάζω in 1 Co 9<sup>27</sup> 'I b. my body' (AV 'keep under,' RVm 'bruise'). The same word is tr.<sup>d</sup> 'wear out' in Lk 18<sup>8</sup> 'Lest she wear me out by her continual coming' (AV 'weary me,' RVm 'bruise me'). It is an extremely forcible word, literally 'to give a blow beneath the eye' (ὤψ and δψ), then 'to beat black and blue.' (See Expos. Times, vol. i. p. 243; and Plummer, Luke in loc.).

J. A. SELBIE.

BUKKI (בֻּכִּי).—1. Son of Jogli, a prince of the tribe of Dan, and one of the ten men entrusted with the task of dividing the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel (Nu 34<sup>20</sup>). 2. Son of Abishua and father of Uzzi, fifth in descent from Aaron in the line of the high priests through Phinehas (1 Ch 6<sup>3, 5</sup>, Ezr 7<sup>2</sup>). In 1 Es 8<sup>2</sup> he is called Boccas, for which Borith is substituted in 2 Es 1<sup>2</sup>. It is doubtful whether he ever filled the office of high priest, as the statements of Josephus on the point are contradictory (Ant. v. xi. 5, viii. i. 3).

R. M. BOYD.

BUKKIAH (בֻּכְיָהוּ, full form of Bukki).—A Levite of the sons of Heman, and leader of the sixth band or course in the temple service (1 Ch 25<sup>4, 13</sup>).

BUL (בֹּל, Boḷā A, Bul, 1 K 6<sup>30</sup>).—See TIME. BULL, BULLOCK, WILD BULL.—See CALF and OX. BULRUSH.—See REED.

BULWARK.—1. (=bole-work, i.e. a defence made of the trunks of trees or of logs of wood) is the tr. of Heb. הֶלֶל, 'rampart' (Is 26<sup>1</sup>, הֶלֶל הַמִּגְדָּל wā-hēl, 'walls and rampart'; τεῖχος καὶ περικύκλος, LXX; murus et antemurale, Vulg.). Isaiah (l.c.) gives the paradoxical promise that God will appoint salvation, i.e. free space unconfined by walls (cf. for this meaning of 'salvation,' Ges. Thes. s.v. שָׁלוֹם=Arab. was'ā) to be Zion's walls and bulwarks (cf. vv. 2<sup>4</sup>, open gates and trust in God commended).

The hēl (1 K 21<sup>23</sup> 'rampart,' RV) with its ditch (bor, Jer 41<sup>9</sup>) was, as the VSS show, an outer defence for the wall. Jerusalem had such a hēl (Ps 48<sup>13</sup>), but only, no doubt, on the side on which the walls, not being on the edge of a precipice, needed extra defence. At the present day there would be room for such a work only on the N. and W. The Psalmist (l.c.), calls on the spectators to observe that not even the outer defences of Zion had been touched during the invasion of which he speaks.

2. Bulwarks (Dt 20<sup>30</sup> מִצְדֹּת māzōt, and Ec 9<sup>14</sup> מִצְדֹּת māzōdīm) are also the hasty defences raised by besiegers to protect themselves while attacking fortified places. Such defences were largely made of wood (Dt l.c.), and so were rightly called bulwarks. The 'bank' (Lk 19<sup>43</sup> χάραξ, 'palisade' RVm) served the double purpose of shutting in the besieged and of defending the besiegers.

BUNAH (בִּנְיָה, 'intelligence').—A man of Judah, a son of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2<sup>25</sup>).

BUNCH is used of (1) a bundle of hyssop, Ex 12<sup>22</sup> (בִּנְיָה= something tied together); (2) a cluster of raisins 2 S 16<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ch 12<sup>30</sup> (בִּנְיָה= something dried); and (3) a camel's hump Is 30<sup>6</sup> (בִּנְיָה, of uncertain origin). The last is the most original meaning of the Eng. word (which is also of uncertain origin): cf. Trevisa (1398), 'A camell of Arabia hath two bones in the backe'; and—

'This pois'nous bunch-back'd toad.'

BUNNI (בֻּנִּי, Buni), Neh 9<sup>4</sup> 10<sup>15</sup> 11<sup>4</sup>, but in each case perhaps the text is corrupt; cf. Bertheau-Ryssel. See GENEALOGY. H. A. WHITE.

BURDEN.—1. In OT 'burden' is the term used (in AV and RV) to represent the Heb. מַסָּא' (massā' (fr. מָצָא), both in the sense of a load, and in that of an utterance or oracle. In the latter case the rendering is supported by the ancient VSS (except the LXX, which has λόγος, ῥήμα, ῥασις, etc.). It was partly determined by the fact that the prophecies of which it formed the title were mainly of a threatening character, the burden thus being the threats of punishment imposed upon the place or people concerned. But this translation is now generally abandoned. Some of the prophecies to which the word is applied are not comminatory. Thus, Zec 12 contains a promise of victory to Jerus. through the direct intervention of J<sup>o</sup> on behalf of His people. See also Zec 9<sup>1</sup>, Pr 30<sup>1</sup> 31<sup>1</sup>, the Eng. tr. in the two latter instances reversing their usual procedure, and rendering by prophecy (AV), oracle (RV, in text, and burden in m.). It is not surprising that the massā' should so seldom have been other than denunciatory, when we remember the chief occasions and objects of Heb. prophecy. Jer 23<sup>30</sup> is intelligible only if we suppose that the prophets were accustomed to apply the word massā' to their prophecies in the sense of oracle or utterance. There the scoffers are reproved, simply because they pervert the word and give it the meaning of burden. Massā', therefore, simply means something taken up solemnly upon the lips (cf. Ex 23<sup>1</sup>, Ps 15<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 36<sup>3</sup>, and the repeated 'took up his parable' used of Balaam in Nu 23), in particular, a divine utterance or oracle. Although used of false oracles (Isa 24<sup>1</sup>), it is not used of a merely human utterance except in Pr 30<sup>1</sup> 31<sup>1</sup> (both doubtful); and even here, if the text is correct, a semi-divine precept is referred to.

2. In NT 'burden' denotes the woes and troubles of this earthly life (φορτίον, Mt 11<sup>30</sup>), the legal ordinances of the Pharisees (φορτία βαρέα, Mt 23<sup>4</sup>), the difficulties in which the Christian may be involved in consequence of his having yielded to temptation (βάρος, Gal 6<sup>2</sup>), and the load of personal responsibility, or, at all events, the difficulties and trials that are inseparable from the Christian life (φορτίον, Gal 6<sup>3</sup>). The only other passage we need compare with these is He 12<sup>1</sup>, where, instead of burden, we have in AV and RV weight (ὄγκος); the lit. meaning of the word is encumbrance, and connotes whatever prevents men from fully developing their spiritual nature. Various distinctions may be drawn between these words. Thus, βάρος and φορτίον in Gal 6<sup>2, 3</sup> mean respectively a burden that may and ought to be got rid of, and one that must be borne (see Lightfoot). Again, ὄγκος suggests not so much weight as encumbrance. But these distinctions are of no great importance.

BURGLARY.—See CRIMES.

BURIAL in Bible lands followed speedily upon death. Among the Jews of the E. at the present day burial takes place, if possible, within twenty-four hours of death. Mohammedans bury their dead the same day, if death takes place in the morning; but if in the afternoon or at night, not till the following day. Immediate burial was rendered necessary among the Jews of Canaan by the rapidity of decomposition in that climate, requiring survivors, as in the case of Abraham on the death of Sarah, to bury their dead out of their sight (Gen 23<sup>1-4</sup>). The defilement to which contact with a dead body gave occasion (Nu 19<sup>11-14</sup>) was a further reason among the Jews for speedy burial. Lazarus was buried on the day of his death (Jn 11<sup>37, 39</sup>). It was expressly commanded (Dt 21<sup>22, 23</sup>) that the body of a man who had been hanged should not remain all night upon the tree, but should be buried that day; and it may have been a sense of the awfulness of the judgment which had overtaken Ananias and Sapphira that hurried on the undertakers in their case (Ac 5<sup>1-11</sup>). It was in accordance with this provision of the Jewish law (cf. Dt 21<sup>23</sup> with Gal 3<sup>13</sup>), as well as with the dictates of humanity, that Joseph of Arimathea went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus for burial on the day of the crucifixion (Mt 27<sup>57ff.</sup>).

Immediately the last breath was drawn, it was the duty of the oldest son, or, failing him, of the nearest relative present, to close the eyes of the dead (Gn 46<sup>4</sup>). The mouth, too, was closed, and the cheekbones bound together (Jn 11<sup>44</sup>). The kiss imprinted upon the lifeless form of the patriarch Jacob by Joseph as he 'fell upon his father's face and wept upon him' (Gn 50<sup>1</sup>), may point to no uniform custom, but only to a natural impulse of affection. At the present day, when a Jew is drawing near his end, it is customary to bring in ten witnesses—an easy thing, as the house is usually full of friends waiting to raise the lamentations which tell that the sufferer has passed away. The death is announced, as it was of old, by a tumult of lamentation and the weeping and wailing of professional mourners (Mk 5<sup>38ff.</sup>). [See MOURNING.] When death occurs, those who are present rend their clothes, and all water and leaven must be cast out of the house itself as well as out of the houses of the three nearest neighbours, the belief being that the Angel of Death wipes his sword in these two things. Offerings for the dead seem to have been forbidden under the Mosaic law (Dt 26<sup>14</sup>).

The preparations for burial could scarcely be, in the circumstances, of a very elaborate character. In the case of Ananias (Ac 5<sup>6</sup>), we read that 'the young men wrapped him round, and carried him out and buried him.' What they did was likely this: they unfastened his girdle, and then taking the loose undergarment and the wide cloak which was worn above it, used them as a winding-sheet to cover the corpse from head to foot. But there was usually more ceremony. Combining various allusions which we find in the Gospels and the Acts, we learn that the corpse was washed (Ac 9<sup>37</sup>), anointed with aromatic ointments (Jn 12<sup>7</sup> 19<sup>39</sup>, Mk 16<sup>1</sup>, Lk 24<sup>1</sup>), wound in linen clothes with spices (Jn 19<sup>40</sup>, Mt 27<sup>59</sup>, Mk 15<sup>46</sup>, Lk 23<sup>53</sup>; cf. also To 12<sup>13</sup>, Sir 38<sup>16</sup>), hands and feet being bound with graveclothes and the face bound about with a napkin (Jn 11<sup>44</sup> 20<sup>6, 7</sup>). It would appear that in later times at least there was a confraternity of young men whose duty it was to attend to these proprieties on behalf of the dead (Ac 5<sup>6, 8</sup>). But it was, perhaps, only in cases like those mentioned in the references that they were called upon to act. It was on the loving hands of relatives and friends, and ordinarily of female friends, as in the passages referred to above, that these ministries devolved, among the Jews as among the Greeks. In fact, the practice among the Greeks, both by similarity and by contrast, affords an interesting illustration. One not unfamiliar instance may be cited: Electra believing Orestes to be dead, and his ashes placed in the sepulchral urn (Sophocles, Electra, 1136-1142), addresses him thus: 'Woe is me! These loving hands have not washed or decked thy corpse, nor taken up, as was meet, their sad burden from the flaming pyre. At the hands of strangers, hapless one, thou hast had those rites, and so art come to us, a little dust in a narrow urn.' These last words show the point of contrast. Burning of the dead, which was the custom among the Greeks, was no part of Jewish practice. The Rom. historian Tacitus (Hist. v. 5) expressly notices that it was matter of piety with the Jews 'to bury rather than to burn dead bodies.' The exceptions (if they be exceptions, for the Heb. text is in dispute) were cases of emergency, the burning of the bodies of Saul and his sons by the men of Jabesh-gilead (1 S 31<sup>11-13</sup>), although even then they buried their bones under the tamarisk at Jabesh, and David had them finally laid to rest in the sepulchre of Kish (2 S 21<sup>12-14</sup>); and the case supposed by the prophet (Am 6<sup>10</sup>) in the desolation which was to come upon Israel, when it may have been on account of pestilence and accompanying infection that burning was preferred. Burning was reserved for the living who had been found guilty of unnatural sins (Lv 20<sup>17, 18</sup>); and Achan and his family after having been stoned to death were burned with fire, and all their belongings (Jos 7<sup>26</sup>). When St. Paul speaks of giving his body to be burned (1 Co 13<sup>3</sup>), he accommodates his language to the Greeks of Corinth, to whom such a thing was familiar, and by whom such self-immolation would be understood. And as the burning practised by the Greeks was no part of ordinary Jewish custom, neither was embalming as practised by the Egyptians, the cases of Jacob and Joseph (Gn 50<sup>2, 26</sup>) being obviously special. Among the Assyrians the corpse was arrayed for burial in the dress and ornaments and weapons that had been worn during life; and although the allusions are not clear, this may be referred to in certain passages of Scripture (1 S 28<sup>14</sup>, Is 14<sup>11</sup>, Ezk 32<sup>7</sup>). Among the Jews and Mohammedans of the present day, the corpse is arrayed in the holiday apparel of former life.

It was a great indignity for a corpse to remain unburied and become food for the beasts of prey (2 S 21<sup>10, 11</sup>, 1 K 13<sup>22</sup> 14<sup>11</sup> 16<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>24</sup>, 2 K 9<sup>10</sup>, Jer 7<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> 14<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 20<sup>5</sup>, Ps 79<sup>3</sup>, Rev 11<sup>9</sup>), and uncovered blood cried for vengeance (Ezk 24<sup>9ff.</sup>; cf. also Ezk 39<sup>11-16</sup>),—the idea being the same as among other peoples, that the unburied dead would not only inflict trouble upon his family, but bring defilement and a curse upon the whole land. Even malefactors, as we have seen, were allowed the privilege of burial (Dt 21<sup>22, 23</sup>); and the denial of it to the sons of Rizpah gave occasion for the touching story of her self-denying care of the dead (2 S 21<sup>10, 11</sup>). It was an obligation binding upon all to bury the dead found by the way (To 1<sup>18</sup> 2<sup>5</sup>).

The dead body was carried to the grave upon a bier or litter—Heb. mittah, a bed (2 S 3<sup>31</sup>, cf. Lk 7<sup>14</sup> and 2 K 13<sup>3</sup>). The bier was a simple flat board borne on two or three staves by which the bearers carried it to the grave. Coffins were unknown among the Israelites, as they are among the E. Jews to this day; the coffin in which the embalmed remains of Joseph were preserved being the only one mentioned in Scripture (unless Asa's bed, 2 Ch 16<sup>4</sup>, be another), and being in conformity, not with Jewish but Egypt. usage (Gn 50<sup>26</sup>; cf. Ex 13<sup>19</sup>, Jos 24<sup>32</sup>). A procession of mourners, with professional mourning women leading the way, followed, who made the air resound with their lamentations (Ec 12<sup>5</sup>, Jer 9<sup>17</sup>, Am 5<sup>9</sup>). See MOURNING. A funeral procession among the Jews at the present day always moves swiftly along the road, because there are supposed to be innumerable Shédím, or evil spirits, hovering about, and desirous to attack the soul, which is considered to be in the body until interment takes place and the corpse is covered with earth. When the body is let down, the bier is withdrawn, and a heap of stones is piled over the shallow grave to preserve the dead from the depredations of hyenas and jackals. It was the belief of the Jews that the dead did not cease to be. There was a gathering place of the departed, commonly called Sheol among the Jews, and known also to the Greeks and Babylonians, where a kind of family life was preserved in the under-world. In accordance with that belief, the dead were buried in the sepulchres of their fathers when it was at all possible. Machpelah was the family burying-place of Abraham and Sarah and their descendants and connexions (Gn 25<sup>10</sup> 49<sup>31</sup> 50<sup>13</sup>), although there were notable exceptions—Rachel being buried where she died on the way to Ephrath, which is Bethlehem (Gn 35<sup>19</sup> R); and Joseph in Shechem, the parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor (Jos 24<sup>32</sup>). Among the Israelites, all who possessed any land, or who could afford it, had their family tombs hewn out of the rock in the hillside, each sepulchre containing many niches for the reception of bodies. Many generations of a family could thus be placed in the ancestral tomb, and countless numbers of such tombs are to be found all over the country. Of this Machpelah is the first example (Gn 23). Joshua was buried in the border of his inheritance at Timnath-serah (Jos 24<sup>30</sup>). Samuel was buried in his house at Ramah (1 S 25<sup>4</sup>). Joab was buried in his own house in the wilderness (1 K 2<sup>31</sup>). In the days of the kingdom special mention is made of the burial of kings. Manasseh, king of Judah, was buried in the garden of his own house, in the garden of Uzza (2 K 21<sup>18</sup>); and of Amon, his son, it is said that he also was buried in his sepulchre in the garden of Uzza (2 K 21<sup>20</sup>). Josiah seems to have been buried in the same tomb as his father and grandfather (2 K 23<sup>30</sup>). At the burial of some of the kings (Asa is singled out by the Chronicler for special notice, 2 Ch 16<sup>14</sup>) there was burning of aromatic wood and fragrant spices (Jer 34<sup>5</sup>); but there were exceptions in the case of unpopular and wicked kings, of whom Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, is specially mentioned (2 Ch 21<sup>19</sup>). Of Jehoiakim it was prophesied that there would be none to lament for him, and that he should be buried with the burial of an ass (Jer 22<sup>19</sup>), his dead body simply drafted out of sight and left to decay where it lay.

The graves of the dead were variously made. They were sometimes simply dug in the earth, as in this country, and as, in fact, they are among the E. Jews at the present day. Sometimes natural caves or grottoes were used as graves. And often they were hewn out in the rock, and provided, as we have seen, with galleries and chambers. In times of oppression fugitives found shelter in these rocky tombs (Jg 6<sup>2</sup>, 1 S 13<sup>9</sup>, He 11<sup>19</sup>); and in the time of our Lord poor creatures possessed with demons took up their abode in them (Mk 5<sup>2,3</sup>). The hills and valleys around Jerus. were honeycombed with these rock-hewn sepulchres of the dead. To the mouth of the sepulchral cave a stone was rolled to protect the remains deposited within from the ravages of wild beasts (Jn 11<sup>38</sup>, Mt 28<sup>2</sup>). Tombs were sometimes very spacious. In Joseph's tomb, where Jesus was laid, there was room for several persons (Mk 16<sup>1-8</sup>). It is quite in accordance with this that we find in a famous passage of Ezk (ch. 32), Sheol represented as a vast burying-place, not of individuals, but of nations. The place of burial in NT times was outside the cities and villages (Lk 7<sup>12</sup>, Jn 11<sup>30</sup>), and the instinct that seeks a quiet grave and the shade of trees for the resting-place of our dead influenced the choice of a burying-place in the earliest times (Gn 23<sup>17</sup> 35<sup>8</sup>, 1 S 31<sup>13</sup>, Jn 19<sup>41</sup>). There was public provision made for the burial of strangers (Mt 27<sup>7</sup>); and there was at Jerus. in the closing days of the monarchy a public burying-ground (Jer 26<sup>20</sup>), probably where it is to this day, between the city wall and the Kidron Valley.

Besides the heaping of stones on ordinary graves for protection, stones and pillars were set up as memorials of the dead (Ezk 39<sup>15</sup>, 2 K 23<sup>17</sup>, where RV reads, 'What monument is that which I see?' and the reference is not to a title or inscription, but to a sepulchral pillar). Jacob set a pillar upon Rachel's grave (Gn 35<sup>20</sup>), and Rachel's tomb is a monument of her pathetic story to this day. On the road from Engedi to Petra, on the crest where the first view of Mount Hor is obtained, is a conspicuous cairn, which we are told marks the burying-place of Aaron. There is no express mention of the Pyramids of Egypt in Scripture, but it is possible that 'the desolate places' said by Job to have been built by kings and counsellors of the earth (Job 3<sup>14</sup>) refer to them. Absalom's grave in the wood of Ephraim had a heap of stones raised over it (2 S 18<sup>17</sup>); but this, as in the case of Achan (Jos 7<sup>20</sup>), was not for honour, but for contumely.

There is no religious service at funerals among the Jews of the E., and there is no indication that there was any in Bible times. There is little in their burial customs to indicate belief in a resurrection; but the belief of a resurrection, as well as of a future life, obtains widely among the Jews in every land. At this hour thousands of Jewish graves on the sides of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, where the Jews have come from all lands to be buried, bear witness to the belief that associates the coming of the Messiah with a blessed resurrection. They hold that Messiah will descend upon the Mt. of Olives, and will pass through these resting-places of the dead as He enters in glory the Holy City.

BURIER, a very old word for grave-digger, is found in Ezk 39<sup>15</sup> 'till the buriers have buried it in the Valley of Hamon-gog,' where it was introduced by the Wyclifite version of 1382. J. HASTINGS.

BURNING.—See BURIAL, CREMATION, CRIMES, SACRIFICE.

BURNING BUSH.—In the account of the call of Moses, given by the prophetic narrative of the Pent. (JE), the Angel of J' is represented as appearing to Moses 'in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush,' Ex 3<sup>2-4</sup>. The word for bush in the original (קִשְׁטָן) is found only in this passage and in the reference thereto in Dt 33<sup>16</sup>. Its derivation is unknown, and we have no means of ascertaining what species of shrub is referred to. See BUSH.

The expression used by our Lord in the parallel passages Mk 12<sup>31</sup>, Lk 24<sup>37</sup> ἐν τῷ τοῦ (τῆς) βάτου, illustrates the then current method of referring to passages of the Scriptures, the reference in this case being to the section of the Torah or Pent. in which the incident of the burning bush is related (cf. Ro 11<sup>2</sup> 'in Elias'). Hence the RV rendering: 'in the place concerning the bush.'

BURNT-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE.

BURST, BURSTING.—1. Of the death of Judas it is said (Ac 1<sup>18</sup>) that 'falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst.' The verb τρᾶ 'b. asunder' (ἀσκαῶ) is always in classical Gr. (this is its only occurrence in NT or LXX) used of making a loud noise, 'to crack'; here it is bursting accompanied with noise. 2. In Pr 3<sup>10</sup> 'thy presses shall b. out with new wine' (πῶς, RV 'overflow'), 'b. out' is used 'hyperbolically, as a strong expression for to be exuberantly full,' acc. to Oxf. Eng. Dict., which has found only another example (without 'out')—Homilies (1563) 'thy presses shall b. with new wine.' But cf. the common phrase 'ready to b.' and Sir 19<sup>10</sup> 'If thou hast heard a word, let it die with thee; and he hold, it will not b. thee.' 3. Bursting in Is 30<sup>14</sup>, 'there shall not be found in the b. of it a sherd to take fire from the hearth,' has the obsol. sense of 'breaking into fragments' (Heb. ḥṣṣā 'in the breaking up,' abstr. for coner.; Vulg. de fragmentis ejus; RV 'among the pieces thereof'). Cf.—

'You will not pay for the glasses you have burst?'

BUSH (ῥῶς ḡnēch, βῆρος, rubus).—The etymology of this word sheds no light on the kind of bush in which J<sup>n</sup> appeared to Moses (Ex 3<sup>2-3,4</sup>, Dt 33<sup>16</sup>). It undoubtedly refers to a thorny shrub. Gesenius seems to imply that there is a connexion between it and senna. This is, however, not so, as the senna plant is not thorny, and is too insignificant a bush (not more than 2 to 3 ft. high) to have been chosen for the theophany. The translation βῆρος, in the LXX, gives the opinion of the scholars of that time in favour of the bramble (Rubus, blackberry). Rubus discolor, W. et Nees, grows everywhere in Pal. and Syria. R. tomentosus, Borekh., grows in Syria and northward; its var. collinus, Boiss., grows along the coast of Pal. and Syria, and in the lower mountains. A bush of this has been planted by the monks of the convent of St. Catherine in Sinai, in the rear of the chapel of the Burning Bush, and testifies to their opinion that this was the bush in question. But Rubus has not been found wild in Sinai, which is south of its range, and climatically unsuited to it.

The following are among the thorny shrubs which grow in Sinai: — Capparis spinosa, L.; C. galeata, Fres.; Ochradenus baccata, D. C.; Zizyphus Spina-Christi, L.; Acacia Nilotica, Del.; A. tortilis, Hayne; A. Seyal, Del. Any one of these shrubs or small specimens of the trees, which often assume a bushlike form, would answer the etymological and other requirements of ḡnēch. The attempt to establish a connexion between ḡnēch and sinf, the classical Arab. name for Acacia, is not defensible on philological grounds. It is better to regard the term as indefinite, meaning a thorn bush, and not attempt to identify it. G. E. POST.

BUSHEL.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BUSYBODY.—To express an individual, 'body' was used early with a tinge of compassion, as Coverdale's tr. of Ps 14<sup>1</sup> 'The foolish bodyes saye in their hertes: Tush, there is no God.' This is the sense the word has in 'busybody,' of which the earliest example is Tindale's tr. (1526) of 1 P<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> 'a b. in other men's matters,' which Cranmer, Geneva, and AV retained, but RV has changed into 'meddler' (Gr. ἀλλοτριεπισκοπος, an overseer (bishop) of other men's affairs: the word is found nowhere else). 'Busybody' is found also in 1 Ti 5<sup>13</sup> (Gr. πεπλεγος, taken up with trifles; the neut. τὰ πεπλεγμένα is used in Ac 19<sup>19</sup>, AV and RV 'curious arts'; Page, 'things better left alone, not meddled with'; and in 2 Th 3<sup>11</sup> (πεπλεγόμενοι, the verb from πεπλεγος)). J. HASTINGS.

BUT.—The archaic uses are few: 1. Lk 9<sup>13</sup> 'We have no more but five loaves' (RV 'than'). Cf. T. Beard (1597), 'It was no sooner said but done.' The same Gr. (οὐ πλεον ἢ) is tr'd by 'but' alone in Ac 24<sup>11</sup> 'there are yet but twelve days since I went up' (RV 'not more than'). 2. Nu 22<sup>35</sup> 'Go with the men; but only the word that I shall speak unto thee, that thou shalt speak,' a stronger 'only' (עַתָּה, tr. simply 'but' in Nu 23<sup>13</sup> 'thou shalt see but the utmost part of them'). 3. Gn 21<sup>26</sup> 'neither yet heard I of it, but to-day.' The mod. expression would be 'until,' but the Heb. (עַד) means 'except.' J. HASTINGS.

BUTLER.—While the modern sense of this word is that of a superior servant in the houses of the wealthy, whose work is to superintend general domestic affairs, its derivation from the French word boutillier, and its original meaning, indicate the special office of offering wines and drinks at the meals of the rich, and during entertainments. It is in this latter sense that it is used in Gn 40<sup>1</sup> and 41<sup>9</sup>, and the Heb. word (מַשְׁכֵּם he who gives to drink) is thus tr. elsewhere cupbearer (Neh 1<sup>11</sup>, 1 K 10<sup>5</sup>, and 2 Ch 9<sup>4</sup>). (See CUPBEARER.)

J. WORTABET.

BUTTER.—See FOOD.

BUZ (בּוּז).—1. The second son of Nahor and Milcah, and nephew of Abraham (Gn 22<sup>21</sup>). Elihu, one of the friends of Job (Job 32<sup>2</sup>), is called a Buzite, and may have belonged to a tribe of that name against which judgments are denounced by Jeremiah (Jer 25<sup>21</sup>). This tribe, being mentioned along with Dedan and Tema, seems to be located in Arabia Petraea, and it is possible that in early times it had migrated thither from Mesopotamia. 2. A man of the tribe of Gad (1 Ch 5<sup>14</sup>).

R. M. BOYD.

BUZI (בּוּזִי).—The father of the prophet Ezekiel (ch. 1<sup>3</sup>), and consequently a member of the priestly house of Zadok. Of the man himself nothing is known. Jewish writers were led to identify him with Jeremiah, partly by a supposed connexion of the name with a verb meaning 'despise,' and partly by a theory that when the father of a prophet is named it is to be understood that he also was a prophet. This view is referred to with apparent approval by David Kimchi: 'In the Jerus. Targ. [he is called] Ezekiel the prophet, the son of Jeremiah the prophet; and Jeremiah is called Buzi, because [the people] despised him' (Comm. ad loc.). J. SKINNER.

BUZITE (בּוּזִי, LXX βουζιτης).—See BUZ.

BY was originally an adverb, meaning near, and became a prep. through a change in the order of words; thus, 'the folk him by stood' (by-stood), 'the folk stood him by,' 'the folk stood by him.'

1. In this orig. sense 'by' is of freq. occurrence; generally in OT as tr. of בָּ, as Neh 4<sup>3</sup> 'Now Tobiah the Ammonite was by him'; Pr 8<sup>30</sup> 'When he appointed the foundations of the earth, then I was by him'; Ezk 1<sup>9</sup> 'When the living creatures went, the wheels went by them' (RV 'beside'); or of אֵת, as Ezk 43<sup>3</sup> 'their threshold by (אֵת) my thresholds, and their post by (אֵת, RV 'beside') my posts'; or of עַל, as Gn 35<sup>4</sup> 'the oak which was by Shechem,' 1 K 1<sup>9</sup> 'Adonijah slew sheep . . . by (עַל) the stone of Zoheleth, which is by (אֵת, RV 'beside') En-rogel'; or of מִן (מִן, עַל), as Dt 5<sup>31</sup> 'stand thou here by me.' In NT the Gr. is παρὰ, as Lk 9<sup>47</sup> 'Jesus . . . took a child, and set him by him' (παρ' αὐτοῦ, RV 'by his side'); or πρὸς, as Mk 11<sup>4</sup> 'found the colt tied by the door' (RV 'at'). In this sense 'by' is the frequent accompaniment of certain verbs, as go, Ps 129<sup>5</sup> 'they which go by'; stand, 1 K 13<sup>24</sup> 'the ass stood by it, the lion also stood by the carcass' (both בָּ); sit, Neh 2<sup>6</sup> 'the queen also sitting by him'; dwell, Neh 4<sup>12</sup> 'the Jews which dwell by them'; set, Lk 9<sup>47</sup> as above (for 'set by' = esteem, see SET); lay, 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup> 'let every one of you lay by him' (παρ' αὐτοῦ). Evidently of the same meaning also is 'by' in the phrases 'by the sea side' Mt 13<sup>1</sup>; 'by a river side' Ac 16<sup>13</sup>; 'by the highway side' Mk 10<sup>46</sup>; and 'by the way side' Mt 13<sup>4</sup> (all παρὰ). Then the word 'side' gets dropped, and we have the phrase 'by the way,' very common in Eng. of the 17th cent. and earlier; as Dt 11<sup>30</sup> 'by the way where the sun goeth down' (קָדַם לְמָנָה); Lk 10<sup>4</sup> 'salute no man by the way' (κατὰ τὴν ὁδόν, RV 'on the way'); Sir 8<sup>15</sup> 'Travel not by the way with a bold fellow' (ἐν ὁδῷ, RV 'in the way'); cf. 2 P 3<sup>1</sup> 'by way of remembrance' (ἐν ὑπομνήσει, RV 'by putting you in remembrance'); and Shaks. Jul. Cæs. II. i. 218—

'Now, good Metellus, go along by him,' where Pope, mistaking the phrase, changed 'by' into 'to,' and was followed by other early editors. In the same drama (III. i. 161) Shaks. puts a play upon the word into the mouth of Antony, who says to Cæsar's murderers—

'No place will please me so, no mean of death,
As here by Cæsar and by you cut off.'

2. In a phrase as 'go by the way' (e.g. Job 21<sup>29</sup> 'Have ye not asked them that go by the way?') the way is in a sense the means, and this is believed to have led to the extensive use of 'by' as the prep. introducing the means, instrument, or origin. For this purpose 'by' is the tr. of many Heb. and Gr. expressions, and there is no part of the Eng. Bible where we are so liable to be led astray, either by an archaism (of which one notable example will be referred to), or by a mistranslation (of which many examples might be given). The danger is greatest in NT, because of the number and variety of the Gr. preps., and also because these Gr. preps. are often affected by the Hebrew. The Revisers have rendered an incalculable service by their watchful care in translating the preps.; and even when they have not been bold enough to disturb familiar but misleading renderings, they have nearly always indicated the correct tr. in the margin. Thus in Jn 1<sup>9-10</sup> 'All things were made by him,' 'The world was made by him' (AV, RV, but RVm through, Gr. δι' αὐτοῦ); while in He 6<sup>7</sup> 'herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed' (even AVm gives 'for whom,' RV text 'for whose sake,' Gr. δι' οὗς). The most important and treacherous archaism is the use of 'by,' which now denotes the agent, to express the instrument, the agent being expressed by 'of.' Thus we read, Mt 4<sup>1</sup> 'Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit (ὡπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος) into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil' (ὡπὸ τοῦ διαβόλου); but in v. 4 'Man shall not live by bread alone' (ἐπ' ἄρτου); again in 22<sup>2</sup> 'being warned of God in a dream'; but v. 23 'which was spoken by the prophets' (διὰ τῶν προφητῶν, the prophets being the channel of communication, RVm 'through the prophets'). Lightfoot (Fresh Revision of NT, pp. 132 ff.) emphasizes the importance of this distinction, pointing out that it affects the doctrines of Inspiration and the Person of Christ. 'Wherever the sacred writers have occasion to quote or to refer to OT, they invariably apply the prep. διὰ, as denoting instrumentality, to the lawgiver, or the prophet, or the psalmist, while they reserve ὑπὸ, as signifying the primary motive agency to God himself'; thus Mt 1<sup>23</sup> 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet' (ὡπὸ [τοῦ] κυρίου διὰ τοῦ προφήτου, RV 'by the Lord through the prophet'). Again, 'the prep. which is especially applied to the office of the Divine Word is διὰ.' But here we have to deal with not only an archaic meaning of the prep. 'by,' but also with a capricious use of it in the AV. Thus Jn 1<sup>9-10</sup> 'All things were made by him,' 'The world was made by him' (both δι' αὐτοῦ); v. 7 'that all men through him might believe' (δι' αὐτοῦ), and v. 17 'grace and truth came by Jesus Christ' (διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ). The fact is that about 1611 the word 'by' was losing its special sense of instrumentality, and there are a few clear examples of its employment to express the primary source or agent, as

Mt 22<sup>31</sup> 'have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God?' (ὡπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ) where all the previous versions have 'of God.' (See OF.)

3. 'Two by two,' 'three by three,' means two beside two, three beside three. But in older Eng. these phrases were frequently shortened; thus 1 Co 14<sup>27</sup> 'let it be by two (κατὰ δύο) or at most by three'; Lk 9<sup>14</sup> 'by fifties in a company' (RV 'in companies, about fifty each'); so 1 K 5<sup>14</sup> 'by courses,' 2 K 5<sup>2</sup> 'by companies.' And this idea of nearness is present in certain fig. expressions of time, as 1 S 25<sup>22</sup> 'if I leave of all that pertain to him by the morning light'; Ex 22<sup>26</sup> 'by that (= by the time that) the sun goeth down'; even in the phrase 'by the space of,' where the meaning is during, as Ac 13<sup>31</sup> 'by (RV 'for') the space of forty years.'

4. As nearness suggests comparison, such expressions as 'set by,' 'set light by' are easily understood. (See SET.) But from this, 'by' came to be used after verbs of thinking, knowing, etc. in the sense of 'about,' as Shaks. All's Well, v. iii. 237—

'By him, and by this woman here, what know you?'

Then this passed into the meaning of against, of which there is a probable* example in 1 Co 4<sup>4</sup> 'I know nothing by myself' (RV 'against myself'). Cf. Foxe, Book of Martyrs: 'Thou hast spoken evil words by the queen . . . 'No man living upon earth can prove any such things by me'; Sanderson, Works, ii. 37, 'Far be it from us to judge men's hearts, or to condemn men for that we know not by them.' J. HASTINGS.

BY AND BY.—In earlier versions 'by and by' is the usual tr. of εὐθὺς or εὐθέως, as it then consistently meant immediately. Thus Latimer in one of his sermons says, 'the clapper brake, and we could not get it mended by and by; we must tarry till we can have it done. It shall be mended as shortly as may be.' But about 1611 this meaning was passing away.† 'The inveterate procrastination of men,' says Trench, 'had caused it to designate a remoter term; even as "presently" does not any longer mean "at this present," but "in a little while."' So AV retains 'by and by' only in four places, Mt 13<sup>31</sup> (εὐθὺς, RV 'straightway'), Lk 17<sup>7</sup> (εὐθέως, RV 'straightway'), 21<sup>9</sup> (εὐθέως, RV 'immediately'), Mk 6<sup>55</sup> (εὐαυτίς, RV 'forthwith'). J. HASTINGS.

BYWAY.—Only Jg 5<sup>6</sup> 'the travellers walked through byways' (מִדְרָגִים, RVm and RVm 'crooked ways,' which is Coverdale's tr. Moore points out that both words are in Mishnic Heb. used tropically of tortuous conduct; but he believes that here the first word, מִדְרָגִים, is erroneously repeated from the preceding line to the detriment of both the poetical expression and the rhythm; he translates 'those who travelled the roads went by roundabout paths'). In Eng. as in Heb. the word signifies, not a side road merely, but a secret path, a path to take in seeking to escape observation. Thus Spenser, F.Q. I. i. 28—

'That path he kept which beaten was most plaine, Ne ever would to any bye-way bend.'

Hence the transition was easy to tortuous conduct, as Coverdale's tr. of Is 57<sup>17</sup> 'he turneth him self, and foloweth ye bywayes of his owne heart.'

RV introduces 'bypaths' in Jer 18<sup>15</sup> (מִדְרָגִים, AV, 'paths'). J. HASTINGS.

* Probable, for this meaning of 'by,' though never common, is clearly made out; but the Gr. being εὐαυτίς (Vulg. mithi) one is not certain that Tindale, whom the others follow, did not miss the meaning, and translate the word as an instrumental dative.

† Tindale and the Gen. Bible have 'by and by' in many places in which AV has 'immediately.' Thus Mk 13<sup>1</sup> 'the fever forsake him by and by' (ὡπὸ, 'anonon,' them, 'iproninent,' but Cov. and the rest as AV); so 21<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>, Lk 6<sup>40</sup>, Jn 6<sup>21</sup>, etc.

C

C.—This symbol is used in critical notes on the Text of OT and NT to indicate the readings of the Codex Ephraemi Syri rescriptus in the National Library at Paris. The MS is assigned to the 5th cent. Tischendorf, on somewhat slender grounds, suggests Egypt as its birthplace. In the 6th cent. the NT was carefully revised by the first corrector (C<sup>1</sup>). In the same or in the succeeding century some changes were introduced in the OT (C<sup>2</sup>). Tischendorf hazards a conjecture that during this period of its history the MS was in Palestine. By the 9th cent., at any rate, it had found its way to Constantinople, and there the NT came into the hands of a second corrector (C<sup>2</sup>) who revised the MS for liturgical use.

In the 12th cent. the MS must have been taken to pieces, the separate sheets of vellum sponged over to obliterate the original writing, and then a certain number of the sheets used again to receive a Greek translation of some works of Ephraim the Syrian. Hence its description as a codex rescriptus or palimpsest. After the fall of Constantinople in 1453 the MS was taken into Italy, and finally passed into the hands of Catherine de Medici. At her death it became the property of the French Royal Library. Its real value was not recognised at first. It was not till the end of the 16th cent. that the older writing attracted attention. In 1716 Bentley set Wetstein to work at a systematic collation. In 1834 the MS was chemically treated to intensify the ancient writing on the whole with good effect. Still the task of deciphering the faded letters calls for extraordinary patience and skill; and Tischendorf deserves unstinted praise for the edition that he published (Leipzig 1843 and 1875) as the result of ten months' hard work in the Library at Paris.

The MS contains at present 209 leaves, written in single columns: 64 contain fragments of Job, Proverbs, Eccles., Wis. of Sol., Sirach, and Canticles; 145 contain large portions (not quite two-thirds of the whole) of NT, including fragments from every book except 2 Jn and 2 Th. The Ammonian sections are marked in the margin of the Gospels, and the list of chapters at the beginning of St. Luke and St. John are preserved. There are no indications of chapters in the other books of the NT. Hort has shown that there is reason to believe that Rev was transcribed from a separate exemplar, consisting of about 120 small leaves (Intr. p. 268).

CAB.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CABBON (קבון), Jos 15<sup>40</sup>.—A town of Judah near Eglon. The name has not been recovered.

CABIN is used once in AV in the obsol. sense of a prison cell, Jer 37<sup>10</sup> 'When Jeremiah was entered into the dungeon, and into the cabins' (קבין [all], something vaulted, from קבץ to bend; AVm, RV 'cells'). The word is rare in this sense, but in frequent use for a hermit's cell, as Caxton, Chron. Eng. ccliv. 329, 'They put hym in a Cabon and his chapeayne for to shryue hym.' J. HASTINGS.

CABUL (קבול), Jos 19<sup>27</sup>, 1 K 9<sup>12</sup>.—A town of Asher on the border of Zebulun. The district was ceded by Solomon to Tyre. Prob. the large village Kabul E. of Acco. See SWP, vol. i. sheet v.

C. R. CONDER.

CÆSAR (Καῖσαρ).—This name was adopted by Octavius, subsequently known as Augustus, after the death of his uncle Julius Cæsar, and passed on to his successors as the official designation of the Roman emperors, until the third century A.D., when it came to be used for the junior partners in the government, in distinction from the title Augustus, which was reserved for the supreme rulers. No name was ready at hand to describe the unique office of the real autocrat in a nominal republic. While the word 'king' was hated at Rome on account of its associations with the legendary history of the city, and despised by the victorious generals who were familiar with it as the title of defeated Oriental rulers, the fame of Julius Cæsar suggested the use of his name by his heir.

The following Cæsars fall within NT times:—

Augustus	. . .	R.C. 31—A.D. 14.
Tiberius	. . .	A.D. 14—37.
Gaius (Caligula)	. . .	37—41.
Claudius	. . .	41—54.
Nero	. . .	54—68.
Galba	. . .	68—69.
Otho	. . .	69.
Vitellius	. . .	69.
Vespasian	. . .	69—79.
Titus	. . .	79—81.
Domitian	. . .	81—96.

Four of these are referred to in NT, viz. Augustus (Lk 21), Tiberius (Lk 31), Claudius (Ac 11<sup>28</sup> 18<sup>2</sup>), Nero (1 Th 4<sup>22</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>16</sup>, 17). Augustus was ruling when Jesus Christ was born, and continued to rule until He was about eighteen years of age; Tiberius was emperor during the remainder of His time of obscurity, His public ministry, His death and resurrection. Although our Lord accepted the title of king (Jn 18<sup>37</sup>), and admitted that He was the Messiah (Mk 8<sup>29</sup>, 30, Jn 4<sup>25</sup>, 26), He never came into conflict with the political claims of the ruling Cæsar. The Gospel record mentions only one occasion on which He touched on those claims, and on that occasion it was because they had been forced on His notice (Mk 12<sup>13</sup>, 17). The coin for which He then called was a denarius with the image and legend of Tiberius upon it (see MONEY), and His judgment was to the effect that the acceptance of this coin by the Jews was a sign that they admitted the Roman rule over them, under which circumstances they were morally bound to render Cæsar his dues, not forgetting the dues of God. In the Fourth Gospel the Jews threaten Pilate with a charge of disloyalty to Cæsar (Tiberius), and describe the claims of Jesus to be a king as amounting to sedition against Cæsar; and the priests, who represent the ancient aristocratic rulers of Israel, expressly declare that they have no king but Cæsar (Jn 19<sup>12</sup>, 15). Caligula is not referred to in the NT. His time coincides with the early ministry of St. Paul. Aquila and Priscilla are stated to have come from Italy to Corinth in consequence of a decree of Claudius (the fourth Cæsar) banishing all Jews from Rome (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>). See CLAUDIUS). Since Nero was in power when St. Paul was arrested at Jerusalem, it was to him that the apostle, as a Roman citizen (Ac 22<sup>27</sup>, 28), appealed from the local tribunal at Cæsarea (Ac 25<sup>6</sup>, 12). The right of appeal to Cæsar was allowed to citizens, but not to provincials (Pliny, Epis. x. 96 (al. 97); Schürer, HJP i. ii. p. 59; Mommsen, Staatsrecht, 3rd ed. pp. 255-257). The Apoc. appears to contain frequent obscure allusions to the Cæsars, and especially to Nero, one passage (Rev 17<sup>10</sup>) seeming to point to the first seven emperors, and in such a way as to suggest that the book must have been written under the sixth (Galba).

CÆSAR'S HOUSEHOLD.—This phrase occurs with a mark of emphasis in the salutations sent from St. Paul's friends at Rome to the Church at Philippi, where we read, 'All the saints salute you, especially they that are of Cæsar's household (οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας, Ph 4<sup>23</sup>). The domus or familia Cæsaris included the whole imperial household, and extended to the attendants of the emperor in the provinces as well as at Rome. Lightfoot gives a list of some of these, from which it is evident that the phrase contains no indication of the rank of the persons to whom it refers. They may have been courtiers of high position; the execution of Titus Flavius Clemens, a man of consular rank and cousin to the emperor, and the banishment of his wife Flavia Domitilla, the emperor's niece, and her daughter Pontia, by Domitian, for the vague crimes, contemptissimæ inertie (Suet. c. 15), atheism (ἀθεΐας), and inclination to Jewish customs (Dion. Cass. lxvii. 14), have suggested the probable opinion that these people were Christians. Still, most probably in the time of St. Paul the Christian members of the imperial household were slaves, or freedmen of humble position. The apostle's association with the soldiers who guarded him may have led to the introduction of the gospel to the palace attendants, although the statement that the prisoners were put under the Prætorian guard (Ac 28<sup>16</sup> AV) is absent from the best MSS. The imperial household must have constituted so large a proportion of the population of Rome that there is nothing surprising in the fact that some of its members came into contact with Christian teachers. The interesting fact is that converts were won from so frightful a circle of dissoluteness as the court of Nero (Suetonius, Nero, 28, 29). The names of a number of the imperial attendants of this period having been recovered from sepulchral monuments among the columbaria in the neighbourhood of the Appian Way, Lightfoot pointed out the identity of some of these names with several that occur in the list of salutations in Ro 16, viz. Amplias, Urbanus, Stachys, Apelles, Narcissus, Tryphena, Tryphosa, Patrobas (Patrobins), Philologus, Julia (Julius). The probability that the last chapter of Ro is really part of an Ep. to the Ephesians deprives these coincidences of their supposed value. Most of the names are not uncommon.

CÆSAREA (Καίσαρεια), Ac 10<sup>1-24</sup> 21<sup>8</sup> 23<sup>33</sup>.—The city N. of Jaffa, on the seashore, orig. called Strato's Tower, rebuilt by Herod the Great, the capital of Judea under the Procurators, and where St. Paul was imprisoned. It was famous for its port, which Josephus compares with the Piræus, though the latter was very much larger (Ant. xv. ix. 6). The present ruins include the walls of the ancient city, and within them those of a much smaller town of the twelfth cent., with walls rebuilt in the thirteenth by St. Louis. The cathedral, of which only foundations remain, appears to stand on the site of the temple raised by Herod to Augustus (Jos. Ant. xv. ix. 6; Wars, i. xxi. 7). On the S., outside the mediæval town, are ruins apparently of a large theatre close to the shore. On the E. is a circus, with a fine goal of granite, now overthrown. Two aqueducts from Carmel brought the waters of the Zerka, or Crocodile River, to the city. They are Rom. work, with round arches, running over the swamps, and a tunnel through the cliffs, with rock-cut staircases descending in wells. A few Bosnian colonists have houses in the ruins. Cæsarea was a bishopric from the fourth to the thirteenth cent. A.D., of which the most celebrated bishop was Eusebius. In NT times it had a mixed population, and conflicts between the Jews and their fellow-citizens were frequent. On the outbreak of the great war, the Jewish population was massacred (Jos. Wars, ii. xviii. 1, vii. viii. 7; Schürer, HJP ii. i. 86 f.). It was also the scene of a Moslem massacre when taken by the Crusaders in A.D. 1101. For full account, and plans of the ruins, see SWP, vol. ii. sheet x. See also Neubauer, Géog. Pal. s.v.

C. R. CONDER.

CÆSAREA PHILIPPI (Καίσαρεια ἡ Φιλίππων, 'Cæsarea of Philip').—It was so named to distinguish it from Cæsarea Palestina on the seacoast. It possibly appears in the OT as Baal-gad, but its history for us begins with Herod the Great. (For suggested identification with Dan, see Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 480.)

No spot in Palestine can compare with this in romantic beauty. It stands on a triangular terrace 1150 ft. above sea-level, cut off from Hermon by Wady Khashabeh, and bounded on the S. by Wady Za'areh. Abundant water produces luxuriant vegetation, fertile fields stretch away to westward, while groves of stately poplars, great oaks, and lowlier evergreens surround the place with perennial charm. The fortress Kal'at es-Subeibeh, or Kal'at Banias, crowns the hill behind the village. A position of great antiquity and of enormous strength, its possession has always been essential to the holding of the western meadow. The old city was surrounded by a strong wall, flanked by massive towers, and protected by a ditch on the east. North of the village, in the face of a steep rock, is Magharat Ras en-Neba, 'Cave of the fountainhead.' 'Very deep and full of still water' in the days of Josephus, the crumbling rock has filled the cavern. The waters rise all along the base of the gravel bank in front, and, gathering together, rush away in arrowy streaks between banks of evergreen, under the arch of an old Roman bridge; then, as becomes 'the descender' (נַחֲלִית), plunge down a narrow ravine, and, taking the stream from Wady Za'areh, flow on 'to join the brimming river' from Tell el-Kādi in the plain. West of the spring, on a projecting crag, is a small shrine of El-Khudr, that strange object of Oriental reverence identified with St. George and also with the prophet Elijah. Away to the N.E. rises the mighty bulk of Hermon, culminating in the snowy crest full 8000 ft. above the spring.

Baal-gad—the god of good fortune—gave place to the Grecian Pan. The scene of his worship at the fountain was called the Paneion (τὸ Πανείον, Jos. Ant. xv. x. 3), whence the whole district took the name of Paneas, Panæds (Ant. ibid.). Zenodorus dying at Antioch, Augustus gave this region to Herod (B.C. 20), who built here a temple of white marble in honour of his benefactor. Philip, to whom it passed as part of the tetrarchy of Trachonitis, enlarged and beautified the town, and in compliment to the emperor called it Cæsarea, adding 'of Philip,' to distinguish it from his father's town, and also, no doubt, to secure the memory of his own name. Its great and abiding interest, however, is derived from the visit of our Lord, and the amazing event witnessed by these silent hills (Mt 16<sup>13</sup>, Mk 8<sup>27</sup>). Agrippa II. called the city Neronias (Ant. xx. ix. 4); and, as is proved from the city's coins, this name, with Cæsarea, survived some time. Paneas then again asserts itself with Cæsarea, and finally Cæsarea disappears, and Paneas takes permanent possession in the Arabic form of Baniās, for the Arabs have no p. Vespasian and his army found refreshment here before their descent on the Sea of Galilee (BJ III. ix. 7). After the destruction of Jerusalem, Titus Cæsar here 'exhibited all sorts of shows,' many of the captives being destroyed by wild beasts, and others forced to slay each other in gladiatorial displays (BJ VII. ii. 1). Later it became the seat of a bishop, under Antioch. Its bishops were present at the councils of Nicaea, A.D. 325; Chalcedon, A.D. 451, etc. In the stormy history of the crusades the town and castle played an important part. Eusebius (bk. vi. 18) mentions a Christian tradition that the woman healed of an issue of blood (Lk 8<sup>43</sup>) was a native of Baniās, her house being shown, with statues representing the event.

The modern village consists of about fifty houses, occupied by Moslems. There are few antiquities. Fragments of broken columns and carved stones, a Roman aqueduct nearly buried in refuse, part of the old walls and castle, and several niches in the rock over the spring, are practically all that remain of the splendours of old Cæsarea Philippi.

W. EWING.

CAGE (קליב), Jer 5<sup>27</sup>.—The houses of the rich, stuffed with craftily-obtained wealth and articles of luxury, are compared to a cage full of birds. The reference in the previous verse to bird-traps would at first suggest that 'cage' here continues the thought of fowling, but the stress laid on the fulness of the houses points perhaps to a wicker-case or crate full of pigeons and fowls. This is a common market sight in the East: the crate being literally stuffed, and the birds craning their necks out at every opening to get breath and escape oppression. The meaning of 'cage' is supported by the cage (κάραλλος) of Sir 11<sup>30</sup>, which is the Arab. ḡantal 'hamper' of the present day.

'Cage' in Rev 18<sup>2</sup> (φυλακή) means 'hold,' i.e. 'prison' (RVm), or the word may have here an accent of mockery, representing the owls and bats as mounting guard over the traditions of the past. No one would think of putting 'unclean and hateful' birds in a cage or crate, as they were unfit for food and too ill-omened for ornament.

G. M. MACKIE.

CAIAPHAS (Καϊάφας), more correctly 'Joseph C.' (cf. 'Joseph called Barsabbas,' Ac 1<sup>24</sup>), appointed high priest of the Jews by the Rom. procurator Valerius Gratus (predecessor of Pontius Pilate), and removed by Vitellius A.D. 37 (Jos. Ant. XVIII. ii. 2, iv. 3). C. was son-in-law to Annas (Ananus), high priest A.D. 7-14. Some confusion has arisen from Lk 3<sup>2</sup> 'in the high priesthood of Annas and C.' and Ac 4<sup>6</sup> 'Annas the high priest and C.' (cf. Mk 16<sup>7</sup>), as well as Jn 18<sup>10, 22</sup> where 'the high priest' almost certainly designates Annas. (For explanation of this usage of terms see ANNAS, SANHEDRIN.) The chief priests were at this period mostly Sadducees (Ac 4<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>17</sup>, cf. Jos. Ant. xv. ix. 3), and in the final conflict with Jesus they played a more prominent part than the Pharisees, as they did also in the subsequent persecution of the apostles. When the popularity of Jesus had received a powerful impulse from the raising of Lazarus, C. was the leading spirit at the council which was held to devise measures to stem the popular current (Jn 11<sup>40ff.</sup>). His counsel was to put Jesus to death before a tumult of the people should bring down upon the nation the vengeance of the Romans. His action upon this occasion illustrates his characteristic disregard of justice and religion, and shows with what adroitness he could hide self-interest under the cloak of patriotism. But there was a deeper meaning in his words than he was conscious of; and the evangelist finds in them a high-priestly prophecy of the atonement (vv. 51-52; cf. Ex 28<sup>30</sup>, Nu 27<sup>21</sup>)—with which may be compared similar unconscious testimonies in Mt 27<sup>25, 27</sup> and Mk 15<sup>21</sup>. The policy which C. advocated at this meeting, he was largely instrumental in carrying out. It was in 'the court of the high priest who was called C.' that 'the chief priests and elders' resolved to take Jesus 'by subtilty'—with the help of Judas (Mt 26<sup>3, 4, 14-16</sup>); and it was C. that took the leading part in the trial of Jesus at the nocturnal meeting held immediately after the private examination before Annas (Jn 18<sup>24</sup>, Mt 26<sup>57-60</sup>). The procedure under C.'s presidency was a travesty of justice, and while they 'sought false witness against him,' Jesus kept silence; even when challenged by C. to speak,—till the latter, despairing of establishing any relevant charge by means of witnesses, solemnly adjured Jesus to say whether He was 'the Christ, the Son of God.' At once the unfaltering answer came (although the speaker knew that He would have to seal His testimony with His blood), whereupon C., with an affectation of pious horror, rent his garments, saying, 'He hath spoken blasphemy . . . What think ye?'—to which 'they answered, He is worthy of death,'—a sentence that was ratified next morning at a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin (Mt 27<sup>1, 2</sup>; Jn 18<sup>20</sup>). After this C. is only once mentioned by name in the NT (Ac 4<sup>9</sup>), associated with 'as many as were of the kindred of the high priest' in the trial of Peter and John; but in all probability he is 'the high priest' of Ac 5<sup>17, 21, 27</sup> 7<sup>1, 9</sup>, who continues to persecute the Church.

J. A. M'Clymont.

CAIN (קין), Firstborn of the first pair (Gn 4<sup>1</sup>). As murderer C. marks a further stage in the downward course of the fallen race, while he also foreshadows its material progress. The name, which J derives from the mother's joyful exclamation at the 'acquisition' of a man-child (קָנָה procure), may also have suggested the secondary notion of the man of blood (קַיִן a spear). A tiller of the soil (4<sup>2</sup>), C. offered a sacrifice of the produce of the earth (4<sup>3</sup>), which, however, was not viewed by God with acceptance (4<sup>5</sup>). The ground of the divine displeasure has commonly been sought in the tardiness of the offering, or in its comparative worthlessness,—in the latter case, either because he withheld his best, or because of the insufficiency of a sacrifice without blood; but, while the spirit of C. may well be supposed to have expressed itself in delay and niggardliness, the text does not carry us beyond the prophetic idea that the offering, owing to the character and inward disposition of C., could not please God (cf. He 11<sup>4</sup>). As to the manner in which God intimated His rejection of the sacrifice, the narrative is also silent, though the analogy of the primitive history suggests various forms of the revelation—especially the audible voice of God, or the refusal of the consuming fire. Wrothful and dejected at the slighting of his gifts, C. is rebuked by God (4<sup>6, 7</sup>), who teaches him that joy (forgiveness?) is the reward of well-doing, but the penalty of wrong-doing the temptation to further sin.* The guilt of the fratricide is aggravated by premeditation in LXX and other versions, where C. is represented as inviting Abel to go with him into the field (4<sup>8</sup>). As the motive of the murder, jealousy is sufficient, without following Jewish scholastics in supposing disputes about religion or property. More hardened than Adam, C. would conceal his guilt, but is convicted by the voice of the shed blood which cries from the ground (4<sup>10</sup>); and, agreeably to his deeper guilt, the curse which is upon the earth, by which it had been made an instrument of punishment, is further heightened (4<sup>12</sup>). Adam is driven from Eden, Cain from tillage-land. Afraid for his life, which he feels to be forfeited, C. is vouchsafed the protection of the threat of a sevenfold vengeance and of a special sign (4<sup>15</sup>). By the sign has been understood a miracle wrought in confirmation of the promise of protection, or a reiterated miracle which in time of need might deter or terrify an assailant, e.g. a lightning flash, or intermittent signs of leprosy; but the idea rather appears to be that a permanent physical brand was imprinted, which would identify him to his kind, to whom by report his crime, and the will of God concerning him, were sufficiently known. It is further related that C. went forth into the land of Nod or Wanderland (4<sup>16</sup>), where, consistently enough with OT social ideals, if not with C.'s doom of vagabondism, the first city is built by the first murderer (4<sup>17</sup>).

The NT allusions to C. (besides He 11<sup>4</sup>; 1 Jn 3<sup>12</sup>, Jude<sup>11</sup>) are very general, referring simply to the spirit of his life as the antithesis to Christian faith and brotherly love. The vindication of C. was undertaken by the Cainites (cf. Epiphanius adv. Haereticos, i. 3, 38), who represented him as possessed of a dignity, power, and enlightenment superior to Abel—a phenomenon which is not without its parallels in modern pleas for the emancipation of the modern man from the self-sacrificing ethics of Christianity. The many problems raised by the narrative were a fertile theme for the Jewish rabbis. The tradition that C. was slain by an arrow from the bow of Lamech, who mistook him for a wild beast, and thereafter killed his youthful son who had misled him, is a fanciful structure reared by the same hands on the foundation of Lamech's wild song.

The history of C. and Abel belongs in substance to the Jahwistic section of the Pentateuch (J, Dillmann's C), which may be concisely described as a body of tradition edited in the light of prophetic revelation. That the story was not found by the writer in its present setting, but was transferred by him from a later situation to the primeval period, is argued on various grounds—that its distinction of farmer and shepherd, and also of fruit-offerings and animal sacrifices, cannot have been primitive, much less the building of a city, and especially that it assumes the existence on the earth of a widely-distributed population. On the other hand, it must be said that none of the problems are absolutely insoluble, with the presuppositions of the history as it lies before us. Possibly, Assyriology may throw more light on the question by discovering fresh points of contact between the OT and the cuneiform inscriptions. According to Budde, it is constructed on the basis of hints in the genealogies and patriarchal narratives. What remains unaffected by criticism is the prophetic inspiration manifested in the representation of God's holiness and long-suffering, in the analysis of the guilty heart, and in the knowledge of the rapid diffusion of the principle of sin, and its tendency to steadily increasing heinousness as manifested in outward act.

CALAH (כַּלַּח).—The name of a city mentioned in Gn 10<sup>11</sup> as having been founded by Nimrod, or by Asshur; for the rendering of the RVm 'Out of that land went forth Asshur,' is by many scholars preferred to that of the RV text, 'Out of that land he (i.e. Nimrod) went forth into Assyria.' C. is here spoken of, together with Nineveh, Rehoboth-Ir, and Resen, as having been built, according to Heb. tradition, in the earliest ages of Assyrian history.

This city of C. was one of the four cities which together formed the huge city of Nineveh. Its ruins were discovered by Layard beneath the mounds which had gone by the name of Nimrod, lying some 20 miles S. of Nineveh-Kouyunjik, and occupying the S. portion of the V-shaped piece of country at the junction of the Tigris and the Greater Zab.

The impression produced by the passage in Genesis is that Nineveh and the adjacent towns were founded at an age long previous to the time of Abraham. But we gather from the cuneiform inscriptions that the real founder of Nineveh was Shalmaneser I. (B.C. 1300), and that he was the builder of C. (Kalhu), the southern suburb of the great Assyrian capital. C., after the death of its founder, seems to have been allowed to fall into neglect until the days of Assur-nazir-pal (c. B.C. 880), who practically rebuilt it. He surrounded it with a massive wall, on the N. side of which alone are the traces of 58 towers. He erected in it beautiful temples and palaces; by a canal he led the water of the Greater Zab into the midst of the city, and adorned its banks with lovely fruit-gardens and vineyards. But the principal building of all seems to have been his own palace (called the N.W. palace), the walls of which were covered with superb bas-reliefs, representing the king engaged in his duties as priest and warrior. The remains of these splendid works of art were carefully excavated under the superintendence of Layard, George Smith, and Rassam; and they present to the visitor of the British Museum the most striking extant memorial of the art and magnificence of the ancient Assyrian empire. To the E. of the N.W. palace, Shalmaneser II., son and successor of Assur-nazir-pal, built another palace, known as the central, in which was found the famous 'black obelisk,' containing the memorials of Shalmaneser, and the inscription beginning with the words that have been deciphered as 'tribute of Jehu son of Omri.' This was also the palace and residence of the Tiglath-pileser of whom we read in Scripture. But it was pulled down by Esar-haddon (B.C. 681), who used the materials to erect his own, the S.W. palace; and a fourth smaller building, on the S.E., was begun by Assur-til-ilani, the last but one of the Assyrian kings.

All these buildings were raised upon the huge palace-hill, a gigantic terrace made of bricks and faced with stone, 40 feet above the river bed, at the S.W. angle of the city wall. The old river bed must have flowed close by the W. side of this vast structure, access to which, on the city side, was obtained by steps. The size of the terrace may be appreciated from the fact of the mound measuring 600 yards (N. and S.) by 400 (E. and W.), while the mound at its N.W. corner forms a hill 140 feet high.

After the fall of Nineveh, we hear nothing more of C. in history. The work of exploring its wonderful mounds, and of excavating its treasures, will always be associated with the name of the famous discoverer of the site, Sir H. Layard.

CALCOL (כַּלְכֹּל).—A Judahite, a descendant of Zerah (1 Ch 2<sup>9</sup>), otherwise described in 1 K 4<sup>31</sup> (where AV has Chalcol) as a son of Mahol, famous for wisdom, but surpassed by Solomon.

CALDRON.—See FOOD.

CALEB (כָּלֵב, Χαλὲβ) is one of the numerous words in OT which are used both as the name of an individual and the eponym of a family or clan. Acc. to the narrative of Nu 13, 14, C. was (alike in JE and P) one of the men sent by Moses to 'spy out' the land; in JE he is the only one of the spies who dissents from the opinion that the Canaanites were too strong to be conquered; and to him alone is exemption granted from the sentence of exclusion from the Promised Land (Nu 14<sup>24</sup>). In P, Joshua is also named as one of the spies; both are equally faithful, and both have praise and promises bestowed upon them (Nu 14<sup>30</sup>). JE's narrative, which is the older, is followed in Dt 1<sup>22-30</sup>, 30<sup>17</sup>, and Jos 14<sup>6-14</sup> (where the words 'and concerning thee' [v. 6] seem to be an editorial addition). In the last-named passage, C. at the age of 85 claims from Joshua the fulfilment of the promise of Nu 14<sup>24</sup>, and, in answer to his application, has Hebron and the neighbouring hill-country assigned to him, 'because that he wholly followed the Lord the God of Israel.'

The chief interest of the name C. centres, however, in its use as the eponym of the great family of the Kalibbites (Calebites). The latter name is most probably to be explained as an instance of totemism. The Kalibbites were a dog-tribe (כלב=dog). While the K. became eventually one of the most important constituents of the tribe of Judah, C. is truly represented in 1 S 25<sup>3</sup> (Nabal of the house of C.) 30<sup>14</sup> (the Negeb of C.) as distinct from Judah. On the other hand, the Chronicler traces C.'s descent to the patriarch Judah (1 Ch 2<sup>5, 9, 186, 427</sup>), and makes Jerahmeel his elder brother. The difference between the original and the ultimate relation of C. to Judah explains these divergent accounts of C.'s descent, which are found in different documents belonging to different periods and dominated by different motives. While, as we have seen, the Chronicler makes him a descendant of Judah, he is called by JE, the Kenizzite (Nu 32<sup>12</sup>, Jos 14<sup>6, 14</sup>), or son of Kenaz, like Othniel his younger brother (Jos 15<sup>7</sup>, Jg 1<sup>3, 39, 11</sup>). This Kenaz appears in Gn 36<sup>40, 42</sup> among the tribes of Edom, and in v. 11 is expressly designated the grandson of Esau. For probable explanation of Caleb=ephraiah 1 Ch 2<sup>24</sup>, see GENEALOGY.

Taking all the data together, the course of events was probably something like this. The Kalibbites, separating from the main stock of the Kenizzites, who had their settlements on Mt. Seir, penetrated into the hill-country of S. Canaan as far as Hebron. Their relations with Judah were more or less friendly at the time of the conquest, and ultimately they coalesced with that tribe, and came to be reckoned as one of its chief clans. The statements that C. alone spoke hopefully of the prospect of conquering Canaan (Nu 13<sup>30</sup>), and that he afterwards received Hebron as the reward of his faith (Jos 14<sup>14</sup>), may contain a reminiscence of the circumstance that the Kalibbites penetrated into Canaan directly from the S., and before the advent of the tribe of Judah. The name of C. may still survive in the Wady el-Kulab, 10 miles S. of Hebron.

CALENDAR.—See TIME.

CALF, GOLDEN CALF.—i. The use of the word 'calf' in EV to designate the images of Aaron and Jeroboam is somewhat misleading. The Heb. writers invariably (for Hos 10<sup>6</sup> see below) employ for this purpose the word כֶּלֶב 'egel', which, however, like the corresponding fem. כֶּלֶב 'eglah', has a wider application than our calf. Thus we read of an 'eglah' of three years old (Gn 15<sup>9</sup>), and of another giving milk (Is 7<sup>21</sup>, cf. Hos 10<sup>11</sup>, Jer 50<sup>11</sup> RV). A comparison of Jer 31<sup>18</sup> with Jg 14<sup>18</sup>, where the reference is to a young bull and a young cow respectively, of an age to be broken to the plough, shows conclusively, apart from considerations drawn from the study of comparative religion, that 'egel' is the appropriate term for a young bull just arrived at maturity. It is a mistake, therefore, to suppose that the use of the word to denote the images in question is due either to contempt on the part of the sacred writers, or to the diminutive size of the images themselves (so most recently Bacon, Triple Trad. of the Exodus, p. 134, who would translate 'little bull'). The feeling of contempt which Hosea undoubtedly entertained towards the bull-worship of his countrymen has usually been detected in the unique fem. כֶּלֶבָה ḥēḇā Hos 10<sup>5</sup> MT. But the MT is here certainly at fault; for not only do the LXX and Pesh. versions preserve the sing., but the repeated occurrence of the sing. mass. suffix in the rest of the verse unmistakably points to the usual כֶּלֶב as the original reading. In the LXX the rendering is uniformly μόσχος, except in the books of Kings where the fem. δόματις, a heifer, is adopted. The reason for this procedure may perhaps be found in the desire of the translator or translators of this part of the OT to avoid the use of μόσχος, as suggesting to Egyptian readers the sacred bulls of Memphis and Heliopolis. Herodotus and other Greek writers, as is well known, designate the latter as μόσχοι, and in the LXX itself the word is applied to Apis (ὁ Ἄπρις . . . ὁ μόσχος σου Jer 26<sup>18</sup> [MT 46<sup>18</sup>]). The occurrence of the fem. in To 1<sup>8</sup> (τῇ Βάαλ τῇ δαμάλει, Cod. B—but Cod. A τῷ μόσχῳ κτλ) is to be explained by the favourite substitution of δαί for δα by Jewish doctors (see esp. Dillm. in Sitzungsber. d. Berl. Akad., June 1881, on 'Baal with a fem. article'—cf. Ro 11<sup>4</sup> and LXX passim).

ii. AARON'S GOLDEN BULL.—One of the most important incidents which Heb. tradition has preserved of the wanderings is that which now occupies the 32nd chap. of Exodus. A very cursory examination is sufficient to show that the narrative in its present form cannot be the product of a single pen. Thus (a) the author of vv. 9-14 cannot be the author of vv. 20-24; (b) v. 25 cannot have been written by the same hand as v. 24; (c) if the chapter is a unity, the evident surprise of Moses in vv. 18, 19 is inexplicable after the explanation in vv. 7-8. Without going further into the details of the analysis—which in this part of Exodus is exceedingly difficult—we may simply remark that the main strand of the narrative is almost certainly from the pen of the Ephraimite historian, E. Additions thereto have been drawn from the other prophetic source, J, not without some modifications from the pen of the redactor of the two narratives. The main point to note is that the historicity of the incident is attested by our oldest sources, and confirmed by the author of Deuteronomy who based his own narrative (Dt 97-102<sup>1</sup>) on these sources, frequently, indeed, using their ipsissima verba (see parallel columns in Driver's Deut. pp. 113, 114). This conclusion does not exclude the possibility that the narrative in receiving its final literary form may have absorbed some reflection of the religious sympathies of the writers (see below).

The following is a résumé of the leading features of the narrative as now presented:—Becoming impatient under the continued absence of their leader, the people prevail on Aaron to make a god (אלהים) which should go before them. With the material furnished by the golden earrings of the women and children 'a molten calf' is fashioned (the details of the process are obscure), before which an altar is built, and to which, as a symbol of J<sup>2</sup>—see esp. v.<sup>2</sup> 'to-morrow is a feast to J<sup>2</sup>'—divine honours are paid. The rest of the chapter tells of J<sup>2</sup>'s anger, of Moses' energetic intervention, of Aaron's truly Oriental apology, and, finally, of the destruction of the calf (here again the process is difficult to explain), and of 3000 of its worshippers. The uncertainty which prevails with regard to the reading and rendering of v.<sup>4</sup> (see the Comm. in loc.) renders it impossible to speak positively as to the construction of the image. A comparison of v.<sup>4</sup> with v.<sup>20</sup>, and of both with other passages where similar images and their manufacture are described, such as Dt 7<sup>25</sup>, Is 30<sup>22</sup> 40<sup>19</sup> 44<sup>10</sup> ff. etc., seems to point to a wooden core overlaid with gold (cf. what is said below of the bulls of Jeroboam). If this supposition is correct, the image was no doubt life-size or over, as is suggested both by the amount of gold provided and by the fact that Aaron built an altar before it (v.<sup>2</sup>). Much ingenuity has been expended in the endeavour to explain the methods of destruction enumerated in v.<sup>20</sup>. The most probable explanation seems to be that after the core had been charred and burned, the casing of gold (Dt 7<sup>25</sup>, Is 30<sup>22</sup>) was reduced to minute fragments ('dust' Dt 9<sup>21</sup>) by a process of crushing similar to that employed at the present day by the poorer classes in the East in the preparation of cement from broken pottery* (cf. Dn 2<sup>34</sup> 35). As a supreme mark of contempt, the 'dust' thus obtained was cast 'upon the brook that descended out of the mount' (acc. to an interesting detail supplied by Dt 9<sup>21</sup>), and the children of Israel made to drink of it (cf. the analogous procedure, Nu 5<sup>28</sup> ff.).

Deferring to a later stage the question as to the origin, Egyptian or other, of this so-called 'calf-worship,' we must, before passing from the incident of Ex 32, refer to the problem, raised by recent criticism, of the original connexion and historical purport of the narrative. The key to the simplest solution of the problem is that furnished by the account in Dt 10<sup>8</sup>,<sup>9</sup> of the separation of the tribe of Levi for the exclusive exercise of the priestly office. The introductory phrase 'at that time,' v.<sup>8</sup>, refers, we can hardly doubt, to the incidents recorded in ch. 9. Now, if we keep in mind the fact that the great prophetic history-book, as it lay before the author of Dt, contained much which the final redactor excised to make way for the divergent and ampler details of P, the suggestion seems most reasonable, that Ex 32 in its original connexion formed the introduction to JE's account of the consecration of the tribe of Levi to the priesthood. The priestly prerogative, in short, was represented in JE as the reward bestowed by J<sup>2</sup> on the sons of Levi for their fidelity to his cause at an all-important crisis in the history of the wanderings. The use of the standing expression for the priestly consecration (כֹּהֵן לַיהוָה) in Ex 32<sup>29</sup> leaves no doubt as to the nature of the 'blessing' (v.<sup>29</sup>) that was about to be bestowed upon the tribe (cf. also Dt 33<sup>8</sup>,<sup>9</sup> where we have probably another reference to the incidents of Ex 32).

While regarding the explanation just given of the main purport of the narrative in its original connexion as the most probable, we would not seek to deny that other motives may also have influenced the early narrators. No Ephraimite writer of the 8th cent. B.C., imbued with the spirit of the prophetic teaching, could have committed to writing the incident of the golden calf without penning, at the same time, an implicit condemnation of the recognised worship of Northern Israel. That the narratives of Ex 32 and 1 K 12<sup>26ff</sup> are not independent of each other is plain from the almost identical words with which the images are introduced (Ex 32<sup>2</sup>, 1 K 12<sup>26b</sup>, cf. Neh 9<sup>18</sup>). Indeed it is more than probable that the author of Ex 32<sup>2</sup> deliberately chose the unusual plural construction (הָאֵלֹהִים . . . הָאֵלֹהִים) in order to make his covered polemic more pointed.*

iii. THE BULLS OF JEROBOAM I.—The cardinal passage, 1 K 12<sup>26-33</sup> (cf. 2 Ch 11<sup>14</sup>,<sup>15</sup>), is by every token to be assigned to the Deuteronomistic compiler of the book of Kings, who flourished c. B.C. 600 (see Driver, LOT 183; Kittel, op. cit., Eng. tr. ii. 211-212). Whether the compiler is here building on an older written foundation or not, the passage undoubtedly bears the stamp of genuine history. The situation is perfectly natural and intelligible. Jeroboam found that, despite the success of his revolution politically, the temple of Solomon, with its numerous priesthood and no doubt imposing ritual, still exercised an irresistible attraction for the worshippers from the Northern Kingdom. Justifiably dreading a reaction in favour of the Davidic dynasty if such religious pilgrimages were to continue, Jeroboam felt himself compelled to take measures to provide a counter-attraction—a sanctuary or sanctuaries that might retain the more devout of his subjects within his kingdom. While thus maintaining (against Stade, Geschichte, i. 352) the essential accuracy of the compiler's estimate of Jeroboam's principal motive, we would by no means exclude, as an important factor in the case, the desire—on which Stade lays exclusive stress—to pose as the protector of the ancient sanctuaries and the patron of their priests, to whom Jeroboam may have looked for political support. Indeed it is not improbable that many of the Northern priesthood had already begun to realise that the temple of Solomon must inevitably make for the centralisation of the cultus, and, like the priesthood of Babylonia in the case of Cyrus, they may have been among the first to welcome the new sovereign.

We can also understand the motives that led to the selection of Bethel and Dan as the chief seats of the rival worship. The former recommended itself as having been, from time immemorial (Gu

* This suggestion holds good whether we translate אֱלֹהִים in the above passages by 'God' or by 'gods.' On the construction of 'X with a plur. vb., see Driver, Deut. p. 65; Strack's excursus in his Genesis, pp. 67-68; Baudissin, Stud. z. semit. Religionsgeschichte, note pp. 55-57. If we must render 'gods,' then clearly the use of the phrase in 1 K is the older, for (as Kittel has pointed out, Hist. of the Heb., Eng. tr. ii. 212) it is only in the case of Jeroboam, and not in the case of Aaron, that the plural 'gods' has any meaning.

* The pottery is reduced to fine dust by rolling a large stone backwards and forwards over the fragments, as may be seen any summer in the Birket es-Sultan at Jerusalem.

With regard to the size and construction of Jeroboam's bulls we have no precise information. As in the case of the image fashioned by Aaron, we may best think of them as consisting of a wooden core overlaid with gold. This view would be considerably strengthened could we be sure that the obscure word עֲבֹתִים (Hos 8<sup>6</sup>) has the meaning here which it bears in the Talmud, viz., splinters or shavings of wood (see Wellhausen, Die kleinen Propheten, in loc.).* They were probably of considerable size, and represented a young but full-grown bull. There is no authority for supposing that they were winged, like the bulls of Assyria, or were copies of any 'cherubic emblem,' whether in Solomon's temple (so Farrar, Expositor, viii. [1893]: 'Was there a Golden Calf in Dan?') or elsewhere. We are further expressly informed that Jeroboam 'set the one in Bethel, and the other put he in Dan' (1 K 12<sup>29</sup>). The view recently put forward by Klostermann in his Komm. in loc. (1887), and repeated in his Gesch. d. Volkes Isr. (1896), and supported by Farrar (ut sup.), that both images were set up at Bethel, requires unwarrantable liberties with the text, and is contrary to all the available evidence (cf. Am 8<sup>4</sup>, To 1<sup>6</sup> τῶ ἀβραῶν . . . ἐν Δάν (κ)). On the other hand, it is thought by many recent scholars that the bull symbolism was not confined to the two great sanctuaries already mentioned. Stade, indeed, goes so far as to say that there is evidence in Hosea for the presence of bull-images at all the more important sanctuaries (ZATW, 1883, p. 10). The strongest claim is perhaps for the capital, Samaria (Am 8<sup>4</sup> 'they that swear by the sin of S.'), although it is doubtful whether the city or the country is here intended. If the latter, the reference would be to the image at the chief sanctuary at Bethel. The same form of worship was also, in the opinion of many, practised at Beersheba and Gilgal† (Am 4<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>13</sup>, Hos 4<sup>16</sup> 9<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>11</sup> [11cb. 12]).‡

The ritual of these northern sanctuaries does not seem to have differed much from that of the great sanctuary of the South (see an exhaustive presentation of the evidence of Amos and Hosea on this point by Oettli in Greifswalder Studien, 'Der Kultus bei Amos u. Hosea,' 1895). The priests, however—derisively named עֲבֹתִים ('black-coats'?) by Hosea (10<sup>6</sup>)—were recruited from all the tribes, not, as in the South, from the tribe of Levi exclusively, which thing was an offence to the historian, writing from the standpoint of the Deuteronomic law (1 K 12<sup>31</sup>, 2 K 23<sup>8</sup>, and cf. 2 Ch 11<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>). Mention is made of various kinds of sacrifice, although not of human sacrifice (as some would interpret Hos 13<sup>3</sup> עֲבֹתִים יִקְרְבוּ, see the Commentaries). This passage further refers to the practice of kissing the bulls as an act of worship, either by throwing kisses to them (as in Job 31<sup>27</sup>) or by actually kissing the images, as the Moslems do the 'black stone' at Mecca (cf. 1 K 19<sup>18</sup>).

iv. THE ORIGIN OF THE BULL SYMBOLS.—We have deferred to this stage the inquiry as to the origin of this form of religious symbolism. It is needless to occupy space with proof of the absurdity of the opinion so long current in the Church, both Jewish and Christian, that we have here a species of avowed idolatry. Whatever abuses may have crept in at a later period, however gross may have become the conceptions of the people regarding the golden bulls, it is now universally acknowledged that they were originally a sincere attempt to symbolise the true covenant God of Israel. Whence, then, did the Hebrews derive this symbol? How came they to represent the Deity under the form of a young bull? The answer, almost uniformly given from the days of Philo and the early fathers to our own, has been: The Hebrews borrowed this symbolism from the Egyptians. Now, it is indeed a striking coincidence that both Aaron and Jeroboam had intimate relations with Egypt just before they fashioned their respective images. But it is a mistake to speak of Jeroboam as a protégé of Shishak or Sheshonk of Egypt, for this monarch claims to have captured cities from Central as well as from Southern Palestine in the course of the raid referred to in 1 K 14<sup>25</sup>. Some of the difficulties in the way of accepting the Egypt. origin of the so-called calf or bull worship are these: (a) The Egyptians worshipped only the living bulls Apis and Mnevis, as incarnations of Osiris and of the Sun-god respectively; (b) it would have been the height of absurdity to speak, as Aaron did, of the golden calf as representing the God that brought the Hebrews up out of Egypt, had the image been a reflection of any Egypt. deity; (c) the historical situation of 1 K 12<sup>28</sup> requires that the new symbolism by which Jeroboam hoped to consolidate his kingdom should not be an importation from without, but something genuinely national. For these and other reasons the majority of the more recent writers on this subject prefer to seek the origin of the bull-symbolism in the native religious tendencies of the Hebrews themselves—tendencies which they shared with the other Semitic peoples about them. Among an agricultural people there could be no more natural symbol of strength and vital energy than the young bull. The leaning to this particular symbolism was, so to say, in the blood, from the far-off days when the ancestors of the Hebrews were still beyond the flood (Jos 24<sup>2</sup>). This view of the native origin of the so-called bull-worship has been adopted not only by such men as Vatke (Bibl. Theol. p. 398), Kuenen (Relig. of Israel, i. passim), and Duhm (Theol. d. Propheten, p. 47), but by more conservative scholars, such as Dillmann (Exodus, 1880, p. 337; Handb. d. AT Theol. 1895, pp. 98-9), and Baudissin, in Germany, and hesitatingly, in our own country, by Robertson (Early Relig. pp. 215-220, where a full discussion of the problem will be found).

v. ATTITUDE OF THE PROPHETS AMOS AND HOSEA TO THE BULL-SYMBOLS.—We cannot bring this article to a close without a brief reference to this topic. However excellent Jeroboam's intentions may have been in the institution of the new form of the national cultus, and however little the contemporary representatives of Jahwism may have found amiss therein, we cannot escape the conclusion that he, unwittingly it may be, sanctioned a declension from the pure teaching of the great prophet and founder of Israel's religion, with its imageless worship of J<sup>n</sup>. The silence of the earlier prophets is a fact, explain it as we may. It has even been questioned if Amos condemns the bulls of the northern sanctuaries (but see above for Am 4<sup>a</sup> 5<sup>b</sup>). Hosea, on the other hand, is unable to express the intensity of his scorn for them. He saw what his predecessors in the prophetic office had not seen, how dangerous an approach to the worship of the heathen deities of Canaan the institutions of Jeroboam had provided. This worship of J<sup>n</sup> by images had helped on a gradual assimilation of the religion of J<sup>n</sup> to that of Baal, which now threatened to prove fatal to the former. Bull-symbolism was rapidly becoming mere bull-worship. So that while, in justice to Jeroboam, we may fairly modify the sweeping condemnation passed upon him by the later biblical writers, imbued with the loftier spiritual teaching of Deut., we must also charge him with having hindered, not helped forward, the divine purpose in the election of Israel. 'In reality, man cannot with impunity bring down the invisible God to the sphere of the visible; he thereby empties the idea of God of its ethical content; it loses for him its sanctifying, elevating, disciplining, and purifying power; God, for him, sinks to the level of a heathen idol, which makes no higher demands on men. This is amply proved by the history of the Northern kingdom; its image-worship became for it a bridge by which to pass over into genuine heathenism; the heathenish, secular atmosphere (Sinn) and heathen immorality overpowered it, and brought about the premature dissolution of the State' (Dillmann, Handbuch, p. 167).

LITERATURE.—Besides the Comm. on Exodus and Kings, and the works on OT Theology by Kuenen (Religion of Israel esp. vol. 1. 73-75, 235-36, 260-62, 345-347), Schultz, Smend, and Dillmann (Handbuch d. AT Theologie, 1895, pp. 98-9, 166-7), the foll. special works may be consulted: Of the older writers Moncaus, Aaron Purgatus in Critici Sacri, ix., a brief summary is given by Matt. Poole in his Synopsis under Ex 32; Bochart, Hierozoicon, lib. ii. c. 34; De Auris . . . Vitulis, pp. 320-360; Selden, De Dis Syris, pp. 45-64. Of modern works, E. König, Hauptprobleme, etc., pp. 53-58, and Die Bildlosigkeit d. legitimen Jakowcultus, 1886; also on the same lines, Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, ch. ix.; Baudissin, Studien, etc. vol. i., and his art. CALITAS (A Καλitas, B Καλεitas).—One of the Levites who undertook to repudiate his 'strange wife,' 1 Es 9<sup>23</sup>. He bore a second name, Collus (A Κώλιος, B Κώλος). The reading of B is Κώλος, οὗτος Καλεϊταις, κε Ηαθαίος, which should perhaps be read, as Dr. Swete conjectures, οὗτος καλεῖται Σκεραθαίος; but this is an emendation of the Gr. on the part of B, and does not represent the original Heb. of Ezra, as a comparison with Ezr 10<sup>23</sup> 'Kelaiah (the same is Kelita), Pethabiah' shows. A Levite of the same name, and probably the same person, is mentioned as one of those who expounded the Law, 1 Es 9<sup>48</sup> (Καλεϊτας = Kelita, Neh 8<sup>7</sup>, where LXX omits).

CALKER.—To calk (or caulk as the spelling has been for the last century), from calcare 'to tread,' is to stop up a seam, esp. of a ship, by treading or pressing in oakum or the like. Cf. Dampier, Voy. (1697), 'In the South Seas the Spaniards do make Oakum to chalk their Ships, with the husk of the Coco-nut.' 'Calker' occurs in this sense, Ezk 27<sup>20</sup>.<sup>27</sup> (Heb. כָּקֵר, AVin 'stoppers of chinks').

J. HASTINGS.

CALL.—To call is originally to 'shout,' and esp. to shout so as to summon. 1. Hence one of its earliest applications is to invite, now archaic or obsolete, but found in AV, as 2 S 15<sup>11</sup> 'with Absalom went two hundred men out of Jerus. that were called' (RV 'invited'); Jn 2<sup>2</sup> 'And both Jesus was called (RV 'hidden'), and his disciples, to the marriage'; Rev 19<sup>9</sup> 'Blessed are they which are called unto (RV 'hidden to') the marriage supper of the Lamb.' 2. Closely connected with this is the call to some duty, as 1 S 23<sup>15</sup> 'I have called thee, that thou mayest make known unto me what I shall do'; esp. by God, as He 11<sup>8</sup> 'Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place'; Ac 13<sup>2</sup> 'Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them.' Then the word is used particularly and technically of the Divine call to partake of the blessings of redemption; 1 Co 1<sup>9</sup> 'God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord'; whereupon they who are thus called (having obeyed) are described as 'the called,' 1 Co 1<sup>24</sup> 'But unto them which are called' (Gr. αὐτοῖς δὲ τοῖς κλητοῖς, RVm 'unto the called themselves,' Lightfoot 'to the believers themselves'). See CALLING. 3. When one is called it is often by name, from which comes the idiom to call a person or thing so and so, to give a name: Gn 1<sup>5</sup> 'God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night'; 2 S 6<sup>2</sup> 'the ark of God which is called by the Name, even the name of the Lord of hosts that sitteth upon the cherubims' (RV; see NAME). And according to a usage which is now archaic if not obsolete, the calling is transferred from the person or thing to the name, as Mt 1<sup>21</sup> 'thou shalt call his name Jesus'; Gn 32<sup>28</sup> 'Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel.' See also He 5<sup>10</sup> 'Called (RV 'named') of God an high priest after the order of Melchisedec' (Gr. προσαγορεύειν [all] 'expresses the formal and solemn ascription of the title to Him to whom it belongs, "addressed as," "styled"'—Westcott in loc). It is a public designation—ἀγορεύειν, from ἀγορεύω the market-place); 7<sup>11</sup> 'and not be called after the order of Aaron' (λέγεσθαι, 'be spoken of as,' RV 'be reckoned'); and cf. Ac 11<sup>6</sup>, Ro 7<sup>3</sup>, where χρηματίζειν is tr. 'call' (see Sanday-Headlam on Ro 7<sup>3</sup>).

4. Some phrases demand attention. Call again, i.e. call back (see AGAIN), as Bar 3<sup>3</sup> 'He that sendeth forth light and it goeth, calleth it again.' Call back = invite to return, 1 Es 1<sup>60</sup> (Gr. μετακαλέω, used in middle voice in NT = 'send for,' Ac 7<sup>14</sup> 20<sup>17</sup> 24<sup>25</sup>, 28); and fig. = take back a promise, Is 31<sup>2</sup> 'will not c. back his words' (ῥῆς). Call for: (1) Send for, cause to come, Est 5<sup>10</sup> 'he sent and called for his friends' (ἄρξ, RV 'fetched'); Ac 24<sup>25</sup> 'when I have a convenient season, I will c. for thee' (μετακαλέω, RV 'c. thee unto me'); 28<sup>30</sup> 'For this cause therefore have I called for you, to see you' (παρακαλέω, only here in this meaning, elsewhere 'beseech,' Mt 8<sup>5</sup>. 31. 34 and often; 'entreat,' Lk 15<sup>28</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>13</sup>, 1 Ti 5<sup>1</sup>, so here RV; 'exhort,' He 3<sup>18</sup> 'exhort one another daily,' and often; 'comfort,' 2 Co 1<sup>4</sup>, etc.); Ac 13<sup>7</sup> 'Sergius Paulus . . . called for Barnabas and Saul' (προσκαλέω, RV 'called unto him'; but Jn 5<sup>14</sup> 'let him c. for the elders of the church,' RV retains, though Gr. the same); Ac 10<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>13</sup> (μεταπέμψω, RV 'fetch'). (2) Ask, request, 1 K 8<sup>32</sup> 'to hearken unto them in all that they call for unto thee' (ἄρξ, RV 'cry'); Ac 16<sup>29</sup> 'he called for a light' (αἰτέω); Mt 27<sup>37</sup> 'This man calleth for Elias' (RV 'calleth Elijah'), and Jn 11<sup>28</sup> 'The Master is come, and calleth for thee' (RV 'calleth thee,' both φωνέω). Call forth: Is 31<sup>4</sup> (ἄρξ); Ac 24<sup>2</sup> 'when he was called forth, Tertullus began to accuse him'—the tr. of Tindale, RV 'called,' as in mod. law-court phraseology, 'Call the next witness' (Gr. καλέω). Call on or call upon, used frequently, but always of God or the Name of God (קרא or ἐπικαλέω), as 1's 50<sup>15</sup> 'c. upon me in the day of trouble.' In Ac 15<sup>17</sup> 'all the Gentiles, upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord' (from Am 9<sup>12</sup> 'the heathen which are called by my name') we see the reverse side. See this phrase in Dt 28<sup>10</sup> (קרא יהוה יקרא עליהם, 'J's name is called over thee') and Driver's note there.

* In the Gospels there is a distinction between the 'Called,' κλητοί, i.e. those who have received the invitation to enter the Messiah's kingdom, and the 'Chosen' (ἐκλεκτοί), i.e. those who have obeyed it: Mt 22<sup>14</sup> 'Many are called, but few chosen.' But in the Epistles this distinction vanishes, the writer having in mind the divine greatness and force of the call, not the human acceptance or rejection of it. See Lightfoot on Col 3<sup>12</sup>, Sanday-Headlam on Ro 1<sup>1</sup>.

'The sense of the phrase,' says Driver, 'appears clearly from 2 S 12<sup>28</sup>, where Job, while besieging Rabbah, sends to urge David to come in person and take it, "lest I (emph.) take the city, and my name be called over it," i.e. lest I gain the credit of having captured it, and it be counted as my conquest. The phrase expresses thus the fact of ownership—whether acquired by actual conquest or otherwise (cf. 1's 49<sup>12</sup> (11))—coupled at the same time with the idea of protection; and occurs frequently, esp. with reference to the people of Israel, Jerus., or the Temple. The passages are: Am 9<sup>12</sup>, Jer 7<sup>19</sup>, 11, 14, 39, 14<sup>9</sup>, 15<sup>16</sup> (of Jer. himself), 25<sup>29</sup>, 32<sup>34</sup>, 34<sup>16</sup>, 1 K 8<sup>53</sup> (Deut.)—2 Ch 6<sup>33</sup>, 18, 63<sup>19</sup>, 2 Ch 7<sup>14</sup>, Dn 9<sup>18</sup>, 19. [In NT Ac 15<sup>17</sup>, Ja 27, both quotations by James from Am 9<sup>12</sup>.] It is to be regretted," adds Driver, "that in EV the phrase is generally paraphrased obscurely, "called by my name" (which really corresponds to a different expression, נקרא בשמי, 1s 43<sup>7</sup>; cf. 48<sup>1</sup>, Nu 32<sup>42</sup>); but the literal rendering, which in this case happens to be both clearer and more forcible than the paraphrase, is sometimes given in RVm (e.g. in 1 K 8<sup>53</sup>).'

'He that was in question for the robbery.'

CALLING (καλῆσις, vocatio), God's invitation to man to accept the benefits of His salvation. It is God's first act in the application of redemption, in accordance with His eternal purpose (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>). A distinction is made between God's calling and men's acceptance of it (Mt 20<sup>16</sup>), the unrestricted offer and the appropriation which results from a hearty appreciation of what it implies. On God's part it is sure, and without repentance (Ro 11<sup>29</sup>). God in Christ calls to Himself all who are in need of Him, and those who feel their need, come. God's calling of man is in Christ and unto fellowship with Himself in Christ (1'h 3<sup>14</sup>), and is conveyed to all peoples by the preaching of the gospel and the administration of ordinances (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, 20). In respect of its ethical significance and the spiritual condition which it aims at working in all who respond, it is described as a 'holy calling' (Ro 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>), and a 'heavenly calling' (He 3<sup>1</sup>). See ELECTION.

J. MACPHERSON.

CALLISTHENES (Καλλισθένης, 2 Mac 8<sup>30</sup>).—A Syrian, who was captured by the Jews in a small house, where he had taken refuge, in the course of certain successes which followed the great victory over Nicanor and Gorgias, in B.C. 165 (comp. 1 Mac 4<sup>1-34</sup>). At a festival in celebration of the victory, the Jews burnt Callisthenes to death, because he had set fire to the portals of the temple (comp. 1 Mac 4<sup>38</sup>).

CALNEH, CALNO (כַּלְנֶה, כַּלְנֵה, Χαλδωνη, Χαλδωνη, Chalanne).—Calneh is mentioned as one of the four towns of the kingdom of Babylon (Gn 10<sup>10</sup> 'And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar'), but cannot be identified with certainty. Some have thought it to be the Nipura of the Bab. and Assy. inscriptions, the same as Niffer, a town situated between the Euphrates and the Tigris; but this is an impossible identification. Most of the historians, like the Targum of Jerusalem, Eusebius, Jerome, and Ephraim the Syrian, identify it with Ctesiphon in Seleucia beyond the Tigris towards Elam; but this is also worthless. No written record, in fact, has yet been found of the Calneh of Gn 10<sup>10</sup>, the suggested identification of Calneh with Kul-unu (Kullaba or Zirlaba) being rendered still more doubtful by the fact that Kul-unu is closely connected with Erech, and was perhaps a part of that city. The Calno of Is 10<sup>9</sup> ('is not Calno as Carchemish?' etc.), where, according to the LXX, the tower was built, and the Calneh of Am 6<sup>2</sup> ('Pass ye to Calneh and see, and from thence go ye to Hamath the great, then go down to Gath of the Philistines'), which seem to be mentioned as Syrian cities, are probably to be identified with the Kullnia * mentioned along with Arpad and Hadrach, both cities of Syria, in the Assy. tribute lists (WAI ii. 53, No. 3), and cannot be the same as the Kullani mentioned with the cities and districts lying to the north of Assyria in the geographical list (WAI ii. 53, No. 1, l. 6<sup>b</sup>), and therefore cannot be the same as the Kullani captured by Tiglath-pileser III. Notwithstanding that Kullani can hardly be identified with the Calno or Calneh of Isaiah and Amos, it is not improbable that Fried. Delitzsch's identification of these biblical names with Kullanihu, situated about 6 miles from Arpad, may be correct. It seems certainly to be the best that has yet been suggested.

CALVARY.—See GOLGOTHA.

CALVES OF THE LIPS (Hos 14<sup>2</sup>).—See LIP.

CAMEL.—While the Arabic has scores of words for the camel and its varieties and states, the Heb. words are but two—

(1) גָּמָל gāmāl, κάμηλος, camelus; the generic name for the camel, preserved exactly in the Arab. jimal, and in all W. languages. It is one of the earliest mentioned beasts in the Bible. Abraham had large numbers of camels (Gn 24<sup>10</sup> etc.); also Jacob (Gn 30<sup>33</sup> 31<sup>34</sup> 32<sup>7, 15</sup>); they were carriers between Arabia and Egypt (Gn 37<sup>25</sup>); the Ethiopians (Cushites) had camels in abundance (2 Ch 14<sup>15</sup>); also the queen of Sheba (1 K 10<sup>2</sup>); Job had 3000 (Job 1<sup>3</sup>), then 6000 (42<sup>12</sup>); the Midianites and Amalekites had them 'as the sand by the seaside for multitude' (Jg 7<sup>12</sup>). No one who has not travelled in the deserts where camels are reared can realise the force of the latter passage. In a waterless waste of sand and flint chips, with nothing but the salty shrubs of the desert for pasture, immense droves of camels find a subsistence, and, when not worked, become fat on their diet of thorns and salsolas, with an occasional mouthful of tamarisk. They have been steadily employed, not only to traverse the deserts, but in the internal traffic of Pal. and Syria and Asia Minor. David captured a large number of them from the Geshurites, Giritites, and Amalekites (1 S 27<sup>9</sup>). Benhadad used them in Damascus (2 K 8<sup>9</sup>).

The camel was used for riding (Gn 24<sup>61</sup> 31<sup>84</sup>; camel's furniture means the sort of palanquin in which Rachel rode, called in Arab. hamdaj, and still used for women and children). The Amalekites and the Midianites used them, as the Arabs now do, in war (Jg 7<sup>12</sup>, 1 S 30<sup>17</sup>). They were even used to draw chariots (Is 21<sup>7</sup>). The trappings of riding camels were sometimes ornamented with gold (Jg 8<sup>21</sup>).

The Hebrews were expressly forbidden to eat camel's flesh (Lv 11<sup>4</sup>, Dt 14<sup>7</sup>). It is, however, eaten by the Arabs of the desert, and in the towns bordering on it. It is coarse, but not unpalatable nor unwholesome. The Arabs also use camel's milk, fresh and in the form of clabber. Its use is not mentioned in the Bible. 'Thirty milch camels, with their colts' (Gn 32<sup>15</sup>), were given by * Written thus, according to Mr. Pinches' correction of the tablet.

Jacob to Esau, who was a Bedawi. Both probably drank camel's milk, although this is not necessarily implied in the passage. Even if Jacob's descendants applied the prohibition to use camel's flesh to the milk also, Jacob was not under this law.

The skins of camels are used for sandals, and were probably always so used. Camel's hair was spun and woven into cloth (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>). Elijah, the forerunner of John, may well have had a similar mantle (1 K 19<sup>13, 19</sup>). The 'rough garment,' AVm 'garment of hair,' RV 'hairy mantle' (Zec 13<sup>4</sup>), may have been of camel's hair or of goat's hair.

The camel is always loaded, and usually mounted, in the kneeling posture (Gn 24<sup>11</sup>). The pack-saddle is usually of the cross-tree form. The load, on level ground, may be as heavy as 600 lbs. or more. In hilly districts, and over stony roads, the load is lessened. In going up from 'Ain-Jidi to Jerus. there is a steep part of the road where the cameleers take off their loads and carry them up the rocks on their backs, and lead the camels up and reload them at the top. There are calliosties under the camel's breast, his fore and hind knees, and on the sole of his foot. The 'stable for camels' (Ezk 25<sup>5</sup>) is a knéeing place. The signal to kneel is a tap with a stick on the camel's neck; and to rise, a jerk of his halter, with a monosyllabic khiikh. The foot is padded with a thick elastic mass of fibrous tissue, which makes the step noiseless, and protects from the angular flint chips and thorns, over which so much of his way lies. The breadth of the camel's foot prevents him from sinking into the sand. On the other hand, the broad and comparatively smooth surface of the sole makes it very slippery on rocks, or in clayey and muddy places. Camels often have disastrous falls on such roads.

The camel has a provision for storing water in a supplementary cavity in his stomach. This water can be absorbed, or passed into the alimentary canal as needed. Besides this, he has a supply of nourishment in his hump, which is a storehouse of fat, reserved for the long fasts or insufficient provender which are so often his lot. The Arabian camel has one hump, and the Bactrian two. Bactrian camels sometimes appear in N. Syria. Nothing in the way of pasture, however dry or succulent, comes amiss to the camel. He is also fed on cut straw, and kirsenneh, a sort of lentils, horse beans, and sometimes barley. If water is convenient, and he has no access to succulent forage, he will drink every day, or once in two days. The Arabs have a peculiar whoop, 'oowha,' by which they call camels to water. The latter often go a week or more without water. To keep the camel's body from vermin, the Arabs anoint it with tar, the smell of which, with the emanations from the skin, is certainly most unsavoury. They are ill-natured, quarrelsome animals, and in the rutting season often dangerous. The bite of a camel is often quite poisonous, producing death from septicæmia. An enraged camel has been known to bite off the top of a man's skull.

(2) bikrê, pl. const. of bêker (Is 60<sup>6</sup>), is rendered in both AV and RV dromedaries. bikrâh (Jer 2<sup>23</sup>) is also rendered dromedary, with the pronoun her following, to indicate that a female is intended. The etymological signification of both, however, is young camel, (so RVm) the first male, and the second female. They correspond both in form and meaning with the Arab. bekr and bekrah. In both, the allusion is to the vigour and swiftness of youth. In the passage in Isaiah there is a climax, 'the multitudes of camels shall cover thee, the young camels (bikrê) of Midian.' It is similar to the climax in the case of Lamech, 'I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt.' Lane says, 'the term bekr=young camel, applied to a camel, corresponds to fata=young man, applied to a human being; and bekrah, a young female camel, to fatât, a young woman. Bekr and fata are more specialised than the general terms jamal=camel, and rajul=man; and bekrah and fatât are more specialised than naḥaḥ=female camel, and mar at=woman. And in both pairs of cases the specialised words refer to excellence.' There is nothing in the Heb. original in the above passages, nor in its Arab. equivalent, to indicate that it was the intention of the respective writers to refer to a blooded camel (dromedary), an animal for which the Heb. contains no word. The Arab. has such a word, hajin, but bekr is not its equivalent, as above shown. Some have supposed that kirkarâth, which is rendered in AV and RV 'swift beasts' (Is 66<sup>20</sup>), means dromedaries (so RVm), deriving it from kar to leap or gallop, alluding to the long trot of the dromedary. If so, this would be an additional reason for not identifying bekr and bekrah with the dromedary. It is more probable, however, that we should regard kirkarâth as a reduplicated form of kar=palangin (Gn 31<sup>34</sup> the Arab. haudj). With this corresponds the LXX rendering σαῖδια, and the Vulg. carruæ.

Twice the camel, on account of its being the largest animal familiar to all in Bible lands, is used to point a moral. Once, to rebuke the hypocrisy of the Pharisees and scribes, it is said (Mt 23<sup>34</sup> RV), 'Ye blind guides, which strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel.' Again it is said (Mt 19<sup>24</sup>), 'It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.' The hyperbole here is no more striking than that of the preceding passage. Some, claiming a knowledge of the E. from birth or long residence, have said that this latter comparison had its origin in the custom of stripping a camel—belated until the great gate of a city was closed for the night, so that it could no longer enter in the usual way—of its load, and pulling or pushing it through the small gate which is made in the panel of the larger one. They have alleged that the force of the comparison is to be sought in the fact that a rich man must be stripped of his wealth to enable him to squeeze through the narrow gate of heaven, as the camel is stripped of his load that he may be forced through the panel gate of the city. Some have even gone so far as to say that this small gate is known in the E. by the name of the 'needle's eye.' In reply, we would say—(1) That this small gate is known by the name khaukhah, but no one of the many whom we have asked ever heard the name needle's eye applied to it. We believe this to be a fabrication. (2) No camel could be forced through the khaukhah. It is a gate from 3 to 4 feet in height, and from 18 inches to 2 feet in breadth, and its bottom is from 1 to 2 feet above the ground, and by no possibility could a camel be got through it. (3) Could we suppose a khaukhah so exceptionally large that a camel could be forced through it, the hyperbole would be quite lost.

G. E. POST.

CAMEL'S HAIR (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>).—The cloth made of camel's hair is of blanket-like texture, softer than the black sack-cloth of goat's hair. In colour it varies from cream to cinnamon and darker brown, so that by means of this variety a pattern is sometimes introduced to relieve slightly the general dinginess of tone. The large enveloping garment, with its plain belt of leather, which John the Baptist wore, was the common and inconspicuous dress of the desert: it was a sufficient covering by day and night, and doubtless he had come to prefer it. It was the harmonious vesture of the prophet when he delivered his message of protest and preparation, and such simplicity of personal life is still the consistent accompaniment of any voice crying against social luxury and ecclesiastical pride. See CAMEL. G. M. MACKIE.

A camp was a collection of tents (Jg 7<sup>13</sup>), or of huts or booths (1 K 20<sup>12</sup> RVm, Neh 8<sup>14</sup>). Camps, when large, were pitched in the plain for convenience (Jg 6<sup>33</sup>); when small, on hills for safety (Jg 4<sup>12</sup>). In either case it was necessary to choose a spot within reach of water; thus the army of the Northern Confederacy pitched 'at the waters of Merom' (Jos 11<sup>9</sup>), Gideon encamped 'beside the spring of Harod' (Jg 7<sup>1</sup>), Jonathan the Maccabee 'by the water of the pool Asphar' (1 Mac 9<sup>39</sup>).

For defence a position of natural strength was generally chosen, e.g. the side of a ravine or valley (cp. 1 S 14<sup>13</sup> 17<sup>2</sup>). A further defence was perhaps provided by the מִגְדָּל migdal (1 S 17<sup>20</sup> 26<sup>7</sup> 'barriade' RVm). The meaning of the word is, however, not certain (see CARRIAGE). Most authorities take it to mean a laager, i.e. a line of wagons arranged as a barricade, מִגְדָּל agdal being 'a wagon.' In 1 S 17<sup>20</sup> the LXX (A) and Aquila give στρογγύλωσις, which probably means either a circular line of defence or a circular camp; * Syr. has simply 'camp,' while Targ. gives as equivalent a transliteration of the Gr. word χαράλωμα, 'palisade.' In 1 S 26<sup>7</sup> LXX (AB) gives καμπήνη, a 'covered chariot' or 'litter.'

As a precaution against surprise, a watch was set when danger was feared (Jg 7<sup>19</sup>; cp. Jg 8<sup>11</sup>); but camps were usually too strongly entrenched to be openly attacked (cf. 1 S 17<sup>1, 2, 16</sup> forty days delay on both sides, and 1 K 20<sup>29</sup> seven days delay).

In Nu 2 (P) a detailed account is given of the arrangement of the camp of Israel in the wilderness, the principle being that each tribe was grouped round a standard which had a fixed position with regard to the Tabernacle at all halts.

In the NT the stationary Roman camp (ἡ παρεμβολή) at Jerusalem is mentioned several times as 'the castle' (Ac 21<sup>34</sup>, etc.). In He 13<sup>11, 18</sup> the name 'camp' is applied to the Jewish Church of the writer's own day by an easy adaptation of the language of the Hexateuch. In Rev 20<sup>9</sup>, by a further adaptation, the term 'camp of the saints' is fitly applied to the Christian Church, in that it suggests the three thoughts of organisation, warfare, and pilgrimage. W. E. BARNES.

CAMPHIRE, קָפְרִי kāpher, κύπρος, cypus (Ca 1<sup>14</sup>), and plur. קִפְרִיִּים kīphārīm (Ca 4<sup>13</sup>). — The henna plant, Lawsonia alba, L., is a shrub from 6 to 10 feet high, with opposite branches, often becoming spinescent, opposite, oblanceolate to obovate leaves, and panicles of cream-coloured flowers. The Orientals are extremely fond of the odour of the henna, which to most Occidentals is heavy, mawkish, and rather stifling. They frequently put a sprig of it into their nosebags, and the women often put it in their hair, to make themselves attractive. Sonnini says that they put it in their bosoms for a similar reason, which illustrates the comparison of 'a 1<sup>13, 14</sup>. For its fragrance it was cultivated with spikenard and frankincense and myrrh (Ca 4<sup>13, 14</sup>).

Henna is also extensively used in the east to stain the hands, feet, and hair. The hands and feet are stained in lines or diamonds or other figures, by passing strips of cotton cloth around them in such a way as to leave the lines or figures desired uncovered. A paste made of the powdered leaves of the henna and a little water is applied to the skin in the interstices of the bandage, and the hands tied up in a rag over night. When the paste is washed off, an ochreous red stain is left on the parts, while the white skin occupies the spaces which were covered by the bandages. If desired, this colour can be made a deep blackish-brown by applying a mixture of lime and hartshorn over the stain left by the henna paste. Often the nails are thus blackened, while the figures on the hands and feet are left red. Brides, especially among the Moslems, are elaborately adorned in this way, as also infants and young girls. Old women often dye the hair with henna. It is sometimes applied in cases of inflammation, with an idea that it disperses the congestion.

CANA (Κανὰ τῆς Γαλιλαίας, 'Cana of Galilee'). — This was the native place of the disciple Nathanael (Jn 21<sup>2</sup>), the scene of Christ's first miracle (Jn 2<sup>11</sup>), where also the nobleman from Capernaum secured the healing of his son (Jn 4<sup>46</sup>). From these passages, where alone the place is mentioned in the Scriptures, we learn, regarding the site, only that it was in Galilee, on higher ground than Capernaum. Jesus went down (κατέβη) to Capernaum (Jn 2<sup>12</sup>). The nobleman besought Him to come down (καταβῇ). In attempting to identify the site, therefore, we have practically nothing to guide us but etymology and tradition. Josephus gives but little help, his references being evidently to other places, with perhaps one exception. He fixes his residence at Cana, a village of Galilee (Vita, 16), and afterwards (ib. 40) adds that it was in the plain of Asochis. The ancient name was probably Ḳanah (קָנָה), of which the Gr. (Κανὰ) is as nearly as possible a transliteration, and the name would be correctly represented in the Arab. (Ḳānā or Ḳanat, for it is spelt both ways). Again, in Ḳānā el-Jelil the latter word is simply a transliteration of the Heb. Gālīl (גָּלִיל) = Galilee, and has nothing whatever to do with the Arab. julil, 'great' or 'magnificent.' It is the Arab. name for the province of Galilee to-day. Ḳānā el-Jelil is therefore the exact Arab. equivalent of Κανὰ τῆς Γαλιλαίας. This name is found attached to a considerable ruin on a slope of the hills north of el-Buttauf, the ancient Asochis. There are many rock-hewn tombs. Several water cisterns have been found, but no spring. The Heb. name (קָנָה, 'the place of reeds') would be most appropriate, as overlooking the marshy plain, where reeds still are plentiful. It is commonly called Khīrbet Ḳānā; but one hears also, occasionally, Ḳānā el-Jelil on the lips of the natives. It fulfils the NT conditions, being in Galilee, higher than Capernaum, which could be reached by road N. of the Tor'an range, towards the Jordan Valley, without any circuit to the south.

The only serious rival to Khīrbet Ḳānā is Kefr Kennah, on the Tiberias road, 3½ miles from Nazareth. It occupies rising ground on the southern edge of Sahl Tor'an, the branch cut from el-Buttauf, by the Tor'an hills. The doubling of the medial nun is against the identification with the Gr. Κανὰ. Were other difficulties overcome so as to make Kennah represent the Heb. קָנָה, the name would have no appropriateness here, with neither marsh nor reeds for miles around. This line of inquiry leads very decidedly towards Khirbet Kānā.

Tradition yields no clear result. It is often difficult to get any satisfaction out of the witnesses: they are far from exact, and frequently contradictory. A very early tradition must have located Christ's first miracle at Khirbet Kānā. Eusebius (c. 270-340) and Jerome evidently identify Cana with Kānā in Asher, some 8 miles S.E. of Tyre. They could not mean Kefr Kennah, which was not in Asher. In favour of Khirbet Kānā may also be mentioned Saewulf, 1102; Brocardius, 1183; Marinus Sanutus, 1321; Breydenbach, 1483; and Anselm, 1507. As against these, St. Paula, 383; St. Willibald, 720; Isaac Chelo, 1324; and Quaresimus, 1616. The last named mentions the tradition regarding Kānā only to dismiss it. His position has since been stoutly maintained by the monks of both Greek and Latin Churches. Both have considerable ecclesiastical property in Kefr Kennah, and in the Gr. church a jar is shown, said to have been used in the miracle. West of the village is a spring, whence, it is said, the water made wine was drawn. An old sarcophagus serves as drinking-trough. The balance of evidence is in favour of the northern site. Conder (Tent Work in Pal.) has suggested another possible site at Ain Kāna, on the highway from er-Reineh to Tabor.

CANAAN, CANAANITES (גִּזְר, Xardav, Xardavos, Chanaan).—Canaan is the son of Ham, according to Gn 9<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>6</sup>, and the brother of Cush (Ethiopia), Mizraim (Egypt), and Put. In consequence of Ham's conduct towards Noah when drunken, Canaan was cursed, and it was prophesied that he should be the servant of his brethren, Shem and Japheth (Gn 9<sup>22-27</sup>). The passage, however, does not agree very well with the context, as the wrong to Noah had been committed by Ham, and not by Canaan, and it has therefore been supposed that it is taken from an ancient poem. The prophecy was fulfilled when the Canaanites were conquered first by the Israelites, the descendants of Shem, and afterwards by the Persians, Greeks, and Romans.

The tenth chapter of Genesis is geographical rather than ethnological, and the relationship between the nations and states mentioned in it denotes their geographical position, not their racial affinities. When it is said that Canaan was the brother of Cush and Mizraim, we are transported to the age of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Egypt. Dynasties, when Palestine was a province of Egypt. The statement is not applicable to a later period, and so indicates the age to which it belongs.

The name of Canaan is derived from a root signifying 'to bow down,' and (as St. Augustine noticed) means 'the lowlands' of Palestine. Primarily it was applied to the coast, secondarily to the valley of the Jordan (Nu 13<sup>29</sup>). But in time it came to be extended to the whole country, including the mountainous districts occupied by the Amorites. The name appears under two forms. The shorter form is found in the Gr. Xvā (Euseb. Præp. Evān. i. 10; Hekat. Frag. 254, ed. Klausen; Steph. Byz. p. 721), which was Hellenized into Agēnōr, 'the manly one.' Klna or Agēnōr was the older name of Phœnicia, and also the eponymous ancestor of the Can. and the father of Phœnix, or Phœnix himself (Euseb. l.c.). In the Tel el-Amarna tablets, as well as the lexical tablets of Nineveh, the name is sometimes written Kinakhkli (with kh for the Can. 'Ayin), and represents the greater part of southern Pal. as far north as the frontiers of the Amorites. The longer form of the name, Canaan, is met with in the hieroglyphic texts; Seti I. destroyed the Shasu or Bedawin from the eastern rampart of Egypt 'to the land of Canaan, and captured their fortress of 'Kana'an,' which Conder has identified with Khurbet Kan'an near Hebron. Among the geographical names enumerated by Ptolemy Auletes at Kom Ombo is that of 'Kan'an.' The name was preserved among the Phœnicians, the original inhabitants of the sea-coast. Coins of Laodiceia on the Orontes bear the inscription, 'Laodiceia, mother (or metropolis) in Canaan'; and St. Augustine states that in his time the Carthaginian peasantry in northern Africa, if questioned in Phœnician as to their race, answered that they were 'Channani' (Exp. Epist. ad Rom. 13). In some of the Tel el-Amarna tablets, moreover, we find Kinakhkla.

The Gr. Φοινίξ, 'Phœnician,' is the equivalent of 'Canaanite'; and Φοινίκη, Phœnicia, is the original Canaan on the sea-coast. In Latin the name appears as Pœnus, Punicus. Φοινίξ in the sense of 'purple-dye' and 'date-palm' seems to be derived from its use as a gentile, the one being 'the Phœnician dye,' the other 'the Phœnician tree'; the date-palm having been brought from Egypt to the Phœnician coast and there become naturalised. But phœnix, 'a palm,' may be the Egyptian benr, beni, just as the name of the fabulous bird phœnix is the Egypt. bennu. It is probable that we must seek the origin of the name 'Phœnician' in the Penklu of the Egyptian monuments, a name applied in a text of Tahutmes III. at Karnak to the people of Canaan (Brugsch, Ægyptologie, ii. p. 466). It thus corresponds exactly with the Kinakhkli of the Tel el-Amarna tablets. We must suppose that the termination was imagined to be the same as that of Kilix 'Cilician' and similar words, and that the name was accordingly identified with φωνός and φολιός, and explained to signify 'red,' the Latin Pœnus being borrowed from φωνός.

In the bilingual Decree of Kanôpos the Gr. Phœnicia is replaced in the hieroglyphic text by Keft. W. Max Müller has tried to show that Keft was rather Cilicia, but unsuccessfully. The name appears in Greek as Kêpheus and Kêphēne. Kêpheus, father of Andromeda, was said to have been a king of Joppa (Steph. Byz. s.v.), and the Chaldeans of Babylon were first called Kêphēnos, according to Hellenicus. Keft, in fact, seems to have denoted the whole sea-coast of Phœnicia, from the Gulf of Antioch to Jaffa.

Another name applied to Canaan and Syria by the Egyptians was Khal, which embraced the whole country from the frontiers of Egypt to Aup in northern Syria. It denoted more especially the northern part of the region, from which wine was imported into Egypt; while the southern part of Pal., particularly towards the sea-coast, was termed Zahi. The most general name was Rutennu or Lutennu, which corresponded to our 'Syria.'

The mercantile pursuits of the Phœnicians caused the word 'Canaanite' to become synonymous with 'merchant' (Is 23<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 17<sup>4</sup>, Hos 12<sup>7</sup>, Zeph 1<sup>1</sup>, Job 41<sup>6</sup>, Pr 31<sup>24</sup>). In an Egypt. papyrus, on the other hand, mention is made of 'Canaanite slaves from Khal' (Anastasi, iv. 16. 2).

Isaiah (19<sup>18</sup>) calls Heb. the language of Canaan, and the decipherment of the Phœnician inscriptions, as well as the names of Can. persons and places mentioned in the OT, show that the description was correct. Hebrew and Phœnician (or Can.) differed only in a few unimportant particulars, such as the absence in Phœnician of a definite article. The Tel el-Amarna tablets prove that there was little or no difference between the language of Canaan in the cent. before the Exodus and that of the Phœnicians and of the OT in later times. In some of the letters written from Canaan the writer adds the Can. equivalent of the Bab. word he is using. Thus the king of Jerusalem uses anuki, 'I,' the Heb. anokhi, instead of the Bab. anaku, and zuru'u the Heb. zēvā, 'arm,' instead of katu; while other correspondents from southern Pal. explain the Bab. šige 'horses,' kašira 'cattle,' risu 'head,' same 'heaven,' elippi 'a ship,' ina kati-su 'in his hand,' and arki-su 'after him,' by the Can. šūsi (Heb. šūs), makani (Heb. mišneh), rusu (Heb. rōsh), samēna (Heb. shanayim), anay (Heb. 'ōni), badiu (Heb. bēyado), and akhrun-u (Heb. akhrōn-o). The Phœnician governors give batnu (Heb. beten) for the Bab. panēl 'stomach,' mima (Heb. mayim) for mami 'water,' kaparu and aparu (Heb. 'āphār) for ipru 'dust,' and kilabi (Heb. kēlub) for khukharu 'a cage.' Similar evidence is borne by the Can. words borrowed by the Egyptians under the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Dynasties; e.g. markabute 'chariots,' uqolte 'wagons,' harpu (hereb) 'sword,' espat 'quiver,' shabud (shebet) 'staff,' supdr 'scribe,' baith 'house,' bitkrat 'pool,' yum 'sea,' nakul 'brook,' ebete (ebed) 'slave,' gāmal 'camel,' zaba 'army,' na'aruna 'young men,' parzal 'iron' (cf. Lauth, 'Semitische Lehnwörter im Ägyptischen,' in ZDMG, xxv. 4, 1871). The Can. script at the time was the cuneiform syllabary of Babylon; the so-called Phœnician alphabet was not introduced till afterwards. The earliest known inscriptions in this alphabet are the Moabite Stone (B.C. 850), a dedication by Hiram of Tyre to Baal-Lebanon, which may be of the same date, and a single word on a piece of pottery found by Bliss on the site of Lachish at a depth of 300 feet.

One of the Tel el-Amarna letters was sent by Burna-burias, king of Babylon, to Amenhotep IV. of Egypt to complain of outrages committed upon his ambassadors in Canaan (Kinakhkhi). At Khinnatani (Ain-Atlum; cf. the modern Ain-Ethan, near Solomon's Pools, between Bethlehem and Hebron) they were attacked by Sum-Adda (Shem-Hadad), the son of Balumme (perhaps Balaam), and Sutatna (also called Zatatna), the son of Saratum of Acco (Acre), the feet of one being cut off, and the face of another trampled upon. As Canaan belonged to Egypt, and its 'king' was an Egypt. vassal, Burna-burias calls upon the Pharaoh to punish the assailants and restore the silver they had stolen, otherwise amicable relations between Babylon and Egypt will be broken off. In another letter it is stated that Kuri-galzu, the predecessor of Burna-burias, refused the proposal of the Kunnakhians, by whom the Can. seem to be meant, that they should revolt to him from Egypt. Another letter is from a king of northern Syria 'to the kings of Kinakhna, the servants' of the Pharaoh, asking them not to hinder his ambassador on his way to Egypt; while in a fourth Abi-melech of Tyre says he has heard from Canaan (Kinakhna) that 'the king of the land of Danuna is dead and his brother has succeeded him as king, and that his country is tranquil'; that 'one half of the city of Ugarit has been burnt and its troops have perished'; that 'the Hittite army has departed,' but that 'Etagama, the prince of Kadesh, and Aziru (the Amorite) are hostile, and are fighting against Namya-yizi.' Here Canaan seems to be used in a wide sense.

CANANÆAN or CANAANITE occurs in Mt 10<sup>4</sup> and Mk 3<sup>18</sup> as a designation of Simon, one of the disciples of Jesus. The first is the correct reading, the Gr. Kananaïos being the transliteration of קננאי (a late Heb. derivative from קנן = jealous). It is rendered in Lk 6<sup>15</sup> and Ac 1<sup>13</sup> by ζήλωτης (zealot). The Cananæans or Zealots were a sect founded by Judas of Gamala, who headed the opposition to the census of Quirinius (A.D. 6 or 7). They bitterly resented the domination of Rome, and would fain have hastened by the sword the fulfilment of the Messianic hope. During the great rebellion and the siege of Jerusalem, which ended in its destruction (A.D. 70), their fanaticism made them terrible opponents, not only to the Romans, but to other factions amongst their own countrymen.

CANDACE (Κανδᾶκη), queen of the Æthiopians, is mentioned Ac 8<sup>27</sup>. Her treasurer was baptized by Philip (which see), near Gaza, on his return from Jerus., where he had gone to worship. C. seems to have been a dynastic title of the queens of Æthiopia. Pliny says (vi. 29) . . . 'regnare feminam Candace, quod nomen multis iam annis ad reginas transit.' From the time of Alexander the Great the dowager queens used to reign. C. mentioned Ac 8<sup>27</sup> was probably rich, since the eunuch baptized by Philip was said to be 'over all her treasure.' (See Rawlinson, Herodotus, ii. 30 n.; Strabo, Geogr. xvii. 1. 54; Pliny, HN vi. 35.)

CANDLE, CANDLESTICK.—1. In AV 'candle' appears in nine passages of OT as the rendering of נֵר nēr, and in eight passages of NT as the rendering of λύχνος. In the whole of these passages, with two exceptions (Jer 25<sup>10</sup>, Zeph 1<sup>12</sup>, but see marg.), RV adopts the more accurate rendering 'lamp' (which see).

As indispensable to the furnishing of a simple 'prophet's chamber' we find mention of a bed, a table, a stool, and a candlestick (נֵר, 2 K 4<sup>10</sup>). The article in question, however, is rather a lamp-stand (cf. Petrie, Tell el-Hesi, p. 104), and corresponds to the NT λύχνος, now rendered more correctly in the Gospels by 'stand' (Mt 5<sup>15</sup>, Mk 4<sup>21</sup>, Lk 8<sup>16</sup> 11<sup>33</sup> in RV). In Dn 9<sup>3</sup> is mentioned the candlestick or candelabrum of Belshazzar's banqueting hall. For the golden candlestick of the tabernacle and the temple, see TABERNACLE.

2. The custom, practised from time immemorial in the East, of allowing a house lamp to burn night and day, is the source of the frequent figure by which the continually burning lamp pictures the continued prosperity both of the individual and of his family (see Ps 138<sup>29</sup>, 'thou wilt light my candle,' 1 K 11<sup>36</sup>). Conversely, 'to put out the candle of the wicked' (1r 24<sup>20</sup>, Job 18<sup>6</sup>) is to make his home desolate and bring destruction on himself. This familiar metaphor is employed in the Apoc. to describe the fate with which the Church of Ephesus was threatened: 'I will remove thy candlestick out of his place' (Rev 2<sup>5</sup>). A. R. S. CANE.—See REED.

CANKER.—As subst. 2 Ti 2<sup>17</sup> 'their word will eat as doth a c.' (γάργαρα, RV 'gangrene'). As verb, Ja 5<sup>3</sup> 'Your gold and silver is c<sup>ed</sup>' (καρίδα, RV 'rusted'). The mod. spelling of the subst. is 'cancer,' which is found as early as the beg. of the 17th cent. For the verb, cf. Shaks. Temp. IV. i. 192—

'As with age his body uglier grows,
So his mind cankers.'

CANON.—In this article an attempt will be made to give a general view of the history of the idea involved in the application of the word Canon to Holy Scripture; and in so doing the use both of this and other terms to express the idea in question will be noticed. The history of the process whereby the actual Canons of the Jewish and the Christian Scriptures were arrived at will be more fully traced under the heads OLD TESTAMENT CANON and NEW TESTAMENT CANON.

The conception of a C. virtually existed long before this precise term was employed. We have it wherever there is the notion of a collection of writings marked off as peculiarly sacred and as having a special Divine authority. Writings of the past would be likely for the first time fully to acquire this position when an age had come in which the living voice of prophecy was no longer heard. This view of them would not preclude the possibility of an addition to the number of inspired books at a future epoch of revelation. It is also to be observed, though to some this may at first sight seem strange, that a belief in a distinct class of writings of this kind was not incompatible with some diversity of opinion as to its extent, and with doubts on this subject in the minds even of those who were fully persuaded of the main facts. And this is true even of the time after the word C. was introduced. The idea of a C. no doubt gained to some degree in definiteness through controversies as to the writings which were to be held to form part of it. But in essence it was presupposed in those controversies; and their chief result was simply to fix more clearly and firmly the limits of the Canon.

There was no exact equivalent for the word among the Jews in respect to OT, but we have the idea clearly implied in the expression 'the Scriptures' as employed by Jews addressing Jews in NT (e.g. Mt 21<sup>42</sup>, Jn 5<sup>39</sup>, Ac 18<sup>24</sup>); and the word 'Scripture,' as used in the singular for a particular passage, also involves it, since each passage so named derived the binding force which is attributed to it from being contained in the body of sacred writings. So again, where Jos. (c. Ap. i. 8) makes a formal statement concerning these books and their number, the recognition of a C. is implied. And we have it also in the collective words used in the Talm. for the Divine Scriptures, such as ספרים ('reading,' from their being read publicly in the synagogue) and ספרי הקדש ('the holy writings').

The Christian Church adopted the Scriptures of the Jews as her own. She also in process of time extended the idea of 'Scripture' to another body of writings, which in one or more groups were named along with those of OT. Pseudo-Clement of Rome's 2nd Ep. (c. A.D. 150) speaks of τὰ βιβλία καὶ οἱ ἀπόστολοι (i.e. the OT and the apostolic writings). Fresh names, also, were introduced expressive of the fact that she possessed two such collections, or such a collection in two parts. Melito, bp. of Sardis, circa A.D. 170, speaks of τὰ τῆς παλαιᾶς διαθήκης βιβλία (ap. Euseb. HE iv. 26), 'the books of the Old Covenant' (or Testament). And we have evidence about the end of the same cent., in the writings of Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian, that the names παλαιὰ διαθήκη (vetus testamentum) and νέα διαθήκη (novum testamentum), the names that have become the most prevalent of all, had been transferred to the actual writings of the two dispensations. Tertullian himself preferred (see c. Marc. iv. 1) the term Instrumentum (of legal associations = 'documentary record or proof'). He frequently employs it, applying it sometimes to particular books, and sometimes separately to OT or to NT, but also to the Scriptures as a whole. From διαθήκη the adj. ἐνδοθήκης was formed; it occurs repeatedly in the writings of Origen and Eusebius, in a sense closely corresponding to 'canonical' (e.g. Philocal., iii. and Euseb. HE iii. cc. 3, 9, 25, vi. c. 14).

Another description, δεδημοσιευμέναι γραφαί, 'writings which have been made public,' used by Origen and others, needs somewhat fuller consideration. A certain vagueness attaches to it owing to the fact that these writings are contrasted with such as are 'apocryphal'; and while this word is common in the Fathers of the 2nd and 3rd cent., it does not seem ever to occur at this time with the precise connotation which it has since acquired. The original and fundamental signification of 'apocryphal' was that of something withheld from general knowledge. But there might be various reasons for so treating different writings. There were some among the Jews, as there were also some Christians, esp. in the Church of Alexandria, who were inclined to value highly lore which they considered to be unfit to be communicated even to all the faithful, and suited only for the study of the wise. But this tendency was never strong enough either among Jews or Christians to lead to the establishment of a class of writings regarded as authoritative and yet not imparted to all; and the spirit of Christianity in particular was wholly opposed to such reservation. All writings regarded as inspired were naturally included among the δεδημοσιευμέναι—those 'made the public property of the whole Church.' We have still, however, to ask what was meant by and implied in this 'publication,' and, as a further point, whether it could really serve to mark off the writings regarded as, in the full sense, authoritative from all others. The chief means of the publishing in question was the regular reading in the congregation. And no doubt this solemn reading served to impress upon the people generally the idea of the special authority of the books which they heard in this way; while the need of a rule for directing it may have been one influence which promoted the formation of the C. of OT, as it was certainly of NT. But it seems too narrow a view of the words δημοσιεύεσθαι, or publicari, to regard them (as Zahn does, Gesch. d. Kanons, i. p. 134) as meaning little or nothing more than 'to be read in church.' If the publication connoted by these terms was closely associated with the public reading, it was so because that act was the chief symbol of the general reception and acknowledgment of the books by the Church, which had been informally arrived at, and which found expression in various habits of speech and practice. It must, however, further be observed that the fact of particular books being publicly read would seem to be often too inconsiderately taken as evidence that they were regarded as Scripture in the full sense of the term. It is not to be supposed that the public reading would necessarily be regarded as having the same significance, or that the rules for it would be conceived in the same spirit, everywhere and always. There might be, and in point of fact there were, varieties of custom acc. to differences of circumstances and of theological temper. At some times and places there would be comparative laxity, at others special strictness. The Muratorian C. (circa A.D. 200, written at Rome or in the neighbourhood) reveals a disposition to exclude from public reading all works of secondary or doubtful authority. This might be due to the special genius of the Rom. Church, or to a sense of the need of watchfulness which the recent spread of Gnosticism and Montanism and the circulation of the writings of these sects had created. On the other hand, at the very same epoch, we find Serapion, bp. of Antioch, first allowing the public reading of the Gospel of Peter at a place within his diocese, though he knew very little of the work and held it in no particular esteem, and then afterwards forbidding it, when he became more fully acquainted with its contents, and found that it was doing harm (Euseb. HE vi. 12). Again, to pass to a later age. With Cyril of Jerus. in his catechetical lectures, delivered circa A.D. 340, the class of books 'openly read in the church' is coterminous with that of those 'acknowledged among all,' and is the opposite of 'apocryphal'; and he knows no third division (Catech. iv. cc. 33, 35). Athanasius, on the other hand, writing not long afterwards, but representing the usages of another Church, distinguishes between 'canonical books,' 'books that are read,' and 'apocryphal books' (Ep. Fest. 39, i. 768, ed. Bened.). And Rufinus at the end of the cent. distinguishes in the same way, and gives the name of 'Church books,' Ecclesiastici libri, to the second class (De Symb. cc. 37, 38).

We shall now be in a position to estimate rightly the amount of significance to be attached to the introduction of the words Canon, canonical, and canonised with reference to the books of Scripture; but we must first determine which of them was so used earliest, and when? Some have supposed that the employment of the adjective in this connexion preceded that of the substantive, and that it is to be traced back to Origen, on the ground that the epithets canonici and regulares are applied to the books of Scripture in portions of his works which we possess only in Rufinus' tr. No reliance can, however, be placed upon this argument, since these would be the most convenient renderings for such a word as ἐνδιδάσκαι, which, as we have seen, certainly belonged to Origen's terminology. Moreover, Rufinus so renders this very word in passages of Eusebius, where we have both the original and his translation. The earliest instance which can be adduced of the occurrence of either κανών or a derivative in the sense now under consideration is in the Festal Epistle of Athanasius above referred to, written in A.D. 367. The participle κανονίζουσα is there used of the books of Holy Scripture. It seems, however, improbable that the verb κανονίζω, or its parts, should have been so applied before the term κανών had been used of the books collectively. And a little later Amphilochius, the eminent bishop of Iconium, concludes a catalogue of them, which he gives in his Tambi ad Seleucum with the words οὗτος ἀπευδίστατος Κανὼν ἐν εἰρητῶν θεοπνευστῶν γραφῶν. 'The word, which originally meant a rod, and thence a measure, had been already applied in the sense of a rule or norm, and that variously, both in classical and ecclesiastical usage. It will suffice here to notice the phrase δ κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας, for the Church's creed, which had long been familiar. It has been questioned whether, when the word κανών was first used in connexion with the Scriptures, the primary intention was to express the thought that they form the rule of faith and life for the Christian, or to denote the list whereby the contents of the Scriptures are correctly defined. The latter seems to be the true view. It is the simplest; and, moreover, it would be hard otherwise to explain the use of the verb κανονίζω, which is applied both to particular books and to the books collectively. The other idea would, however, also be readily suggested to the mind by the associations of the word κανών. And accordingly we find Isidore of Pelusium, in the earlier half of the 5th cent., expressing himself thus: 'the Canon of the truth, I mean the Divine Scriptures' (Ep. 114).

It will be perceived, then, that no essentially new point of view was implied in the use of the term Canon and its derivatives in connexion with Holy Scripture. At the same time it is noteworthy that they began to be employed at a time when special efforts were being made in different quarters to remove ambiguities with respect to, and to codify, the contents of the Scriptures.

For further illustrations of some of the points here touched upon, and for the considerations which determined the inclusion or exclusion of particular books, or groups of books, the reader must consult the arts. APOCRYPHA, OLD TESTAMENT CANON, and NEW TESTAMENT CANON.

CANOPY (κωνωπίον, from κώνωψ (Mt 23<sup>34</sup>), gnat, mosquito).—Originally a mosquito-net. The canopy of the bed of Holofernes, 'which was of purple, and gold, and emerald, and precious stones inwoven,' was taken by Judith 'from the pillars' as a trophy, and given by her 'for a gift (ἀνδθήμα) unto the Lord' (Jth 10<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>, 16<sup>10</sup>). 'Canopy' occurs also in RV at Is 4<sup>5</sup> 'Over all the glory shall be spread a canopy' (AV 'defence'). The Heb. is קנף, which here only has the sense of a canopy for protection; elsewhere it means a bridegroom's (1<sup>8</sup> 19<sup>5</sup>) or a bride's (Jl 2<sup>10</sup>) chamber. F. C. PORTER.

CANTICLES.—See SONG OF SONGS.

CAPER-BERRY (קִיטָה 'ābiyyōnāh, κάππαρις, Ec 12<sup>9</sup>). The authority of the LXX and of some of the Rabbis is in favour of the tr. 'caper-berry' RV, instead of 'desire' AV.—This is the fruit of Capparis spinosa, L., a perennial shrub, rooted in the clefts of rocks and walls, with straggling, more or less pendulous branches, and orbicular to ovate leaves, 1 to 2 inches in length, and white flowers 2 to 3 inches broad. It grows in all the Mediterranean basin. The ripe berry is oblong to obovate-oblong, and 2 to 2½ inches long. The young berries have a pungent flavour, and are pickled as a condiment. The Arabs of the Sin. desert call it el-āsāf, while the people of Pal. and Syria know it by the name kabar, which is manifestly a modification of κάππαρις. Like all pungent plants, it is stimulating to the erotic instinct. The idea of those who tr. 'ābiyyōnāh 'caper-berry' is that even this stimulant shall fail to excite desire. The principal Rabbi of Beirūt assures me that the tr. of AV 'desire' is that of the majority of the Jewish commentators. In either case the object is the same, that is, to express the decadence of the bodily powers with the advance of years.

CAPERNAUM (TR Καπερναούμ, from which our English word is taken; but Καφαρναούμ, supported by B<sup>2</sup>DZ, etc., is undoubtedly correct, representing the original כפרנחום).—This city is mentioned only in the Gospels, and derives all its interest from association with the life of Christ. To it Matthew applies Is 9<sup>1</sup> (Mt 4<sup>13-16</sup>). After His rejection at Nazareth, Christ made His headquarters in C., and it is called 'his own city' (Mt 9<sup>1</sup>). Here only was it said of Him ὅτι ἐν οἴκῳ ἐστίν—that He was at home (Mk 2<sup>1</sup>). Peter and Andrew of Bethsaida (Jn 1<sup>44</sup>) had settled in C. (Mk 1<sup>29</sup>), and on the neighbouring beach they first heard and followed the Master (Mk 1<sup>16</sup>). Matthew (Mt 9<sup>9</sup>), or Levi (Mk 2<sup>14</sup>, Lk 5<sup>27</sup>), was here called from 'the place of toll.' Many miracles were wrought here (Mk 1<sup>24</sup>). The following are specially mentioned, viz. healing centurion's servant (Mt 8<sup>5</sup>, Lk 7<sup>1</sup>); nobleman's son cured by a word from Cana (Jn 4<sup>46</sup>); Simon Peter's mother-in-law cured of fever (Mk 1<sup>21</sup>); paralytic healed (Mt 9<sup>1</sup>, Mk 2<sup>1</sup>, Lk 5<sup>18</sup>); unclean spirit cast out (Mk 1<sup>23</sup>, Lk 4<sup>33</sup>). Here the lesson of humility was taught from a little child set in the midst (Mt 18<sup>2</sup>, Mk 9<sup>33-36</sup>). A famous discourse in the synagogue is reported in Jn 6. Over C., highly favoured but unrepentant, the heavy woe was pronounced, 'And thou Capernaum, shalt thou be exalted unto heaven?—thou shalt go down to Hades' (Mt 11<sup>23</sup>, Lk 10<sup>15</sup> RV).

C., invariably called πῶλις, 'a city,' was an important position, held by a body of Roman troops (Mt 8<sup>9</sup> etc.). It was also a customs-station (Mt 9<sup>9</sup> etc.). The commander of the soldiers thought it worth while to ingratiate himself with the people by building them a synagogue (Lk 7<sup>6</sup>). It was the residence of a distinguished officer of the king (Jn 4<sup>46</sup>). But beyond the facts that it was on the seashore (Mt 4<sup>13</sup>), and was in or near the plain of Gennesaret (Jn 6<sup>17-21</sup>; see also Mk 6<sup>33</sup>, Mt 14<sup>34</sup>), there is nothing in the NT to indicate the site. Twice mentioned by Josephus (Vita, 72, BJ II. x. 8), neither passage is decisive. Tradition wavers between two sites, and a warm controversy has long raged over the question.

The claims of 'Ain et-Madounerah, 'the round fountain,' a large spring on the N. edge of Gennesaret, may be dismissed. There is nothing near it to indicate the site of a great city; and it waters only a small portion of the plain.

The two serious rivals are Khân Minyeh, at the N.E. corner of the plain, and Tell Hâm, on the shore, fully 2 miles nearer Jordan. The case for Tell Hâm rests chiefly upon the name, the size of the ruins, their position on the eastward road, and the testimony of certain travellers. It is suggested that the Arab. Tell took the place of Caphtar when the city became ruinous, na falling from Nahum. This is an almost impossible derivation. A Jewish Rabbi, Tankhum, is said to be buried here. The derivation from his name is both easy and natural. An alternative derivation is suggested from the Heb. חם = 'brown' or 'fire-blackened,' of which Arab. Hâm is an exact translation. Then Tell Hâm = 'the black mound,' truly descriptive of the ruins, could only date from a time subsequent to the destruction of the city. Along this road only the eastern traffic would pass. The northern caravans never came this way. Jerome, Theodorus (532 A.D.), Antoninus Martyr (?), A.D. 600, and John of Würzburg (1100), may be taken as favouring Tell Hâm. Josephus, hurt on the Jordan, was carried to C.; but this was not necessarily the nearest town. He was evidently anxious to reach his headquarters at Tarichea (Vita, 72). It is much against Tell Hâm that there is no fountain there; and nothing like that described by Josephus within about a couple of miles.

On the other hand, there are many considerations in favour of Khân Minyeh. Gennesaret was a well-defined district, generally allowed to correspond with el Thuweir, 'the little Ghôr,' lying along the N.W. shore of the sea (see Jos. BJ III. x. 8). The disciples started from the other side to go to C. (Jn 6<sup>17</sup>). The waters being stilled, they were straightway 'at the land whither they were going' (ib. v. 21). Matthew (14<sup>34</sup>) says 'they came to the land, unto Gennesaret.' (So also Mk 6<sup>33</sup>.) Those who sought Jesus in the morning found Him at C. (Jn 6<sup>24</sup>), and He addressed them in the synagogue. C. was thus either in or close to Gennesaret. This condition is met by Khân Minyeh; not at all by Tell Hâm. Remains of an ancient city are found in the plain between Khân Minyeh and the sea; also on the adjoining Tell 'Areimeh, where probably a large church once stood. Standing at the junction of the two great roads which must always have united behind Tell 'Areimeh, that to eastward along the shore, and that to the north by Khân Jubb Yusif, it occupied a position of first importance in the district. All the traffic from north, south, east, and west passed through the hands of its customs officers. The spring of which Josephus speaks (BJ II. x. 8) may not have been actually in the plain. Certainly it was not 'Ain et-Tinch. At et-Tabigha (Heptapegon?), on the edge of the valley beyond Tell 'Areimeh, rise several springs, one of great volume, the largest fountain in Galilee. An old aqueduct led the water across the vale, along the face of the cliff in a rock-cut channel, and into the plain at Minyeh sufficiently high to water a large area. Historical evidence is on the whole favourable to Khân Minyeh. Antoninus Martyr (600) is claimed on both sides; but the latter site is supported by Arculfus, end of 7th cent.; St. Willibald, middle of 8th cent.; Eugesippus, middle of 12th cent.; Brocardus, end of 13th cent.; Quaresimus, 1620, who says that a ruin, called in Arab. Minieh, is the site of Capernaum.

The absence of any reminiscence of the ancient name is a difficulty with some. But from the Talm. we learn that C. was, for the Jews, associated with the Minim, the name by which they designated the Christians, who were numerous in the city. The Hittâ of the Talm., 'the sinners,' are the sons of Caphtar Nahum, and again these are identified with the Minim. Among the Jews, C. was the city of Menai down to the 14th cent. The name given to the inhabitants is probably preserved in Khân Minyeh. The balance of evidence is at present greatly in favour of this site.

CAPH or KAPH (כ).—Eleventh letter of Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 11th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

CAPHIRA (Α Καφίρα, Β Πειρά), 1 Es 5<sup>19</sup>.—A town of Benj., inhabitants of which returned with Zerub. In Ezr 2<sup>29</sup> CEFPHIRAH (כפרפר, Β Καφείρα, Α -ι); cf. Neh 7<sup>29</sup>. See CEFPHIRAH.

CAPHTOR (כפתר, כפרס, Χαφθοριεμ, Caphtorim).—The Caphtorim were geographically connected with Egypt according to Gn 10<sup>14</sup>; and in Dt 2<sup>28</sup> we read: 'The Avvim, which dwelt in villages as far as Gaza, the Caphtorim, which came forth out of Caphtor, destroyed them, and dwelt in their stead.' Here the Caphtorim are identified with the Philistines, who are stated to have come from Caphtor in Am 9<sup>7</sup> and Jer 47<sup>4</sup> (where Caphtor is called an 'isle' or 'coastland'). Consequently in Gn 10<sup>14</sup> the words, 'whence went forth the Philistines,' must be out of place, and should follow Caphtorim instead of Casluhim. Caphtor has been identified with both Cyprus and Crete, but the names do not agree. Ebers (Ägypten und die Bücher Moses, 1868) proposed to see in Caphtor an Egypt. compound Kaft-ur, 'Greater Kaft' or 'Phœnicia,' and made it the coast of the Delta, which was thickly covered with Phœnician colonies. But this theory has been overthrown by the excavation of the temple of Kom Ombo in Upper Egypt in 1892. On the wall of the south external corridor is a series of cartouches containing the names of the countries supposed to have been conquered by Ptolemy Auletes and collected from older monuments of various ages. Among the names are those of Kaptar (Caphtor) and Kasluhet (Casluhim), each with the determinative of 'country' attached to it. Kaptar ends the first line, and is immediately preceded by the names of Persia, Susa, Babylon, and Pontus, while Kasluhet (followed by Zoar) is the fifth name of the second line, which begins with the inhabitants of the Sinaitic peninsula and northern Syria. The names, however, have probably been registered at haphazard, so that no conclusion can be drawn from their order.

The Philistines seem to have entered Palestine in the course of the great invasion of Egypt by the northern nations in the eighth year of Ramses III.

Prof. Prásek combines this fact with the statement of Justin, that in B.C. 1209 a king of Ashkelon stormed Sidon, and that the fugitive Sidonians founded Tyre. The dates would agree very well. At any rate, the Pulista or Philistines are closely associated with the Zakkal (Teukrians?) in the attack on Egypt in the time of Ramses III., whereas the latter appear alone in an earlier attack in the time of Merenptah.

From 1 S 30<sup>14</sup>, Ezk 25<sup>16</sup>, Zeph 2<sup>5</sup>, we may gather that the Philistines were also known as the Cherethites or Cretans, as the Sept. transcribes the name. In this case Caphtor must be identified with Crete, or at all events with some district in that island. Recent discoveries have shown that Crete was a centre of culture in the prehistoric age of the eastern Mediterranean, and Mr. A. Evans has pointed out that it possessed a peculiar system of pictorial writing (see his article on 'Primitive Pictographs' in the Journal of Hellenic Studies, xiv. 1894). A. H. SAYCE.

CAPPADOCIA (Καππαδοκία), a large country in the E. of Asia Minor, was formed into a Rom. province by Tiberius in A.D. 17, on the death of king Archelaus. It was administered by a procurator, sent out by the reigning emperor; and it was treated as an unimportant outlying district. In A.D. 70, however, Vespasian united it with Armenia Minor as one of the great frontier provinces of the empire, placing it under the rule of a legatus Augusti pro pretore, who was selected by the emperor from among the ex-consuls; and he stationed a legion (VII. Fulminata) at Melitene as garrison to maintain the defence of the Euphrates line. At this period a great territory, ruled by Antiochus Epiphanes of Commagene, lying between the provinces Cilicia and Cappadocia, and including part of Lycaonia, was incorporated in C.; and under succeeding emperors, especially Trajan, the size and importance of the province were greatly increased, and more troops were stationed in it. The commercial capital of the province was Caesarea - Eusebeia - Mazaka; the military centres were Melitene and (after Trajan) Satala. Between about A.D. 76 and 106, both Galatia and C. were placed under one governor. Jews in C. are mentioned in Ac 2<sup>5</sup>, and implied in Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, § 36 (Mang. ii. 587): a letter in their favour from the Rom. Senate to Ariarathes, king of C., about B.C. 139, is mentioned 1 Mac 15<sup>22</sup>; in the 3rd cent. after Christ and later, a great Jewish population in Caesarea is alluded to in the Talmud. The easy road from Tarsus through the Cilician Gates tempted them onwards towards the N., to take advantage of the lucrative trade between Central Asia and the Black Sea harbours, esp. Amisus: the road passed through C. and Pontus (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>). This trading connexion led to the early extension of Christianity over both countries (1 P 1<sup>1</sup>).

CAPTAIN.—I. IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.—The AV translates no fewer than 13 different Heb. words by 'captain,' and many of these words have other renderings as well. The RV has scarcely introduced much greater consistency. (1) מֶלֶךְ, often translated 'prince,' used especially of 'captains of thousands' (χίλαρχος), etc., and of the 'captain of the host' (ἀρχιστρατήγος). For the 'captain of the host of the Lord' (Jos 5<sup>14, 15</sup>), and for 'Michael your prince' (also מֶלֶךְ Dn 10<sup>21</sup> etc.), see under GOD and ANGEL. (2) מִנְיָן, the foremost officer, used of the king (1 S 9<sup>16</sup>—RV prince or leader, LXX ἀρχων); the same Heb. word is used also of the 'leader of the house of Aaron' (1 Ch 12<sup>27</sup>), and of the 'rulers of the house of God' (2 Ch 35<sup>5</sup> etc.). See below. (3) רֹאשׁ, literally head, Nu 14<sup>4</sup> etc., LXX ἀρχηγός. (4) מִנְיָן, literally lifted up, Nu 2<sup>3</sup> etc., RV prince, LXX ἀρχων. (5) מִנְיָן, literally one who decides, Jg 11<sup>6</sup> etc., RV chief (except Dn 11<sup>18</sup>), LXX ἀρχηγός or ἡγούμενος. (6) מֶלֶךְ, RV marshal, Jer 51<sup>27</sup>, Nah 3<sup>17</sup>. (7) מֶלֶךְ, usually of the governor of a territory, 2 K 18<sup>24</sup>, Hag 1<sup>1</sup> etc. (8) מֶלֶךְ=(1), only in later Heb., e.g. 2 K 25<sup>5</sup>. (9) מֶלֶךְ, baal, 'master,' Jer 37<sup>13</sup>, captain of the ward. (10) מֶלֶךְ Ex 14<sup>7</sup>, 2 K 9<sup>25</sup> etc., probably knight or quarry, LXX στρατός. The other three words are (in AV) mistranslated captain, 2 K 11<sup>4, 19</sup>, Jer 13<sup>2</sup>, Ezk 21<sup>22</sup> (מֶלֶךְ, מֶלֶךְ, מֶלֶךְ, respectively).

II. Captain represents three words in the NT (1) χίλαρχος—used vaguely of a military officer, and technically as the equivalent of the Roman 'praefectus' or 'tribunus militum.' One such officer was regularly in charge of the Roman garrison at Jerusalem, which probably consisted of a cohort of auxiliaries, about 1000 men in all. The commander would be a Roman citizen (Ac 22<sup>28</sup>), the soldiers provincials (not Jews, but many of them Samaritans), who would receive the franchise on discharge. Whether the word has the technical or the vaguer sense in Jn 18<sup>12</sup> is not clear. (2) στρατηγός—used in Lk 22<sup>4, 52</sup> and Ac 4<sup>1, 5, 24, 26</sup> of the captain of the Temple, together with his chief subordinates, who are perhaps the same as the three 'keepers of the threshold' (2 K 25<sup>18</sup>, Jer 35<sup>4</sup>, and see Josephus, Ant. x. viii. 5). This captain (מֶלֶךְ, see (2) above) is mentioned Jer 20<sup>1</sup> (LXX ἡγούμενος) and Neh 11<sup>1</sup>, and is called in 2 Mac 3<sup>4</sup> προστάτης τοῦ τεποῦ, and in Josephus (Ant. xx. vi. 2, etc.) στρατηγός. Probably he and his chief subordinates are indicated by the term 'rulers' in Ezr 9<sup>2</sup> and often in Neh (מֶלֶךְ, LXX στρατηγοί or ἀρχοντες): see Schürer, HJP ii. i. 258. The captain was at least a Levite, and commanded a small body of police, probably themselves priests; and he had the duty of keeping order in the Temple, and watching there by night. (3) ἀρχηγός—He 2<sup>10</sup>—probably to be understood rather as author and beginner than as commander in a fight (cf. Ac 3<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>31</sup>, He 12<sup>2</sup>).

The captain of the guard (στρατομεδάρχης, Ac 28<sup>16</sup> TR and AV) would, perhaps, be the 'principes castrorum peregrinorum'; it would hardly mean the 'praefectus pretorio,' whose title is never so rendered in Greek. But the sentence is omitted by RV following the best authorities: it is, however, an ancient 'Western reading,' and possibly records a real tradition. (See Mommsen in Sitzungsber. d. kgl. preuss. Akad. d. Wissensch., phil.-hist. Classe, 1895, p. 495, and art. PRÆTORIUM.)

CAPTIVITY.—See ISRAEL.

CARABASION (Β Καρabasίων, Α -σιών), 1 Es 9<sup>24</sup>.—A corrupt name of one of those who put away their 'strange' wives. It seems to correspond to MEREMOTH in Ezr 10<sup>38</sup>. The conjecture that it should be read καὶ Παρabasίων is not supported (as is stated in Speaker's Comm.) by the Vat. text.

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

CARAVAN, not used in AV, is given by RV in Job 6<sup>18, 19</sup> (מִדְּבָר עֲרָבָה est.) for AV 'paths,' 'troops'; in Is 21<sup>18</sup> (ptep. of עֲרָבָה) for AV 'travelling companies'; and in Ezk 27<sup>25</sup> 'The ships of Tarshish were thy caravans for thy merchandise,' for AV 'The ships of Tarshish did sing of thee in thy market,' taking עֲרָבָה from עֲרָבָה to travel (after Gesen.) not עֲרָבָה to sing. But Davidson doubts: 'The camel has been called the ship of the desert, but conversely to call an east-indiaman a caravan is too brilliant for the prophet.' See his note. In older Eng., however, the word might have been applicable without crediting Ezekiel with the brilliant metaphor, since 'caravan' was used from the beg. of the 17th to the middle of the 18th cent. for a fleet of ships, as Fuller, Com. on Ruth (1654): 'A caravan . . . sailing in the vast ocean.' J. HASTINGS.

CARBUNCLE.—See STONES, PRECIOUS.

CARCAS (כַּרְקָס, Est 1<sup>10</sup>), one of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of king Ahasuerus. An etymology suggested is the Persian kargas, 'vulture.' The LXX gives a different name.

CARCASE (the spelling has been indifferently carcase or carcass throughout, though dictionaries have given carcass alone, or by preference since Johnson) is used now only of the dead body of a beast, or contemptuously of a human being, but was formerly used freely of either. The Heb. words are various: (1) קָרָס qārās (used of living body also) is so tr. only Jg 14<sup>8</sup> of the c. of Samson's lion (RV 'body'), which is also (14<sup>9</sup>) called (2) קָרָס qārās (fr. קָרַס to fall, as πῶμα fr. πᾶσσω, cadaver fr. cadere), which has this meaning only here; elsewhere 'fall' Pr 29<sup>10</sup>, Ezk 28<sup>16</sup>, 31<sup>18</sup>, 32<sup>10</sup>, or 'ruin' Ezk 27<sup>27</sup>, 31<sup>18</sup> [all]. (3) קָרָס qārās and (4) נֶבֶחֱלָה neḥelāh are often tr. 'carcase.' Both are also applied to the trunk of an idol, peger Lv 26<sup>30</sup> 'I will cast your carcases upon the carcases of your idols'; neḥelāh Jer 16<sup>4</sup> 'they have filled mine inheritance with the carcases of their detestable things.' Both words are used in Heb. of dead bodies only, so that the tr. 'dead carcase' of Dt 14<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 6<sup>9</sup>, is as needless for the Heb. as in the Eng.; RV omits 'dead.'

In Bel<sup>22</sup> 'in the den there were seven lions, and they had given them every day two carcases and two sheep' (so RV, AVm 'slaves,' Gr. δῶματα, lit. 'bodies,' used of 'servants,' i.e. slaves, To 10<sup>10</sup>).

In NT 'carcase' occurs Mt 24<sup>28</sup> 'whosoever the c. is, there will the eagles be gathered together' (πῶμα, as in Wis 4<sup>18</sup>); and He 3<sup>17</sup> 'whose carcases fell in the wilderness' (κῶλον, lit. 'limbs,' the LXX tr. of קַיִס in Nu 14<sup>29</sup>, 32 where the language is nearly identical). J. HASTINGS.

CARCHEMISH (כַּרְכַּמִּישׁ; omitted in the LXX at 2 Ch 35<sup>20</sup>, but at Jer 26 [Heb 46]<sup>2</sup> Karqamis [Q. Karqarqmish]; Vulg. Charcamis). There have been various conjectures as to the site of this city, which was finally correctly located by Messrs. Skene and Geo. Smith, by means of the Assyrian inscriptions. Carchemish is at present represented by the mounds of Jerablūs (Smith, Yaraboloos) or Hierapolis, on the western bank of the Euphrates, described by Smith as a grand site, with vast walls and palace-mounds 8000 ft. round, and containing numerous sculptures and monoliths with inscriptions, many of which are now in the British Museum. Pococke says that the ruins are rectangular, and measure  $\frac{1}{2}$  mile long by  $\frac{1}{4}$  mile wide. The mounds lie between Birejik and the junction of the Sajur and the Euphrates. Carchemish, the chief city of the Hittites, was called Karkamis by the Babylonians, Gargamis and Kargamis by the Assyrians, and Karikamāi(?)sa or Karakamisa by the Egyptians, and the city was known—perhaps renowned—as a trading centre as early as the 3rd millennium B.C.\* Amen-em-hebe, one of the captains of Tahutmes III. (c. B.C. 1600), refers to his campaign against the people of Karikamāi(?)sa, where he took prisoners;† and about B.C. 1200 Tiglath-pileser I. of Assyria plundered the land of the neighbourhoood of Suhi as far as Carchemish (Kar-gamiš) of the land of Hatti (Kheta or Hit) in a single day.' There is no record, however, that the fortress was taken on this occasion. The ruler of Carchemish about B.C. 880 was Sangara, who paid a large amount of tribute, chiefly in manufactured things, such as furniture and woven stuffs, also metal, to Aššur-naḥir-pal, king of Assyria. Sangara afterwards came into conflict with Shalmaneser II., son of Aššur-naḥir-pal, about B.C. 858, and the Assyrian king says that he captured Sangara's cities, receiving from the latter, when he submitted, 2 talents of gold, 70 talents of silver, 30 talents of copper, 100 talents of iron, 20 talents of purple cloth, 500 weapons, his daughter with a dowry, 100 daughters of the great men of the place, 500 oxen, and 5000 sheep, and fixed as his (yearly) tribute 1 maneh of gold, 1 talent of silver, and 2 talents of purple cloth, one payment of which is duly recorded as having taken place. The large amount of the war indemnity and the tribute testify to the prosperity and commercial importance of the city. On the bronze gates found by H. Rassam at Balawat the reception of tribute by Shalmaneser II. is twice represented, and in each case a picture in relief of the fortress is given. The city was finally taken by Sargon of Assyria in B.C. 717, when Pisiri or Pisiris, its last king, was made prisoner. From this time it formed part of the Assyrian empire, and was administered by an Assyrian governor.\* Its importance as a trading centre continued under its new rulers, the 'maneh of Carchemish' being one of the standard weights in use at Nineveh. Later notices of the city occur in the Bible itself, when Pharaoh-Necho defeated Josiah in the battle in which the Jewish king lost his life (2 Ch 35<sup>20</sup>), and was himself defeated by Nebuchadrezzar, four years later (B.C. 605), under the walls of the city (Jer 46<sup>2</sup>), in the battle which decided the fate of Western Asia. The patron deity of the city was the Asiatic goddess worshipped under the name of Atargatis, whose worship, when the city fell into decay, was transferred to the city now represented by Membij, which became the new Hierapolis, and continued in existence after the old city of Carchemish was deserted. The meaning of the name is unknown.

CARE.—The proper meaning of this word, and of all its compounds (of which there occur in AV 'careful,' 'carefully,' 'carefulness,' 'careless,' 'carelessly') is trouble or sorrow. But from a very early period it was confounded with Lat. cura (with which it has no connexion, being a purely Teutonic word), and the meaning of cura, viz. attention to something or somebody, became attached to it. This affected even the original word, so that care in the sense of sorrow became anxiety, as if due to over-attention; while the compounds have now actually dropped their original meaning, and adopted that of cura wholly. But throughout the history of the word, and esp. in AV, we can trace the two senses side by side.

1. Care is both subst. and verb. As subst. (1) Anxiety (Gr. μέριμνα): Mt 13<sup>22</sup>, 'the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word'; so Mk 4<sup>19</sup>, Lk 8<sup>14</sup> 21<sup>34</sup> 'cares of this life,' 2 Co 11<sup>28</sup> 'the care of all the churches' (RV 'anxiety for'), 1 P 5<sup>7</sup> 'Casting all your care upon him' (RV 'anxiety'), 1 Mac 6<sup>10</sup> 'my heart faileth for very care.' In OT, 1 S 10<sup>2</sup> 'thy father hath left the care of the asses (i.e. concern about, קָרָס, lit. 'the matters of the asses'), and sorroweth for you,' Ezk 4<sup>18</sup> 'they shall eat bread by weight, and with care' (קָרָס, RV 'carefulness'). (2) Attention (esp. earnest attention, the original meaning of the word in turn affecting this borrowed meaning; (Gr. σπουδή): 2 Co 7<sup>12</sup> 'om care for in the sight of God' (RV 'earnest care,' as 8<sup>16</sup> AV, RV); Ph 4<sup>10</sup> 'your care for me' (τὸ φρονεῖν, RV 'thought for me') Wis 6<sup>17</sup> 7<sup>4</sup> (φροντίς). As verb (1) Anxiety or concern (Gr. μεριμνᾶω); 1 Co 7<sup>32</sup> 33. 34 'But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord: but he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife' (RV 'is careful for'); 12<sup>25</sup>, Ph 2<sup>20</sup>. In OT, 2 S 18<sup>3</sup> 'if we flee away, they will not care for us, neither if half of us die, will they care for us' (Heb. לָשׂוּעַ). (2) Attention: Dt 11<sup>12</sup> 'a land which the Lord thy God careth for' (עָרַךְ, RVm 'seeketh after'), the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it'; Ps 142<sup>1</sup> 'no man cared for my soul.' When the expression is care for, the distinction is not always obvious, since it is the person that is anxious about who will give attention to; but in the foll. passages (where the Gr. is μελεῖ) the meaning is always anxiety or concern: Mt 22<sup>16</sup>, Mk 12<sup>14</sup>, Jn 10<sup>13</sup> 'he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep,' 12<sup>9</sup> 'not that he cared for the poor,' Ac 18<sup>17</sup> 'Gallio cared for none of these things,' 1 Co 7<sup>21</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>7</sup> 'He careth for you.' On the other hand, to take care of (ἐπιμελεῖσθαι) must be 'to give attention to,' Lk 10<sup>34</sup> 'he brought him to an inn and took care of him,' 10<sup>36</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>6</sup> 'if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?' Hence 1 Co 9<sup>9</sup> AV, 'Doth God take care for oxen?' (μελεῖ) is a serious mistranslation. God does take care for oxen, as for all living creatures, but it is only for man that He may be said to have concern (RV 'Is it for the oxen that God careth?').

Careful.—1. Anxious, Lk 10<sup>41</sup> 'Martha, Martha, thou art c. and troubled about many things' (μεριμνᾷς RV 'thou art anxious'), Ph 4<sup>6</sup> 'Be careful for nothing' (μηδὲν μεριμνᾶτε, RV 'In nothing be anxious'). In OT, Jer 17<sup>8</sup> 'he shall be as a tree planted by the waters . . . and shall not be c. in the year of drought' (אָרַךְ); Dn 3<sup>16</sup> 'O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not c. to answer thee in this matter' (אָרַךְ, RV 'we have no need,' RVm as AV). Cf. Shaks. Tit. And. iv. iv. 84—

'The eagle suffers little birds to sing,
And is not careful what they mean thereby.

In Apoc., Bar 3<sup>18</sup> 'They . . . were so c.' (μεριμνῶντες); to which RV adds 2 Es 2<sup>7</sup> 'Be not c. overmuch,' an expression which brings out the difference between careful=anxious, and careful=attentive or painstaking; in the latter sense, as we put it, 'you cannot be too careful.' 2. Attentive to one's interests, painstaking: Ph 4<sup>10</sup> 'Now at the last your care of me hath flourished again; wherein ye were also c., but ye lacked opportunity' (ἐφρονεῖτε, RV 'ye did take thought'); Tit 3<sup>8</sup> 'that they which have believed in God might be c. to maintain good works' (φροντίσω); 2 K 4<sup>13</sup> 'thou hast been c. for us with all this care' (עָרַךְ, usually 'to tremble,' and so here 'to be anxiously careful,' its only occurrence in this sense).

Carefully.—In the sense of anxiously, c. occurs only Mic 1<sup>12</sup> 'the inhabitant of Maroth waited c. for good' (עָרַךְ, lit. 'has been in pain,' RV 'waiteth anxiously'). In the sense of attentively, there are in AV Dt 15<sup>5</sup> 'if thou c. hearken' (שָׁמַעְתָּ, 'if hearkening thou shalt hearken,' RV 'if thou shalt diligently hearken,' as AV in 11<sup>13</sup> 28<sup>1</sup>, same Heb.); Wis 12<sup>22</sup> 'we should c. think of thy goodness' μεριμνῶμεν, RV 'ponder'); Ph 2<sup>28</sup> 'I sent him the more c.' (σπουδαιοτέρως, RV 'the more diligently'); He 12<sup>17</sup> 'he sought it c. with tears' (ἐκζητέω, RV 'sought it diligently'). To these RV adds Mt 27<sup>16</sup> (ἀκριβῶς, AV 'diligently'), 2<sup>8</sup> (ἀκριβῶς AV 'diligently'), Ac 18<sup>26</sup> (ἀκριβῶς, AV 'diligently') 18<sup>26</sup> (ἀκριβῶς AV 'perfectly') and He

Carefulness, in the sense of anxiety, is given in AV (as tr. of ἡρεσ) Ezk 12<sup>18</sup> 19; to which RV adds 4<sup>16</sup> (AV 'care'), Jos 22<sup>24</sup> (AV 'fear'). In the same sense is Sir 30<sup>24</sup> 'c. bringeth age before the time' (μέριμνα, RV 'care'); and 1 Co 7<sup>32</sup> 'I would have you without c.' (ἀμέριμνος, RV 'free from cares'). Cf. Latimer, Ser. i. 413, 'Consider the remedy against carefulness, which is to trust in God.' But the sense of watchful and helpful interest is clear in 2 Co 7<sup>11</sup> 'what c. it wrought in you' (σπουδή, RV 'earnest care'); for the same apostle commends c. in this passage, who had condemned it in the previous.

Careless and Carelessly have always the meaning of without trouble or anxiety, in security (the Heb. being always אָרַךְ 'to trust,' or אָרַךְ 'confidence'); 'careless' Jg 18<sup>7</sup>, Is 32<sup>9</sup> 10. 11, Ezk 30<sup>9</sup> (but RV adds 1r 19<sup>16</sup> Heb. הָקַדַּח 'a despiser'); 'carelessly' Is 47<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 39<sup>6</sup>, Zeph 2<sup>10</sup>. Cf.—

CARIA (Καρία) is actually mentioned only in 1 Mac 15<sup>38</sup> as one of the places to which the Rom. Senate sent a circular letter in B.C. 139–138 in favour of the Jews. The political entity which is here meant was probably the Chrysaorian confederacy, in which most of the cities (esp. the inland cities) of C. were united, meeting at the temple of Zeus Chrysiorens at Stratonicea. C., most of which belonged to the Rhodians from 190 to 168, was then declared free by the Romans; and this confederacy was the responsible government until 129, when the country was incorporated in the province of Asia. The coast cities of C. were chiefly Greek, and did not belong to the confederacy: of these Miletus was Ionian; Cnidus, Cos, and Halicarnassus were Dorian; hence the Rom. Senate sent their letter about the Jews (see DELUS) to the Dorian cities, Cnidus, Halicarnassus, Cos, and also to Rhodes and Myndus (which seem to be nearly the complete list of Carian governments).

CARITES (כָּרִיתִים) occurs in the Kethibh of the Heb. text and margin of RV in 2 S 20<sup>34</sup>, where the Kerē has Cherethites (כְּרִיתִים), and in RV of 2 K 11<sup>4</sup>, where the AV has captains (RVm executioners). The Carites were possibly Phil. mercenaries from Caria, as the Cherethites were from Crete. See CHERETHITES, and cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC 2 262 n.

CARMEL (usually with the def. art. כַּרְמֶל 'the garden' or 'garden-land'; without it only in Jos 19<sup>28</sup>, Jer 46<sup>18</sup>, Nah 1<sup>4</sup>; ὁ Κάρμηλος; but generally ἡ Κάρμηλος 'Mount of the Carmel'; ὄρος τὸ Καρμήλιον; Jos. Κάρμηλος, Καρμήλιον ὄρος. In later Heb. כַּרְמֶל. In the list of places conquered by Tahutmes III. in Pal., No. 49 reads Kalimna, which Tomkins takes as Kalamon or Carmel; and No. 48, Rshkadsh, by which Maspero understands Rosh-Kodshu, 'the sacred headland' of Carmel. Mod. Arab. Karmāl, but more usually Jebel Mār Elyas).—This long headland, which forms one of the great features of Pal., is of the same hard limestone as the central range of the country, but is separated from the latter by hills of softer formation, which are therefore more worn than itself, and now lie lower and are opened up by passes. The promontory of Carmel rises above a narrow sea-beach to a height of some 500 ft. at the monastery; thence the ridge, running S.E., ascends (PEF Large Map, sheets v. and viii.)  $9\frac{1}{2}$  miles to Esia (1742 ft.), and then sinks for  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles more to its end at El-Mahraka (1687 ft.); beyond which there is a sudden dip into the Wady el-Milh, a valley that separates Carmel from the lower hills aforesaid, the Belâd er-Ruhah. The ridge is well-defined, and in shape a wedge, with the thin end seaward, in breadth from plain to plain  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles, but at the thick or inland end as much as  $8\frac{1}{2}$  miles broad. The sides are very differently disposed. The S.W. sinks slowly by long ridges and glens upon the plain of Sharon; the N.E. is abrupt and steep above the plains of Haifa and Esdraelon. At the foot of the latter runs Kishon, for the most part parallel to the axis of the mountain. The limestone of C. abounds in flints, 'geodes' (known as 'Elijah's melons'), and fossils; and on the N.E. igneous rocks crop out from a basalt formation that extends to the Sea of Galilee (Ritter, Pal. 712, 713). There are very many caves.

C. is very conspicuous from most parts of central Pal.; its high sky-line, with the line of Bashan and the great mass of Hermon, form the three grandest features of all views from Esdraelon, Galilee, and the mountains of Ephraim. Accordingly C., Gilead or Bashan, and Lebanon are frequently named together in OT (Is 33<sup>9</sup> 35<sup>2</sup>, Mic 7<sup>14</sup> etc.). Once C. is coupled with Tabor: "Pharaoh is but a rumour?" As I live, saith J', surely like Tabor among mountains, and like C. by the sea, shall he come! (Jer 46<sup>18</sup>). At opposite ends of Esdraelon (the very scene of Pharaoh's coming) the two hills stand out, symbols of that which shall certainly be established as fact, and make its presence felt. Sweeping seaward, in the face of the rains, C., as its name declares, is richly clothed with verdure. At present this is mostly wild—a thick growth of underwood, grass and flowers, coppices of oak, carob, and many evergreens, with here and there a grove of great trees. Van de Velde asserts that there was not a flower found by him in Galilee or in the maritime plain which he did not also meet on C., 'still the fragrant lovely mountain that it was of old' (i. 317, 318). But there are, too, frequent olive-groves, and other gardens, with prosperous villages; while the more numerous grooved floors and troughs that have been traced in the rock below the brushwood, prove that, in ancient times, there was an even greater cultivation, and chiefly of olive and vine. Accordingly, in OT Carmel is the very type of a luxuriant fertility (Is 35<sup>2</sup> etc.); her decay the prophets' most desperate figure of desolation (Am 1<sup>3</sup>, Is 33<sup>9</sup> etc.). The German colonists at Haifa have resumed the culture of the vine on the N. slopes of the promontory.

C. plays no part in the political or military history of Palestine. The great campaigns swept past her on either side: in military tactics the hill was only an obstacle to be avoided. By far the most armies, whether going north or south, crossed between Esdraelon and Sharon by the passes to the east of C. Some of the Syrian advances south, Rom. legions when passing from Ptolemais to Caesarea, Richard Lionheart and the Third Crusade, Napoleon on his retreat from Acre,—these followed the sea road under the promontory. May not this quality of being neither a goal in itself, nor on the road anywhere, be the origin of the curious Talmudic word תרמלין?

The aloofness of C. from the central range made its ridge but an uncertain appendage to the territory of Israel. According to Jos 19<sup>38</sup> it was assigned to the tribe of Asher; but their tenure must have been intermittent. The kings of N. Israel seem to have held it as they held Gilead; but even in the time of Amos (9<sup>8</sup>) 'the top of C.' is regarded as a hiding-place of fugitives from J'; and in later history it lay outside Samaria, and was sometimes allotted to Galilee, but frequently subject to Tyre (Jos. BJ III. iii. 1).

The causes, however, which disabled C. from political rank, contributed to enhance its fame as a sanctuary. 'In its separation from other hills, its position on the sea, its visibleness from all quarters of the country, its uselessness for war and traffic, in its profusion of flowers, its high platforms and groves, with their glorious prospects of land and sea, C. must have been a place of retreat and of worship from the earliest times.' Maspero thinks to identify it in the lists of Tahutmes III. under the name of 'headland of holiness' (see above); and even before Elijah's day there seem to have been upon it altars both to Baal and J'. For here, as on ground which both of them held to be sacred, the representatives of the two religions met to appeal to their respective deities, and decided the argument between them (1 K 18<sup>17ff.</sup>). Tradition and the agreement of many modern explorers (see esp. Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 353 f.) place the scene at the E. end of the ridge, at a place called El-Mahraka, or 'the burning,' where Druses have a sanctuary and are said still to perform a yearly sacrifice; there is a good spring just below (cf. Jos. Ant. VIII. xiii. 5). It is interesting that immediately below, on the banks of Kishon, a great mound is known as the Tell el-Kâsis or Mound of the Priests. But the derivation of the modern name of Kishon, the Nahr el-Mukatta, as if it meant river of slaughter, is both improbable in itself and impossible to connect with the slaughter of the priests. When it is said that Elijah afterwards went up to the 'head of C.' it is possible that 'headland' is meant, in which case the tradition is correct that places the site of his waiting for rain near the monastery; but the word may also mean 'top,' any spot on the long summit of the ridge, which almost everywhere is in sight of the sea. A point near the E. end and the altar of J' would better suit the context, and esp. the story of Elijah's subsequent race to Jezreel in front of Ahab's chariot. It is possible that the great prophet from Gilead chose as his subsequent residence the scene of the triumph of J', and evidently C. is meant by 'the mountain' on which, according to the extraordinary story (2 K 19<sup>10</sup>), he called down fire on the king of Israel's soldiers sent to arrest him for his interference with the ambassadors to Ekron. Elisha visited C. after the departure of Elijah (ib. 2<sup>25</sup>); and when the Shunammite was in need of him, she went to seek and found him there (4<sup>25</sup>).

Probably for reasons already stated, C. does not again appear in OT as the scene of any sacred function; but in heathen hands the sanctity of the hill was preserved. Tacitus describes it as the site of an oracle, without an image 'tantum ara et reverentia' (Hist. ii. 78); and Vespasian, having sacrificed here, is said to have received from the priests the prediction that he would be emperor (Suetonius, Vespas. 5). Jamblichus (Vit. Pyth. iii. (15)) describes C. as 'sacred above all mountains, and forbidden of access to the vulgar' (see W. R. Smith, ES 146). As we have seen, the probable site of Elijah's altar is still held sacred by the Druses. But it is Christianity which has chiefly perpetuated the ancient sanctity of C., and the mountain has given its name to the great order of Carmelite Friars, whose convent stands upon the promontory above the sea. Louis the Saint, of France, founded the convent; but its legends trace the order of its monks in unbroken succession from Elijah himself, by Elisha, the sons of the prophets, John the Baptist, and the Essenes! The church of the convent is dedicated to the Virgin Mary, whom the interpretation of the Rom. Church sees prefigured in the cloud for which Elijah sent his servant to look; and who, according to many legends, frequented the neighbourhood of the convent with the child Jesus.

CARMELITE, CARMELITESS (הַכְרֵמֶלִית, הַכְרֵמֶלִיתָ).—An inhabitant of Carmel in Judah, which is to be distinguished from the well-known Carmel in the north; it lies in the small but fertile plateau between Hebron and the south desert. Nabal lived with his wife Abigail at Maon, a mile to the S., but his farms were at Carmel (1 S 25<sup>2</sup>). Maon, Carmel, and Ziph are mentioned together, Jos 15<sup>62</sup>; cf. G. A. Smith, Hist. Geogr. p. 306. Hezrai (or Hezro), one of David's 'thirty,' came from this district (2 S 23<sup>36</sup>). J. F. STENNING.

CARMONIANS (Carmonii, 2 Es 15<sup>30</sup>, AV Carmanians).—A people occupying an extensive district north of the entrance to the Persian Gulf, between Persis on the west and Gedrosia on the east. Accounts of the country and of the people, who are said to have resembled the Medes and Persians in customs and language, are to be found in Strabo (xv. p. 726), Ptolemy (vi. 8), Am. Marcellinus (xxiii. 6), and other ancient writers. The name survives in the present town and district of Kirman. In the above verse, which is one of the late additions to the Second Book of Esdras, it is said that the Carmanians shall come forth like wild boars, shall join battle with the 'dragons of Arabia,' and lay waste a portion of the land of the Assyrians. The reference is probably to Sapor I. (A.D. 240-273), the founder of the Sassanid dynasty, who, after defeating Valerian, overran Syria, and destroyed Antioch. He was subsequently driven back across the Euphrates by Odenathus and Zenobia (cf. Lupton in Speaker's Com. ad loc.). The erroneous form Carmonians, which is supported by the best Latin MSS, is possibly due to confusion with Carmona, an important city in Spain (so James in Texts and Studies, iii. ii. p. lxx). H. CARNAIM, Καρνείν, 1 Mac 5<sup>26</sup>. (Καρνείν) 43. 41, and Carnion (τὸ Κάρνιον), 2 Mac 12<sup>21, 26</sup> (RV Carmin).—The ancient Ashteroth-Karnaim (which see).

CARNION.—See CARNAIM.

CARPENTER (עֹשֶׂה הָאָרְטִיפֶּס, 'artificer,' e.g. 2 K 22<sup>5</sup>; עֹשֶׂה הָאָרְטִיפֶּס, 'artificer in wood,' e.g. 2 K 12<sup>11</sup>; τέκτων, Mt 13<sup>55</sup>, Mk 6<sup>3</sup>).—The early use of timber structures and agricultural tools must have necessitated some form of carpentry among the Isr. in primitive times, and the close intercourse of the Hebrews with the Egyptians who have left mural representations of carpenters at work with a variety of tools, afforded an opportunity for the development of the art. Nevertheless, the Jews were backward in technical skill. In the first mention of carpenters in the Bible they are foreigners imported into Pal. for builders' work, which would seem to have been beyond the capacity of the Isr. themselves. Phoen. workmen were engaged on the building of David's house, Hiram of Tyre sending carpenters to work the timber which he also furnished (2 S 5<sup>11</sup>). Similarly, the timber work as well as the masonry in Solomon's temple was executed by Phoen. artisans owing to the confessed inability of the Jews (1 K 5<sup>6</sup>), the Jewish workmen only assisting as labourers (1 K 5<sup>16</sup>). When, however, carpenters appear at the restoration of the temple by Jehoush, there is no mention of these men being foreigners (2 K 12<sup>11</sup>). Those who repaired the temple under Josiah also seem to have been Jews (2 K 22<sup>5</sup>). Nebuchadrezzar carried the carpenters and smiths together with Jeconiah and the princes into captivity (Jer 24<sup>1</sup> 29<sup>2</sup>, where, indeed, we only read שָׂרָף, not יָרָף; but then the mention of 'smiths' suggests that the 'artificers' were workers in wood). In Is 44<sup>18</sup> there is a picture of a carpenter with his tools carving a wooden idol; but this refers to a Bab. artist. At the rebuilding of the temple under Zerub. the carpenters appear to have been Phoenicians (Ezr 3<sup>7</sup>). Zechariah's 'carpenters' may have been any kind of artisans. According to the first Gospel, Joseph was a carpenter (Mt 13<sup>55</sup>); according to the second, Jesus himself (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>). Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 150) states that 'He was in the habit of working as a carpenter when among men, making ploughs and yokes' (Trypho, 88). This more definite statement is not attributed to the Memoirs of the Apostles, and seems to have been derived from tradition. See Delitzsch, Jewish Artisan Life. W. F. ADENEY.

CARPUS.—An inhabitant of Troas, with whom St. Paul stayed, probably on his last journey to Rome (2 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>). The name is Greek, but we have no means of proving his nationality. His memory is honoured, as one of the seventy disciples, by the Greek Church on May 26, and by the Roman and Syrian Churches on October 13. A late tradition found in the list of the seventy disciples, attributed to Hippolytus, and in that by Dorotheus, describes him as having become bishop of Berytus or Berœa, in Thrace. (Acta Sanctorum, May 26, Oct. 13; Monologion, May 26; Nilles, Kalendarium Manuale, i. pp. 165, 461.) W. LOCK.

CARRIAGE.—In the AV this word occurs five times in the OT, once in the NT, and four times in the Apocrypha, but never in the sense which the word bears in modern English. It denotes regularly 'something carried,' or, as we should say, 'baggage.' The passages are arranged below according to the various Heb. or Gr. words rendered by carriage.

(1) 1 S 17<sup>22</sup> בִּגְדֵי, Is 10<sup>28</sup> לֵךְ, LXX σκενή—a word of very wide signification, and corresponding roughly to the English 'things.' In the first place in Samuel the ref. is to the present brought by David to his brothers in Saul's army, in the second and in Isaiah to the baggage of an army. RV 'And David left his baggage in the hand of the keeper of the baggage.' 'At Michmash he layeth up his baggage.'

(2) Is 46<sup>1</sup> נִשְׂאֵתֶיךָ=your carried things, of the Babylonian idols, which the priests were accustomed to carry about in solemn procession. RV 'The things that ye carried about.'

(3) Jg 18<sup>21</sup> כְּבִדָּה, LXX τὸ βάρος, but A (τὴν κτῆσιν αὐτοῦ) τὴν ἑνδοξον=the heavy, or perhaps the precious goods, referring to the baggage of the Danites, or more probably to the images which had been stolen out of Micah's house. RV 'the goods.'

(4) Ac 21<sup>15</sup> 'We took up our carriages' is the translation of ἐπισκευασμένοι. The Greek word expresses the completion of the preparations necessary for the journey from Caesarea to Jerusalem; but others understand the term of the loading of the baggage animals. RV 'We took up our baggage,' RVm 'made ready.'

In the Apocrypha, carriage, i.e. baggage, represents ἀπάρτια (Jth 217<sup>310</sup>) and ἀποσκευή (1 Mac 9<sup>80, 89</sup>).

In the margin of the AV the phrases, 'the place of the carriage,' and 'in the midst of his carriages,' occur as alternative renderings to the word 'trench' found in the text of 1 S 17<sup>20</sup> 26<sup>5</sup>. The Heb. expression is לָקָק (LXX 17<sup>20</sup> στρογγύλωσις; 26<sup>5</sup> λαμπρήνη), and denotes the circular 'laager' or barricade formed by the baggage and baggage-wagons round the place of encampment. RV 'the place of the wagons.' RVm 'barricade.' Even here 'carriage' is probably not to be understood in the modern sense of 'a vehicle.' See CAMP.

CART (רֶגֶל, δμαζα, plaustrum—in the AV the same word is also rendered WAGON in Gn 45<sup>19, 21, 27</sup> 46<sup>5</sup>, Nu 7<sup>37</sup>).—Such vehicles, drawn usually by two oxen (Nu 7<sup>3, 7, 8</sup>, 1 S 6<sup>7, 10</sup>, cf. 2 S 6<sup>3</sup>), were used for the conveyance of persons (Gn l.c.), goods (Nu l.c., 1 and 2 S l.c., and Jth 15<sup>14</sup>), or produce (Am 2<sup>13</sup>). Artificial roads seem to have existed in Palestine from a very early period (Nu 20<sup>19</sup>, Jg 20<sup>81</sup>, 1 S 6<sup>12</sup>); and the Canaanites conquered by Joshua at the Waters of Merom possessed war chariots (Jos 11<sup>5</sup>, cf. 17<sup>16, 18</sup>). Nevertheless, the rough mountainous country of Judah and of central Pal. was not suitable for vehicles, and it is to be noticed that we first hear of wagons in connexion with the flat country of Egypt, or the level plain of Philistia. Carts for agricultural produce may well have been used from the earliest times (Am 2<sup>13</sup>, cf. Is 5<sup>18</sup>), and for these roads would not be required (see G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 667 ff.). The wagons mentioned in Nu 7<sup>3</sup> were probably covered vehicles (LXX λαμπήρικα, Aq. σκεπαστά); but the word רֶגֶל is obscure, occurring again only in Is 66<sup>20</sup> in the sense of 'litters.' The ordinary carts probably resembled those still in use in the East, which have two wheels of solid wood; but on monuments from Nineveh and Egypt we find representations of vehicles with two and four wheels, the wheels being constructed with six or eight spokes (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 396; Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, ii. 211, iii. 179).

In Is 28<sup>27</sup> (perhaps also in Am 2<sup>13</sup>) the 'cart' of EV is really a threshing wagon. Similar instruments are still to be seen in the East. They consist of three or four parallel rollers, ridged with iron, and fitted into a square wooden frame (see AGRICULTURE). Horses are employed to draw these threshing wagons in Syria at the present day (comp. G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 613), and they were used for this purpose even in Isaiah's time, if the ordinary text of Is 28<sup>28</sup> is correct (see Duhm, ad loc.).

for NT. 2. Carving in relief-work (מַעֲמָדִים), as in the ornamental panelling in the holy place of the temple (1 K 6<sup>29</sup>, Ps 74<sup>9</sup>), the two words in the former passage indicating the raised effect (מַעֲמָדִים) and the hollowing of the gonges (פִּלֵּשׁ). 3. 'Carved works,' RV 'striped' (מִסְבָּה), spoken of a bed-cover (Pr 7<sup>16</sup>).

Decorative art among the Hebrews was meagre and unoriginal, and generally debased what it imitated (see ART, ARCHITECTURE). It had little to encourage it, as its chief employment was in the service of religion, and the true religion was the worship of the Invisible. The Heb. mind differed from the Greek in obeying an ordinance because it was an ordinance, rather than because of the compulsion of its inward beauty. In the building of Solomon's temple the best art available was employed upon the richest materials, but the details are more about outlay than effect, and the point of view in the description is sacrifice rather than symmetry. The result of the finished glory is left to be imagined. Finally, the second commandment was interpreted as a specific prohibition. In the same way the Moslems abstain from the representation of life in ornament, and have developed the decorative treatment of geometrical form.

CASE (casus, anything that befalls one, hence any condition of one's affairs): Ps 144<sup>15</sup> 'Happy is the people that is in such a case' (קֶסֶף; cf. Ac 25<sup>14</sup> RV); Jn 5<sup>9</sup> 'he had been now a long time in that case'; 2 Es 16<sup>21</sup> 'they shall think themselves to be in good case' (cf. Geneva Bible, Gn 40<sup>14</sup> 'When thou art in good case, show mercie unto me,' AV 'When it shall be well with thee'); Ex 5<sup>19</sup> 'they were in evil case,' cf. Jon 4<sup>5</sup> RV; Dt 19<sup>4</sup> 'this is the case of the slayer' (קֶסֶף); and Mt 19<sup>10</sup> 'if the case of the man be so with his wife' (אֵרִיסָה). The phrase 'in any case' occurs in the obs. sense 'by any means' in Dt 22<sup>1</sup> 'thou shalt in any case bring them again' ('bringing thou shalt bring,' RV 'thou shalt surely bring'); and 24<sup>13</sup>. In Mt 5<sup>20</sup> 'Ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven,' the Gr. is the two negatives (οὐ μὴ), which, in the declining lang. of NT, are not always more emphatic than the single negative, but they seem to be so here (RV 'in no wise'). In Ro 3<sup>9</sup> RV gives 'are we in worse case than they?' for AV 'are we better than they?' (Gr. πρὸς ἄλλους). See Field, Otium Norv. iii. ad loc., and an excellent note in Sanday-Headlam's Romans.

CASIPHIA (כַּסְפִּיָּה, or, in full, כַּסְפִּיָּה מִסְפָּה 'the place Casiphia').—Judging from the two references to this city in Ezr 8<sup>17</sup>, it was situated on or near the river Ahava, on the way from Babylon to Jerusalem; but neither of these names is to be located with certainty. If C. be connected with the word keseeph, 'silver,' as is implied by the LXX tr. (ἐν ἀργυρίῳ τοῦ τόρου), 'with the money of the place,' it may have been situated in the 'land of silver' (Sarsu or Zirsu) mentioned in the well-known Assy. Geogr. tablet WAI ii. 51; but as the position of this place also is unknown, it does not help us to identify the site of Casiphia. The city seems to have been the home of the Nethinim or 'temple-servants' during the reign of Artaxerxes.

CASLUHIM (כַּסְלִיָּה, Xaswonielu).—A name occurring in Gn 10<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>2</sup>, in connexion with the names of other peoples there spoken of as descended from Mizraim, esp. the Caphtorim and Philistines (which see).

CASSIA.—This word occurs in three places in OT, and is AV and RV rendering for two Heb. words. 1. קָדָה, kiddah, LXX Ex 30<sup>24</sup> lps, but Ezk 27<sup>19</sup> omits. 2. קָסְיָה kezi'oth, kasla, cassia, Ps 45<sup>8</sup>. It is highly probable that the reference in both these Heb. words is to the cassia lignea, the product of Cinnamomum Cassia, Blume. Two substances are believed to be obtained from this species. (a) Cassia bark, cortex cassia, a kind of aromatic bark, with the smell and flavour of cinnamon, and resembling it in general appearance and properties. The root kiddah, in both Heb. and Arab., signifies a strip, and seems to refer to the strips of the bark of cassia lignea. The Arab. VS has salikhah for cassia, from a root also meaning to strip off or decorticate. The exact substance meant by salikhah is as uncertain as that intended by cassia. It is also called arfaj and ramth, and is probably the same as darsin. (b) Cassia buds, clavelli cinnamomi, the immature flowers of the above. Both are produced in China. Coarser varieties are produced in Malabar, Manilla, and Mauritius. It is probable that they were known to the Greeks and Romans, although the accounts of cassia given in the classical authors are indefinite and conflicting. The cassia of Scripture must not be confounded with the species of the genus cassia which yield the senna of commerce and medicine. Nor is it at all probable, notwithstanding the LXX lps, that it is orris.

CAST as a subst. occurs Lk 22<sup>41</sup> 'a stone's c.' (βολή); as an adj. Jer 38<sup>11,12</sup> 'old c. clouts' (קִרְבִּיָּה [all]). The verb is freq., and is used in some obsol. meanings. 1. In its simplest sense = 'throw,' it is now archaic, having been displaced by 'throw' itself, but is often found in AV, as Jn 8<sup>7</sup> 'let him first c. a stone at her'; 1 Mac 6<sup>81</sup> 'engines and instruments to c. fire and stones, and pieces to c. darts, and slings'—in such a case the verb has gone out of use with the instrument. 2. The expression cast lots translates several Heb. words (see LOT); the practice is seen in Pr 16<sup>33</sup> 'The lot is c. into the lap.' 3. To 'c. (=sow) seed' is now mainly fig. Cf. Ec 11<sup>1</sup> 'c. thy bread upon the waters.' 4. C. was formerly used of animals, meaning to give birth to, as Walton, Angler (1653), i. 26, 'There be divers fishes that cast their spawn on flags and stones.' But it was specially used of an untimely birth, as Job 21<sup>10</sup> 'their cow calveth, and casteth not her calf,' and extended to fruit-trees, as Dt 28<sup>40</sup> 'thine olive shall c. his fruit'; Rev 6<sup>18</sup> 'as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken by a mighty wind.' 5. C. was extended to actions that involved some continuous effort, as Zec 5<sup>8</sup> 'he c. it (RV 'her') down into the midst of the ephah; and he c. the weight of lead upon the mouth thereof'; the erection of a pillar, Gn 31<sup>61</sup> 'Behold this heap and this pillar which I have c. betwixt me and thee' (RV 'set'); and esp. an earthwork, as 2 S 20<sup>10</sup> 'they c. up a bank against the city'; Jer 6<sup>6</sup> 'Hew ye down trees, and c. a mount against Jerusalem.'

The foll. phrases deserve attention: Cast about is used in two senses, Mk 14<sup>81</sup> 'having a linen cloth c. about his naked body' (περιβάλλω); Jer 41<sup>14</sup> 'So all the people . . . cast about and returned' (יָבֹאוּ, 'turned round'). Cf. Raleigh (1591), Last Fight Rev. 19 'Persuaded . . . to cut his maine saile, and cast about.' Cast away is both lit. and fig., as Mk 10<sup>50</sup> 'And he, casting away his garment, rose' (ἀποβάλλω); Ro 11<sup>1</sup> 'Hath God c. away his people?' (ἀποθῶ, RV 'cast off'); 11<sup>18</sup> 'if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world' (ἀποδοχή); Lk 9<sup>55</sup> 'if he . . . lose himself, or be c. away' (ζηῶδω, RV 'forfeit his own self'). Different is 1 Co 9<sup>27</sup> 'Jest . . . I myself should be a castaway' (ἀδόκιμος, RV 'rejected'). The Gr. word occurs also Ro 1<sup>28</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>5,6,7</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>, Tit 1<sup>16</sup>, where EV gives always 'reprobate,' and He 6<sup>8</sup> AV, RV 'rejected.' See Sanday-Headlam on Ro 1<sup>28</sup>: δοκιμάζω = 1. 'to test,' as 1 Co 3<sup>13</sup>; 2. 'to approve after testing,' as Ro 12<sup>218</sup>; hence ἀδόκιμος = 'rejected after testing,' 'reprobate'. Cast down—(1) lit. Mt 27<sup>5</sup> 'he c. down the pieces of silver'; Sir 19<sup>27</sup> 'Casting down his countenance, and making as if he heard them not' (RV 'bowing down his face'); (2) fig. 'to defeat,' 'to humble,' 2 Co 10<sup>5</sup> 'Casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself'; Rev 12<sup>10</sup> 'the accuser of our brethren is c. down'; 2 Co 4<sup>9</sup> 'c. down, but not destroyed' (καταβάλλω, as Rev 12<sup>10</sup> RV 'smitten down'); Job 6<sup>21</sup> 'ye see my casting down, and are afraid' (תָּהָה RV 'a terror'); Neh 6<sup>18</sup> 'they were much c. down in their own eyes'; (3) 'c. down' = 'defected,' is rare, only Ps 42<sup>8,11,43</sup> 'Why art thou c. down, O my soul?' (תָּהָה RV 'bowed down'). Cast forth is used in the obsol. and very rare sense of spreading roots, Hos 14<sup>8</sup> 'he shall grow as the lily, and c. forth his roots as Lebanon' (תָּהָה 'strike'). Cast in (1) = 'sow,' Is 28<sup>28</sup> 'c. in the principal wheat' (RV 'put in the wheat in rows'); (2) in phrase 'c. in one's lot,' Pr 1<sup>14</sup> 'C. in thy lot among us' (Heb. lit. 'cause thy lot to fall among us'); (3) 'cast in one's teeth,' Mt 27<sup>44</sup> 'The thieves also, which were crucified with him, c. the same in his teeth' (Gr. ὠνεῖδίζον αὐτῷ [edd. αὐτῶν] = 'reviled him,' RV 'c. upon him the same reproach.' It was Tindale that introduced 'cast in his teeth,' to which Cranmer added 'the same'; Wyclif has 'upbraiden Hym of the same thing'); (4) 'c. in one's mind' = 'ponder,' Lk 1<sup>29</sup> 'she . . . cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be' (διαλογίζομαι); cf. 2 Mac 11<sup>18</sup> 'casting with himself what loss he had had'; and Addison (1719), 'I have lately been casting in my thoughts the several unhappineses of life.' Cast out, in many obvious senses, also (1) = vomit, Is 26<sup>19</sup> 'the earth shall c. out the dead' (RV 'c. forth'); cf. Holmshush (1561), 'He that hath a drye cough and doth not cast out'; and Wyclif's tr. of 2 P 2<sup>22</sup> 'The bound turnede agen to his castynge'; (2) 'to excommunicate' or make an outcast, Jn 9<sup>38</sup> 'Jesus heard that they had c. him out'; (3) 'to expose' children, Ac 7<sup>19</sup> 'they c. out their young children' (ποιεῖν ἐκθετον). Cast upon: 'to make dependent on,' Ps 22<sup>10</sup> 'I was c. upon thee from the womb.'

CASTLE.—1. The word, כִּנְרָה, rendered castle in the AV of Gn 25<sup>16</sup>, Nu 31<sup>19</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>54</sup>, denotes properly a circular group of tents, the encampment of a nomad tribe—RV 'encampment'; LXX ἐπαυλῖς; 1 Ch κώμη; Vulg. oppidum, castellum, caula, etc. In English translations of the Bible till the 16th cent., 'castle,' like the Latin castellum, is often used in the sense of 'village'; but the rendering of the AV seems to be due to the influence of Jewish tradition. Thus in the Targs. כִּנְרָה is rendered by כִּנְרָה, i.e. a large town, Onk. in Gn 25<sup>16</sup>; כִּנְרָה = castra, T. Jer. ib.; כִּנְרָה, i.e. a fortress, T. Jer. in Ezk 25<sup>4</sup>. Similarly, the word is rendered incorrectly 'palace,' Ps 69<sup>25</sup> AVm; Ca 8<sup>9</sup> AV.

2. It seems to have been the custom, from an early date, among the inhabitants of Pal., to erect in their towns a fortified tower or citadel, e.g. the 'tower' (מִגְדָּל) of Pennel (Jg 8<sup>9-17</sup>), or of Thebez (ib. 9<sup>51b</sup>); the 'hold' (מִצְדָּה) and tower of Shechem (ib. 9<sup>40b</sup>); the 'stronghold' of Zion at Jerusalem (2 S 5<sup>7</sup>; = 1 Ch 11<sup>6-7</sup>, AV 'castle'). Citadels of a similar character were built in connexion with the royal palaces at Tirzah (1 K 16<sup>18</sup>) and at Samaria (2 K 15<sup>25</sup>); but the word here used, מִצְדָּה, which does not appear before the royal period, is applied not only to a castle or fortress (Pr 18<sup>19</sup>, cf. 1's 48<sup>13</sup>, La 2<sup>5</sup>), but generally to palaces or prominent buildings (cf. Hos 8<sup>14</sup>, Am 3<sup>5a</sup>, Jer 9<sup>21</sup> 30<sup>19</sup> etc.). Many of the kings of Judah devoted their attention to strengthening their dominions by fortifying cities in strong positions, and building towers and castles to protect outlying districts (2 Ch 17<sup>12</sup> 27<sup>4</sup>, cf. 1 Ch 27<sup>25</sup>; on the word מִצְדָּה, see below). Such measures are ascribed especially to Jehoshaphat and Jotham.

In the time of Nehemiah we hear of a castle or citadel in Jerusalem, which is apparently connected with the temple (Neh 2<sup>8</sup> 7<sup>2</sup>). The term מִצְדָּה, which is found only in late Hebrew, is applied to the Temple of Solomon (1 Ch 29<sup>1-19</sup>), and to the Persian royal castle or palace at Susa (Neh 1<sup>1</sup>, Dn 8<sup>2</sup>, Est passim): it is probably of Persian origin (baru=fortress, castle), and a derivative from it, מִצְדָּה, also occurs (2 Ch 17<sup>12</sup> 27<sup>4</sup>). The citadel of Nehemiah stood probably on the site afterwards occupied by the castle of the Hasmonæan high priests and kings, to which Josephus gives the name of βάρυς (Ant. xv. xi. 4, xviii. iv. 3; Wars, i. xxi. 1). When the temple was rebuilt, Herod also rebuilt and strengthened this fortress, calling it Antonia after his patron M. Antonius. It stood on the north side of the temple, with which it was connected by means of cloisters and stairs (καταβάσεις, Jos. Wars, v. v. 8; ἀναβαθμοί, Ac 21<sup>30</sup>). Under Roman rule, the one cohort, which formed the permanent garrison at Jerusalem, was stationed in this fortress, for its position enabled the officer in command to keep watch over the temple and its courts. From the fort of Antonia the commandant (χάλαρχος) with his soldiers appeared on the occasion of the riot raised against St. Paul (Ac 21<sup>31-36</sup>), while in the barracks attached to the fort (παρεμβολή, lit. camp, AV castle) the apostle was confined till he was sent under escort to Cæsarea (Ac 21<sup>37</sup> 22<sup>24</sup> 23<sup>10</sup>). The destruction of the communications between Antonia and the temple was one of the first acts of the Jews on the outbreak of the rebellion in A.D. 66 (Jos. Wars, ii. xv. 6).

In Maccabæan times we hear of another citadel in Jerusalem, in the city of David, which, both in 1 and 2 Mac and in Josephus, bears the name of Ἀκρά, also Ἀκρόπολις (2 Mac 4<sup>12</sup> 27<sup>5</sup>). Though not originally built by Antiochus Epiphanes (see 2 Mac ll.c.), it was newly fortified by him, and occupied by a Syrian garrison (1 Mac 1<sup>33-36</sup>, Jos. Ant. xii. v. 4). The Jews, under the leadership of the Maccabees, made several ineffectual attempts to expel the Syrians (1 Mac 6<sup>19-22</sup> 10<sup>8-9</sup> 11<sup>20a</sup>); but it was not till B.C. 142 that Simon forced the garrison to capitulate, and entered the citadel in triumph (1 Mac 13<sup>40-42</sup>). According to 1 Mac 14<sup>30a</sup>, Simon strengthened and garrisoned the fort; but Josephus (Ant. xiii. vi. 7; Wars, v. iv. 1) relates that the fort was destroyed, and the hill on which it stood levelled after three years' continuous labour, in order that it might no longer overlook the temple. The site of Acra is much disputed; but the question whether it stood north (so most writers) or south of the temple (Schürer, HJP i. i. 207 f.; Benzinger, Heb. Archæol. p. 47), cannot be discussed here.

CAT.—It seems strange that an animal so well known, and so long associated with man in Egypt, should not have been domesticated among the Greeks and Romans, or mentioned in the canonical books of Scripture. The word αἰλουροι is used once in the Apocr. (Ep. Jer v. 22 [Gr. 21]). Herodotus (ii. 66) uses the word for the domestic cat. This animal is now more common by far in Bible lands than in the West, yet Tristram and Houghton declare that no trace of its name is found in classical authors, except in connexion with Egypt. There are two species of wild cat in the Holy Land. Felis maniculata, Rüpp., the Abyssinian wild cat, which is supposed to be the wild original of the domestic cat, and is called by the Arabs ḥuff el-khalā, is rare west of the Jordan, but common to the eastward. The body is 2 ft. long, and the tail 11 in. Felis chaus, Gmel., the jungle cat, is known in Arab. as el-ḥuff el-barri. It is about as large as the domestic cat, and resembles a lynx.

CATHOLIC EPISTLES (ἐπιστολαὶ καθολικαί).—

The title given to a group of seven Epistles of the NT, which bear the names of James, Peter, John, and Jude. From an early period in the history of the Church these Epistles were dealt with as a class by themselves. There were reasons for this, lying in their contents and in their generally accepted authorship. They form a distinct and interesting section of the NT literature. They have some obvious points of affinity with each other. There are resemblances, e.g., between 1 P and Ja; while Jude and 2 P have much matter in common. These seven Epistles have some remarkable coincidences both with other books of the NT and with non-canonical writings of ancient date. There are unmistakable similarities in thought and style, with certain marked differences, between the Johannine Epistles and the other writings ascribed to St. John. There are resemblances between 1 P and the Pauline Epistles, especially those to the Romans and the Ephesians. Jude quotes the pseudepigraphic Book of Enoch, and refers, as it seems, to the Assumption of Moses; while in James we have reminiscences of Ben Sirach.

These seven Epistles are not all of one piece. There are notable differences in style and contents between the several members of the group. While they are all letters, they differ considerably in epistolary form. Some of them (2 and 3 Jn) are simple, personal letters. One of them (James) is rather of the nature of a sententious Wisdom writing, like parts of the Hokhma literature of the OT and Judaism. Others, especially 1 Jn, have the appearance of Pastorals or Epistolary Manifestoes (Westcott's The Epistles of St. John, pp. xxix, xxx; Moulton's The Literary Study of the Bible, pp. 292, 442). As a class, however, they have a character which readily distinguishes them from the Epistles which bear Paul's name, and from the Epistle to the Hebrews. They make a contribution of essential value to the body of NT teaching. They have their own ideas, their own forms of expression, their own aspects of the truth taught in common by the first Christian writers. They have had different degrees of acceptance in different parts of the Church and in different ages. They have been, and continue to be, the subject of much debate with regard to their origin, date, authorship, and claims. For these questions see the articles on the several Epistles.

These seven Epistles are not given in the same order in ancient MSS, versions, and catalogues. Jerome notices a difference in this respect between the Greek and the Latin codices (Prolog. 7. Epist. Canon.). The order in which they stand in our English Bible (Ja, 1 and 2 P, 1, 2, 3 Jn, Jude) is the order in which they occur in most ancient documents. It is the order that is followed in Codex B, in the Canon of the Synod of Laodicea (c. A.D. 363), in the lists of Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, Gregory Naz., Leontius, Jerome, Nicephorus, Amphilochius, the 'Sixty Books', Isidore, and John of Damascus (see Westcott's Canon of NT, pp. 540-579). Eusebius also (HE ii. 23) speaks of James as reported to have written 'the first of the Catholic Epistles'. But in the Canon of the third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397), in the Apostolic Canons, and in the Claromontane Stichometry (Sæc. vii.), they are given as 1 and 2 P., 1, 2, and 3 Jn., Ja., and Jude. Augustine (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 12) enumerates them as two of Peter, three of John, one of Jude, and one of James; which succession is followed also by Philastrius, Rufinus, again (Comm. in Synb. Apost. § 36), names them in the order of 1 and 2 P., Ja., Jude, 1, 2, and 3 Jn.; Innocentius (ad Eusebium Ep. Tolosanum) in that of 1, 2, 3 Jn., 1 and 2 P., Jude, Ja.; Gelasius (De rebus de lib. recep. et non recep.) in that of 1 and 2 P., Ja., 1, 2, 3 Jn., Jude; while Junilius Africanus, noticing a difference in respect of extent of recognition between the first two and the five which follow, gives them in the succession of 1 P., 1 Jn., Ja., 2 P., Jude, 2 and 3 Jn. Neither have they the same place in the series of the NT books as given in ancient MSS., versions, and catalogues. In most they come between the Acts and the Pauline Epistles. This is the case with the Canon of the Council of Laodicea, Codices B and A, the lists of Cyril of Jerusalem, Athanasius, Leontius, the 'Sixty Books', Cassiodorus, John of Damascus, etc. This is the position assigned them in the critical editions of Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, Westcott and Hort. But in the Canon of the third Council of Carthage, in Rufinus, in Amphilochius, and in Codex  $\delta$ , they are inserted between the Pauline Epp. (with He) and the Apoc.; and this is the place given them by Griesbach in his critical edition. The same arrangement is so far followed also in the lists of Gregory Naz., Nicephorus, Philastrius, and Junilius Africanus, where they come after the Pauline Epp.; and in that of Epiphanius, where they precede the Apocalypse. In the Apostolic Canons they are placed between the 14 Epp. of Paul and the 2 Epp. of Clement; in Augustine, Innocentius, and Isidore, between the Pauline Epp. and Acts; in Jerome, between the Acts and the Apoc.; in the Claromontane Stichometry, after the Pauline Epp. and before the Ep. of Barnabas (supposed to mean here the Epistle to the Hebrews), the Rev. of Jn. and the Acts. In Gelasius they appear after the Apoc. and last in the list of our NT books; in the Synopsis of Chrysostom, after the Acts and last in the list. While in our English Bible they come between He and Rev. In the German Bible they are dealt with in a singular fashion. Instead of being brought into one series there, five of them (those ascribed to Peter and John) are introduced between Philem and He, and two of them (Ja and Jude) are placed between Hebrews and the Apocalypse.

Nor, again, has the group of Cath. Epp. been of the same compass at all times or in all parts of the Church. The first of the seven to be generally received seem to have been 1 P. and 1 Jn. The other five were accepted later, and at different times, Ja. apparently at a comparatively early period. Chrysostom's Synopsis mentions only three. Junilius Africanus places 1 P. and 1 Jn. by themselves, and explains that very many add (adjuvant quamplurimi) the remaining five. Amphilochius (Iamb. ad Seleucum) notices that some say seven Cath. Epp. are to be received, others only three, viz. one of James, one of Peter, one of John. Cassiodorus (De Instit. div. lib. xiv.) mentions only the Epistola Petri ad Gentem (if the reading is correct), Jacobi, Johannis ad Patres. But it may be said that, in the Eastern Church at least, by the end of the 3rd or the beginning of the 4th cent. the group included the whole seven. In Eusebius (HE ii. 23) they appear as seven, and the terms used of them imply that they had a recognised place, though not all quite the same place, in the Church. The Syrian Church, on the other hand, occupied a peculiar position in relation to these Epp. In that Church the group consisted only of three, 1 P., 1 Jn., and Ja. The remaining four formed no part of its Canon.

The history of the term 'Catholic' is of interest. It is a term used frequently by the Fathers; and while it is employed by them of writings outside the NT Canon, it seems never to be applied by them to any of the NT books but these seven—neither to any of the Pauline Epp. nor to the Ep. to the Hebrews. For its application to these seven we are indebted to the Church of the East. It was not limited to these, however, in the usage of the great theologians of the East. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. 15), e.g., employed it of the letter of the Church of Jerusalem, given in Ac 15. It was applied by Origen (Contra Celsum, i. 63) to the Ep. of Barnabas. It was even used to describe a heretical composition. For Eusebius (HE iv. 23) speaks of an Ep. written by Themison, who appears to have been a disciple of Montanus, as a 'certain Catholic Epistle.' But it was applied to certain members of our group at an early period. Origen (Selecta in Psalm., in Ps. iii. c. 3, 7; Comm. in Joann. vi. c. 18) speaks of things said by Peter 'in the Catholic Epistle'; of 'the Catholic Epistle of John' (Comm. in Matt. xvii. c. 19); and of the statement regarding the angels which 'Jude the apostle' makes 'in the Catholic Epistle' (Comm. in Ep. ad Rom. B. v. t. iv., in the Latin tr.). Dionysius, in like manner, speaks of 'the son of Zebedee, the brother of James,' and 'the Catholic Epistle which bears his name' (Euseb. HE vii. 25). And by the 4th cent. it had come to be a designation of the group of seven. Eusebius, who reports (HE vi. 14) Clement of Alexandria to have included 'Jude and the other Catholic Epistles' in the accounts of the canonical writings which he gave in his Hypotyposes, speaks himself of 'James, who is said to have written the first of the Catholic Epistles,' and of the Ep. of Jude as one which 'not many indeed of the ancients have mentioned,' but which 'is also one of the seven called Catholic Epistles' (HE ii. 23). So the Canon of Athanasius names the ἐπιστολαὶ καθολικαὶ καλούμεναι τῶν ἀποστόλων ἑπτὰ; the Canon of the Laodicean Council enumerates ἐπιστολαὶ καθολικαὶ ἑπτὰ; and the Canons of Cyril of Jerusalem and Epiphanius speak of them in terms indicating that they were seven in number, bearing the common title of Catholic.

In the Western Church these Epp. seem to have been later in receiving a general designation, and the title by which they came to be designated was a different one. The term Catholic is indeed applied to them. Jerome (De vir. ill. c. 1), e.g., says of Simon Peter that he wrote two Epistles quæ catholicæ nominantur; of James (ib. c. 2), that he wrote unam tantum . . . epistolam, quæ de septem catholicis est; and of 'Jude the brother of James' (ib. c. 4), that he left a 'small Epistle' quæ de catholicis est. But elsewhere (Prolog. 7. Epist. Canon.) he writes of the epistolarum septem, quæ canonice nuncupantur. And this term canonica seems practically to have taken the place of Catholic in the Latin Church as the common designation of the seven. At what time, however, this came to be the case, is not quite certain. Junilius Africanus (c. A.D. 550) employs it. He speaks of 1 P. and 1 Jn. as forming part of the seventeen libri canonici which make the species (Scriptura), dealing de simplici doctrina as distinguished from history, prophecy, and the species proverbialis. To this he adds the statement—adjuvant quamplurimi quinque alias quæ Apostolorum Canonice nuncupantur; id est; Jacobi I., Petri secundam, Jude unam, Johannis II. (De part. divin. legis. i. 2). Cassiodorus, too, employs it in the following statement about Clement—in epistolis autem canonicis Clemens Alexandrinus presbyter, qui et Stromateus dicitur, id est in Epistola S. Petri prima et secunda, et Jacobi quædam Attico sermone declaravit (De inst. div. litt. c. 8). Hence it is thought that by the 6th cent. this term canonica was the accepted designation of the group in the Western Church. Yet Cassiodorus uses the term also of the Apostolic Epistles as a whole. And how it happened that this title took the place of Catholic in one half of the Christian communion, is difficult to explain. It is supposed by some to have been due to mere mistake. 'By a singular error,' it is said, 'the group of letters was called in the later Western Church "canonical" (canonica) in place of "catholic" (Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, p. xxix). Others, e.g., Bleek, think that it 'originated in the belief that by Catholic as applied to these Epistles in the Greek Church was meant universally recognised and received by the Church, without reference to any distinction between them and the Pauline Epistles' (Introd. to NT, ii. p. 135, Clark's tr.). Other explanations, some of them of a fanciful kind, have been proposed; as, e.g., by Lücke in SK, 1836, iii. pp. 643-659.

There is much that is still far from clear as regards the origin and use of the terms Catholic and Canonical in this connexion. Different views have been taken of the precise meaning and intention of the title Catholic. Some fanciful speculations have also been indulged in. It has been supposed by some (Pareus, Prolog. in Jac.) that the name καθολικαὶ as applied to these Epp. was accidental, no definite purpose being attached to it. It has been supposed by others to be intended to express their doctrinal harmony; Augusti, e.g., taking it to designate them as 'in der Lehre übereinstimmende Schriften.' The main explanations proposed, however, are these.

1. That the term refers to the authorship of these writings and their position as a distinct group. This is the view of Hugg, who regards the word as a 'technical expression for one class of biblical writings which possesses it exclusively and communicates it to no other; namely, for that class which comprised in itself the didactical compositions of the apostles collectively, with the exception of Paul, καθολικός, i.e. καθ' ὅλου καὶ συλλήβδην. When the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles constituted one peculiar division, the works of Paul also another, there still remained writings of different authors which might likewise form a collection by themselves, to which a name must be given. It might most aptly be called the common collection, καθολικὴν σύνταγμα, of the apostles, and the treatises contained in it, κοινὰ and καθολικὰ, which are commonly used by the Greeks as synonymous.' He appeals in support of this to Clement of Alexandria, who, he says, 'calls the Epistle, which was dictated by the assembly of the apostles (Ac 15<sup>22</sup>), the Catholic Epistle, as that in which all the apostles had a share, τὴν ἐπιστολὴν καθολικὴν τῶν ἀποστόλων πάντων.' Whence he concludes that 'the seven Epistles are Catholic, or Epistles of all the apostles, who are authors' (Introd. to Writings of NT, p. 537, etc., Wait's tr.). This explanation has been followed more or less completely by Schleiermacher and Pott, by Eichhorn so far, and some others. Otherwise it has met with little favour. It is not borne out by Clement's statement. It disregards the fact that the term Catholic is applied by early ecclesiastical writers to compositions like the Ep. of Barnabas, the Ep. of Dionysius, the Ep. of Themiſon. It makes ἐπιστολαὶ καθολικαὶ equivalent to αἱ λοιπαὶ ἐπιστολαὶ καθ' ὅλου. But there is nothing to show that the term καθολικός was employed elsewhere to express any such idea as that of common apostolic authorship, one collection of writings written by all the apostles together.

2. Others, therefore, take the term to refer to the place of these Epistles in the Church, their ecclesiastical recognition, the fact that they were universally received as genuine, their canonicity. Michaelis (Introd. to NT, vi. p. 270, Marsh's tr.) takes this view, holding that the word was used by Origen to distinguish 1 P and 1 Jn as undisputed Epp. from 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, and Jude, about which there was no such consent of opinion, and that it was given also to these five in course of time as they ceased to be doubted. This explanation, or one not materially different, is given also by Horne, Guericke, and others. It is supposed by some that there is an indication of the identification of the word Catholic with the word Canonical in the Muratorian Fragment, in the puzzling sentence 'Epistola sane Jude et superscriptio Johannis duas in Catholica habentur.' Some refer in support of this view to the passage in which Eusebius, speaking of James who is 'said to have written the first of the Catholic Epistles,' and of Jude as also 'one of the seven Catholic Epistles,' adds that 'nevertheless we know that these, with the rest, are publicly used in most of the churches' (HE ii. 23). This is relevant, however, to the question of public use in the church, but not to more. For it speaks also of James as 'considered spurious' (νοθεύεται). Most found rather on the passage, also in Eusebius (HE iii. 3), in which mention is made of certain works ascribed to Peter, his Acts, the Gospel according to Peter, the Preaching, and the Revelation of Peter, and it is said of them 'we know nothing of their being handed down among catholic writings (οὐδ' ὅλως ἐν καθολικοῖς ἴσμεν παραδεδομένα), for neither of the ancients nor of those of our own time has any ecclesiastical writer made use of testimonies from them.' Here, it is thought, the word in the phrase ἐν καθολικοῖς must have the sense of genuine, undisputed, universally received. Others, however, think the phrase may mean 'handed down among catholic Christians' (Charteris, Canonicity, p. 289), or publicly read in the churches, the question of genuineness not being in view (Kirchhofer, Quellensammlung, p. 257). It is with the distinction between disputed and undisputed books that Eusebius deals there. But what is referred to in his statement is not one class of the NT books, but these books as a whole; not the Catholic Epp. in particular, but the Catholic writings (γραφῶν) generally. Further, if the sense supposed were the true sense, the term would be no distinctive title of these seven Epistles, marking them off from the Pauline Epistles, which were no less canonical or generally recognised in the Church. Nor does this view consist with the fact that the term catholic is used by Origen, as we have seen, of the Ep. of Barnabas, and by Eusebius of the Epp. of Dionysius of Corinth to the Lacedaemonians, the Athenians, the Nicomedi-ans, and other Churches (HE iv. 23), of none of which it could be said that they were canonical or universally received. Nor has it regard, again, to the fact that only some of the seven Epistles were universally received at the time when the term was applied to the group as a whole. Eusebius himself in his chapter on 'The Divine Scriptures acknowledged as genuine, and those that are not' (HE iii. 25), distinguishes 1 Cn and 1 P as ἐν ὁμολογούμενοις from the other five as of the ἀντιλεγόμενων γραφῶν δ' οὐν ὁμῶς τοῖς πολλοῖς. There is nothing in the facts to conflict with the idea that this came in course of time to be the sense. There is everything to rebut the assertion that it was the original and proper sense.

3. Others suppose that the term refers to the character of the contents of these Epp., the catholicity of their doctrine, distinguishing them from others which were heretical as orthodox or authoritative Epp.,—Epp. whose teaching was in harmony with Christian truth, or the Church's faith. So Salmeron held it to define them as giving the one true catholic doctrine which the whole Church might profitably receive. Similar is the explanation of Cornelius à Lapide and others. This view, too, is supposed to be favoured by the passage in which Eusebius speaks of the Acts, the Gospel, and other alleged writings of Peter. But the supposition has as little to support it in this case as in (2). The term so interpreted would equally fail to serve as a distinctive title of the group; for in this sense Paul's Epp. were as catholic as these. Further, it overlooks the fact that the title is used of the heretical Epistle of Themiſon.

4. Consequently, it is held that the term refers to the destination of the Epp., designating them as Encyclical letters, differing from the Pauline Epp. as being addressed, not to individuals or to single Churches, but to the Church universal, to circles of Churches, or to readers scattered over wide territories. This is the explanation given by Occumenius (Sæc. x.) in the Preface to his Commentary on the Epistle of James: καθολικαὶ λέγονται αὐταὶ ὡσεὶ ἐγκύκλιοι. Οὐ γὰρ ἀφωρισμένως θέλει ἐπὶ ἡ πόλει ὡς ὁ θεὸς Παῦλος, ὁὖν Ῥωμαῖοις ἢ Κορινθίοις, προσφωεῖ ταύτας τὰς ἐπιστολὰς ὁ τῶν τοιούτων τοῦ κυρίου μαθητῶν θίσιος, ἀλλὰ καθόλου τοῖς πιστοῖς, ἅτε Ἰουδαίοις τοῖς ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ, ὡς καὶ ὁ Πέτρος, ἢ καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς ὑπὸ τὴν αὐτὴν πλίστην Χριστιανοῖς τελοῦσιν. It is the explanation given also by Leontius (c. A.D. 500): καθολικαὶ δὲ ἐκλήθησαν ἐπειδὴ οὐ πρὸς ἐν ἔθνος ἐγράφησαν ὡς αἱ τοῦ Παύλου ἐπιστολαὶ (De Sectis Act. ii.). Suidas also treats καθολικός and ἐγκύκλιος as synonymous when used of letters. This is the explanation which is preferred by most. It retains for the adjective the sense which it has in ancient, non-eccelesiastical Greek; the sense which it also has when it is used of the Church; the sense which can be traced back, in the application of the term, to particular writings, at least to the close of the 2nd cent. It is the sense that best suits Clement's statement on the letter addressed by the 'apostles and elders and brethren' at Jerusalem to the 'brethren which are of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia' (Ac 15<sup>23</sup>, etc., especially in view of the extent of its publication, Ac 16<sup>5</sup>). It is the most natural sense for the term as used by Origen, in the passages cited above, of 1 Jn, 1 P, Jude, and Barnabas; by Clement, of Jude in his Hypotyposes; and by Dionysius of Alexandria, of 1 Jn (Euseb. HE vii. 25). It fits the tenor of 1 Jn, and is sufficiently consistent with the expressed destination of other members of the group of seven. Ja, 1 P, 2 P, and Jude are addressed, it is true, to definite circles of readers. But these are large circles, embracing the Christians and Churches of many lands, and differing widely from those which the Pauline Epp. have in view. James is meant for the brethren in the extensive Jewish Dispersion; 1 Pet. for the Churches of five provinces of the East; 2 Pet. and Jude, for circles still less particular or defined. The remaining two have inscriptions referring to individuals, and are in no proper sense general Epistles. Their position is explained either by the fact that they were interpreted at an early period as general Epp., the Church being taken to be addressed under the personal designation of the ἐκλεκτὴ κυρία of 2 Jn and the Gains of 3 Jn (Clem. Alex. Hypotyposes); or by the circumstance that, being accepted as genuine letters of the Apostle John, they were naturally associated with his first Epistle, and so came to be included in the group of which it formed a part, and to share in the title borne by the group.

It would appear most probable, therefore, that the title 'catholic' had from the beginning its proper sense of 'general'; that it was used to designate letters of the nature of circular or encyclical Epistles; that in this sense it was applied at least from the end of the 2nd cent. to particular writings both within and without the NT literature proper; that in this sense it was applied first to individual members of the group, and by the time of Eusebius to the seven as a class distinguishable in this respect from the Pauline Epp.; that in course of time other ideas became connected with it, and its use became less constant; that by the 6th cent. it became identical with canonical in the Western Church, and assumed a more dogmatic character. There are things at the same time which indicate that its use was not quite fixed or uniform even at the close of the 4th cent. or the beginning of the 5th. Some, indeed, contend that when Origen speaks of 1 Peter as a Catholic Epistle he means to distinguish it as a genuine or accredited Epistle from 2 Peter as a disputed Epistle. It is much more reasonable to understand it there in the sense of general or encyclical. But there are passages in Eusebius which are of another kind. We have one such, e.g., that in HE iii. 3, where, speaking of acknowledged and disputed books, he says of certain writings alleged to be by Peter, that they are not ἐν καθολικοῖς παραδεδομένα. We have another in HE iv. 23, where mention is made of the 'Catholic Epistles' of Dionysius of Corinth. The Churches to which these Epistles were addressed are named—the Lacedæmonians, the Athenians, the Nicomediens, the Church of Gortyna, and the 'other Churches in Crete,' etc. They are mostly particular Churches, and it is not a sufficient explanation to say, with Westcott (Epp. of St. John, p. xxviii), that the 'word is used of letters with a general application (though specially addressed) which made no claim to canonical authority.' It must be admitted that, as in the case of the process by which these Epp. came to form a collection and to rank as canonical, so, in the history of the names given to them as a group in the Eastern Church and in the Western, all is by no means clear yet.

CATTLE.—No fewer than six Heb. and two Gr. words are tr. in the Bible by cattle. 1. מִקְנֶה mikneh. The primary meaning of the word is wealth or possessions. It is so tr. Ec 2<sup>7</sup>, where מִקְנֶה קָטָן מִקְנֶה גָּדוֹל is rendered AV 'possessions of great and small cattle,' RV 'possessions of herds and flocks.' Among nomads, whose riches consist principally in herds and flocks, the word for possessions came to mean cattle. Thus the Arab. māl, pl. amwāl, when used in connexion with the shepherd's life, usually means cattle in the generic sense. Mikneh certainly includes horses, asses, oxen, sheep, and goats (Gn 47<sup>16</sup>), where Joseph says, 'give your cattle (מִקְנֶה), and I will give you for your cattle' (מִקְנֶה). The narrator then states (v. 17) that 'they brought their cattle (מִקְנֶה) . . . horses . . . flocks (צֹאן) . . . RVm cattle of the flocks . . . cattle of the herds (מִקְנֶה) . . . RVm also cattle of the herds . . . asses; and he fed them with bread for all their cattle' (מִקְנֶה). The historian then says (47<sup>18</sup>), 'my lord also hath our herds of cattle' (מִקְנֶה). Mikneh may also be understood, in all passages where its meaning is not otherwise defined, to include all the domestic animals, which constituted so much of the wealth of the Hebrews. Mikneh is also rendered herd as above (Gn 47<sup>18</sup>), and flocks (Ps 78<sup>18</sup>). The expression מִקְנֶה צֹאן (Gn 46<sup>32</sup>), awkwardly rendered in text AV 'their trade hath been to feed cattle,' RV 'they have been keepers of cattle,' is better rendered as AVm 'they are men of cattle,' or, still better, herdmen. Another meaning of the root קָנָה, from which mikneh is derived, is to buy, and in Hiphil to cause to buy, i.e. to sell. This is the true meaning in the passage (Zec 13<sup>9</sup>) קָנָה קָנָה, where AV has rendered the clause 'man taught me to keep cattle,' as if קָנָה, which means also to possess, meant particularly to possess or keep cattle. RV renders the passage 'I have been made a bondman,' i.e. man has sold me. 2. בְּהֵמָה bēhēmāh, tr<sup>d</sup> cattle in the places where it occurs with תָּרָה (Gn 12<sup>4</sup>, 25 3<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>1</sup>, Ps 148<sup>10</sup>, Is 46<sup>1</sup>), also, arbitrarily, in many other places. Probably the Eng. word beast, which is as flexible in its meaning and use as bēhēmāh, would more adequately express it. 3. צֹאן zōn. This word is translated AV 'cattle' in two places (Gn 30<sup>33</sup> 31<sup>43</sup>), in both of which RV has 'flocks,' i.e. both sheep and goats. 4. בָּקָר bāqār. This word, which means oxen, is rendered in one place cattle (Jl 1<sup>18</sup>). 5. עֲרֵי בָקָר 'herds of cattle.' 6. בְּעִיר be'ir. Twice in AV translated cattle (Nu 20<sup>4</sup>, Ps 78<sup>48</sup>), RV adds Nu 20<sup>11</sup>. See BEAST. 7. שֶׂה seh. This word, which primarily means one of a flock of sheep or goats (cf. Arab. shāt), is once tr. AV 'lesser cattle,' RV 'sheep' (Is 7<sup>25</sup>), and once AV, RV 'small cattle' (Is 43<sup>25</sup>). See SHEEP.

CAUDA (Καῦδα in B, confirmed by a few inferior authorities, by Καῦδω in Suidas, Καῦδος in Notitia Episcopatum, viii. 240; Gaudus in Pliny, Nat. Hist. iv. 12 (61), and Pomp. Mela, ii. 114. Καῦδα is the form in s, supported by the majority of other authorities, and by Κλαῦδος in Ptol. iii. 15. 8; Hierocles, Synecd. 651, 2,* and Notitia Episcop. 9. 149; and Κλαῦδα in the Stadiasmus Maris Magni, § 328, AV Clauda) was an island off the S. coast of Crete. Amid the varying forms of the name, the preference must be given to the forms in which the letter L is omitted, as is proved beyond dispute by the mod. forms Gavdho in Greek and Gozzo in Italian. The Alex. ship laden with corn in which Paul sailed from Myra for Rome, after lying becalmed for a considerable time in Fair Havens, proceeded on its course favoured by a light northerly breeze; but shortly after rounding Cape Matala (about 4 miles on its course), while the vessel was standing towards W.N.W. across the mouth of the Gulf of Messara, it was caught by a sudden eddying blast from E.N.E., which struck down from the lofty mountains of the island, and it could do nothing except scud before the wind, until, after running about 23 miles, it was able to get under the lee of Cauda (Ac 27<sup>16</sup>), where in calmer water it became possible to attend to the condition of the ship. The perfect agreement of the description in Ac with the natural features and winds of the coast (where, according to Captain Stewart, R.N., 'southerly winds almost invariably shift to a violent northerly wind') has been admirably brought out by James Smith in his Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, p. 96 ff. According to Suidas, wild asses of unusually large size lived on the island. There was a city on the island, which was the seat of a bishop in Byzantine times. It lay almost due S. of Phoenix, and is mentioned next to it in the Byzantine authorities.

CAUL (Fr. cale, a small cap or head-dress. Now obsol.).—1. (צִיָּה) The fatty envelope of the liver, which, with the fat of the kidneys and other inward parts (Ex 29<sup>13, 22</sup>, Lv 3<sup>4</sup>, etc.), was to be burnt on the altar as an offering by fire unto the Lord. In Hos 13<sup>9</sup> the rending of the caul or enclosure (רִיב) of the heart is a term of uttermost destruction. See MEDICINE.

2. צִיָּהִים Is 3<sup>18</sup>, RV 'networks.' This was most probably the small head-veil, now of fine network or art muslin with floral designs, worn in the East over the brow and crown, and fastened loosely behind the neck under the hair. It is counted indelicate to go to the door or garden without it. Much art is often expended upon it. It is fringed with silk embroidery, and adorned with gold thread, tiny gilt discs, and other ornaments. The Heb. shabīs seems to have the same root-meaning as the Arab. mutashabbas, applied to the network or interlacing of tree-branches; and similarly, the Arab. term for fine damask of branch and foliage-like design is mu-shajjar, from shajarah, a tree.

CAUSE.—The obsol. phrase 'for his c.' = 'for his sake' is used 2 Co 7<sup>12</sup> 'I did it for his c. that had done the wrong' (ἐνεκεν). Cf. Ps 69<sup>1</sup> Pr. Bk. 'Let not them that trust in thee . . . be ashamed for my c.' (צ, AV 'for my sake,' RV 'through me'). Twice 'c.' is used in the vague sense of 'matter' (as if on the way to Ital. cosa, Fr. chose): 1 K 12<sup>18</sup> 'the c. was from the LORD' (צק, LXX μεταστροφή, RV 'it was a thing brought about of the LORD'); 2 Ch 10<sup>18</sup> 'the c. was of God' (צק, LXX as before, the only occurrences of the Gr. as of the Heb.; RV 'it was brought about of God'). Causeless is an adv. in 1 S 25<sup>31</sup> 'thou hast shed blood c.'; but not in Pr 26<sup>2</sup> 'the curse c. shall not come' (both צק, RV here 'that is c.' after Geneva). J. HASTINGS.

CAUSEWAY.—This is the spelling of mod. edd. of AV (except in Pr 15<sup>10a</sup>) for the 1611 spelling 'causey.' But the words are not the same. A causey is a mound or dam, made by treading (late Lat. calciāre), and a causeway is a way or road formed on such a mound. It occurs 1 Ch 26<sup>16, 18</sup>; Is 7<sup>3</sup> AVm (1611 causeway) for 'highway' in text; the Heb. (צֶלֶק mēšillāh) means a way 'cast up' or raised up. J. HASTINGS.

CAVE (קֶוֶת, σπήλαιον, spelunca).—1. Palestine is a region abounding in caves; hence the frequent reference to them in the Bible. Natural caves and caverns are to be found in most countries formed of limestone strata and considerably elevated above the sea level; such as Malta, Sicily, parts of Italy,* and Derbyshire in England. In such countries the underground acidulated waters dissolve channels for themselves out of the rock, and upon a change of level with reference to their outlet, they leave these channels for others; the old channels becoming caverns with generally dry floors, and roofs decorated with stalactites. The elevated character of Western Palestine and its calcareous structure have naturally resulted in the formation of caves which in O.T. times, and still later, have become interwoven with the historical events of that country; and, as Dean Stanley observes, when Christianity became degraded in the early centuries, caves, the real or supposed scenes in the history of our Lord, became the seats of worship amongst the Eastern Christians. Thus the 'cave of the Holy Sepulchre' at Jerusalem and the 'cave of the Nativity' at Bethlehem,† both discovered or identified (according to Eusebius) by the empress Helena, have remained shrines of semi-idolatrous devotion down to the present day.

2. Prehistoric man appears to have made caves his dwelling wherever available, and it is not improbable that the Horites of Mount Seir (Gn 14<sup>6</sup> 36<sup>20</sup>), who were cave dwellers as their name implies, were the representatives of early cave-dwelling races of other countries.‡ The Horites were expelled by the Edomites; and the vast caverns artificially hewn out of the sandstone rock of Petra, the Edomite capital, attest the extent to which these early inhabitants made use of such hollows both for habitations and as sepulchres for the dead.§ See Driver on Dt 2<sup>12</sup>.

† It may be observed that there is no authority in the account of the Nativity for connecting the event with a cave: see Mt 2<sup>11</sup>, Lk 2<sup>7, 12</sup>.

‡ Strabo, i. 42, xvi. 775, 776.

§ The caverns of Upper Egypt, hewn out of the same formation, 'the Nubian Sandstone,' were made use of by the ancient Egyptians for similar purposes.

3. Caves were largely made use of in the troublous times of Israelitish history as places of refuge: as such the following may be specially mentioned:—

(a) The cave in the hills above Zoar inhabited by Lot and his two daughters (Gn 19<sup>30</sup>).

(b) The cave of Makkedah at Beth-horon, in which the five kings of the Canaanites hid themselves (Jos 10<sup>10</sup>).

(c) Caves in which the Israelites hid themselves from the Midianites in the time of the Judges (Jg 6<sup>2</sup>), and from the Philistines in the time of Saul (1 S 13<sup>6</sup>). Both these references point to the conclusion that caves, both natural and artificial, were very numerous in these times; some of them may be now covered over and their entrances hidden from view.

(e) The cave of En-gedi, in the cliffs overlooking the Dead Sea, was another place of refuge for David, after he had been dislodged from the cave of Adullam (1 S 23<sup>20</sup> 24<sup>3</sup>). See ENGEDI.

(f) The cave in which Obadiah fed the prophets of the Lord in the days of Ahab (1 K 18<sup>4</sup>). This cave was probably situated on the flank of Mount Carmel.

The above instances explain the language of Is 21<sup>10</sup>, 19<sup>21</sup>, 21 where 'men shall go into the caves of the rocks, and into the holes of the earth, from before the terror of the LORD, and from the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake mightily the earth.'

4. Caves, both natural and artificial, were used as places of sepulture: the cave of Machpelah, purchased of Ephron the Hittite, was the sepulchre of Sarah (Gn 23<sup>19</sup>), and afterwards of Abraham (Gn 25<sup>9</sup>), Isaac (35<sup>27-29</sup>), and Jacob (50<sup>13</sup>). There can be no doubt but that the mosque of Hebron covers the last resting-place of the patriarchs; it is a spot considered of the highest sanctity by the Arab tribes.†

CEDAR (ערב 'erez, κέδρος, cedrus).—We cannot enter intelligently on the discussion of the cedar without premising that the Heb. word 'erez was probably used for three or more different trees. In this it resembles its English equivalent. Cedar, in English, is used for the cedar of Lebanon, for the Bermuda cedar, of which lead pencils are made, for Juniperus Virginiana, L., and for Cupressus thyoides, L., and other trees. The cedar wood, which (acc. to P) was used with scarlet and hyssop for purification (Lv 14<sup>4</sup>, Nu 19<sup>6</sup>), was not, in all probability, the cedar of Lebanon, but a plant obtainable in Sinai, and afterwards in Palestine. Such a tree is Juniperus Phænicea, L., which is found on Mt. Hor, and on the brow of the Edomitic limestone cliffs overlooking the Arabah, and probably in the Sinaitic peninsula. If no longer there, there is nothing in the climate to hinder its having grown there formerly. Houghton erroneously calls it oxycedrus, which is a shrub or small tree of the mountains of Syria.

It is uncertain what tree is meant by 'arazim (Nu 24<sup>6</sup>). They are said to be trees growing by water. The cedar of Lebanon does not grow in moist places. On the contrary, it seeks the dry sloping mountain-side, where nothing but the moisture in the clefts of the rocks nourishes

it. Unless we suppose, as has been hinted in the article on ALOES, that the location of the 'arazim is poetic licence, we must suppose some water-loving tree to be intended in this passage, certainly not the Cedrus Libani, Barr., nor Juniperus oxycedrus, Lam., nor indeed any of the conifere of the Holy Land.

Avicenna defines 'arz, in Arab., as the well-known juniper berry. This is the product of Juniperus communis, L.

In most of the passages of Scripture not already cited, probably in all, there can be no doubt that the cedar of Lebanon is intended. Let us analyse them in detail. (1) It was abundant (1 K 6<sup>9-10</sup> 10<sup>27</sup>). There is every reason to believe that the cedar was exceedingly abundant in Solomon's day. The remains of the old forests exist above el-Me'asir, Barûk, 'Ain-Zehalta, el-Hadeth, Beshherri, Sir, and the Dunniyeh. They probably covered all the sub-alpine peaks of Lebanon. It is also extremely probable that the cedar flourished in those days on Hermon and Antilebanon, both of which belong to the Lebanon system, and are suited climatically to the growth of these trees. Large forests of them exist in Amanus, and thence they extend northward and westward to Akherdagh, and for a long distance into the Taurus. The cedar existed also in Cyprus; and large forests of it are found in the Atlas and the Himalayas. (2) It was a tall tree (Is 2<sup>13</sup>, Am 2<sup>9</sup>). Several of the trees in the Beshherri grove are 60 or 70 ft. high. In Amanus it often reaches 100 ft. It is quite likely that it reached or exceeded this height in Lebanon. (3) It was not only a tree 'of a high stature,' but one 'with fair (beautiful) branches, and with a shadowing shroud' (dense shade) (Ezk 31<sup>3</sup>). No quality of the cedar tree is more beautiful than its horizontal spray, with an upper surface flat, and presenting an even carpet of dark green, ornamented with its yellow staminate and purple pistillate cones. (4) It was suitable for the masts of ships (Ezk 27<sup>5</sup>). It has been objected that the cedar has a thick, gnarled trunk, too short for a mast. This is true of the old weather-beaten veterans in the open groves of Lebanon at the present day. But in Amanus, where the growth is close and forest-like, there are multitudes of tall straight trunks, every way suitable for masts. Indeed, many of the younger trees of the Beshherri grove would make excellent masts for ships of the size of those in Ezekiel's time. It has been proposed to consider the Pinus Halepensis, Mill., as the 'erez' here intended. It is curious that this pine is still known in some parts of Lebanon by the name 'arz', and also in the neighbourhood of Aleppo. But it is not so well adapted to masting as the true cedar, and, although abundant throughout Lebanon, is also equally abundant in Pal., east and west of the Jordan. It is unlikely that Ezekiel would have spoken of the tree distinctively as the 'cedar from Lebanon,' if he had intended the Aleppo pine, which the Tyrians could have cut from the hill-country close to their city. (5) It was suitable for beams, pillars, and boards (1 K 6<sup>9</sup> 7<sup>2</sup>). The cedars of Amanus, where the normal growth obtains, could furnish a board 60 to 80 ft. long, and 6 to 8 ft. wide at the bottom, and 2 or more at top. They could furnish pillars and beams of any required thickness. The timber is indestructible by dry rot or borers. It is close-grained, sound to the heart, fragrant, and of a pleasing colour. We have abundant testimony as to its durability. Pliny says that the cedar roof of the temple of Diana at Ephesus lasted 400 years. That of the temple of Apollo at Ulicia lasted 1170 years. (6) It was suitable for carved work, as images (Is 44<sup>14, 15</sup>). Cedar wood is better fitted for this purpose than almost any other wood in the land. It is hard, close-grained, and takes a high polish. (7) It must be full of sap (Ps 92<sup>14</sup>). The balsamic juice of the cedar exudes from every pore. Large beads and nodules of the fragrant resin form on the uninjured branches. An incision into the bark is followed by a copious distillation of the same. Where two branches meet and rub together, they each pour out the life-giving sap, which cements them, so that they grow fast to one another. Numerous examples of this can be seen in the grove at Beshherri. (8) It was the king of trees. It is placed at the head of the vegetable kingdom by Solomon (1 K 4<sup>33</sup>). Abimelech concedes its superiority (Jg 9<sup>15</sup>). It is perhaps alluded to as 'the glory of Lebanon' (Is 35<sup>2</sup> 60<sup>13</sup>). The cedars are 'the trees of the Lord' (Ps 104<sup>16</sup>). The Arabs still know them by the name 'arz er-rubb,' 'the cedars of the Lord.' When the cedar falls, the fir, itself a noble tree, howls, as a vassal for his lord (Zec 11<sup>1, 2</sup>). When Jehoash wished to express his contempt for Amaziah, he compared himself to a cedar and Amaziah to a thistle, and said, 'there passed by a wild beast that was in Lebanon, and trode down the thistle' (2 K 14<sup>9</sup>). The highest boast of Sennacherib was that he would 'cut down the tall cedars' (Is 37<sup>34</sup>). (9) Of this tree much of the temple was built, also the palaces of David and Solomon, and many other grand buildings of Jerusalem. It was probably at that epoch that the denudation of Lebanon began.

The cedar is known by the natives of restricted localities in Lebanon by two other names. Thus the people in the neighbourhood of 'Ain-Zehalta, Bâruk, and el-Me'asir call their cedars ibhul. The people in the neighbourhood of Sir call it tnâb.

CELLAR.—In AV only (1 Ch 27<sup>27, 28</sup>) for wine or for oil. The Heb. (קִרְיָא) is common for any store or storehouse. RV gives 'c.' for AV 'secret place' in 1 K 11<sup>33</sup>, reading קְרִיפָה 'a vault,' 'crypt,' for קְרִיפֹת 'hidden.' The Greek word is used by Jos. CENCHREÆ.—Cenchreæ or Kenchreæ (not, as AV, Cenchræ; usually spelt Κενχ., by T., WH Κενχ.), where St. Paul, before sailing for Syria, had his hair shorn in compliance with a vow (Ac 18<sup>18</sup>), and where Phœbe was a deaconess (Ro 16<sup>1</sup>). C. was the seaport of Corinth, on the eastern side of the isthmus (see CORINTH). It doubtless had its share in the bustle, luxury, and licence of the mother-city; but, under the influence of St. Paul, it early became the seat of a local church, whose deaconess had the honour of bearing the apostle's letter to the Roman Church.

CENDEBÆUS (Κενδεβαῖος), a general of Antiochus VII. Sidetes, who was given the command of the sea-coast, and sent with an army into Palestine in order to enforce the claims of Antiochus against Simon Maccabæus (comp. ARRHENIUS). Cendebæus occupied Jamnia, fortified Kidron, a place not otherwise known, and then began to make raids upon Judæa. Owing to his advanced age Simon did not go out to battle himself, but placed his two sons, Judas and John, in command. The battle took place in a plain not far from Modin; and the Jews, although obliged to cross a torrent-bed before commencing the attack, gained a complete victory over Cendebæus, and pursued the Syrians as far as Kidron and the neighbourhood of Ashdod (1 Mac 15<sup>38</sup> 16<sup>9</sup>; cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 3).

CENSER.—Two Heb. words are thus rendered in our Eng. version, קִנְיָא and קִנְיָא. The latter, from the same root as the word for incense, is rendered by the LXX in the two places where it occurs (2 Ch 26<sup>19</sup>, Ezk 8<sup>11</sup>) θυμιατήριον. For this reason χρυσόθιν θυμιατήριον of He 9<sup>4</sup> has been understood since Jerome's time to mean 'golden censer' (AV, RV). The best modern authorities, however, have decided in favour of the rendering 'golden altar of incense' (so RVm after Bleek, Del. etc.), a sense in which the word frequently occurs in Philo and Josephus (for reil. see Thayer, NT Lex. sub voc.).

Elsewhere in OT the vessel used to carry the charcoal on which the incense was burned is termed קִנְיָא. In AV and RV our translators have only in certain cases given the rendering 'censer,' preferring 'Firepan' in those passages, apparently, where the קִנְיָא is mentioned among the utensils connected with the altar of burnt-offering, as in Ex 27<sup>3</sup>, Nu 4<sup>14</sup> RV* etc.

There is no reason for this distinction, one and the same utensil being intended throughout. The קִנְיָא was so constructed as to be capable not merely of lifting the glowing charcoal from the altar of burnt-offering,—so much is indicated by its etymology from קָנָה to take up 'live coals' from the hearth,—but also of containing a quantity sufficient to burn at least two handfuls of incense (Lv 16<sup>2</sup>). We may therefore think of it as a bowl-shaped implement furnished with a short handle,—in other words, as a species of ladle. The censers of the Pent. (only in P) are of the same material as the great altar, probably bronze (Ex 27<sup>3</sup>, cf. Nu 16<sup>38, 39</sup>). Those of Solomon's temple were of gold (1 K 7<sup>30</sup>,

* It is not correct to say, as in Smith's DB, 2 i. p. 552, that the vessels enumerated (Nu 4<sup>14</sup>) are those of 'the golden Altar, i.e. of incense.' These have been mentioned but not named in v. 10. Besides, 'the altar' (v. 12) is invariably in the Pent. the altar of burnt-offering.

2 K 25<sup>18</sup>). A censer of silver is mentioned in connexion with the daily offering in Tamid v. 4, 5, Yoma iv. 4. The favourite LXX renderings are πυρέλιον (cf. Sir 50<sup>9</sup>) and θυτοσκη (cf. 1 Mac 1<sup>22</sup>).

It is now impossible to say in what respect, if at all, the תקק differed from the תקקק. Delitzsch is certainly mistaken in identifying (art. 'Raucherpfanne' in Richin's IBA) the latter with the vessel designated תק (see Nu 7<sup>147</sup>), EV spoon, more probably a bowl with a handle, and therefore of similar shape to תקק (hence LXX θυτοσκη), in any case a vessel in which the incense was kept (cf. the תקק with incense on the table of shewbread, Ex 25<sup>40</sup>). The context in which it occurs (see above) requires us, in each case, to see in the תקקק a proper censer.

The censer (λαβαντός) appears along with incense in the imagery of the Apoc. (8<sup>3-5</sup>). In 5<sup>8</sup> the 'golden vials (φιάλας) full of odours' (RV more correctly 'the golden bowls full of incense') have been suggested by the תקק or incense-holders just mentioned. For the use of this vessel in Herod's temple see Tamid v. vi.

Among the implements of the golden candlestick were its תקקק, EV snuff dishes. These were probably not trays for the snufflers as the LXX rendering in Ex 25<sup>38</sup> (ὀπιδομα) would suggest, but rather a utensil of the same shape as the censer, in which to receive and carry away the burnt portions of the wicks.

Representations of the censers used by the ancient Egyptians are still extant. They consisted of a small pot or cup with a long handle (Kitto, Encycl. Bibl. Lit. 1862, p. 461) into which little pellets of incense were projected at intervals by the priest.

In early Christian times the use of censers is not mentioned; it appears to have commenced about the 4th cent. A.D., probably for antiseptic fumigation. In the 8th cent., however, their use was general, and directions for their adoption were given by local synods. But symbolical meanings became by degrees attached to the burning of incense. In many cathedrals on the Continent and in this country very valuable thuribles or censers of gold and silver (cf. Herod. iv. 162; Thucyd. vi. 46; Cic. Verr. iv. 21-24) are still to be found, some of them weighing as much as 16 lbs., and evidently not intended to be swung like the ordinary censer. In form modern censers vary considerably, being usually oval, but sometimes square. The ordinary form used by the Jews is of an octagonal shape. In Europe they are generally furnished with a perforated lid, and have three chains to the lower portion, a fourth chain being attached to the lid, so that it can be raised when required. There is usually a small shallow pan enclosed in the censer to receive live charcoal. They are now usually made of brass, as used in the Roman and Anglican services. The incense used for the censer is generally carried by an acolyte in a boat-shaped brass box, containing a spoon for sprinkling it on the censer.

CENTURION (Latin, centurio; Gr. κεντυριων in Mk; ἐκατοντάρχης, ἐκατονταρχος in Mt, Lk, and Ac,—see critical authorities in Grimm-Thayer for the two forms of this word).—An officer in the Roman army in command of a century (centuria), which corresponded to the civil curia, and consisted of a body of men numbering from 50 to 100, according to the size of the legion of which it was a subdivision. Though resembling a British captain in the size of the unit under his command, the centurion in social position was equal only to a British non-commissioned officer. He could not become more than a centurion, except through exceptional circumstances, but left the service when his time was up and settled in some small town, to live on the smaller or larger fortune he had acquired in the wars.

We meet with centurions in the NT on five occasions—two of these being connected with incidents in the life of our Lord, one with St. Peter, and two with St. Paul. 1. At Capernaum a centurion came to Jesus to seek healing for his servant (Mt 8<sup>5-13</sup>, Lk 7<sup>2-10</sup>). This man was a Gentile, but probably not a Roman, because the occurrence took place in the dominions of Herod Antipas (see Holtzmann, Handkom. in loc.). The Herods would be inclined to imitate their Roman patrons in the organisation of their armies. The centurion shows a warm sympathy for his slave, such as was rare among Romans. His reference to his being a man under authority, having soldiers under him, would be esp. appropriate on the lips of a subordinate officer to whom the duty of obeying his superiors was as familiar as that of commanding his men. The Capernaum centurion had probably resided for some time in the city, which would thus appear to have been guarded by a garrison. There he had been so attracted by the good qualities of Judaism as to have built a synagogue, from which it may be inferred that he was a believer in the God of Israel, though evidently he was not a proselyte. He evinced great kindness of heart, humility, and faith—the exceptional strength of his faith surprising and delighting our Lord. 2. A centurion was in charge of the execution of Jesus. This man must have been in the Roman army, as the crucifixion was carried out under the orders of Pontius Pilate, the Roman Procurator. The Synoptists note the impression produced on him by the spectacle of the last scene in the life of our Lord. According to St. Matthew and St. Mark, he exclaimed, 'Truly this' (Mk 'this man') 'was the son (or a son) of God' (Mt 27<sup>54</sup>, Mk 15<sup>39</sup>); and according to St. Luke 'he glorified God, saying, Certainly this was a righteous man' (Lk 23<sup>47</sup>). Whichever phrase he used, it cannot be supposed that as a heathen he fully appreciated the divinity of Christ, but it is clear that he was impressed with our Lord's goodness and greatness. This centurion appears again a little later when Pilate inquires of him as to the fact and time of the death of Jesus (Mk 15<sup>45</sup>). 3. Cornelius, the first Gentile baptized and received into the Church (Ac 10), was a centurion of the Roman garrison at Caesarea, the headquarters of the Procurator, and belonged to the 'Italian band'—(which see). It is evident from the narrative, that Cornelius, like the Capernaum centurion, had been deeply impressed with the religious ideas of the people among whom he was serving; but it is also evident that he had not become a proselyte—or St. Peter's scruples would not have needed to be removed by the vision on the house-top, and it seems clear that he was not satisfied with the measure of light he perceived in Judaism. 4. Several centurions of the cohort at Jerusalem under the command of a chiliarch (called 'the chief captain' in Ac 21<sup>31</sup> AV and RV) appear during the riot at Jerusalem, and the subsequent rescue of St. Paul and his arrest (Ac 21<sup>32-22.25</sup>, 26 23<sup>17.24</sup>). There would be ten centurions to a cohort if the numbers were complete. 5. After his appeal to Caesar, St. Paul was conducted to Rome under the charge of a centurion named Julius, with whom he came to be on very friendly terms (Ac 27<sup>11, 42</sup> 28<sup>10</sup>). This centurion was 'of Augustus' band' (which see), Ac 27<sup>1</sup>.

CERTAIN.—1. The orig. meaning of c. is fixed or definite, not fluctuating. It is seen in Ex 16<sup>4</sup> 'gather a c. rate every day' (קָרַיִם בֵּימֵי, RV 'a day's portion every day'); 2 Ch 8<sup>13</sup> 'after a c. rate every day' (בֵּימֵי קָרַיִם, RV 'as the duty of every day required'); Neh 11<sup>23</sup> 'a c. portion . . . for the singers, due every day' (קָרַיִם בֵּימֵי הַזִּמְרָן, RV 'a settled provision . . . as every day required'); 1 Co 4<sup>1</sup> 'we . . . have no c. dwelling-place' (ἀσπατοῦμεν). See also Du 2<sup>15</sup> 'the dream is c.' 'fixed,' cf. 2<sup>8</sup> 'I know of certainty,' same Heb.; Ac 25<sup>20</sup> 'of whom I have no c. thing to write' (ἀσφαλῆς). Or c. after being ascertained, Dt 13<sup>14</sup> 'Then shalt thou inquire, and make search, and ask diligently; and, behold, if it be truth, and the thing c.' (וְכֵן), and 17<sup>4</sup>. In this sense is the phrase 'for certain,' 1 K 2<sup>27</sup>, Jer 26<sup>15</sup>; and 'for a certain,' 1 K 2<sup>24</sup> 'know for a c.' (RV 'for c.'), where the a is redundant. See A.

2. When a person or thing is taken out of the fluctuating multitude and fixed in the mind, it need not be further specified, and so becomes indefinite, as in the common phrases 'a certain man,' etc. (Heb. שֵׁם, שֵׁם, or שֵׁם, Gr. τις mostly, also ἀνθρώπος, Mt 18<sup>23</sup> 21<sup>22</sup>, and εἷς). Thus we have, Ac 8<sup>30</sup> 'a c. water'; 5<sup>2</sup> 'a c. part'; Lk 23<sup>10</sup> 'a c. sedition'; 2 Ch 18<sup>2</sup> 'after c. years'; Ezr 10<sup>16</sup> 'c. chiefs of the fathers' (RV 'c. heads of fathers' houses'); and Du 8<sup>18</sup> 'I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that c. saint which spake,' where we see the word changing from its definite to its indefinite use. 'Certain' in this sense is freq. used alone, where we now use the vaguer 'some,' as Nu 16<sup>2</sup> 'c. of the children of Israel'; 1 Ch 19<sup>6</sup> 'there went c. and told David'; Lk 8<sup>20</sup> 'it was told him by c. which said'; 18<sup>5</sup> 'unto c. which trusted in themselves.'

Certainly. 1 S 20<sup>3</sup> 'Thy father certainly knoweth that I have found grace in thine eyes,' not 'it is certain that thy father knoweth,' but 'thy father knoweth for a certainty' (Heb. יָדָע, RV 'knoweth well'); so 20<sup>9</sup>, Gn 43<sup>7</sup>, Jer 13<sup>12</sup> 40<sup>14</sup> 42<sup>10, 22</sup>. Same Heb. in Jos 23<sup>13</sup> 'know for a certainty'; 1 K 2<sup>27</sup> 'know for certain'; 2<sup>42</sup> 'know for a certain'; Jer 26<sup>15</sup> 'know ye for certain.'

'If you desire to know the certainty
Of your dear father's death.'

CERTIFY, in AV, means not 'to make certain' or 'assure,' but simply 'to make to know,' 'tell.' In OT it occurs (1) Ezr 4<sup>14</sup> 16 5<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>24</sup> (עָרַב); (2) 2 S 15<sup>23</sup> (עָרַב); (3) Est 2<sup>22</sup> (עָרַב, RV 'tell'). In Apoc. Wis 18<sup>6</sup> (προσγινώσκω), Ep. Jer<sup>1</sup> (ἀναγγέλλω), Bel<sup>1</sup> (δεικνύω), 1 Mac 14<sup>21</sup> (ἀπαγγέλλω), 2 Mac 1<sup>18</sup> (διασαφένω), 2 Mac 11<sup>20</sup> (εἰδοῦς). In NT Gal 1<sup>11</sup> 'I certify you' (γινώσκω, RV 'I make known to you'). Cf. Ps 39<sup>8</sup> Pr. Bk. 'Lord, let me know mine end, and the number of my days, that I may be certified how long I have to live' (AV 'that I may know how frail I am,' RV 'let me know how frail I am'); 19<sup>2</sup> Pr. Bk. CHABRIS (Χαβρῖς).—One of the three rulers of Bethulia, Jth 6<sup>15</sup> 8<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>6</sup>.

CHADIASAI (Β of Χαδίασαι, A Χαδάσαι, AV they of Chadias), 1 Es 5<sup>20</sup>.—They are mentioned with the Ammidioi as returning, to the number of 422, with Zerub. There are no corresponding names in the lists of Ezra and Neh. Fritzsche (Exeg. Handb. in loc.) identifies them with the people of Kedesh in Judah (Jos 15<sup>25</sup>). H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

CHÆREAS (Χαίρας, AV Chereas) was brother of Timotheus, the leader of the Ammonites, and held command at the fortress of Gazara, i.e. probably Jazer in the trans-Jordanic territory (see 1 Mac 5<sup>6-8</sup>). Chareas was slain upon the capture of Gazara by Judas Maccabaeus (2 Mac 10<sup>32-33</sup>).

CHAFE.—To c. is to make warm (Lat. calefacere, late Lat. calefare, old Fr. chauffer); next to make warm by friction; then (as with 'friction' itself) to irritate. In 2 S 17<sup>8</sup> only (AV, RV) 'they be chafed in their minds, as a bear robbed of her whelps in the field' (עָרַב קָרַיִם 'bitter of soul'). Cf.—

'Calumnesse is great advantage; he that lets
Another chafe, may warm him at his fire,
Mark all his wandrings, and enjoy his frets.'

G. Herbert, Temple ('Church Porch,' lib.).

J. HASTINGS.

CHAFF.—The AV renders by this term four Heb. words. 1. עָפָר hāshash. This word occurs but twice in OT, Is 5<sup>24</sup> 33<sup>11</sup>, where it is rendered AV 'chaff.' It would be better rendered 'cut grass' or 'dry grass' (as Is 5<sup>24</sup> RV). 2. מֶטֶן or מֶץ mōz. This is chaff separated from the grain by winnowing. It is usually tr. in LXX χρῶς (Ps 1<sup>4</sup> 35<sup>5</sup>, Is 29<sup>5</sup>, Hos 13<sup>3</sup>), once χρῶς ἀχύρου (Is 17<sup>13</sup>), and once κοινοτρός=dust (Job 21<sup>18</sup>). In the Oriental process of winnowing by tossing the cut straw, grain, and chaff into the air, the grain falls vertically back on the heap, the cut straw is carried a little distance away and deposited in another heap, while the chaff, consisting of the husks and the finer particles of the straw, is carried to and beyond the borders of the threshing-floor. Hence the imagery of the passages cited. 3. תֵּבֶן tebhen, the same as the Arab. tibn=cut straw. This word is only once tr. 'chaff' (Jer 23<sup>28</sup> AV, where LXX renders ἀχυρον, and RV 'straw'). In all the other passages where it occurs, except Job 21<sup>18</sup>, where it is incorrectly rendered 'stubble,' it is tr. 'straw.' Cut straw is preferable. See STRAW. 4. עֵר ēr. This is an Aramaic word of somewhat uncertain signification. Some have derived it from the root עָר to be blind, and regard it as that which blinds, such as the minute particles called AV 'chaff of the summer threshing-floors' (Du 2<sup>35</sup>). The LXX rendering κοινοτρός in this passage would make it the dust and not the chaff of the threshing-floor. This contains, however, many minute spicules of the straw, husks, and beards of the grain. G. E. POST.

CHAIN.—The Bible frequently refers to chains, and uses a great variety of words to describe the different articles and their uses. Chains were chiefly employed for (1) ornament, (2) restraint.

1. Ornament.—1. There was the more solid form of simple or twisted ring for the neck (צִיָּה from צָרַב; cf. Arab. rabat, 'to bind'). Such was Joseph's gold chain (Gn 41<sup>42</sup>), also Ezk 16<sup>11</sup>. The Maronite Christians of Lebanon regard it as a charm against evil spirits, or the evil eye (see AMULET). It is called a tauk, and in the mod. Arab. version of the Bible by Van Dyck the ouch of the high priest's dress is so translated. This chain may be of gold or silver, but the poorer classes, as the Bedawin, wear chains of copper or brass. 2. There was a more elaborate form, made of plaited wire, like (1), but with jewels inserted and pendants attached, or, instead of the metal twist, composed of separate parts in squares, balls, or links (corresp. to Arab. ḫiladat, 'ḫēd'). It did not encircle the neck closely, like the tauk, but hung loosely from it. The chain of Dn 57<sup>16, 20</sup> was probably of this order, and examples of it are found in Jg 8<sup>23</sup>, Ps 73<sup>6</sup>, Ca 4<sup>9</sup>, Pr 1<sup>9</sup>. It is customary in Syria to hang a crescent of silver, called the hıldl, by a hair rope or chain round the necks of valuable camels or horses (cf. Jg 8<sup>21, 26</sup>). 3. The flexible chain (כַּדְדָּה, Arab. silsilah, 'link-chain') for suspending and festooning purposes (Ex 28<sup>14, 22</sup> 39<sup>15</sup>, 1 K 7<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ch 3<sup>8, 16</sup>). 4. In Nu 31<sup>30</sup> RV 'ankle-chain' (which see). 5. In Ca 1<sup>10</sup> (כַּדְדָּה, Arab. haraz) RV 'strings of jewels' means a necklace of gems, beads, or shells strung on a thread. 6. In Is 3<sup>19</sup> (כַּדְדָּה, Arab. nūfafah) RV 'pendants' means ear-drops, in design like a pearl or drop of water.

2. Restraint.—Named from the metal, copper (כֶּדֶד), Is 37. In Jer 39<sup>7</sup> 52<sup>11</sup> chain is transl. fetters (see FETTER); also in AV in Jg 16<sup>21</sup>, 2 S 3<sup>34</sup>, 2 K 25<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ch 33<sup>11</sup> 36<sup>9</sup>. Chain in Ps 68<sup>9</sup> is corrected in RV to 'prosperity' (כֶּדֶדָּה). In NT the references to chains for restraint present little difficulty. The chief terms are ἀλυσίς, Mk 5<sup>3</sup>, Ac 28<sup>20</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>, Rev 20<sup>1</sup>; σείρα in 2 P 2<sup>4</sup> 'chains of darkness'; δεσμάς in Jude 6 'everlasting chains,' which becomes a fig. 'bond' in Lk 13<sup>10</sup>.

Modern brass was unknown in ancient times, but there was an alloy of copper and tin. The feet of prisoners were secured by a chain of copper (כֶּדֶד, Arab. silsil nahās, πῶδη) attached to copper rings encircling each ankle, which were widened to receive the ankle, and then closed by a few strokes of a hammer. For the sake of safe custody, as the soft copper rings might be opened, the prisoner's eyes were put out (2 K 25<sup>7</sup>). In NT mention is made of the Roman custom of securing a prisoner by a chain, one end being fastened to the prisoner's wrist and the other to that of the soldier who guarded him (Ac 12<sup>6</sup> 28<sup>20</sup>). W. CARSLAW.

i. THE LAND.—The land of the Chaldeans, in OT, usually covers what is included in the term Babylonia, not inclusive of Mesopotamia in its larger sense, but of the lower or between-rivers Babylonia. Delitzsch (Paradies, p. 128 f.) maintains that the Bab. name Kašdu, then Kaššā, is but the earlier designation of the 'territory of the Kaš' (da, meaning 'territory'), a people who held sway over middle Babylonia for some time before the 13th cent. B.C. (cf. also Del. Sprache der Kossäer). The land of the Kaldū, for some centuries after B.C. 1000, was located S.E. of Babylon, reaching to Bit-Yakin and the head of the Pers. Gulf, and possibly swinging round W. to the edge of the Arabian desert. In the inser. of Rammannirari III. (Rawlinson, WAT i. 35, No. 1, line 22) Kaldū covers all Babylonia in the expression šarrāni ša māt Kaldū, 'kings of the land of C.' Sargon always speaks of the rebel Merodach-baladan at Babylon as šar māt Kaldū, 'king of the land of Kaldū,' or šar māt Bit-Yakin, 'king of the land of Bit-Yakin.' So the Persian Gulf is mentioned as tāmtum ša Bit-Yakin, interchangeably with tāmtum ša māt Kaldū, indicating that the Pers. Gulf was the sea of the Chaldaea of that day. Sennacherib (Rawlinson, WAT i. 37, line 37) draws a line between the Arabians and Aramaeans on the one hand, and the amēlu Kaldū, 'the people of the Chaldeans,' on the other. In the time of the decline of Assyria and the rise of New Babylonia the term Kaldū included N. and S. Babylonia and the territory occupied by certain foreign tribes and peoples adjacent to them, who were later included in the name as used by the prophet-priest Ezekiel (23<sup>23</sup>). The later Chaldaea was about 400 miles long N.E. and S.W. by an average of 100 miles in width. The derivation of the word is somewhat doubtful, though it may be related to the name of a nephew of Abraham, Chesed (כֶּסֶד), of which it is a plural, in Gn 23<sup>22</sup>. It is also the same in root-form as the Assy. kašādā, 'to conquer.'

ii. THE PEOPLE.—The origin of the Chaldeans is enveloped in the mists of antiquity. Whence and when they migrated into lower Babylonia is also an unsolved riddle. Winckler (Gesch. Bab. und Assy. p. 99 f.) finds the first hint of such a people in the 'dynasty of the coast-land' [meer-landes], in the person of Ea-mukin-sumi, king of Karduniaš, where the latter's territory is distinguished from the 'coast-land,' at about the middle of the 10th cent. B.C. It is also thought that the names of the kings of this dynasty are Kassite, thus sustaining a conjecture (cf. Del. as above) that the Kossaeans, the Kašādā, were the pioneers of the Chaldeans in Babylonia. If these conjectures are true, then we find already in this period a mixed population in the lowlands, reaching as far as the Pers. Gulf. But the character of the Chaldeans, as we know them afterwards, is strongly Semitic. They pushed north from the Pers. Gulf against Babylon, and for centuries contended with Assyria for its possession. They were in early times nomads and agriculturists, despising city life. But their contact with the more advanced civilisation of lower Babylonia led them to respect and to foster centres for self-protection. Soon this industrious, thrifty people built and fortified cities, and extended their boundaries to the north against the older and more cultured capitals. In the second half of the 8th cent. B.C. we find north of Babylon the 'kingdom' of Bit-Dakkuri; and Sargon, as well as his successors on the throne of Assyria, had their hands full in holding at bay this vigorous people. The Chaldaean kings who forced their way to the throne of Babylon were probably heads of different cities, states, or tribes of that people. Merodach-baladan, son of Baladan, was king of Bit-Yakin, Ukin-zir of Bit-Amukkani, and Šuzub, a Chaldaean, from some other place or tribe.

iii. THE LANGUAGE.—The language of the Chaldeans was the Bab. cuneiform, almost identical grammatically and lexically with the Assyrian. The term 'Chaldee' as applied to certain chapters of Dn and Ezr is incorrect, and should not be so employed. The correct term is Aramaic.

iv. THE WISE MEN.—In Dn (1<sup>4</sup> and often) the term 'Chaldeans' is generally used in the sense of astrologers, astronomers. The same sense is seen in classical writers (as Strabo, Diodorus). Schrader (UOT ii. 125) says, 'The signification "wise men," that we meet with in the Bk of Dn, is foreign to Assyrio-Bab. usage, and did not arise till after the fall of the Bab. empire.' Delitzsch (Calver Bibellexicon, p. 127*) regards this usage as built upon the fact that Bab.-Chaldean had been the home and the chief seat of astrological and astronomical knowledge from early ages. The attempted identification of the peoples in the region of the Black Sea (mentioned by Xenophon as Chaldeans) with those in lower Mesopotamia has proved a failure. See BABYLONIA.

CHALDEE VERSIONS.—See TARGUMS.

CHALK-STONES (חֲבֵלֵי).—This expression is used only once, Is 27<sup>9</sup>, where Israel's repentance evinces itself by the destruction of idolatrous altars, whose stones are to be as chalk (or limestone) broken in pieces, calcined and slaked for mortar (see Delitzsch, ad loc.). The expression is of much interest as showing that the practice of burning limestone and slaking with water was practised in Pal. in OT times. The limestone of Pal. consists largely of white granular carbonate of lime of the same geological age as the Chalk formation of England. E. HULL.

CHALLENGE.—In the sense of 'claim,' Ex 22<sup>9</sup> 'any manner of lost thing which another challengeth to be his' (רָגַח, RV 'one saith'). Cf. Moro (1513), 'He began, not by warre, but by Law, to challenge the crown.' J. HASTINGS.

CHALPHI (AV Calphi)=Alpheus (Χαλφεί, Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 7, Χαφείας), the father of Judas, one of the two captains of Jonathan Maccabæus who stood firm in a battle fought against the Syrians at Hazer in N. Galilee (1 Mac 11<sup>70</sup>).

H. A. WHITE.

CHAMBER as a verb occurs Ro 13<sup>13</sup> 'Let us walk honestly, as in the day . . . not in chambering and wantonness' (κοιτῆ, 'a bed,' Lk 11<sup>7</sup>; 'the marriage bed,' He 13<sup>4</sup>; here 'illicit intercourse'; cf. Ro 9<sup>10</sup> κοιτῆν ἔχουσα, 'having conceived'). See HOUSE.

J. HASTINGS.

CHAMBERLAIN.—An officer in the houses of kings and nobles charged with the care of their apartments, dress, etc., though the office often implied other duties of trust. In OT the word occurs in 2 K 23<sup>11</sup> and repeatedly in Est, where the original is eunuch (עֲרֹם); but it is generally believed that this name is not to be taken always in a literal sense, and hence it is often rendered by the word officer. In Esther, however, the chamberlain evidently belongs to that class of persons who are entrusted with the watchful care of the harems of Oriental monarchs. In NT at Ac 12<sup>20</sup> it is said that the people of Tyre and Sidon sought the favour of Herod Agrippa through the mediation of Blastus 'the king's c.' (τὸν ἐπὶ τοῦ κοιτῶνος τοῦ βασιλέως), showing that the office was one of considerable influence. The word occurs again in AV in Ro 16<sup>23</sup>, but is rendered in RV more accurately 'treasurer' (οἰκονόμος) of the city, in connexion with the name of Erastus, a Christian of Corinth, from which place it is generally believed that St. Paul wrote his Ep. to the Romans, and where it is not likely there would be a chamberlain in the primary sense of the word. J. WORTABET.

CHAMELEON.—AV so renders חֲבִילֵי הָאֲרָבִים, chameleon, the second of the lizards mentioned in Lv 11<sup>30</sup>, which RV renders land-crocodile. On the other hand, RV renders by chameleon the last of the animals mentioned in this passage, חֲבִילֵי הָאֲרָבִים, talpa, which AV renders mole.

The Heb. chameleon is used in many passages in its etymological sense of strength, but only in the present for an animal. Nothing in its etymology points to the chameleon. Among the lizards the land-monitor, which is the land-crocodile of the ancients, Psammisaurus saurus, Merrem, is next to the Nile-monitor, Monitor Niloticus, Geoffr., in size and strength. The Arabs call both waral (vulgo waran). They distinguish the first as waral el-arḍ=the land-waral, and the second as waral el-bahr=water-waral. But the first is also called dabb=צָבָב, which is the name of the last animal in the previous verse, translated in AV tortoise, and in RV great lizard. It often attains a length of from 4 to 5 ft. It would therefore be better to render צָבָב, land-crocodile or land- monitor, and kôh, Nile-monitor or water-monitor. This would carry out the etymological idea of strength, as the water-monitor is a foot or two longer than its land relative, and Arabian stories are full of the records of its power in fighting, not only snakes, but the dabb itself. This would give to two of the lizard group appropriate specific names. Both are noted for devouring crocodile's eggs. The Nile-monitor was held in great reverence in ancient Egypt on this account.

As before said, RV gives chameleon for tinshemeth (Lv 11<sup>30</sup>). While it is perhaps probable that this animal is a lizard, as its name stands at the end of a list of lizards, it is by no means certain. It is also at the end of a list of things 'that creep upon the earth' (11<sup>29</sup>). In those days there was no scientific study of objects of Nature, and the collocation of the different clean and unclean animals was with reference to characteristics which are not recognised in any other system of classification (11<sup>4-7, 20-23</sup>). It is quite possible, therefore, that tinshemeth is not a lizard, but the mole-rat of Syria, Spalax typhlus, which, although not a true mole, has all its habits and its general aspect. The LXX and Vulg. renderings strengthen this possibility. There is, however, one strong objection to rendering tinshemeth 'mole-rat.' It is that holed (Lv 11<sup>30</sup>) tr. in both VSS (on the authority of the LXX γαλῆ, and Vulg. mustela), weasel, very probably refers to the mole-rat. See MOLE, WEASEL. It is inadmissible to suppose that the same animal is mentioned twice, by different names, so close together in the same list.

There seems to be no warrant for the adoption of chameleon for tinshemeth, excepting the derivation of the word from a root signifying to breathe, coupled with the ancient opinion that the chameleon lived on air. It must not be forgotten that, in the same chapter, tinshemeth is given as the name of an aquatic fowl (v. 18, cf. Dt 14<sup>16</sup>). See SWAN. On the whole, we think the question of the identity of both tinshemeths very unsatisfactory, and well-nigh insoluble. G. E. POST.

CHAMOIS (צִי זֶמֶר, καμηλοπάρδαλις, camelopardus).—This was one of the wild animals allowed to the Israelites as food (Dt 14<sup>5</sup>), and therefore presumably accessible to them. This would make impossible the renderings camelopard and chamois. Tristram establishes a very strong probability that it is the mountain-sheep of Egypt and Arabia, called in N. Africa oudad, and in Arabia kebs, which signifies a ram. It is known to naturalists as Ovis tragelaphus, and lives in small flocks in the most rugged mountain districts from Barbary to Egypt. The kebs of Sinai is probably identical with it, though as yet no naturalist has seen it. The Bedawin know it well. It may well be supposed that it was abundant in the Mosaic age, and, as it was allowed to the Israelites for food, they may have done much toward its extinction in those parts. It is more than 3 ft. in height, has no mane, but long hair down its throat and breast, and on the fore-legs, forming a sort of ruffles to the knee. It is very active, bounding from rock to rock. It has massive horns, 2 ft. in length, and curving gently backward. G. E. POST.

CHAMPAIGN means 'an open plain' (from Lat. campania, It. campagna, old Fr. champaigne). It occurs Dt 11<sup>30</sup> (in 1611 champion, a later form which was introduced in the beg. of 16th cent.) 'the Canaanites, which dwell in the c.' (צָבָב, RV 'Arabah'); Ezk 37<sup>26</sup> (1611 champion, a still later form), and Jth 5<sup>1</sup> 'in the c. countries' (עַרְבֵי הַבְּלָיִם, RV 'in the plains'). The word is pron. sham'pān. J. HASTINGS.

CHAMPION (from late Lat. campio, one who fights in the campus or open plain) is an accurate tr. of the Heb. in 1 S 17<sup>4-23</sup> (עֶרְכִּי, lit. 'the man of the space between,' that is, the space between the two armies, which is called in Gr. the metaxymos). But in 17<sup>4</sup> Goliath is simply called 'mighty one' (גִּבּוֹר), and the 'champion' of AV and RV is unhappy.

J. HASTINGS.

CHANCE.—The 'reign of law' is no discovery of the 19th century. It was an accepted, even an axiomatic, fact to the ancient Hebrew throughout the whole course of his history. And more than that, the law was the immediate expression of a personal will, not the fortuitous harmony of working forces. 'Chance,' therefore, has scant recognition in OT or in NT. Neither συνηχη nor τύχη occurs in NT; and τύχη only twice, συνηχη not once, in LXX. The first occurrence of τύχη in LXX is Gn 30<sup>11</sup> καὶ εἶπεν Λεῶν 'En τύχη, 'and Leah said, With fortune!' following the kethibh בְּרָכָה bēghādh (in pause), which RV also follows, 'and Leah said, Fortunate!' The other occurrence of τύχη is Is 65<sup>11</sup> ἐτοιμάζοντες τῷ δαιμονίῳ τράπεζαν καὶ πληροῦντες τῇ τύχῃ κέρασμα, 'preparing for the demon a table, and filling up for fortune a mixed drink.' Here τύχη stands for Heb. מֶנֶחַ Mēnē, which most scholars identify with Venus. But δαίμωνιον stands for גַּד, an old Semitic name for the god of Fortune, found in inscriptions, proper names, and common in Syr. = טִיחָה. See GAD. Apart from the passages above, the nearest approach to a recognition of 'chance' is in 1 S 6<sup>9</sup>, where the Philistines devise a method of discovering whether the calamities they had suffered while the ark was in their midst were due to the presence of the ark, or whether 'it was a chance that happened to us' (קָקַר, LXX σύνπτωμα); but here, as in the other places where the same Heb. is used (Dt 23<sup>10</sup> 'that which chance him,' Ru 2<sup>9</sup>, 1 S 20<sup>28</sup>, Ec 2<sup>14</sup>, 10 3<sup>19</sup> ter 9<sup>2</sup>, 3), the idea is not something independent of J<sup>n</sup>, but something unexpected by man. The prevalent Hebrew mind on the matter is expressed in the proverb (16<sup>33</sup>)—

'The lot is cast into the lap;
But the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord.'

The other places in which 'chance' occurs are these: Ec 9<sup>11</sup> 'time and c. happeneth to them all' (כָּל, elsewhere only in 1 K 5<sup>4</sup> and tr. 'occurent,' not 'chance,' but external incident or event; cf. 2 Es 10<sup>49</sup> 'these things which have chanced'); Lk 10<sup>91</sup> 'by c. there came down a certain priest that way' (συγκυβλα, again not 'chance,' but 'concurrency' or 'coincidence,' see Plummer in loc.); and so 1 Co 15<sup>37</sup> 'it may c. of wheat, or of some other grain' (εἰ τίς; i.e. we cannot tell which; cf. 14<sup>10</sup> εἰ τίς, 'it may be'); while in Dt 22<sup>6</sup> 'If a bird's nest c. to be before thee in the way,' and 2 S 1<sup>6</sup> 'As I happened by c. upon Mount Gilboa,' the Heb. is simply 'come upon' or 'meet' (קָרָא).

For the verb 'c.' = turn out (1 Co 15<sup>37</sup>) cf. Coverdale's tr. of Ph 1<sup>19</sup> 'Ye same shal chance to my Saluacion.'

J. HASTINGS.

CHANCELLOR.—'Rehum the c.,' Ezr 4<sup>8.9.17</sup> (רֶחֱמַן, lit. 'the lord of judgment'). Dhēm in Assyrian is the technical word used of the official reports forwarded to the kings of Assyria and Babylonia by their correspondents abroad. With this Sayce identifies the Aram. ṭēēm, and translates bē'el ṭēēm, 'lord of official intelligence' or 'postmaster.' 'Chancellor,' even in its old sense of royal notary or official secretary to the king, is thus unsuitable; while in mod. usage the word is restricted to special offices, all very different from this. See BEELTETHMUS, REHUM.

J. HASTINGS.

CHANGE.—1. See CHANGE OF RAIMENT; and notice that the sing. is used for the pl. in Jg 14<sup>12.18.19</sup> 'thirty change of garments' (RV 'changes'). The Heb. word (תַּחֲבוּשׁוֹת) there and elsewhere used in 'change' of raiment is found in three difficult passages: Job 10<sup>17</sup> 'changes and war are against me,' which may mean 'relays' of soldiers as in 1 K 5<sup>14</sup>, but see Davidson in loc. In Job 14<sup>4</sup> 'all the days of my appointed time will I wait till my c. come,' the meaning is clearly 'release' from the worry of life, as the soldier is released when his watch is over. But in Ps 55<sup>19</sup> 'who have no changes, and who fear not God,' this meaning, if possible, is not so easy. See Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. 2. In Lv 27<sup>32</sup> 'if he c. it at all, then both it and the c. thereof shall be holy,' c. = exchange (תַּחֲבִירָה), RV 'that for which it is changed'. Cf. Heywood (1562), 'Change is no robbery, but robbery maketh change.' 3. Wis 14<sup>28</sup> 'changing of kind' (γενέσεως ἐναλλαγῆ, RV 'confusion of sex'). 4. Changeable in Is 3<sup>32</sup> 'the c. suits of apparel,' means that may be changed; Cheyne, statē dresses, named in Heb. from their being put off when the occasion for their use was over. 5. Changer. See MONEY.

J. HASTINGS.

CHANGE OF RAIMENT.—The expression occurs in Gn 45<sup>22</sup>, where Joseph gives to Benjamin five changes of raiment (חֲבוּשֹׁתַי); in Jg 14<sup>12.19</sup>, where Samson offers thirty changes of garments (תַּחֲבוּשׁוֹתָיו); also in 2 K 5<sup>22.23</sup>, as part of Naaman's gift. In Jg 17<sup>10</sup> part of Micah's wages was to be an outfit of clothing (בְּגָדִים). The separate mention (Jg 14<sup>12</sup>) of the innermost garment (קִרְיָן AV 'sheet,' RV 'linen garment') indicates that 'change of raiment' referred to outer articles of dress. These, under some difference of name, pattern, and material, acc. to life in desert, village, or city, were two: (1) the coat or tunic (חֲבוּשָׁה, chabushā), in the form of a dressing-gown worn with girdle; and (2) the cloak or mantle (לְבָשֶׁת, labshet), of more ample and loose pattern. See COAT, CLOAK, DRESS.

G. M. MACKIE.

CHANT was formerly (and is still poetically) used as a simple synonym for 'sing.' So Am 6<sup>6</sup> 'that chant (Coverdale, 'syngo') to the sound of the viol' (קָנָה [all], RV 'sing idle songs').

CHANUNEUS (Χανοναῖος, AV Channuneus), 1 Es 8<sup>48</sup> (47 LXX).—A Levite, answering to Merari, if to anything, in the parallel list in Ezr 8<sup>9</sup>.

CHAPEL.—The Frankish kings looked with special reverence on the capella or cloak of St. Martin, which was carried before them in battle and invoked in oaths. The name capella was then used for the sanctuary in which its capellani guarded this treasure. By steps which can readily be traced, the same designation came to be given to any sanctuary attached to a palace and containing holy relics, to any private sanctuary, to any room or building for worship, not being a church. Our AV employs its English equivalent chapel at Am 7<sup>13</sup>, but the RV has discarded this in favour of sanctuary. The latter comes nearer the meaning of the original, mikdash, which signifies a holy place. The former, however, aptly suggests that dependence on the king which was one of the characteristics of the sanctuary at Bethel. As an English Chapel Royal is not a parish church belonging to the public, but a place of worship under the control and meant for the use of the sovereign, so were such buildings as that at Bethel intended primarily for the king. It was by his permission that the people found a place there. Even at Jerusalem, Solomon built temple and palace in close proximity to each other: cf. Ezk 43<sup>6</sup>. Chapel occurs also in 1 Mac 1<sup>47</sup> (RV 'shrine'), 2 Mac 10<sup>2</sup> (RV 'sacred inclosure'), 11<sup>3</sup> (RV 'sacred place'). J. TAYLOR.

CHAPHENATHA (Χαφενάθ), 1 Mac 12<sup>37</sup>.—Close to Jerus. on the east. Unknown.

CHAPIER (from Lat. caput, through the French) is now displaced, in ordinary speech, by the cognate form 'capital,' which the American Revision Company wish to substitute for the older form retained by the British Revisers. 1. כִּתְּרָה, LXX ἐπιθῆμα, the spherical capital, 5 cubits high, of each of the two great brazen pillars—JACHIN and BOAZ (wh. see)—of Solomon's temple. The passage recording the construction of these pillars, 1 K 7<sup>15a</sup>, (with which cf. 2 K 25<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ch 4<sup>12-13</sup>, Jer 52<sup>23</sup>), is one of the worst preserved in the OT, and much uncertainty still prevails as to the precise form and ornamentation of the capitals. For details see art. TEMPLE, and compare the reconstruction of Stade in his Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, i. p. 332, and of Perrot and Chipiez in Hist. of Art in Sardinia and Judea (Eng. tr.), i. plates 6 and 7. In 2 Ch 3<sup>10</sup> נָחַשׁ is used for these chapters. 2. כִּתְּרָה appears in MT of 1 K 7<sup>31</sup> as a part of the brazen lavers made by Hiram for the temple, but is almost certainly a corruption of כִּתְּרָה (Ewald, Stade, Klost.). See LAVER. 3. In Ex 36<sup>38</sup> we read that the upper portions or tops (כִּתְּרֵי, EV 'their chapters') of the five pillars which supported the 'screen for the door of the tent' (RV) were to be overlaid with gold, while the corresponding parts of the pillars of the court were to be overlaid with silver (Ex 38<sup>17, 19, 28</sup>). Although all these pillars were of one piece, the parts thus treated would have the appearance of capitals (LXX κεφαλίδες).

CHAPMAN (Anglo-Sax. ceap 'trade,' and mann 'man') is used only once in AV, 2 Ch 9<sup>14</sup> 'Beside that which chapmen and merchants brought' (פְּנֵי חֲמָנִים, RV 'the chapmen,' Amer. RV 'the traders'). For the same Heb., RV gives 'chapmen' (AV 'merchants') 1 K 10<sup>15</sup>, and it is an appropriate tr. if the word had been still in use. For its meaning cf. Rogers (1642), 'It is not a meete thing that man should be both chapman and customer.'

CHAPT.—Jer 14<sup>4</sup> 'Because the ground is chapt, for there was no rain in the earth' (חָפַת, Amer. RV 'chapped,' RVm 'dismayed,' for the Heb. has both meanings). Bradley (1727) in his Farmer's Dict. speaks of 'claiety or still earth . . . subject to chap during the heat of summer' but the word, which means 'cracked,' is no longer used of land.

CHARAATHALAN (B Χααραθαλάν, A Χαρά Ἀθαλάρ, AV Charaathalar), 1 Es 5<sup>36</sup>.—A name given to a leader of certain families who returned from Babylon under Zernb. But 'Charaathalan' leading them and Allar' is due to some perversion of the original, which has 'Cherub, Addan, Immer,' three names of places in Bab., from which the return was made (Ezr 2<sup>50</sup> כְּרֻב, אַדָּן, אִמֶּר, Xapóús (A Xepóús), Ἰἱδάν; cf. Neh 7<sup>61</sup>). The form in 1 Es may be partly accounted for by confusion between O and B, and between A and Δ. H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

CHARAX (Χάρακα, els τόν, 2 Mac 12<sup>17</sup>, RV 'to Charax,' AV 'to Charuca').—East of Jordan, and apparently in the land of Tob. Unknown.

CHARGE, CHARGEABLE.—To charge (late Lat. caricare to load, from carrus a wagon, whence old Fr. charger) is 'to load,' and a charge is 'a load,' as we still speak of 'charging' a gun, and of its 'charge.' But in the Bible the word is used only figuratively. 1. To burden one, or be a burden on one, AV 'be chargeable,' Neh 5<sup>15</sup> 'the former governors, that had been before me, were c. unto the people' (רָבִיבֵי הָעָם, lit. 'made heavy on,' RVm 'laid burdens upon'); esp. in the matter of expense, 2 S 13<sup>25</sup> 'let us not all now go [to the sheep-shearing feast], lest we be c. unto thee' (רָבִיבֵי, RV 'be burdensome'); 1 Th 2<sup>9</sup> 'because we would not be c. unto any of you' (ἐπιβαρύνω, 'be a weight upon,' RV 'that we might not burden'); so 2 Th 3<sup>6</sup>; and 2 Co 11<sup>9</sup> 'I was c. to no man' (καταναρκάω, only here and 12<sup>13, 14</sup>, though LXX gives simple ναρκάω as tr. of νῆ; 'to be dislocated,' 'torn away,' Gn 32<sup>25, 32, 34</sup>, Job 33<sup>19</sup>, Dn [LXX] 11<sup>6</sup>). The vb. κ. is to benumb, as a torpedo [νάρκη] might benumb, and so to paralyse one by laying another's maintenance on him). Cf. Geneva B. 'I was not slothful to the hinderance of anie man'; RV 'I was not a burden on any man.' 2. The burden of expense is also expressed by 'charge,' both verb and subst.: Neh 10<sup>32</sup> 'to c. ourselves yearly with the third part of a shekel for the service of the house of our God' (נָחַ); 1 Ti 5<sup>16</sup> 'let not the church be charged' (βαρύνσθαι, RV 'be burdened' as in 2 Co 5<sup>4</sup> EV); 1 Co 9<sup>18</sup> 'that . . . I may make the gospel without c.' (ἀδάπανος); 9<sup>17</sup> 'who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges?' (ἰδίοις ὀνύλοις); Ac 21<sup>12</sup> 'be at charges with them' (RV 'for them,' δαπάνησον ἐπ' αὐτοῖς, 'spend upon them'). Cf. Shaks. Rich. III. i. ii. 256—

'I'll be at charges for a looking-glass.'

3. To lay a special duty upon one, as 2 Ch 36<sup>23</sup>=Ezr 1<sup>2</sup> 'he hath charged me to build him an house in Jerus.' (רָבִיבֵי). Then this duty or responsibility is expressed by the subst. 'charge,' Job 34<sup>18</sup> 'Who hath given him (God) a c. over the earth?' (רָבִיבֵי); Jth 7<sup>32</sup> 'he dispersed the people every one to their own c.' (παρεμβολή). Then the word is freely used (as tr. of נָחַשׁ), esp. in Nu (1<sup>1</sup>) in a half-technical sense, quite foreign to any modern idiom. Thus the duty is called, Nu 4<sup>31</sup> 'the c. of this burden.' Since J<sup>1</sup> imposes it, it is 'the c. of the Lord,' Lv 8<sup>30</sup>. It is also called 'the c. of the sons of Gershon' (Nu 3<sup>35</sup>), because on them the burden lies. And from its object or extent it is described as: 1<sup>53</sup> 'the c. of the tabernacle of the testimony'; 3<sup>31</sup> 'the c. of the ark'; 3<sup>38</sup> 'the c. of the children of Israel'; or 3<sup>38</sup> 'the c. of the sanctuary, for the c. of the children of Israel.' 4. This meaning passes easily into cure or custody: 2 K 7<sup>17</sup> 'to appoint to the c. of the gate' (רָבִיבֵי); 1 Ch 9<sup>38</sup> (לָ); Ac 8<sup>37</sup> 'who had the c. of all her treasure' (ἐπ' αὐτῇ); Nu 31<sup>49</sup> 'the men of war which are under our c.' (ὑπ'); cf. Ac 1<sup>20</sup> AVm 'office or charge' (ἐπισκοπή, AV 'bishoprick,' RV 'office,' RVm 'overship'). 5. From 'give a c.' (Mt 4<sup>8</sup>, Lk 4<sup>10</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>13</sup>), or 'give in c.' (1 Ti 5<sup>7</sup> 'these things give in c.,' παραγγέλλω, RV 'command'), there naturally arises the meaning of 'enjoin' or 'command,' of which the examples are numerous and obvious,* and the subst. c.=a command, as 2 S 18<sup>6</sup>, Ac 16<sup>23, 24</sup> ('charging the jailor to keep them safely; who, having received such a c.'), 1 Ti 1<sup>18</sup> 6<sup>13</sup>. 6. The last and heaviest weight to lay on one is to 'lay blame,' found chiefly in the phrase 'lay to the c. of,' Dt 21<sup>8</sup>, Ps 35<sup>11</sup>, Ac 7<sup>50</sup> 23<sup>29</sup>, Ro 8<sup>35</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>16</sup>. But the simple verb is also used in this sense, 2 S 3<sup>8</sup> 'thou chargest me to-day with a fault concerning this woman'; Job 1<sup>22</sup> 'nor charged God foolishly' (RV 'with foolishness'), 4<sup>18</sup> 'his angels he chargeth with folly.'

CHARIOT (רֶכֶב, Pa 104<sup>s</sup>, קָדָה, Pa 46<sup>s</sup>, ἄρμα, currus).—In ancient times war chariots formed an important part of the military strength of a nation. We learn from Egyptian monuments that they were largely employed in the armies of the Hittite and Palestinian kings, and thence they were introduced into Egypt about the 17th cent. B.C. (Brugsch, Hist. of Egypt, i. 295). An Egypt. poem mentions that the Hittites brought 2500 chariots against Rameses II. (B.C. 1360); and when the Egyptians defeated the allied forces of the Syrians at Megiddo in the 14th cent. B.C., they captured 2041 horses and 924 chariots. A papyrus relating to the same period described the adventures of an Egyptian mohar or official, who drove through Pal. in a chariot, accompanied by his servant. In the OT we read of the chariots and horsemen of Pharaoh at the time of the Exodus (Ex 14<sup>26. 15</sup> 4). In Pal. the Israelites must have become familiar with the use of chariots in war long before they adopted them. Thus they were used by the Can. kings defeated at the Waters of Merom (Jos 11<sup>4-9</sup>), by Jabin and Sisera, who had 900 chariots of iron (Jg 4<sup>8. 13</sup> 5<sup>28</sup>); and it was through their iron chariots that the Canaanites of the valleys were able to maintain themselves against the conquering Israelites (Jg 1<sup>19</sup>, cf. Jos 17<sup>16. 18</sup>). These chariots were doubtless built of wood (cf. Jos 11<sup>9</sup> 'burnt their chariots') and plated or strengthened with iron. The translation of Vulg. currus falcati (Jg 1<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>3. 13</sup>) seems to involve an anachronism; for the use of scythes attached to the axles of war chariots was probably introduced from Persia. Certainly, chariots of this kind are never represented on the monuments of Egypt or Assyria, and Xenophon attributes the invention to Cyrus (Cyrop. vi. 1. 27). In the time of Saul the Philistines invaded the country of Israel with 3000 chariots (1 S 13<sup>5</sup> LXX [Luc.]; see Driver, Text of Sam.). David, during his Syrian wars, captured 1000 chariots (1 Ch 18<sup>4</sup>), and on another occasion 700 (2 S 10<sup>18</sup>); but, following the example of Joshua (Jos 11<sup>9</sup>), he maimed the horses, reserving only sufficient for 100 chariots (2 S 8<sup>4</sup>). The introduction of chariots into the Israelite army dates from the time of Solomon, who maintained an establishment of 1400 chariots (1 K 10<sup>26</sup>, 2 Ch 1<sup>14</sup>) and 4000 horses (2 Ch 9<sup>25</sup>, in 1 K 4<sup>26</sup> [Heb. 5<sup>6</sup>] wrongly 40,000). These were stationed partly in Jerusalem and partly in more suitable cities selected for the purpose (1 K 9<sup>19</sup> 10<sup>26</sup>). Both chariots and horses were mainly imported from Egypt, and a profitable trade in them was carried on with the Hittite and Syrian kings. We are told that a chariot was brought from Egypt for 600 shekels of silver, and a horse for 150 shekels (1 K 10<sup>26</sup>, 2 Ch 1<sup>16</sup>). From this time onwards chariots form a regular part of the army both in the northern and southern kingdoms (1 K 16<sup>9</sup>, 2 K 7<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>16. 21</sup> 10<sup>2</sup> 13<sup>7. 14</sup> 8<sup>21</sup>, Is 27, Mic 5<sup>10</sup> etc.). In particular, the king seems regularly to have gone to battle in his chariot (1 K 22<sup>34</sup>, 2 K 23<sup>30</sup>, cf. 1 K 12<sup>18</sup>, 2 K 9<sup>21</sup>). Zimri held the important office of captain of half the chariots (1 K 16<sup>9</sup>). There seem, however, to have often been difficulties in securing a sufficient supply of horses (2 K 7<sup>13</sup>, 18<sup>30</sup>); hence in the time of Isaiah there was a strong party in Judah which favoured a close alliance with Egypt (Is 30<sup>2. 16</sup> 31<sup>1</sup> 36<sup>9</sup>). But the consciousness still survived that the use of chariots had been introduced from heathen countries. Hence, while the historian looks upon them as a mark of regal despotism (1 S 8<sup>11</sup>), and the Deuteronomic law forbids the king to multiply horses (Dt 17<sup>16</sup>), the prophets regard horses and chariots as a sign of dependence on human aid instead of on divine protection (Ilos 17<sup>14</sup> [Heb. 4], Is 27<sup>30</sup> 31<sup>1</sup>), and they predict their destruction in the Messianic future (Mic 5<sup>10</sup> [Heb. 9], Zec 9<sup>10</sup>).

The chariot was employed also in times of peace (Gn 50<sup>9</sup>, 1 K 18<sup>44</sup>, 2 K 5<sup>2. 21</sup> 10<sup>18</sup>, Is 66<sup>20</sup>), and was regarded as a mark of high rank. Thus Pharaoh assigned to Joseph his 'second chariot' (Gn 41<sup>43</sup>); Absalom and Adonijah prepared chariots and horses to mark their claims to the throne (2 S 15<sup>1</sup>, 1 K 1<sup>6</sup>); cf. also Is 22<sup>18</sup>, Jer 17<sup>25</sup> 22<sup>4</sup>. In the NT the only chariot mentioned, except in Rev 9<sup>9</sup>, cf. 18<sup>13</sup>, is that of the Ethiopian treasurer of Candace (Ac 8<sup>27</sup>). The heathenish practice of dedicating horses and chariots to the sun, introduced by some of the later kings of Judah, was abolished by Josiah (2 K 23<sup>11</sup>).

The chariots of the Hebrews doubtless resembled those used by the surrounding nations, and represented on Egypt. and Assyrian monuments. They were two-wheeled vehicles, open behind, drawn by two horses, and containing two (1 K 22<sup>34</sup>) or perhaps three persons (2 K 9<sup>25</sup>). The latter view is supported by the special Heb. term for an officer, shalish (שָׁלִישׁ), lit. third man; see Ex 14<sup>7</sup> 15<sup>4</sup>, 2 K 7<sup>24</sup> 9<sup>25</sup> 10<sup>25</sup> 15<sup>25</sup> etc. The Egypt. chariots were of light and simple construction, the material employed being wood, as is proved by sculptures representing the manufacture of chariots. The axle was set far back, and the bottom of the car, which rested on this and on the pole, was sometimes formed of a frame interlaced with a network of thongs or ropes. The chariot was entirely open behind, and for the greater part of the sides, which were formed by a curved rail rising from each side of the back of the base, and resting on a wooden upright above the pole in front. From this rail, which was strengthened by leather thongs, a bow case of leather, often richly ornamented, hung on the right-hand side, slanting forwards; while the quiver and spear cases inclined in the opposite direction. The wheels, which were fastened on the axle by a linch-pin secured with a short thong, had six spokes in the case of war chariots, but in private vehicles sometimes only four. The pole sloped upwards, and to the end of it a curved yoke was attached. A small saddle at each end of the yoke rested on the withers of the horses, and was secured in its place by breast-band and girth. No traces are to be seen. The bridle was often ornamented; a bearing-rein was fastened to the saddle, and the other reins passed through a ring at the side of this. The number of horses to a chariot seems always to have been two; and in the car, which contained no seat, only rarely are more than two persons depicted, except in triumphal processions.

Assyrian chariots did not differ in any essential points from the Egyptian. They were, however, completely panelled at the sides, and a shield was sometimes hung at the back. The wheels had six, or, at a later period, eight spokes; the felloes were broad, and seem to have been formed of three distinct circles of wood, sometimes surrounded by a metal tire. While only two horses were attached to the yoke, in the older monuments a third horse is generally to be seen, which was probably used as a reserve. The later chariots are square in front, not rounded; the car itself is larger and higher; the cases for weapons are placed in front, not at the side; and only two horses are used. The harness differs somewhat from the Egyptian. A broad collar passes round the neck, from which hangs a breast ornament, the whole being secured by a triple strap under the belly of the horse. As in Egypt, there are no traces visible; two driving-reins are attached to each horse, but the bearing-rein seems to be unknown. In addition to the warrior and the charioteer, we often see a third man, who bears a shield; and a fourth occupant of the chariot sometimes appears.

The Hittite chariots, as represented on Egyptian monuments, regularly contain three warriors. In construction they are plainer and more solid than the Egyptian, and the sides are not open. The chariots on Persian sculptures closely resemble the Assyrian.

In Sir 49th the first vision of Ezekiel is alluded to as 'the chariot of the cherubim,' and that chapter (Ezk 1), under the title of 'the chariot,' figures largely in later Jewish mystical speculation. Cf. Schürer, HJP II. i. 347.

CHARITY.—From 1 Co 8th onwards 'charity' is frequently employed in AV as the tr. of ἀγάπη; in RV it does not occur.

The Gr. word ἀγάπη is supposed to have been coined by the LXX. It is found in no profane author, not even in Josephus, and only once in Philo (i. 283). In LXX it occurs 2 S 1<sup>25</sup> (A) 1315, Ec 91-6, Ca 24-6, 7, 35, 10, 58, 70, 84, 9, 705, Jer 22 always as tr. of חֶסֶד; and in Wis 39 618, Sir 4811. It has been supposed that the LXX felt the need of a word of purser suggestion than any in existence, but 2 S 1315 (the love of Amnon for Tamar) disproves that supposition. What the LXX seems to have felt the need of was a stronger word than either ἀγάπη or φιλία, with which they elsewhere translate חֶסֶד. Thus in 2 S 1315, Ec 91-6 it is used in emphatic contrast to 'hate.'

When Christianity came, having received the new revelation of the love of God, it found this word as yet unspoiled by common use, and adopted it to express the new divine idea. Perhaps the fact that the LXX had used it to express the intensity of love, made it the more easily adopted, for this was now also a leading thought, as in 1 Jn 4th 16 'God is love,' and 4th 19 'Herein is love, not that we loved God,' etc.

The word is used 117 times in NT (including ἀγάπαι, 'love-feasts,' Jude 12 and 2 P 213 L Tr WH), always of love with which God has something to do. Its distribution, accord. to Moulton and Geden's NT Concord, is as follows: Synop. 2 (Mt 2412, Lk 1422), Jn 7, Ro 9, 1 Co 14, 2 Co 9, Gal 3, Eph 10, Ph 4, Col 6, 1 Th 5, 2 Th 3, 1 Ti 5, 2 Ti 4, Tit 1, Philm 3, He 2, 1 P 3, 2 P 2, 1 Jn 18, 2 Jn 2, 3 Jn 1, Jude 3, Rev 2. That is, Synop. 2, Jn (including Rev) 30, Paul 76, He 2, 2 P 5, Jude 3. It is not used in Mk, Ac, Ja.

Jerome experienced the difficulty which has been attributed to the LXX. There was no direct equivalent in Latin for ἀγάπη. Amor was impossible, suggesting idolatry as well as sensuality. He sometimes chose dilectio, esteem, and sometimes caritas (charitas), dearness, though both words, being comparatively weak, missed the very point for which ἀγάπη had first been coined. Dilectio is found in Vulg. 24 times, caritas 90 times (1 P 514 gives a different tr.); but the choice of one or the other seems accidental.

Wyclif followed the Vulgate, giving 'love' for dilectio and 'charity' for caritas everywhere, except in Col 18th 13 where he has 'loving' for dilectio, not 'love'; and in 1 Co 134 where he uses the pronoun 'it' for the third caritas.

Tindale systematically avoided ecclesiastical words, and so discarded 'charity' entirely, using 'love' everywhere, except Ro 14th 15 'charitably' (κατὰ ἀγάπην), and Col 113 'His dear Son' for 'the Son of his love.' Tindale was followed by Coverdale, the Great Bible, and the Geneva Bible, except that the Geneva has 'charity' in Rev 24.19.

The Bishops restored 'charity' into the foll. places: Ro 1310 bis, 1 Co 81 131. 2. 3. 4 for 8. 13 bis 141 1614, Col 314, 1 Th 30.12 58, 2 Th 13, 1 Ti 15 216 412, 2 Ti 222 310, Tit 22, 1 P 48 bis 514, 2 P 17, 1 Jn 31, 3 Jn 6, Jude 2.12, Rev 219; while they accepted Tindale's 'charitably' in Ro 14th 15, and his 'dear Son' in Col 113.

The Rhemish Bible, being tr. from the Vulg., returned to the use of 'charity' and 'love,' following the Vulg. precisely, except that (as with Wyclif) the third 'charity' is omitted in 1 Co 134.

The translators of AV followed the Bishops, except in Ro

1310 bis, 1 Th 312 58, 1 Jn 31, and Jude 2, where they capriciously prefer 'love' to 'charity.'

The RV gives 'love' wherever the Revisers found ἀγάπη in the text they adopted; for they reckoned it their special duty to translate the same Gr. word by the same English word, if that could possibly be done. No other Eng. version is so consistent. 'Charity' never occurs.

The word 'charity' entered the Eng. language at two different times. First in the form cherte (from Fr. chiereté, cherté) and with the ordinary meaning of the Lat. caritas, 'dearness,' both in reference to price and affection. Next in the forms caritat, caritet, charitet, charité, from the popular use of the caritas (caritatem) of the Vulg. in the Church to indicate Christian 'love.' The two words were too close to be kept distinct, and in the 17th cent. cherte was discontinued.

After the Vulg., charity was used of the love of God, as 1 Jn 4th 16 'God is charity' (Wyclif) = 'God is charitie' (Rheims)—ἀγάπη is tr. by 'c.' throughout 1 Jn in Wyclif and Rhemish). Its meaning as applied to man is well expressed by Abp. Hamilton, Catechism (1552), 'Quhate is cherite? It is lufe, quharby we lufe God for his awin saik . . . and our neichbour for God's saik, or in God.' But such a word could not resist the strong tendency to degeneration, if indeed it had not degenerated in the use of the Vulg. itself. As early as Caxton we find the general sense of kindly disposition, leniency. Thus, Cato 3, 'I . . . beseeche alle suche that fynde faute or errorr that of theyr charyte they correcte and amende hit.' Dr. G. Salmon (Gnosticisim and Agnosticism, p. 211) thinks it probable that the popular limitation of the word to almsgiving arose from its freq. employment in appeals of preachers either for money on behalf of some good object, or for prayers on behalf of the souls in purgatory; the common exordium being, 'Good Christian people, we pray you of your charity to give so and so.'

That there was a feeling about 1611 against the use of 'love' in the language of religion is shown by Bacon's remark (1603), 'I did ever allow the discretion and tenderness of the Rhemish translation in this point, that finding in the original the word ἀγάπη and never ἔπος, do ever translate Charity and never Love, because of the indifferency and equivocation of the word with impure love' (the statement is incorrect, since Rheims gives 'love' for ἀγάπη 23 times, but it expresses the feeling of the day). But it does not appear that it was in deference to any such feeling that the Bishops and AV introduced 'charity' again, but either to avoid 'the scrupulosity of the Puritans,' or to escape the charge of 'unequal dealing towards a great number of good English words.' The objections to 'c.' as a tr. of ἀγάπη are that it is now obsolete in the sense of 'love,' suggesting a mild toleration, in place of the noblest and most searching of virtues; and that its use in AV (esp. throughout 1 Co 13) has given rise to the mistaken idea that St. Paul is less the apostle of love than St. John. See ALMSGIVING and LOVE.

CHARM.—See AMULET and DIVINATION.

CHARME (Χαρμή, AV Carme), 1 Es 5th 20.—Called HARM, Ezr 230, Neh 742. The form in 1 Es is derived from the Heb., and not from the Gr. form in the canonical books.

CHARMIS (Βα Χαρμυς, A Χαλμυς = חרמי Gn 46th).—Son of Melchiel, one of three rulers or elders of Bethulia (Jth 6th 8th 10th).

CHASE.—See HUNTING.

CHASEBA (Χασεβδ), 1 Es 5th 1.—There is no corresponding name in the lists of Ezr and Neh.

CHASTENING, CHASTISEMENT, TRIBULATION.—The idea represented by the words chastening or chastisement fills a considerable space both in OT and NT. In Heb. it is usually expressed by the verb סָפַר, סָפַר, and the substantive סָפָר, with which חָסַד and חֶסֶד are frequently combined; and in Gr. by the corresponding verb and subst. παιδεύω and παιδεία. The etymological connexion of these last words with παις suggests that education, in the widest sense of the word, including reference to the means as well as the end of the process, is the main idea involved. And on the whole this is true. In one passage, Eph 6<sup>4</sup>, fathers are charged to bring up their children in the παιδεία καὶ νοῦθεσίᾳ κυρίου, where παιδεία is the Christian discipline of character, as it ought to be enforced in the Christian family. The same idea is presented in He 12<sup>9</sup>, where fathers are regarded in the character of παιδευταί—as those who exercise discipline over their children, and esp. over their faults, for their good. This same conception is applied without reserve to God. One of the most striking passages is Pr 3<sup>11</sup>, 'My son, despise not the chastening (παιδεία) of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked (ἐλεγχόμενος) by him; for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth (παιδεύει), and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.' This is quoted and enforced in He 12<sup>4-11</sup> and Rev 3<sup>19</sup>. The idea insisted upon is that the troubles which befall the people of God are not to be read as signs of His hostility, but of His paternal care. 'What son is he whom the father chasteneth not?' In a larger sense, perhaps, than this, the grace of God is spoken of as having appeared in saving power, teaching us (παιδεύουσα) that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts we should live soberly, righteously, and godly. 'Teaching' here suggests too little, and probably 'disciplining' or 'chastening' is too narrow; but the conception of the Christian life offered in this passage is that of education under a power which is at once gracious and severe. The χάρις which brings salvation to men employs resources of all kinds to put them in complete possession of it. Often the idea of painful correction is prominent, and in one place the severe word 'judgment' appears in the context. The abuses connected with the Lord's Supper at Corinth had produced much sickness and not a few deaths in the Church (1 Co 11<sup>30</sup>). Men had been eating and drinking 'judgment' to themselves. Yet even under such judgments (κρινόμενοι), the apostle teaches, Christians are not objects of God's hostility: He is seeking their good; 'we are being chastened by the Lord, that we may not be condemned with the world.' Even in those peculiar passages where the chastisement seems so awful or extreme that Satan, not God, is made the instrument of it, this holds good. The sinner in 1 Co 5 is delivered to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh indeed (by death?), but that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. So in 1 Ti 1<sup>20</sup> Hymenæus and Alexander are handed over to the Adversary, that they may be taught under his hands (παιθεῖσθαι) not to blaspheme. Compare also St. Paul's own case: the thorn in the flesh is called an angel of Satan, yet it disciplines him in the Christian grace of humility. The human mind, so long as it dwells in the human body, will not be able to avoid calling such things 'evils'; no chastening for the present seems matter of joy: it is all grief and pain, and it is only afterward, when the fruit of righteousness appears, that we can see it is something to thank God for, a real indication of His love for His children. The large use made in the Apocrypha of the idea of 'chastisement' for the moral interpretation of experience is very striking. One of the chief passages is Wis 3<sup>4-7</sup>.

There we find the conception that suffering is a trial, which, when one stands it successfully, brings a sure reward: a reward too, as in 2 Co 4<sup>17</sup>, out of proportion to the suffering, ὀλίγα παιδευθέντες μεγάλα εὐεργετηθήσονται. The idea of purification also, as well as that of testing, is involved in the comparison of Wis 3<sup>6</sup> ὡς χρυσὸν ἐν χωνευτηρίῳ ἐδοκίμασεν αὐτούς. The gracious and paternal aspects of chastisement are signalled in Wis 11<sup>10</sup>: the people of God are chastened in mercy, the wicked are judged and tormented in wrath; His own He puts to the proof ὡς πατήρ νοουστῶν, the others He condemns ὡς ἀπόστομος βασιλεὺς. So again, in 2 Mac 6<sup>16</sup>, though God 'chastens with calamity,' He never abandons His people. This is the main thought of the NT passages also: suffering is the rod in a Father's hand, and the sole instrument by which the purposes of the Father's love can be effected.

The word tribulation has come into our language from the Vulg. rendering, not of παιδεύω, but of θλίβω, θλίψις. In NT none of the passages in which these words are used suggest explicitly that 'tribulation' is disciplinary. It is said, indeed, that we must through many tribulations enter into the kingdom of God (Ac 14<sup>22</sup>), but they are rather barriers to be forced, dangers to be disregarded, than disciplines to be welcomed. In 2 Co 1<sup>6</sup> the idea occurs that one man may have to suffer in order to acquire the gift of administering consolation to others. Once in OT (Is 26<sup>18</sup>) the ideas of 'tribulation' and 'chastening' are expressly combined: ἐν θλίψει μικρᾷ ἡ παιδεία σου ἡμῶν; but as a rule θλίψις (affliction or tribulation) is used in a more purely objective way. It may be, in point of fact, an instrument of παιδεία, but that is not the point of view to which of itself it leads.

CHEBAR (כְּבַר, Chobâr, Ezk 1<sup>1</sup>. 3 3<sup>15</sup>. 23 10<sup>15</sup>. 20. 22 43<sup>3</sup>).—A river in 'the land of the Chaldeans,' by the side of which Ezekiel saw his first vision of the Cherubim. Near the banks of this stream was Tel-abib, the home of a colony of Jewish exiles, among whom Ezekiel lived and prophesied (Ezk 3<sup>15</sup>). The Chebar has commonly been identified, in accordance with a Syrian Christian tradition, with the Habor (חַבּוֹר, 'Aḥḥôr), the modern Chabour, which runs into the Euphrates not far from the site of Circesium. But the two names are very different, and Babylonia, whither the Jews were deported (2 K 24<sup>16</sup>, Jer 29<sup>4, 20</sup>), can hardly be considered to include Northern Mesopotamia. It is therefore more probable that the Chebar was one of the numerous canals in the neighbourhood of Babylon to which the name of 'river' was often given (cf. Nöldeke in Schenkel's Bibel-Lexicon). The name, however, has not yet been discovered in any of the numerous lists of rivers and canals which are to be found in Assyrian and Babylonian literature. The word is probably connected with the Semitic root כָּבַר to be great; hence it has been suggested that Chebar was another name of the Nahar Malcha, or Royal Canal of Nebuchadnezzar.

CHECK in the obsol. sense of 'rebuke' or 'reproof' occurs Job 20<sup>3</sup> 'I have heard the c. of my reproach' (RV 'reproof which putteth me to shame'). Cf. Pepys, Diary, 26th Sept., 'I was very angry, and . . . did give him a very great check for it, and so to bed'; and Shaks., Henry IV. iv. iii. 34, 'I never knew yet, but rebuke and check was the reward of valour.' RV gives the verb in 1 S 24<sup>7</sup> in the mod. sense of 'restrain,' 'so David checked his men with these words' (AV 'stayed').

J. HASTINGS.

CHECKER WORK (now generally spelt chequer— work) is work arranged after the pattern of a chess-board (which was orig. called 'a checker or chequer'). 1 K 7<sup>17</sup> 'nets of checker work' (כְּרָצֵף כְּרָצֵף).—trellis work of some material used to ornament the 'chapters' of the pillars in Solomon's temple. In 2 K 1<sup>2</sup> the sēbhakūh is a 'lattice' in an upper chamber through which Ahaziah fell. In Job 18<sup>8</sup> it is a net for snaring. J. HASTINGS.

CHEDOR-LAOMER (חֲדֹר־לָאֹמֶר, Χεδωλλογομορ, Chedorlahomor).—Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, commanded the vassal-kings Amraphel of Shinar, Arioch of Ellasar (which see), and Tidal, king of Goiim, in the war against the Canaanite princes of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar (Gn 14<sup>1-16</sup>). After twelve years of servitude the latter had rebelled against Chedorlaomer, who, with his allies, thereupon marched into the west, on the eastern side of the Jordan, smiting the Rephaim in Bashan, the Zuzim or Zamzumim in Ammon, the Emim in Moab, and the Horites in Mount Seir. He then turned northward through Kadesh-barnea (now 'Ain Qadis), and smote all the country of the Amalekites (or Bedawin), and also the Amorites that dwelt in Hazezon-tamar* or En-gedi, on the western shore of the Dead Sea. Then followed a battle with the Canaanite princes in the vale of Siddim, which resulted in the defeat of the Canaanites, the death (?) of the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the capture of their cities. 'Abram the Hebrew,' however, armed 318 of his men and fell upon the conquerors by night near Dan in the extreme north, pursuing them to Hobah, west of Damascus, and recovering the spoil of Sodom, as well as his nephew Lot.

Chedorlaomer is the Elamite name Kudur-lagamar,* 'servant of Lagamar,' one of the principal Elamite gods. Similar names are Kudur-Nankhundi, 'servant of the god Nankhundi,' and Kudur-Mabug, the father of Eri-aku (Arioch). In the time of Eri-aku, Babylonia was under the suzerainty of Elam; and while Eri-aku reigned at Larsa and Ur, and claimed sovereignty over the whole of Chaldaea, an independent dynasty was ruling at Babylon 'in the land of Shinar.' Kudur-Mabug is called by his son 'the father of the land of the Amorites,' or Syria and Palestine, which implies some kind of authority there, but he never has the title of king. He was also 'the father of Iamutbal,' a frontier district of Elam. The 'land of the Amorites' had been subdued by the Bab. conqueror Sargon of Accad many centuries before (in B.C. 3800). Four times he marched into Syria, and, after erecting an image of himself by the shore of the Mediterranean and crossing the countries 'of the sea of the setting sun,' he united his conquests into a 'single' empire. His son Naram-Sin made his way into the Sinaitic Peninsula, and must therefore have followed the same road as Chedorlaomer. A later king of Babylonia, Ammi-satana (B.C. 2230), still calls himself 'king of the land of the Amorites'; and the deep and permanent influence of Babylonia in Canaan, evidenced by the Tel el-Amarna tablets, proves that Bab. domination must have long continued there. Ammi-satana was the great-grandson of Khammurabi, the king of Babylon who overthrew Eri-aku and his Elamite allies, and united all Babylonia under one monarch. Khammurabi died sixty years before the accession of Ammi-satana, so that, as he reigned fifty-five years, we may place the expedition of Chedorlaomer about B.C. 2330.

* The name Ku-dur-la-ukh-ga-mar has now been read by P. Scheil on a tablet of Khammurabi (see Rev. Bib. Internat. 1896, p. 600, and Rev. de Théol. 1897, p. 83 ff.).

bone'; lihyah, 'beard'; σαγών).—1. The cheek, with its ruddy token of health, is a feature of beauty (1 S 16<sup>12</sup>, Ca 1<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>13</sup>). In the Lebanon vineyards a species of tinted grape is called 'maidens' cheeks.' On the other hand, as of something that ought not to be, it is said of Jerusalem in her desolation, 'her tears are on her cheeks' (La 1<sup>2</sup>).

2. It is connected with manliness and pride. To be smitten on the cheek, as described in 1 K 22<sup>24</sup>, 2 Ch 18<sup>23</sup>, Job 16<sup>10</sup>, Ps 37, Is 50<sup>6</sup>, meant the greatest possible affront, and implied that there was no further power to resist. This gives emphasis to Mt 5<sup>39</sup>, Lk 6<sup>29</sup>, where the want is not of power, but of will, to resist.

G. M. MACKIE.

CHEEK TEETH.—Jl 1<sup>6</sup> 'he hath the cheek teeth of a great lion' (נִיבִּנְתָּ, RV 'jaw teeth,' as in Pr 30<sup>4</sup> 'their jaw teeth as knives' AV, RV; but in Job 29<sup>17</sup> [all] 'jaws,' RVM 'great teeth'). Cheek teeth=molar teeth, is found in Caxton, Chron. Eng. (1480), 'Al that ever were borne after that pestilence hadden ij cheketh in hir hede lesse than they had afore.' J. HASTINGS.

CHEER.—The 'cheer' is orig. the face (Fr. chère, late Lat. cara, as Caxton, Golden Legend, 'In the swete of thy chere thou shalt ete bide.' Then the expression of the face; and so, any state of mind, or mood, as Shaks., Sonnets, xevii. 13, 'so dull a cheer'; but generally with adj. 'good.' So always in AV (except 1 Es 9<sup>4</sup> 'Then went they their way to make great c.'), as in the phrase 'Be of good cheer,' Mt 9<sup>2</sup> 14<sup>27</sup>, Mk 6<sup>50</sup>, Jn 16<sup>33</sup>, Ac 23<sup>11</sup> (all θαρσύνω); Ac 27<sup>22, 25, 36</sup> (εὐθυμέω or εὐθυμος); and in RV Job 9<sup>27</sup> (נִיבִּנְתָּ, AV 'comfort myself,' RVM 'brighten up'). Finally, the word came to signify 'good spirits,' whence the verb 'to cheer,' Jg 9<sup>12</sup>, or 'cheer up,' Dt 24<sup>6</sup> (RV 'cheer').

CHEESE.—See FOOD.

CHELAL (לָלַךְ 'perfection').—One who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10<sup>40</sup>).

CHELLIANS.—Probably the inhabitants of the town CHELLUS (which see). Cf. Jth 1<sup>9</sup> 2<sup>23</sup>.

CHELLUS (Χελούς or Χεσλούς).—From the text (Jth 1<sup>9</sup>) this place is supposed to have been situated S.W. of Jerus. near Betane, and N. of Kadesh and the river (var. 'torrent') of Egypt, identified with the Wady el-Arish. Reland thinks it may be Haluzah (חֲלֻזָּה), the site well known to the Gr. and Rom. geographers under the altered form of Elusa, situated near the source of the Wady es-Sani stream. The mention of a land of the Chellians by the wilderness, to the south of which were the children of Ishmael (Jth 2<sup>23</sup>), is looked upon as supporting this view of the position of C. Doubt must, however, be regarded as accompanying the identification of C. with Haluzah or Elusa if the Syr. transcription Kalōn (with K for Ch) be correct. C. is also regarded as a mistake for Chelul = Halhul, Jos 15<sup>58</sup>.

I. A. PINCHES.

CHELOD (Β Χελοῦδ, * Χεσλαιουδά, Α Χελοῦδ, Old Lat. Chelleuth, Vulg. omits, Syr. Chaldaeans).—Jth 1<sup>6b</sup> reads, not as AV and RV 'many nations of the sons of Chelod assembled themselves to battle,' but 'there came together many nations unto the array (or ranks) of the sons of Chelul'; less naturally 'to battle with (against) the sons of Ch.' (ἐς παράταξιν υἱῶν Χ.). Syriac 'to fight against the Chaldaeans,' is improbable. It is not certain whether the 'many nations' are allies of Nebuchadrezzar or of Arphaxad, nor whether they come to help or to fight the 'sons of Ch.' Probably v.<sup>6b</sup> summarises v.<sup>6a</sup>; hence 'sons of Ch.' should be Nebuchadrezzar's army. But he is, in Jth, king of Assyrians, not Chaldeans. No probable conjecture as to Aram. original has been made.

CHELUBAI (חֶלְבַּי), 1 Ch 2<sup>9</sup>, another form of Caleb. Cf. 1 Ch 2<sup>18, 42</sup>, and see CALER.

CHELUHI (חֶלְוִי Kethibh, חֶלְוִי Keré, Cheluhu RVm, Chelluh AV).—One of the Benê-Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10<sup>39</sup>).

CHEMARIM.—In EV this word is found only in Zeph 1<sup>4</sup>; but the original חֶמְרִים, of which it is the transliteration, is used also at 2 K 23<sup>5</sup> and Hos 10<sup>6</sup>, and in both instances Chēmārim is placed in the margin of AV and RV 'idoltrous priests,' and 'priests' holding the post of honour in the text. It is a little curious that at Zeph 1<sup>4</sup>, the one case where our versions have it, it is probably an interpolation: the LXX omits it, and the parallelism is spoilt by its presence. Wellhausen wished to assert its claim to a place in Hos 4<sup>4</sup>, but other critics have rightly denied this. Chēmer, of which Chēmārim is the plural, is of Aram. origin,* and when used in Syr. carries no unfavourable connotation. In the Peshittā Version of the OT it is employed at Jg 17<sup>5, 12</sup> of Micah's idoltrous priests, but at Is 61<sup>6</sup> of the true priests promised to the restored Israel. In the Pesh. Vers. of the NT, Ac 19<sup>35</sup> has it as the rendering of νεωκόρος, thus reminding us of the Latin edilui (= temple-attendants) of Hos 10<sup>6</sup>, Zeph 1<sup>4</sup>; and the Epistle to the Hebrews, passim, employs it of the Levitical priests and of our Lord (27<sup>3</sup>, 41<sup>4, 15</sup>, 53<sup>10</sup>, and many other places). In the Heb. of the OT, however, Chēmārim always has a bad sense: it is applied to the priests who conducted the worship of the calves (2 K 23<sup>5</sup>, Hos 10<sup>6</sup>), and to those who served the Baalim (Zeph 1<sup>4</sup>). Kimchi believed the original significance of the verbal form was 'to be black,' and explained the use of the noun by the assertion that the idoltrous priests wore black garments. Amongst recent lexicographers Brockelmann accepts this derivation. Others take the root to mean, 'to be sad,' the chēmāra being a sad, ascetic person, a monk or priest. The two ideas run into each other, as is well exemplified at Ezk 31<sup>15</sup>, where Pesh. has chēmāra, LXX ἐκβάσσει, Vulg. contristatus est, EV caused to mourn.

J. TAYLOR.

CHEMOSH (חֶמֶשׁ Kēmōsh, Χημός).—The national deity of the Moabites, as J<sup>1</sup> was the national deity of the Israelites. He is frequently referred to as the god of Moab both in the OT and on the Moabite Stone, and the Moabites are referred to as the people of Chemosh (cf. Nu 21<sup>29</sup>, Jer 48<sup>46</sup>). On the Moabite Stone we have a king Chemosh-melek. We also read of a deity Ashtor-Chemosh, not to be identified with C., but distinct. In the inscription, Mesha, the king of Moab, represents the subjection of Moab to Israel as due to the fact that C. was angry with his land. At length the anger of C. was appeased, and he bade Mesha go and take Nebo from Israel. C. drove Israel out from before him, and restored to Moab the land taken by Israel. The slaughter of the people of Ataroth is spoken of as a gazing-stock to C. Mesha accordingly made a high place for C., because he had saved him and made him victorious over his foes. That upon occasion he might be worshipped with human sacrifices is probable from 2 K 3<sup>27</sup>, where the king of Moab offered his eldest son as a burnt-offering, and thus forced the Israelites to raise the siege. Solomon built a high-place for C. 'the abomination of Moab' (1 K 11<sup>7</sup>), which lasted till the time of Josiah's reformation, when it was destroyed (2 K 23<sup>13</sup>). According to Jg 11<sup>24</sup> C. was also the national deity of the Ammonites; but this can hardly be correct, since Milcom was their special god. It has been suggested that the text should be corrected, and Milcom read here; but perhaps, as Moore says, the error runs through the whole learned argument (Judges, p. 295).

CHENAANAH (חֶנָּאנָה).—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 7<sup>19</sup>). 2. The father of Zedekiah the false prophet in the reign of Ahab (1 K 22<sup>1</sup>, 2 Ch 18<sup>10</sup>).

CHENANI (חֶנָּנִי, prob. for חֶנָּנִי).—A Levite (Neh 9<sup>4</sup>).

CHENANIAH (חֶנָּנִיָּה or חֶנָּנִי).—Chief of the Levites at the removal of the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch 15<sup>22, 27</sup>), named among the officers and judges over Israel (1 Ch 26<sup>29</sup>).

CHEPHAR-AMMONI (כֶּפֶר חֶמְנִי), 'village of the Ammonites,' Jos 18<sup>24</sup>.—A town of Benjamin. Probably the ruin Kefr 'Ana near Bethel. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xiv. C. R. CONDER.

CHEPHIRAH (כֶּפֶר חֶמְנִי), 'village,' Jos 9<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>26</sup>, Ezr 2<sup>25</sup>, Neh 7<sup>29</sup>.—One of the four Hivite cities which made peace with the Hebrews, re-peopled after the Captivity, having belonged to Benjamin. Now Kefirah S.W. of Gibeon, in a position which aids to determine the W. border of Benjamin. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii. C. R. CONDER.

CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES (חֶרֶתִּי וּפְלִתִּי).—A designation repeatedly applied to a body of troops in the service of David, which seem to have formed the king's bodyguard. As to the derivation of the words, opinions have differed. Gesenius explained them as = executioners and runners (from the verbs חָרַת and פָּלַת), their duty being to inflict capital punishment, and also to convey the king's mandates as quickly as possible to those who held places of government. Linguistic and other objections seem to be fatal to this theory, as well as to another which makes חֶרֶת to be so called from חָרַת = to be expelled from one's country (Zec 14<sup>2</sup>),—an explanation which would identify it with the Sept. rendering of פְּלִשְׁתִּי (Philistine) by Ἀλλόφυλος.

It seems to be unquestionable that Cherethite and Pelethite are not common but proper names. The Cherethites, as a tribe inhabiting the southern border of Canaan, are thrice mentioned in the OT (1 S 30<sup>14</sup>, Zeph 2<sup>5</sup>, Ezk 25<sup>16</sup>), and in all these passages they are associated so closely with the Philistines as to be practically identified with them. Now we know from Am 9<sup>7</sup>, Dt 2<sup>21</sup>, and Jer 47<sup>4</sup> that the Philistines were believed to have come to Canaan from Caphtor, which is generally identified with Crete. May Cherethites not be another form of Cretans? Instead of Cherethites, the Kethibh of 2 S 20<sup>23</sup> offers the reading Carites. So in 2 K 14<sup>19</sup> the true reading as restored in RV is Carites, where AV reads Captains. The terms Cretans and Carites may both be represented readily enough by חֶרֶתִּי. That פְּלִתִּי is simply a variation of פְּלִשְׁתִּי (Philistine) was Ewald's opinion, and has since been generally accepted.

The Cherethites and Pelethites were thus a Philistine bodyguard, originally introduced by David, whose action is explained by his relations with the Philistines prior to his accession to the throne. This conclusion finds further support in the fact that in 2 S 15<sup>18</sup> the Gittites, who were certainly Philistines, are coupled with the Cherethites and Pelethites. These men were chosen on the same principle as the Swiss Guards at European courts and the Oriental Janissaries, whose fidelity is in proportion to their freedom from local ties and interests. His Philistine mercenaries proved themselves worthy of David's confidence by standing by him amidst the troubles occasioned by Absalom, Sheba, and Adonijah (2 S 15<sup>18</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>, 1 K 1<sup>38</sup>). While some have confined the existence of this bodyguard to the reign of David, others have found traces of it down to the close of the Judean kingdom. The mention of the Carites in 2 K 11 is in favour of the latter view. It was the officers of the Carians and the foot-guards that enabled Jehoiada to accomplish the overthrow of Athaliah, and the installation of Jehoash as king. So in 1 K 14<sup>25</sup> we read of guards who accompanied the king when he visited the sanctuary, and from 2 K 11<sup>48</sup> it is evident that the royal bodyguard formed also the guard of the temple. Is there any reason to conclude that these guards were foreign mercenaries? W. R. Smith adduces two passages from OT to prove their identity with the Cherethites and Pelethites. Zeph 1<sup>8</sup> speaks of men connected with the court who were clad in foreign garb, and who leaped over the threshold, and filled their masters' house with violence and deceit. Smith finds here an allusion to the Philistine custom of leaping over the threshold of the sanctuary (1 S 5<sup>6</sup>); but others deny the validity of his argument, and make 'leaping over the threshold' simply a name for house-breaking,* while those who are clothed in foreign garb are Israelites who ape foreign customs. Be this as it may, Smith's other OT reference seems to be conclusive. In Ezk 44<sup>6</sup> there is a bitter complaint that uncircumcised foreigners were permitted to keep guard in the sanctuary, and to discharge functions which the prophet would henceforth confine to the Levites. Who can these be except the guards referred to in 2 K 11? This conclusion is strengthened if Smith is right in his conjecture that prior to the time of Ezekiel the king's guards slaughtered the animals provided by the king for the temple, or intended for the royal table. As he points out, the Heb. designation for captain of the guard is רֹאשׁ תְּחָרִים = chief of the slaughterers (of cattle). 'The bodyguard were also the royal butchers, an occupation not deemed unworthy of warriors in early times' (W. R. Smith, OTJC<sup>2</sup> p. 262, n.; cf. Kittel, Hist. of Heb. ii. 153 n., 164; Driver, Text of Sam. 172, 267).

CHERITH (נַחַל חֶרֶת).—The brook by which Elijah lived (1 K 17<sup>3</sup>) was 'before Jordan,' i.e., according to familiar usage, on the E. of Jordan. Elijah 'was of the inhabitants' (or 'sojourners,' RV) of Gilead, or according to the LXX 'of Tishbeh of Gilead,' and would be well acquainted with the hiding-places of that country. If the 'Ravens' (עֲרֵבִים) were an Arab tribe, as many believe (see OREB), it must have been well to the E. where they pastured their flocks. The popular identification of the brook Cherith with the Wady Kelt between Jerus. and Jericho is unwarranted.

A. HENDERSON.

CHERUB.—A proper name (Ezr 2<sup>69</sup>, Neh 7<sup>61</sup>); one of the places from which certain families, on the return from Babylon, failed to prove their register as genuine branches of the Israelite people. The name has been identified with the Chiripha of Ptolemy. See CHARAATHALAN. H. E. RYLE.

* In view of the Oriental reverence for the threshold, this seems an unlikely explanation. (See Trumbull, Threshold Covenant, p. 259 f.; and for the Philistine custom, p. 118 f.)

-CHERUBIM (כְּרֻבִים or כְּרֻבִים, χερουβίμ; sing. כְּרֻב, χερουβ).—By this name are denoted the winged creatures which, in the religious symbolism of OT, are not infrequently mentioned as attending upon the Most High, and as possessed of certain sacred duties in the court of the heavenly beings that surround the throne of God.

What the Heb. conception of a 'cherub' was, does not appear at all certain. And if, as seems most probable, both name and thing were derived from a primitive stage of religious thought in W. Asia, this uncertainty in the Israelitish writings admits of a natural explanation. For writers who were under the influence of the worship of J<sup>h</sup> would shrink from giving a description that might lend itself to obvious comparison with the idolatrous symbolism of other religions.

1. In OT we find references to the cherubim (1) in the Israelite version of primitive myth; (2) in early Heb. poetry; (3) in apocalyptic vision; and (4) in the descriptions of the furniture and adornments of the ark, the tabernacle, and the temple.

1. Gn 3<sup>24</sup> 'And he placed at the east of the garden of Eden the cherubim, and the flame of a sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life.' The function of the cherubim here is to guard the approach to the sacred tree. The number of the cherubim appointed for this duty is not mentioned; nor is it stated, as is usually supposed, that each of the cherubim bore in his hand a flaming sword. We are only told that a sword with darting flames was entrusted to them for the purpose of keeping the way.

It has been natural to compare with these guardian, or sentinel, 'cherubim' the monster winged bulls with human heads which stood at the entrance of Assyrian palaces and temples. M. Lenormant having suggested, on the authority of a talismanic inscription, that kirubu was an Assyrian name in use for the steer-god, the temptation to connect the cherubim of Gn 3 with the Assyrian figures was almost irresistible. But this use of kirubu is questionable; the cherubim in our passage are not limited to two; there is no mention of a gate of Paradise; and the function of the cherubim is evidently primarily connected with the sword, which, to judge from the description, is probably intended to denote lightning.

2. 1 S 18<sup>10</sup> (= 2 S 22<sup>11</sup>) 'And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly.' In the context of this poetical description, the Psalmist describes the power of J<sup>h</sup> as manifested in the thunderstorm. J<sup>h</sup> is represented in flight through mid-air, borne up upon the wings of a cherub, while the lightnings flash before Him ('at the brightness before him,' v. 11). The cherub appears to be the mighty winged spirit of the storm,—on whose back J<sup>h</sup> Himself is seated. He is the personification of the swift storm-cloud that sweeps down as upon eagles' wings. J<sup>h</sup> is carried by the cherub, as the Indian god Vishnu by Garuda, and as Oceanus by the griffin (Æsch. Prom. 395).

3. In the prophetic writings of Ezekiel we have two allusions to the cherubim. (1) In Ezk 28<sup>14</sup> 'Thou wast the anointed cherub that covereth; and I set thee so that thou wast upon the holy mountain of God; thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire.' Here the prophet compares 'the Prince of Tyre' to one of the chosen attendants upon God, a cherub whose wings, as in the Holy of Holies, shaded the mercy-seat, one whose abode was in the holy mountain, and one who there walked among the flashing lightnings that surrounded the Divine Presence. A 'cherub,' according to this account, abides in the sacred precincts of the Most High, and round about him play the thunderbolts. The idea of the thundercloud is combined with that of heavenly guardianship.

(2) The imagery employed by the same prophet in the Vision of the Cherubim (Ezk 10) is very obscure, and introduces a much more complex idea. The prophet recognises them as identical with 'the living creatures that I saw under the God of Israel by the river Chebar' (10<sup>20</sup>), referring to the vision of 'the chariot' in ch. 1. These were four in number (10<sup>10</sup>); they had each four faces, 'the face of a cherub, a man, a lion, and an eagle' (14), and 'four wings' (21). As one of their faces was that of 'a cherub,' and the prophet on seeing them 'knew that they were cherubim' (20), the shape of a 'cherub' as of a fabulous creature must have been well known through popular representations (cf. 1 K 7<sup>29</sup>). Unfortunately, the prophet's description throws no further light upon their shape. But presumably it must have resembled that of an ox (cf. Ezk 1<sup>10</sup>). He tells us that the 'glory of the Lord' rested above 'the cherubim' (10<sup>10</sup>); that their progress was straight forward (22); while they moved not with wings only, but with whirling wheels, and burning fire was between them (6, 7). We have the thought of the thunderstorm connected with their appearance in Ezk 1<sup>4</sup>; the noise of their wings (124) suggests the thunder; fire and lightning attend them (13).

Altogether, this description, though much more complex and involved than any that has been suggested by the previous passages which we have considered, presents no sort of contradiction to them. In all probability it represents an elaboration, in accordance with the general style and characteristics of Ezekiel's literary work, of the older and simpler conception. The 'cherub,' as one of the powers of heaven, in poetry impersonated the storm-clouds that do J's bidding; in Ezekiel's vision there are four such 'cherubim,' corresponding to the four quarters of the sky. In poetry, J' had ridden on the cherub; in the vision the cherubim not only flew, but moved on wheels, supporting the glory of J'. In poetry the lightnings flashed before the cherub; in the vision there is fire between the cherubim, and 'the living creatures' ran and returned as the appearance of a flash of lightning.

4. The representation of the 'cherubim' occupied an important place in Heb. sacred art. (1) The figures of two 'cherubim' were placed on the mercy-seat of the ark (Ex 25<sup>18-21</sup>). Unfortunately, no minute account is given of their appearance. We are only told that their wings lifted upwards, and were outspread so as to cover the ark, and that they were presented in a posture facing one another, but looking down upon the ark—an attitude to which we may suppose the apostle makes reference in 1 P 1<sup>12</sup>. They were composed of 'wrought gold,' possibly hammered solid gold as opposed to plated gold. As the mercy-seat covered by their wings was only 3 ft. 9 in. (2½ cubits) long, the figures of the cherubim were quite small.

(2) Figures of cherubim were introduced into the veil or hanging screen which separated the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies (Ex 26<sup>31</sup>). It has commonly been considered that, as the way into the Holiest was through this curtain, the thought intended by these representations of cherubim may have been similar to that expressed by the guardian cherubim who guarded 'the way of the tree of life' in Gn 3.

(3) Solomon's temple contained in its Holy of Holies two colossal cherubim, 10 cubits (or 15 ft.) high, made of olive wood and overlaid with gold. The wings of the cherubim were spread out, and measured 10 cubits from the extremity of one wing to the extremity of the other. The Holy of Holies was a cube of 20 cubits or 30 ft.; and the two cherubim touched with their outer wings the wall on either side, while they touched one another with their outstretched inner wings. The whole span of their four wings was 20 cubits, equal to the width of the sanctuary. They each therefore stood at the same distance from one another as they did from the wall on either side (1 K 6<sup>23-28</sup>). From this description we should certainly infer that they had each only two wings. In 2 Ch 3<sup>1-17</sup> the same general account is given of the 'cherubim' of 'image-work' in Solomon's temple; but it is added that 'they stood on their feet, and their faces were toward the house,' by which is probably meant, facing the entrance. It has been disputed whether the smaller cherubim which protected the mercy-seat of the ark were retained in Solomon's temple. And it may be granted that the height of the Solomonic cherubim made it perfectly possible, but scarcely probable.

(4) 'Cherubim' were introduced, along with 'palm-trees and open flowers,' into the carved woodwork with which the walls and doors of the exterior and interior of the temple were adorned (1 K 6<sup>29, 32, 35</sup>). In the description of the 'brazen sea' it is recorded that in the ornamentation there were figures of 'lions, oxen, and cherubim' (1 K 7<sup>29</sup>).

From these OT passages we can gather no precise conclusion as to the shape and general figure of the cherub, according to Hebrew treatment in poetry and art. It had wings; it stood on feet (2 Ch); its face was not that of a man, a lion, or an eagle (Ezk 10<sup>14</sup>). It may have resembled an ox. But we are driven rather to suppose that its figure was an imaginary one, like that of a griffin or a dragon.

Whether its name is of Sem. origin or not, is a disputed point (see below). There is not sufficient reason to doubt that the original idea belongs to the early childhood of Israel's religion, and is thus related to similar conceptions in other races.

The prominence given to the cherubim in the passages we have passed in review makes it very unlikely that they had been borrowed from other countries or foreign religions. For we can hardly imagine the one representation of a living creature, which was permitted in the construction of the ark, the tabernacle, and the temple, to have been derived from an alien source. The fact that the making and designing of the cherubim is apparently recorded without any consciousness of the violation of the second commandment, is in itself an indication that the conception of these creatures belongs to an original national idea—the superstitious element of which was destined to be removed by the teaching of J' worship. Thus the 'cherub' survived as one of the traces of a Heb. mythology, which was retained by the prophets because it represented pictorially the attributes of the majesty of the God of Israel, and was employed to express more vividly the means by which His glory is revealed to man.

Besides the winged bulls familiar to us from the Assyr. remains, we come across many representations of winged monsters and chimeras in the countries adjoining Palestine. Egypt. religious art is said to have borrowed from Syria the figure of the Sefer, or Seref (cf. the Heb. 'seraph'). Phœn. monuments contain representations of winged griffins guarding the sacred tree (cf. a white marble relief from Arados in the Museum of the Louvre). The famous monster represented on the tomb of Chuecu-hotep, an Egypt. king (c. B.C. 2100), gives us a leopard, from whose back issues a human head, with wings on either side of the neck. All these are attempts apparently to combine the attributes of strength and swiftness in animals with the intellect of man, in representation of the 'demon' spirits (see Pietschmann's Gesch. der Phonizier, pp. 176, 177). To this category belongs in all probability the earliest Heb. idea of the cherubim. Having been popularly associated with the thunder-cloud, their presence and form were transferred, in the language of Heb. poetry and vision, to the personal court and attendance of J<sup>n</sup>, whose presence was proclaimed by the voice of thunder (cf. Ex 19<sup>18</sup>, 1 S 12<sup>17</sup>, Ps 77<sup>18</sup>). They therefore bear a close analogy to the seraphim (Is 6), who personified the lightnings that surround the throne. Perhaps the two groups of attendant beings are referred to in Ps 104<sup>4</sup>.

The expression applied to J<sup>n</sup>, He 'sitteth upon, or inhabiteth, the cherubim' (יֹשֵׁב הַכְּרֻבִּים), which we find in 2 K 19<sup>18</sup>, Ps 80<sup>1</sup> 99<sup>1</sup>, Is 37<sup>16</sup>, is not without difficulty. The rendering 'sitteth between the cherubim' is an explanation, not a translation, of the original: nor does it give the full meaning of the words. To the Heb. poet the cherubim are not only the attendants of J<sup>n</sup>, but the bearers and upholders of His throne. The thunderclouds are the dark wings of these ministers of God. 'They bear Him up. And to this, which is the picture presented by the service of the mute forces of nature, there is an analogy presented by the service of God's people. Hence the earthly correlative to 'thou that sittest upon the cherubim' is 'thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel' (Ps 22<sup>3</sup>, and see Cheyne's note).

In later Jewish theology the cherubim take their place among the highest angels of heaven. Thus Enoch speaks of the court of the palace of heaven. 'Its ceiling was like the path of the stars and lightnings, with fiery cherubim between in a transparent heaven' (xiv. 11, ed. Charles). Of the throne he says, 'Its circuit was as a shining sun and the voice of cherubim' (xiv. 18, ed. Charles). Speaking of the host of heaven, he mentions 'Gabriel, one of the holy angels, who is over Paradise, and the serpents, and the cherubim' (xx. 7, ed. Charles); and in another passage he speaks of 'all the host of the heavens, and all the holy ones above, and the host of God, the cherubim, seraphim, and ophanim, and all the angels of power, etc. (lxi. 10, ed. Charles). Cf. 'and round about were seraphim, cherubim, and ophanim: these are they who sleep not, and guard the throne of His glory' (lxxi. 7, ed. Charles). The Jews regarded them as supernatural beings, without attempting to define them. Josephus, speaking of the cherubim in the temple, says none could tell or even guess what they were like (τὰς δὲ χερουβείμους οὐδεὶς οὐδὲν οἰοῖται τινες ἦσαν εἰπεῖν οὐδὲ εἰκόσαι δύνανται, Ant. VIII. iii. 3). Philo, referring to the cherubim over the ark, mentions that in the opinion of some they represented the two hemispheres (so Philo himself, De Cherub. § 7); but his own preference was to identify them with the two most ancient and supreme attributes of the Almighty—the power of creating, and the power of ruling (ἐγὼ δὲ ἂν εἰποῖμι δηλοῦσθαι δι' ὑπονοῶν τὰς πρεσβυτάτας καὶ ἀνωτάτω δύο τοῦ Ὁντος δυνάμεις τὴν τε ποιητικὴν καὶ βασιλικὴν. 'Ονομάζεται δὲ ἡ μὲν ποιητικὴ δύναμις αὐτοῦ θεός, καὶ ἡν ἐθηκε καὶ ἐποίησε καὶ διεκόσμησε τὸδε τὸ πᾶν' ἡ δὲ βασιλικὴ κύριος, ἡ τῶν γενομένων ἀρχὴ καὶ σὺν δικῇ βεβαίως ἐπικρατεῖ, Vit. Mos. iii. 8, ed. Mangey, ii. 150).

ii. In NT they are spoken of in the Ep. to the Hebrews in connexion with the ark, 'above it the cherubim of glory overshadowing the mercy-seat' (He 9<sup>5</sup>), where the expression, 'the cherubim of glory,' conveys the special thought of created beings ministering to the manifestation of the divine glory. In the Apoc. they are represented as 'living creatures,' four in number, full of eyes, standing in the midst of the throne, and round about the throne of God (Rev 4<sup>6-7</sup>). From this description it is difficult to understand their exact position. But presumably the words are intended to convey the picture of the four 'living animals' upholding the throne, and facing outwards towards the four quarters of heaven, and the scene is derived from Ezekiel's vision.

Rabbinic theology regarded the cherubim as youthful angels, but also as those who were admitted into the special group of spirits attending the throne of God. The 'living creatures' support the throne at rest; the cherubim bear the glory of God as it passes through heaven (cf. Weber, Altsynag. Paläst. Theolog. 163, 164). There is a strange passage in the treatise Chagigah (13b, i. 25) which has reference to the cherubim, and the passages in Ezk 1 and 10. The passage concludes, 'What is the meaning of cherub? R. Abuhu said, It is equivalent to a growing child. For so in Babylon a young child is called Rabya. R. Papa said to Abuhu, But, as it is written, The first face was the face of the cherub, and the second face was the face of a man, and the third the face of a lion, and the fourth the face of an eagle, this shows that the face of a cherub is the same as the face of a man. There are large faces, and there are small faces' (see translation by Streane, pp. 73, 74).

iii. It remains to mention the various derivations which have been given of the word. (1) As has been mentioned above, it was derived from the Assy. kirubû; but apparently considerable uncertainty hangs over this derivation. (2) Renouf (PSBA, 1884, p. 193) conjectured that it was derived from the Egyp. zeref. (3) Gesenius connected it with a Syr. word meaning 'strong.' (4) Others have suggested another Syr. word meaning 'to plough.' It is difficult to resist the impression that the word must have a common origin with γρόψ, 'griffin,' 'hippogriff.'

But, for the present, the etymology of the word must be considered doubtful. The explanations which were given of the name by the Fathers may be illustrated by the following.

Clem. Alex. Strom. v. 240: ἐθέλει δὲ τὸ ὄνομα τῶν χερουβίμῳ δηλοῦν ἀσθονὴν πολλήν.

Theodorus ap. Theodoret, Quæst. in Gen. iii.: ἀλλὰ χερουβίμῳ καλεῖται πᾶν τὸ δυνατόν· οὕτως λέγει, ὁ καθήμενος ἐπὶ τῶν χερουβίμῳ, ἀντὶ τοῦ ὁ δυνατὸς βασιλεύων, καὶ, ἐπέβη ἐπὶ χερουβίμῳ καὶ ἐπετάσθη, ἀντὶ τοῦ, μετὰ πολλῆς παρεγένετο τῆς δυνάμεως.

Jerome, Comm. in Is. lib. iii. cap. vi.: In septuagesimo nono psalmo legimus: Qui sedes super cherubim manifestare; qui in nostra lingua interpretantur scientie multitudo. Unde et Dominus in aurigæ modum super cherubim aperte sedere ostenditur. . . . In cherubim ergo ostenditur Dominus; in seraphim ex parte ostenditur, ex parte celatur.

Augustine, Enarrat. in Ps 79<sup>2</sup> [Eng. 80<sup>1</sup>]: Qui sedes super cherubim. Cherubim sedes est gloriæ Dei, et interpretatur Plenitudo scientiæ. Ibi sedet Deus in plenitudine scientiæ. Licet intelligamus cherubim sublimes esse cælorum potestates atque virtutes; tamen si vis, eris cherubim. Si enim Cherubim sedes est Dei, audi quid dicat Scriptura: Anima iusti sedes est sapientiæ.

Didymus Alexandrin., Expos. in Ps 79 [Eng. 80]: Καθήμενος δὲ ἐπὶ τῶν χερουβίμῳ ὁ κύριος ἐστίν, ὡς ἐν τῇ ἐξεκλήῳ παρίσταται. Ἐφέψεται δὲ τοῖς ἐν τοῖς ζωοῖς ὄσιν, τετευχόσι ταύτης τῆς προσρηγορίας ἀπὸ τῆς προσούσης αὐτοῖς σοφίας. Πλήθος γὰρ γνώσεως ἐρμηνεύεται τὰ χερουβίμῳ.

These patristic explanations seem to go back to Philo's statement that the Greek meaning of 'cherubim' was 'much knowledge,' a πατρία μὲν γλῶττη προσαγορεύεται χερουβίμῳ, ὡς δὲ ἂν Ἑλλήνες εἰποιεν, ἐπίγνωσις καὶ ἐπιστήμη πολλή (Vit. Mos. lib. iii. § 8; Mangey, ii. 150).

LITERATURE.—The subject is extensively discussed in the standard works on the Theology of the OT, by Oehler, Smend, Schultz, Dillmann; and on the Archaeology, by Nowack and Benzinger. See also Cheyne's 'Excursus' in vol. ii. of his Isaiah, and his Notes on the word in Com. on Psalms.

CHESALON (כֶּסֶלֹן).—Near Kiriath-jearim on the border of Judah, Jos 15<sup>10</sup>. Now the village Kesla on the hill N. of Kiriath-jearim. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xvii. It is noticed in the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Chasalon) as a large village in the Jerus. district.

C. R. CONDER.

CHESED (חֶסֶד).—One of the sons of Nahor and Milcah (Gn 22<sup>22</sup> J). He is obviously here introduced into the genealogy of the Terahites as the presumptive forefather of the Casdim (כַּסְדִּים) or Chaldeans. This probably represents a different tradition from that in P, where Ur of the Chaldees (i.e. Casdim) is spoken of as the dwelling-place of Terah (Gn 11), Nahor's father.

It is noticeable that the eldest of the brothers of Chesed is Uz, and that in Job 1 the Casdim (translated Chaldeans) are found invading the territory of Uz. Gn 22<sup>21, 22</sup> probably represent, in the terms of genealogy, the supposed kinship of allied clans who dwelt in Mesopotamia. The Heb. tradition gives the names of tribes identified with various localities on the borders of the plain of Mesopotamia.

H. E. RYLE.

CHESIL (כֶּסֶל), Jos 15<sup>30</sup>.—The LXX reads Bethel, probably for Bethul, as in the parallel passage, Jos 19<sup>4</sup>, and כֶּסֶל of MT is prob. a textual error. (So Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Siegfried-Stade.)

CHEST.—1. In order to defray the cost of certain repairs of the temple, the priest Jehoiada placed in the court (our authorities are not agreed as to the exact location; cf. 2 K 12<sup>9</sup> (Heb. 10), 2 Ch 24<sup>8</sup>, with LXX in each case) a chest (קֶרֶן), in the lid (Heb. door) of which a hole had been bored, for the reception of the offerings of the worshippers, as recorded 2 K 12<sup>10</sup>. (Heb. 31.) (LXX κιβωτός, Vulg. gazoophylacium), and, with variations, 2 Ch 24<sup>8b</sup>. (γλωσσόκομος, arca). The ark (of the covenant) is also invariably denoted by קֶרֶן, either alone or with qualifications (see ARK i.). So, too, the coffin in which Joseph's mummy was placed (Gn 50<sup>26</sup>). The feature common to all three is the rectangular shape; the first two certainly, the third most probably, were of wood. Γλωσσόκομος, used by the LXX translator of Chron. as a synonym of κιβωτός, is freq. employed by the later Gr. translators as the rendering of קֶרֶן in all the three applications given above, as by Aquila in Gn 50<sup>26</sup>, where the so-called Targ. of Jonathan also renders גִּבְעֹתָא. Jos. further uses it (Ant. vi. i. 2) to denote the 'coffer' (EV, קֶרֶן 1 S 6<sup>3a</sup>) or small chest in which the Phil. princes deposited the golden mice, while in NT it is applied to the cash-box of which Judas Iscariot had charge (Jn 12<sup>6</sup> 13<sup>29</sup>). In the temple of Herod, 13 chests stood in the court of the women, to receive the various kinds of money gifts, in shape resembling a trumpet (if the treatise Shekalim vi. 5 may be trusted), wide at the bottom but gradually narrowing towards the top, hence called שִׁשְׁבִּיטִים. It was into one of these chests that the widow cast her slender offering (Mk 12<sup>41</sup>, Lk 21<sup>1</sup>).

2. In AV and RV we find in Ezekiel's inventory (27<sup>24</sup>) of the merchandise of Tyre 'chests (כֶּסֶלֹן) of rich apparel, bound with cords and made of cedar.' But the sense 'chests' for this word is without sufficient support (see comm. of Cornill, Davidson, Smend), and the word rendered 'made of cedar' must mean 'strong, durable,' so that we should probably render 'cloths of cords twined and durable.'

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

CHESTNUT TREE (אֲרֹמֹן 'armôn, πλάτανος, platanus).—'Armôn is mentioned twice in OT; once as one of the trees in which Jacob 'piled white strakes' (Gn 30<sup>37</sup>), and set them before the flocks at the watering troughs, and again as one of the trees with which the cedar of Lebanon, symbolical of Assyria, is compared (Ezk 31<sup>8</sup>). The chestnut tree, which is the rendering of the Rabbis and of AV, is not indigenous in any part of Syria and Pal., and does not succeed in cultivation. It has probably never grown there except as an exotic. The plane tree of LXX, Vulg., and RV, Platanus Orientalis, L., on the contrary, grows everywhere by, and in, watercourses, and is one of the finest trees of the country. It has a trunk which is often 6 to 10 ft. in diameter, and 50 to 100 ft. high, spreading branches, and large palmate-lobed leaves. The monocious flowers are in pendulous, spherical heads, the fertile becoming as large as a small walnut. The name 'armôn signifies naked, and probably refers to the fact that the outer layers of bark scale off as in the Eucalyptus globulus, leaving a smooth surface. When peeled, it would leave a white streak. Plane trees grow in Mesopotamia. Chestnut trees do not. There can be no reasonable doubt that the 'armôn is the plane tree. It is called in Arab. dilb. In Sir 24<sup>14</sup> wisdom is compared to a plane tree by the water.

G. E. POST.

CHESULLOTH (חֶסְלוֹת), Jos 19<sup>18</sup>.—The same as Chisloth-tabor, Jos 19<sup>12</sup>. A place on the border of Zebulun. Now the ruin of Iksal at the foot of the Nazareth hills, in the fertile plain W. of Tabor. In the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Chasalath) the site was known as near Tabor, but it was also wrongly identified with Achshaph (see Onomasticon, s.v. Acsaph and Achseloth). The ruin is chiefly remarkable for a cemetery of tombs apparently mediæval. See SWP vol. i. sheet v.

C. R. CONDER.

CETH or HETH (ח).—Eighth letter of Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 8th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

CHEZIB, Gn 38<sup>5</sup>.—See ACHIZIB.

CHIDE.—To chide (past 'chode') is to wrangle; then to scold or sharply rebuke; so Ps 103<sup>9</sup> 'He will not always c.' (רִיב). Cf. Ps 18<sup>15</sup>, Pr. Bk. To chide with is to wrangle with one, have an altercation with one; so Gn 31<sup>36</sup> 'Jacob was wroth, and chode with Laban,' Ex 17<sup>2b</sup> (RV 'strive'), Nu 20<sup>8</sup>, Jg 8<sup>1</sup> (all רִיב). Chiding as subst. occurs Ex 17<sup>7</sup> 'because of the c. of the children of Israel' (רִיב, RV 'striving').

J. HASTINGS.

CHIDON (כִּידֹן).—The name acc. to 1 Ch 13<sup>9</sup> of the threshing-floor where Uzzah was struck dead for rashly touching the ark (see UZZAH). In 2 S 6<sup>8</sup> the name is given as Nacon, which Budde considers to be a less probable reading. No locality has ever been identified with either name. The view has been advanced that C. is the name, not of a place, but of the proprietor of the threshing-floor, and attempts have been made to identify him with Araunah or Ornan the Jebusite. (See further Driver and Wellh. on 2 S 6<sup>8</sup>.)

R. M. BOYD.

CHIEF.—i. In old Eng. as in modern, 'chief' was both a subst. and an adj.; but in AV (though it is the tr. of some twenty Heb. words, all substs.) it is seldom if ever a substantive. The Oxf. Eng. Dict. quotes as a subst. the occurrence of 'c.' in Nu 3<sup>30</sup> and Ps 105<sup>38</sup>; but even these are not certain instances. If 'c.' were a subst. in Nu 3<sup>30</sup>, then in 3<sup>32</sup> 'Eleazar shall be chief over the chief of the Levites,' the plu. would be used, 'over the chiefs' (אַנְשֵׁי, RV 'princes'), there being no example of the sing. used for the plural. It is prob. that 'c.' is an adj. with 'men' understood. In Ps 105<sup>38</sup> 'He smote also all the firstborn in the land, the c. of all their strength,' the Heb. (רִשְׁוֹנֵי, lit. 'beginning,' the common word for 'first-fruits') is the same as in Am 6<sup>1</sup> 'c. of the nations' and 6<sup>4</sup> 'the c. ointments,' where the word is clearly an adj. in the one case, and probably in the other. Cf. Lk 11<sup>16</sup> 'the c. of the devils' (ἀρχῶν, RV 'prince'), with 14<sup>1</sup> 'one of the c. Pharisees' (ἀρχῶν, RV 'one of the rulers of the P.'). Hence when RV gives 'chiefs' for AV 'chief,' as 'the chiefs of the Levites' 2 Ch 35<sup>9</sup>, 'the chiefs of the priests' 36<sup>14</sup>, Ezr 8<sup>34, 20</sup> 10<sup>9</sup>, it introduces a plu. not found in AV, and a word of doubtful application.

ii. 'Chief' is given as tr. of 1. ro'sh, 'head,' esp. in the phrase 'c. of the fathers' (RV 'heads of the fathers' houses'), on which see Ryle on Ezr 1<sup>5</sup> and art. FAMILY. In Ezk 38<sup>2, 3</sup> 39<sup>1</sup> ro'sh is taken by RV as a proper name, Rosh (wh. sec). 2. Kōhēn, 'priest,' referring to David's sons (2 S 8<sup>18</sup>) and to Ira the Jairite (20<sup>28</sup>), is mistranslated 'c. ruler' (RV 'priest'), after the gloss of the Chronicler (1 Ch 18<sup>17</sup>). See Driver, Notes on Samuel, on 2 S 8<sup>18</sup> and art. PRIESTS. 3. In Pr 16<sup>28</sup> allāph (אַלְפִי, fr. [אַלֵּף] cleave to) is tr. 'chief friends,' evidently from a recollection that allāph also means 'duke' of Edom throughout Gn 36, and in Ex 15<sup>16</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>61, 62, 63, 64</sup>; and in Zec 12<sup>6, 8</sup> 'governor' (RV 'chieftain'). But in the latter sense allāph is best taken from eleph (אֶלֶף), 'a thousand,' that is, 'leader of a thousand,' 'chiliarch.' Dr. Murray (Oxf. Eng. Dict.) thinks this passage in Pr (16<sup>28</sup> 'a whisperer separateth c. friends') has suggested the Scot. 'chief' = intimate, as 'They're very c. wi' ane another.' 4. In Is 14<sup>9</sup> ([Hell] stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the c. ones of the earth,' the Heb. for 'c. ones' is attūdīm (אַתְּוּדִים), lit. 'he-goats,' here as the leaders of the flock; Cheyne (after Kay), 'bell-wethers.' See Cheyne in loc., and cf. Zec 10<sup>8</sup>.

CHILD, CHILDREN (טָרַן, יָלַד).—The Heb. language has a rich variety of words adapted to the different stages by which infancy passes into manhood and womanhood. This wealth of description indicates the importance of what is described. No word in the Bible contains so much of God's goodness and human happiness as is found wrapped up in the word 'child.' Most of these associations are common to the human family everywhere and in all ages; some are Oriental, a few are special to Israel. (See BIRTHRIGHT, CIRCUMCISION, REDEMPTION.)

1. Children as gifts of God and tokens of divine

favour.—The desire to possess children has always been a marked feature of Oriental life. Rachel spoke as the mother of her people when she cried, 'Give me children, or else I die' (Gn 30<sup>1</sup>). This desire gives their chief value to the tombs of saints and the superstitious shrines of modern Syria. The petition always carries with it a vow to do or give something in honour of the saint appealed to. In the same way, but with a wiser devotion, Hannah went to the tabernacle of God, and afterwards named her child Samuel ('God hath heard'), and surrendered him to the Lord's service (1 S 1<sup>11, 20</sup>). To this devout recognition is due the fact that while many names, such as Isaac, Manasseh, Moses, Ichabod, were suggested by some incident or anxiety of the hour, and names of females were often taken from objects of beauty in nature, such as Deborah, Esther, Rhoda, many others contained the name of God, or an attribute of God, as Elimelech, Athaliah, etc. So among the Arabs we have Shikri ('my gratitude'), Saladin (salāh-ed-dīn 'virtue of religion'), 'Abd-ul-Hamid ('servant of the Blessed'), Na'amat-Ullah ('grace of God'). For the same reason, Oriental feeling is rather against the observance of birthdays, as it seems to turn the sense of favour into an occasion of feasting. In a life so full of uncertainties, it has always seemed safer to be humbly thankful for a gift than to appear elated by a possession. Nothing is more dreaded or disliked by an Oriental parent than to have a child's healthy or beautiful appearance commented upon without thanks being expressed to God in the same breath. The mention of the divine name is understood to avert the curse of the evil eye. Children are 'the heritage of the Lord' (Ps 127<sup>3</sup>), and in Arabic salutation they are referred to as 'the guarded ones.'

2. Parental and filial affection.—Child-life has always been the great emblem of what appeals to human affection and responds to it. With the young, love, that in the ordinary lives of men is often the hireling of selfish interests, is always a free and independent instinct. The child's natural assurance that it must be so with all, appears amid sordid commonplaces and surrendered ideals as a remembrancer of Eden, and a type of what the kingdom of God is meant to be (Mt 18<sup>1</sup> 19<sup>4</sup>). The Bible is throughout a book for the families of men, and finds the fulfilment of all its teaching in the life of the Sinless Man. Its references, especially to child-life, are so simple and realistic that in reading them one forgets the antiquity of the narrative. The Land is here in very close affinity with the Book, for the strength of the family affections is the brightest feature of Oriental life. The infant in the ark of bulrushes cries like a child of to-day on beholding the strange face of his deliverer (Ex 2<sup>6</sup>). Again, in 2 K 4<sup>19</sup> we have a child's repeated cry of pain, the instinctive appeal to the father, and the resource of a mother's comforting and care. Isaiah takes note of the first words a child learns to lip (Is 8<sup>4</sup>), and Naaman's flesh becomes 'like the flesh of a little child' (2 K 5<sup>14</sup>). Solomon reveals his own wisdom in revealing the strain that could be put upon the love even of a degraded mother. David cries over his rebellious yet still beloved son, 'Would God that I had died for thee!' (2 S 18<sup>33</sup>). The cruelty to their infants was one of the experiences that made it impossible for the captives to forget Jerusalem (Ps 137<sup>9</sup>). Such an experience was in its turn the worst thing that could happen to the oppressors of Israel (Nah 3<sup>10</sup>). The transmission of suffering to the innocent of the third and fourth generations was one of the mightiest intimidations of the moral law (Ex 34<sup>7</sup>). Hagar could not bear to sit alone and watch the last unconscious movements of her dying child (Gn 21<sup>16</sup>). 'When my children were about me' (Job 29<sup>5</sup>), was a touching summary of vanished happiness. Amos, seeking to picture the day of ruin that Israel was precipitating by wholesale corruption, could find nothing more expressive of all that was bleak and bitter and unbearable than 'the mourning of an only son' (Am 8<sup>10</sup>).

It was in such a prepared cradle of family experience, with its tenderest ties of affection, and folds of life's sweetness and sorrow, that the gospel of the unexpected and unspeakable gift was laid. 'He gave his only-begotten Son' (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>); 'He spared not his own Son' (Ro 8<sup>32</sup>).

3. The importance of the parental position.—Mingled with the natural affection of parents towards their children, was the fact that their possession meant increase of dignity, influence, and wealth. This is shown in the preference for male children. In the home-circle, daughters might be as affectionate and as much beloved as sons, but in the expansion and continuance of the family name, in the holding of property, the acquisition of wealth, and generally with regard to worldly prosperity, sons and not daughters were the precious gifts of God. The former especially were the olive-shoots springing up from the roots of the parent stem (Ps 128<sup>3</sup>). Hence the forfeiture and reproach connected with childlessness, and the rejoicing over a man-child born into the world. In Syria the paternal position is so important that the father usually ceases to be called by his own name, and receives that of his firstborn son, as Abu-Yuseph ('father of Joseph'). If a middle-aged man has no son, courtesy often gives him a fictitious paternity, and styles him Abu-'Abdullah ('father of 'Abdullah'). The son might also be known by the father's name as a sort of surname. Thus David's full name was David Jesse, or ben-Jesse ('son of Jesse'). It was quite unusual for the son to receive in circumcision the name of the father until late in Israel's history (see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 2 ff.). The father was still alive, and needed as yet no memorial, but a son often received the name of a grand-parent, to keep alive the name of the departed, and with the name to inherit his gifts and graces of character. The later custom appears in Lk 1<sup>39</sup> 'They would have called him Zacharias, after the name of his father.' The authority of the parents over their children, and over all arrangements for their welfare, was complete and far-reaching. One of the commandments was devoted to this relationship, and one of the death-penalties of the law of Moses was to meet the case of filial disobedience (Dt 21<sup>20</sup>). Hence the solemnity of the charge against Israel (Is 1<sup>3</sup>), and the deep meaning of the confession, 'I am no more worthy to be called thy son' (Lk 15<sup>19</sup>).

4. Heredity.—Given a life with little change in its outward conditions, and with a law that controlled every detail of life, it followed that time would be an intensifier of the parental features. Among the Arabs the epithet 'dog' has for its climax 'son of a dog.' As one of their proverbs states the problem, 'If the father be onion and the mother garlic, how can there be sweet perfume?' When Saul asked the young slayer of Goliath, 'Whose son art thou, young man?' (1 S 17<sup>28</sup>), the question would not only reveal the family of David, but also account in part for the courage he had shown. Hence the incriminations, 'Ye are the children of them that killed the prophets' (Mt 23<sup>31</sup>); 'If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham' (Jn 8<sup>39</sup>); and the defence, 'How can Satan cast out Satan?' (Mk 3<sup>22</sup>). So Ezk 18<sup>2</sup>, Ac 13<sup>10</sup> etc.

5. Spiritual sense of father, son, brother.—The use of the word son in a fig. sense carries the three chief meanings of the literal use, namely, (1) affection, (2) obedience, (3) likeness. By these significations we must interpret 'sons of the Highest,' 'children of belial,' 'son of peace—perdition—disobedience—the commandment.' The new creature born of the Spirit receives new preferences and powers for the new life in Christ Jesus. St. Paul speaks of Timothy and Onesimus as his children; and St. John finds his chief delight in the fact that his children walk in the truth. The Lord's Prayer is an assemblage of all that the children should be and do and expect in order to please their Father in heaven. In the prohibition, 'call no man your father upon the earth' (Mt 23<sup>9</sup>), the allusion was most likely to a formality of ecclesiastical homage, like the salutation 'Rabbi' of v. 8. Among the Syrian Christians it is customary to salute the priest as Abāna ('our father').

In the East the family is always reckoned from the standpoint of the chief or oldest representative. Those whom he calls children are brethren. Thus the women of Bethlehem said, 'There is a child born to Naomi' (Ru 4<sup>17</sup>). This custom gave a vital and affectionate largeness of meaning to the word 'brother.' When Christians seek to realise the brotherhood that belongs to the society of the redeemed, the most effective way is found to be a return to Bible thought and Oriental custom, namely, united service to the Head of the family, devotion to the Lord Jesus Christ. See also FAMILY; and for Children of God see GOD, CHILDREN OF. G. M. MACKIE.

CHILEAB (צִלְעָב).—The second son of David by Abigail, the wife of Nabal the Carmelite (2 S 3<sup>3</sup>). In 1 Ch 3<sup>1</sup> he is called Daniel, while the LXX in Sam. has Δαλιούδ, which is also given by A in 1 Ch; but B reads Δαμυῖλ. Wellh. considers that צִלְעָב is only a variant for צִלְעָא, a bye-form of צִלְעָא, and therefore not unsuitable for a descendant of the house of Caleb. A comparison of the Heb. text, in which the last three letters of Chileab are repeated in the following word, favours the reading of the LXX, which would correspond to the Heb. צִלְעָא or צִלְעָא (Delaiah), cf. 1 Ch 3<sup>24</sup> 24<sup>18</sup>, Ezr 2<sup>50</sup> = Neh 7<sup>62</sup>, Neh 6<sup>10</sup>, Jer 36<sup>12-22</sup>. J. F. STENNING.

CHILION and Mahlon were the two sons of Elimelech and Naomi, Ephrathites of Bethlehem-judah, who migrated as a family into the country of Moab in consequence of a famine 'in the days when the judges judged' (Ru 1<sup>2</sup>). They married women of the Moabites, Mahlon marrying Ruth and Chilion Orpah (Ru 4<sup>9</sup>), and after a sojourn of ten years in Moabite territory died there. (Chilion = חִלְיֹן 'wasting away' = Χελαίων, Χελαιών, LXX B. Mahlon = מַחְלֹן 'sickly' = Μααλών, LXX, Mahalon, Vulg., as if the Heb. was originally read חִלְיֹן to connect the name with the hiph. ptep. of חָלַל.) Neither of these names occurs elsewhere in the Bible. Jesse is called an Ephrathite of Bethlehem-judah in 1 S 17<sup>12</sup>. The two names occur in varying order in Ru 1<sup>2</sup> and 4<sup>9</sup>, so that no conclusion can be drawn as to which was the elder. The Targ. on 1 Ch 4<sup>22</sup> connects them with the Joash and Saraph of that passage. H. A. REDPATH.

CHILMAD (חִלְמָד) occurs in Ezk 27<sup>28</sup> at the close of the list of nations that traded with Tyre. The name has been thought to be the Aram. form of Charmande, a town on the Euphrates mentioned by Xenophon (Anab. i. 5. 10). George Smith identified Chilmad with the modern Kalwādhā near Baghdad. The LXX reads Χαμάν, which is perhaps the prov. of Carmania in S. Persia. None of these conjectures has much probability. After Asshur (which there is no reason to suppose means anything else than Assyria) we should certainly expect a country rather than a town, and at the end of the list an important and well-known country. The Targ. seems to have read כִּלְמִי ('all Media'). But the best suggestion, after all, is perhaps that of Joseph Kimchi (adopted by Hitzig and Cornill), who reads the word כִּלְמִי, explaining: '[Asshur etc. were] as those accustomed to come to thee with their merchandise.' It is to be noted that the Heb. has no 'and' before Chilmad. The whole verse, however, shows traces of textual derangement. J. SKINNER.

CHIMHAM (חִמְחָם, חִמְחָם).—Probably the son (cf. 1 K 27) of Barzillai the Gileadite, who returned with David from beyond Jordan to Jerus. after the death of Absalom (2 S 19<sup>34</sup>). Acc. to Jer 41<sup>17</sup> (Kerē חִמְחָם), C. would seem to have erected a caravanserai near Bethlehem for the benefit of those travelling from Jerus. to Egypt; others suppose that the inn was named after him as the owner of the land, and infer that C. received some land near Bethlehem from David. See BARZILLAI. J. F. STENNING.

CHIMNEY.—In Hos 13<sup>3</sup> 'as the smoke out of the c.,' the Heb. is drubbah (דְּרַבָּה), a lattice, hence a latticed opening in a room whence the smoke escapes. But in 2 Es 6<sup>1</sup> [all] 'c.' is the tr. of Lat. caminus, the very word from which c. comes; and the meaning is not the flue or vent, but the fire-place or oven, 'or ever the chimneys in Sion were hot' (RV, after Syr., 'or ever the footstool of Sion was established'). This is the oldest meaning of the word in Eng., and is found as late as Goldsmith. Cf. Milton, L'Allegro, 111—

'Then lies him down the lubbar fiend,
And, stretch'd out all the chimney's length,
Basks at the fire his hairy strength.'

And Goldsmith, Deserted Village, 235—

'While broken tea-cups, wisely kept for shew,

CHIOS (ἡ Χίος) was a large island which formed part of the province of Asia, situated in the Aegean Sea off the Ionian coast, still called Scio (according to the Italian form), about 32 miles long from N. to S., and in breadth varying from 18 to 8 miles. It is separated from the mainland by a channel of varying width, which at its narrowest (about 5 miles across) is blocked by a group of small islands. The ship in which St. Paul sailed from Troas to Patara (on his way to Jerus.) passed through this channel as it sailed S. from Mitylene; and it anchored for a night on the Asian coast opposite the island, and thence struck across the open sea S. to Samos (Ac 20<sup>15</sup>). The voyage of Herod by Rhodes, Cos, Chios, and Mitylene, towards the Black Sea, described by Jos. Ant. xvi. ii. 2, affords an interesting comparison with that of St. Paul. The channel is very picturesque. The chief city of the island, bearing the same name, is situated on its E. coast, towards the S. end, probably facing the point where St. Paul's ship lay at anchor. The island is rocky (esp. in the broader N. part) and unproductive, except that it was famous for its wine, and its gum mastic has been a source of trade and profit both in ancient and in modern times. It was one of the seven places that claimed to be the birthplace of Homer; and a much stronger body of tradition speaks in favour of it than for any of the other claimants. Like Cnidus, Cos, Cyzicus, Ilium, Samos, Smyrna, Mitylene, and many other cities of the province Asia, C. had the rank of a free city, which implied merely that in certain respects it was administered according to native law, while other Asian cities were administered according to Rom. law. W. M. RAMSAY.

CHISLOTH-TABOR, Jos 19<sup>12</sup>.—See CHESULLOTH.

CHIUN.—Notwithstanding the fact that both Luther and our AV have this word, it has continued, even to our own time, to be an open question among English and German scholars whether כִּיּוּן is a common or a proper noun. If it were the former, it would signify the litter or pedestal on which the image of a deity was carried in ceremonial processions [see illustrations in Perrot and Chipiez's Chaldea and Assyria, i. 75, ii. 90]. Ewald maintained this view: 'כִּיּוּן, gestelle, von כָּיָן stellen mit dem 'als zweitem Wurzellaute.' W. R. Smith, too, held that a 'pedestal' was meant (Prophets of Israel, p. 400). The balance of opinion, however, preponderates in the other direction. Chiun is obviously parallel to Siccuth (RV), or rather Saccuth (Assyr. Sak-kut): if the one is the name of a deity, so is the other. Moreover, it would be very strange if the prophet spoke of the litter rather than of the god carried on it. Ka-ai-va-nu (Schrader, KAT p. 443; cf. SK 1874, p. 327) is the Assyr. name of the planet and planetary deity Saturn, who was credited with malignant influences. In Arab. and Persian, Saturn is called by the same name. Rawlinson, Phœnicia, p. 26, speaking of the immigration of Phœnician gods into the Egyptian pantheon, says that this deity found his way there under the name Ken. The appositional phrase, 'your star-god,' falls in perfectly with this interpretation. The evidence of the VSS is discordant. Ag. and Sym. have χιούν [Jer. says chion]. The LXX Ῥαφάρ, a corruption of Kaḫḫar. The Targ. and Pesh. reproduce the Heb. The Arab. has Raphāna; Vulg. imagine.

With regard to the sense of the only passage, Am 5<sup>26</sup>, where this deity is spoken of, there can be no doubt that it is a threat: 'But ye shall take up Sakkuth your king, and Kaivān [or Kēvān] your star-god, your images which ye have made for yourselves, and I will cause you to go into exile.' Wellhausen, Die Kl. Proph. p. 83, argues that this threat must be a later addition, seeing that the Israelites of Amos' day were not chargeable with the worship of Assyrian gods. The form of the word has struck many students as anomalous. An ingenious explanation has recently been advanced. After adverting to the fact that its vocalisation is the same as that of Siccuth [מִסַּח, מִסַּח], Dr. C. C. Torrey says: 'It seems to me pretty certain that for the form of these two names in our present text we are indebted to the misplaced wit or zeal of the Massoretes. It is the familiar trick of fitting the pointing of one word to the consonant skeleton of another, as in חֲרָצִים, חֲרָבִים, חֲרָבָה, and so on. In this case the pointing is taken from the word חֲרָצִים shiqqūz, "abomination." J. TAYLOR.

CHLOE (Χλόη), mentioned only in 1 Co 1<sup>11</sup>.—St. Paul had been informed of the (σχίσματα) dissensions at Corinth ὑπὸ τῶν Χλόης, i.e. prob. by some of her Christian slaves. Chloe herself may have been either a Christian or a heathen, and may have lived either at Corinth or at Ephesus. In favour of the latter is St. Paul's usual tact, which would not suggest the invidious mention of his informants' names, if they were members of the Corinthian Church. A. ROBERTSON.

CHOBÁ (Χωβάδ), Jth 4<sup>4</sup>. Chobai (Χωβαί), Jth 15<sup>1-5</sup>, noticed with Damascus.—Perhaps the land of Hobah.

CHOKE.—Death by drowning is not now described as 'choking'; so in Mk 5<sup>13</sup> 'the herd . . . were choked in the sea,' Amor. RV changes 'choked' into 'drowned'; but RV retains, to preserve uniformity in tr. of πνίγω. 'Choking' occurs Sir 51<sup>4</sup> 'from the c. of fire' (ἀπὸ πνιγμοῦ πυρός).

J. HASTINGS.

CHOLA (Χολά).—An unknown locality mentioned in Jth 15<sup>4</sup>.

CHOLER (Gr. χολέρα, Lat. cholera), bile, is used in Sir 31<sup>20</sup> 37<sup>20</sup> in the sense of a disease, 'perhaps cholera, diarrhoea'—Oxf. Eng. Dict. (χολέρα, RV 'colic'); and in Dn 8<sup>7</sup> 11<sup>1</sup> in the sense of bitter anger (ῥῆγ). Both meanings are old, and belonged indeed to the Lat. cholera as early as the 3rd and 4th cent.

J. HASTINGS.

CHORAZIN (TR Mt 11<sup>21</sup> Χοραζὶν, Lk 10<sup>13</sup> Χωραζὶν; TTRWH always Χωραζὶν).—A town situated at the N. end of the Sea of Galilee on the W. of the Jordan. The meaning of the name is uncertain. It was a 'city' (πόλις), and therefore possessed a synagogue. Our Lord laboured in it, as is shown by His mention of it in Mt 11<sup>21</sup>, Lk 10<sup>13</sup>. It is not mentioned in Josephus, but the Jews long after the time of Christ praised the superior quality of its wheat (Bab. Tal. 'Menahoth' 85 A). Jerome (c. A.D. 400) locates it at two miles from Capernaum, but says that it was deserted. Beyond these meagre notices the place has no history. Thomson (1857) found a ruin called Kerazeh, which from its location and the correspondence of names he thought was the site of Chorazin. Wilson (1866) examined and described the remains at this place, and confirms the identification of Thomson. This view is now generally accepted. The ruins are of some importance, the entire stonework, walls, columns, and ornamentation being composed of black basalt rock. A short paved road ran from the town to the great caravan road leading past the Sea of Galilee to Damascus. S. MERRILL.

CHORBE (Χορβέ, AV Corbe), 1 Es 5<sup>12</sup> = ZACCAI, Ezr 2<sup>9</sup>, Neh 7<sup>14</sup>.

CHOSAMÆUS.—In 1 Es 9<sup>22</sup> Σίμων Χοσαμαῖος A, or Χοσάμαος B, takes the place of Ἰσάων, the reading of the parallel passage Ezr 10<sup>21</sup> (see SIMÉON, No. 2). It is not improbable that the Gr. reading is due to a copyist's error, especially seeing that the three proper names that follow Siméon in the text of Ezra are omitted in 1 Es.

CHRIST.—See JESUS CHRIST, and MESSIAH.

CHRISTIAN (Χριστιανός, Ac 11<sup>26</sup> 26<sup>28</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>16</sup>).—The name borne by the 'followers of Christ' in all ages and countries from NT times.

I. Place and date of origin.—According to the account in Ac 11<sup>26</sup> the first to have the name applied to them were the members of the church at Antioch. This fact is especially mentioned by the author of the Acts in a manner which shows that he attached great significance to it. The evangelising work in the city of Antioch was being carried out by men of Cyprus and Cyrene (i.e. by Hellenists), and though perhaps not directed to Gentiles who had no previous connexion with the synagogue (for we can scarcely substitute Ἑλληνας for Ἑλληνιστάς in face of the MS evidence; see Westcott and Hort, N.T. in Greek, Introd. ad loc.), yet on more liberal lines than hitherto. In Antioch, too, was established the first considerable church outside Palestine. The mother-church of Jerus. was not slow to recognise the importance of these events. Barnabas was sent to guide and control the new community, and the result of a year's work in co-operation with his chosen partner, Saul, was that they 'taught a great multitude, and the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch.' We cannot fix exactly the date of this 'whole year' (v. 26), but it is certainly before the Herodian persecution of 44, and, to judge from the expressions of v. 27 12<sup>1</sup> (ἐν ταύταις ταῖς ἡμέραις, κατ' ἐκείνους τὸν καιρὸν), not very long before it; between 40-44, which leaves room for the possibility that the words ἤτις ἐγένετο ἐπὶ Κλαυδίου, 'which came to pass in the days of Claudius,' in v. 28 may imply that Agabus' prophecy was uttered in the reign of Caligula.

The objections made to the statement of Ac 11<sup>26</sup> are based ultimately upon the theory which discredits the authority of that book as a comparatively late document. If we regard the Acts as the work of St. Luke, the account it gives of the origin of the name 'Christian' is invested with the authority of contemporary evidence, which cannot lightly be set aside on account of apparent difficulties. The objections which have been raised on the score of those difficulties may be gathered under three heads. (a) Baur (Paul, His Life and Work, i. 94, footnote, Eng. tr. 1873) says that the termination is Latin, and seems to think that the name arose in Rome. The termination -ianus was used in Latin during the time of the civil war to denote 'followers of' (e.g. 'Caesariani,' Hist. Bell. Afr. 13; 'Pompeiani,' Caesar, Bell. Civil. iii. 44 et pass.), and acquired this meaning from the adjectival sense 'belonging to,' which the form already possessed, although it was very seldom used, e.g. Tamphiliana domus (from 'Tamphilus'), Nep. Att. xiii. 2; Caesarianum bellum, ib. vii. 1; Catoniana familia, Cic. ad Q. Frat. iv. vi. 5; Miloniana tempora, Valer. Max. vi. 1. The adoptive names in -ianus are not parallel because the 'i' in these cases belongs to the stem of the gentile name, e.g. Æmilianus, Æmilii. So far, then, Baur was justified. The termination -ianus was common in Latin of this period. But as names like Caesariani, Pompeiani, etc., were known and used throughout the whole Rom. Empire, it seems to have become the fashion in Greek-speaking countries also to form other words on the same analogy. Thus (omitting 'Herodiani,' which may have originated in Roman official circles) we find names such as those mentioned in Hegesippus (ap. Eus. Ecc. Hist. iv. 22), Σιμωνιανοί, Καρποκρατιανοί, Ουαλεντινιανοί, Βασιλιδιανοί, Σατορνιλιανοί. The theory that this -ianus is a native 'Asiatic type' of termination is not borne out by the instances quoted, in which either the 'i' belongs to the stem, e.g. Ἀσιανός (Ἀσία) Σαρδηνιανός (Σάρδεις), or the words are late enough to have been copied from the Latin termination. But the instances quoted above show that, whether derived from the Latin or not, the termination became common enough in Greek, and therefore there is no necessity to ascribe to the name Χριστιανός a Roman origin.

(b) Hausrath (N.T. Times: Apoktes, ii. pp. 211, 212, Eng. tr. 1896) objects to Ac 11<sup>26</sup> that we find no trace of the word 'Christian' in contemporary literature until the time of Trajan. But until the Neronian persecution the sect can scarcely have attracted much attention in the Roman literary class, and from the year 64 to the time of Trajan the extant literature is extremely scanty, and so in both cases we are not justified in arguing ex silentio. On the other hand, however, passages in Tacitus and Suetonius furnish us with an indirect argument that the name was known and used in Rome in the year 64. Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44) says, 'quos . . . vulgus Christianos appellabat. Auctor nominis ejus Christus,' etc. The imperfect 'appellabat' is significant when we remember that Tacitus was probably living in Rome in 64, and an eye-witness of the Neronian persecution. It is quite probable that he is recording a circumstance which he remembered in connexion with these events, viz. that the word 'Christiani' was in everybody's mouth, and he somewhat naturally believed Christ himself to have been the author (auctor) of the name. Suetonius, writing only a year or two later than Tacitus, also introduces the name 'Christiani' into his reference to this persecution (Nero, 16, 'afflictis supplicis Christiani, genus hominum superstitiosis novae ac malefices'). Some have found additional evidence for an early use of the name in the supposed occurrence of the word in an inscription at Pompeii, i.e. dating before A.D. 79. But this inscription (CIL iv. 679), which is merely a few lines scribbled upon a wall, cannot be deciphered with any certainty. The letters -RISTIANI are fairly plain, and before the I are two faint perpendicular strokes, probably II (= E). If they are meant for II the horizontal stroke has quite disappeared. The drift of the whole inscription is as uncertain as the reading of this word. See V. Schulze in ZKG iv. 125 ff.; Friedländer, Darstellungen aus der Sittengesch. Roms,<sup>9</sup> iii. 645, n. 3; C. F. Arnold, Neron. Christenerfolg, p. 54.

Equally indecisive is the mention of the name in Josephus (Ant. xviii. iii. 3), ἵστανται τοὺς τῶν Χριστιανῶν ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀνομασίμους εὐκρινέστερον τὸ ὄνομα. This section is deservedly suspected by the great bulk of modern scholars to be entirely or partly a later forgery. The latest editor, Niese (Flavii Josephi Opera, Berlin, 1892, Introd. to vol. iii.), rejects the whole section as an interpolation. Others (e.g. G. A. Müller, Christus bei F. Josephus) incline to accept a substratum of authentic matter. The passage is not found at all until it occurs in a quotation by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 11; Dem. Evang. iii. 5), since whose time the whole is repeated (excepting quite unimportant divergences) in all MSS and other evidence for the text of this part of Josephus' works. (Besides the books referred to above, see also on this subject C. Arnold, XXX Epistolae de F. Josephi testimonio quod Jesu Christo tribuit, 1661; C. Daubuz, Pro testimonio F. Josephi de Jesu Christo, 1706; F. H. Schodde, F. Jos. de Jesu Christo testatus, 1840; Gieseler, Lehrb. d. Kirchengesch., 1824, i. 65; Langen, Th. Quartalschrift, 1865, i.; Schürer, JP i. ii. 143 ff.).

(c) R. A. Lipsius urges the silence of St. Paul's Epistles, and indeed of the whole body of the earliest Christian literature. He regards the Asiatic origin of the name as probable, but is not inclined to date it earlier than the last decade of the 1st cent. But even if we set aside, as he does, the evidence of Acts and 1 Peter, this silence explains itself from the fact that the name arose in non-Christian circles, and was for some time confined to them.

II. By whom was the name invented?—Here we are left without direct evidence. The χρηματίζω (EV 'were called') of Ac 11<sup>26</sup> might be used indifferently of a name adopted by oneself, or given by others (see Thayer, NT Lex. s.v.). But there are certain hints which furnish some clues.

(a) The Christians do not seem to have used it of themselves, at any rate within the apostolic period. They called themselves 'the brethren' (οἱ ἀδελφοί, Ac 14<sup>13</sup> 15<sup>13</sup>, Ro 16<sup>14</sup> etc.), 'the disciples' (οἱ μαθηταί, Ac 11<sup>26</sup> 13<sup>22</sup> 20<sup>30</sup>), 'the saints' (οἱ ἅγιοι, Ro 16<sup>10</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>, Eph 1<sup>18</sup> etc.), 'the faithful' (οἱ πιστοί, Ac 10<sup>10</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>12</sup> 12), 'the elect' (οἱ ἐκλεκτοί, Mt 24<sup>22</sup>, Mk 13<sup>22</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>10</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>1</sup>), 'the way' (ἡ ὁδός, Ac 9<sup>2</sup> 19<sup>9</sup> 23 24<sup>22</sup>), but never 'Christians.' In the only passage in which this is apparently not true (1 P 4<sup>10</sup>), 'as a Christian' is parallel with 'as a thief,' 'as a murderer,' which shows that the writer is speaking for the moment from the point of view of the heathen persecutor. St. Paul (Ac 26<sup>20</sup>) seems even to avoid using the name 'Christian,' which Agrippa had employed, and to substitute for it the periphrasis τοιοῦτος ὁποῖος καὶ ἐγὼ εἰμι. It is not probable, then, that we must look to Christians themselves for the invention of this title.

(b) Nor is it much more probable that the Jews invented it. The only direct name by which they call the Christians in NT is that of Ναζωραῖοι, 'Nazarenes' (Ac 24<sup>5</sup>). Elsewhere they speak of them as ἡ αἵρεσις αὐτῇ, 'this sect' (ib. 28<sup>22</sup>; cf. 24<sup>14</sup>). On one occasion, indeed, we find the word in the mouth of the Jewish king Agrippa (Ac 26<sup>28</sup>). But Agrippa had spent a great part of his life in Rom. circles, and was speaking on this occasion at Caesarea before a Rom. audience. It is too much then to infer from this passage that the word 'Christian' was in use among the Jews. On the other hand, there is a strong a priori improbability that the Jews, even in irony, would call the new sect 'followers of the Messiah, the Anointed One' (οἱ Χριστοί).

(c) More probably it is to the heathen populace of Antioch that we must look for the origin of the name. It was amongst the populace ('vulgus,' in loc. cit.) that Tacitus' attention was drawn to the word in Rome. It was (next to the Jews) the heathen populace whose notice was first attracted by the Christians. And their notice was attracted to them as the preachers of one Christos. This name was always on their lips. It was the name in which they were baptized (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>48</sup>, Ja 2<sup>7</sup>*). It is not surprising, then, that the Antiochenes, hearing that this Christos had been alive not more than fifteen years before, should call his followers the Χριστιανοί. We must, however, leave room for the possibility that the word may have originated in the Latin-speaking suite of the legatus, i.e. in the official class, though not necessarily as an official name. Though we hear of nothing which would bring the Christians prominently before this class in Antioch, as happened in other towns, yet, in our complete ignorance of the relations between the Christians and this official class in Antioch at the time, this might easily be the case without our knowing anything of it.

III. Early spread of the name.—We must be on our guard against overestimating the attention which the Christian body attracted in Antioch at the time when the name was invented. The ἐχλος ἱκανός, 'much people,' of Ac 11<sup>26</sup> might be almost unnoticeable in so large a metropolis as Antioch, and the arrival of another new teaching would easily escape observation in a great centre of thought, where all the religions of the world jostled with one another. St. Luke, writing at a time when the name had become famous, assigns to its origin an importance reflected from its later history. He is writing also from within the Christian circle, to which the name would be familiar long before its application became general. But though confined, it may be, in its beginnings to that quarter of the city where the Christians had settled, it must have spread very quickly beyond Antioch to all parts of the empire whither Christianity had made its way. Less than twenty years after its birth we hear it mentioned in the Rom. official circle at Caesarea as a familiar word, whose signification was too well known for it to need introduction or explanation (Ac 26<sup>28</sup>). A year or two later it is in common use among the populace of Rome (Tac. loc. cit.), and not far from the same date St. Luke indirectly implies that the name has become famous (11<sup>26</sup>). St. Peter, writing probably between 64–67 from Rome to the Christian communities in Asia Minor (1 P 5<sup>13</sup> 1<sup>1</sup>), assumes that it is quite well known over all that district (ib. 4<sup>10</sup>). From the correspondence between the younger Pliny and the emperor Trajan in 112–113 we find that it is by that time equally familiar to members of the official bodies in Rome and Bithynia. Finally, in the Ignatian Epp., written in the first or at the beg. of the second decade of the 2nd cent., we find for the first time that the Christians have accepted the name and use it amongst themselves (e.g. Eph. 11<sup>14</sup>, Rom. 3, Polycarp 7).

IV. Significance of the name.—St. Luke evidently wishes to connect the origin of the name with the final departure of Christianity from merely Jewish ideals and the dawning consciousness of this fact in the Gentile mind. It is then fair to ask, 'What were the distinctive marks of the new sect to those who first used the word Christian?' If it did not originate as a sarcastic jeu d'esprit, it very soon came to be used with a contemptuous signification. It occurs with an implication of scorn in the mouth of Agrippa, 'With but little persuasion thou wouldst fain make me a Christian' (Ac 26<sup>28</sup>).

* Many editors take this passage as a direct allusion to the name 'Christian.' The expression τὸ ὄνομα τινος is a Hebraism which occurs many times in the LXX. The Heb. equivalent denotes that the person whose name is 'called over' a thing possesses the rights of ownership in it. See esp. 2 S 12<sup>28</sup> 'Lest I take the city, and my name be called upon it' (RVm), and the note of Driver, ad loc (Heb. Text of Sam.). The allusion in Ja 2<sup>7</sup> is, then, more correctly referred to baptism in the name of Christ (see Mayor, Ep. of St. James, ad loc.). See also art. CALL.

From 1 P we learn that in heathen mouths 'Christian' was practically equivalent to 'malefactor' (4<sup>10</sup>, cf. 2<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>16</sup>). What were the reasons for this malice and contempt? They were perhaps mainly four.

(c) There was much in heathen social life which, even if innocent in itself, suggested associations offensive to Christian scruples (1 P 4<sup>3-4</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>1-13</sup>, Ro 14<sup>1-20</sup>). Again, it must have caused many heart-burnings and domestic strifes when the new religion made its way into families. Hence arose the hatred of Christians as morose and unsociable Puritans.

(d) Besides merely holding aloof from heathen society, Christians were fearlessly outspoken in condemnation of its vices and idolatry (Eph 2<sup>1-3</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>, Ro 1<sup>18-32</sup>). The secret consciousness that such condemnation was not at bottom unfounded, embittered the heathen world still more against its self-constituted censors. From this hatred it was but a short step to the fabrication of slanders (1 P 2<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>16</sup>), and such charges found a shadow of support in the mystery with which the Christians invested their acts of worship. At the same time the proofs of their world-wide organization gave them the aspect of a secret society banded together against the religion and manners of the day.

Somewhat later in the corrupted form 'Christianus' the Apologists applied the word to themselves as the 'good' (χρηστος). The word Χριστός, though known to the Greeks as an adjective, was not used as a proper name except to translate the Hebrew 'Messiah'. Χρηστος, on the other hand, was a tolerably familiar name. Hence arose the corruption (probably towards the middle of 2nd cent.) into Χρηστιανοί. Suetonius (Claud. 25) uses 'Chrestus' for 'Christus'; but there is no evidence that he connected the name with 'Christiani,' which appears (Nero, 16) without any variant reading 'Christiani.' It appears as 'Christiani' also in Tacitus and Pliny (loc. cit.). Justin Martyr plays on the double name (Ap. i. 55 A), ὅσον γε ἐκ τοῦ ὀνόματος τοῦς κατηγοροῦντας μάλλον κολάζειν ὀφείλετε. Χριστιανοὶ γὰρ εἶναι κατηγοροῦμεθα· τὸ δὲ χρῆσθαι μισῶνται οὐ δίκαιον. Cf. Tert. Ap. 3, 'cum et perperam Christianus pronuntiatur a vobis (nam nec nominis certa est notitia penes vos) de suavitate et benignitate compositum est.'

CHRISTOLOGY.—The purpose of this article is to reproduce the conception of Himself and of His relation to God left by Christ in the minds of His earliest followers; and then to estimate the truth and worth of this conception. For this inquiry, we fortunately have, in the NT, abundant materials. We there find various, and in great part independent, witnesses speaking to us from the first and second generations of the followers of Christ, and comprising some who stood in close relation to Him.

i. 1. The undisputed and well-attested genuineness of some of the Epistles of St. Paul, and the probable genuineness of the others, make these the best starting-point for our inquiry. For in them we have a secure platform on which we may stand firmly, and from which we can survey the entire evidence. We shall then consider the Synoptic Gospels and the writings attributed to the Apostle John.

Throughout his Epistles we notice the profound reverence with which St. Paul bows before Christ as in the presence of One incomparably greater than himself or the greatest of men. There is no comparison of Christ with other men, and no trace of familiarity, or of that sense of equality, which no differences of rank or ability can altogether efface. But there is everywhere a recognition of the honour of being a servant, or indeed a slave, of so glorious a Master.

St. Paul speaks of Christ, e.g. in Ro 1<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>10</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>3</sup>, Gal 4<sup>4</sup>, as the Son of God, using this term as a title of honour distinguishing Him even from the adopted sons of God. In Ro 8<sup>3</sup>, and again in v.<sup>32</sup>, he calls Him God's own Son whom He sent into the world and gave up on behalf of us all. This last passage suggests a comparison with a human father who gives up to peril or death his own son to save others who are not his sons. And this comparison dominates the whole teaching of St. Paul and of the NT about the death of Christ. It implies that Christ is the Son of God in a sense not shared by other men. Now the word son suggests derivation of one person from another. And the term Son of God given to Christ as a mark of honour, distinguishing Him from all others, suggests irresistibly that He is derived from the Father, but in a manner differing in kind from that by which we sprang from the Creator's hands.

In Ro 3<sup>26</sup> St. Paul teaches that God gave up Christ to die in order to harmonize with His own justice the justification of those who believe in Christ. This implies, not only that among a race of sinners Christ is sinless, but that in moral worth He is equal to the whole race for which He died. In Ro 5<sup>10-19</sup> Christ is contrasted with Adam as the second and greater Head of the race. This gives to Him a unique superiority to all the generations of men.

In Ro 2<sup>16</sup> we read that 'God will judge the secret things of men through Jesus Christ'; and in 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup> St. Paul writes that himself and all others 'must needs appear before the judgment-seat of Christ.' Similar teaching is attributed to St. Paul in an address recorded in Ac 17<sup>31</sup>. In 1 Th 4<sup>10</sup> we read that at the voice of Christ the dead will rise; and in Ph 3<sup>21</sup> that by His mighty power He will transform the lowly bodies of His servants into the likeness of His own glorious body.

In Col 1<sup>16</sup>, a document which we may accept with complete confidence as written by St. Paul, we read that in Christ, and through His agency, and for Him, all things, even the successive ranks of angels, were created; that He is earlier than all things; and that in Him all things have their unity, or 'stand together.'

All this proves decisively that, in the eyes of the pupil of Gamaliel, the Carpenter of Nazareth stood infinitely above men and angels, in a position of unique dignity and unique nearness to God. This must be accepted as well-attested historical fact.

2. We turn now to another group of documents differing widely from the Epistles of St. Paul, the Synoptic Gospels. These were accepted without a shadow of doubt in the latter part of the 2nd cent. all round the Mediterranean as written by the Apostle Matthew, and by Mark and Luke, friends of apostles. The First Gospel, as the farthest removed from the theological standpoint of St. Paul, is specially valuable in the inquiry before us.

Throughout the Synoptic Gospels we find Christ making for Himself claims corresponding to the homage constantly paid to Him in the Epistles of St. Paul. In Mt 5<sup>17</sup> the young Teacher from Nazareth announces that He has come, not to annul the law and the prophets, but to complete and fulfil. In ch. 11<sup>27</sup> He asserts that He alone and those taught by Him know God. He calls to Himself all the weary and heavy-laden, and promises to give them rest by laying upon them His yoke. Yet He speaks of Himself as meek and lowly of heart. And no one resents these strange assertions as involving undue assumption.

As in the Epistles of St. Paul, so in the Synoptic Gospels, Christ is called, in a special sense, the Son of God. This title is given to Him by a voice from heaven at His baptism, in Mt 3<sup>17</sup>, Mk 1<sup>11</sup>, Lk 3<sup>22</sup>; and His claim to it is the question at issue in His temptation. The same august title is, as narrated in Mt 16<sup>16</sup>, given to Him by St. Peter, and is accepted by Christ at an important turning-point of His teaching. Its meaning is expounded by Christ in the Parable of the Vineyard in Mt 21<sup>33-41</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1-9</sup>, Lk 20<sup>9-16</sup>; where, after the ill-treatment of his servants, the master sends his son, thinking that, whatever the vinedressers have done to them, they will reverence him. Christ here claims to be as much above the prophets of the Old Covenant, above Moses and Isaiah and John the Baptist, as the master's son is above the highest of his servants. The same contrast is found in He 3<sup>6-8</sup>, where Moses is called a faithful servant in the household, and Christ a Son over the household. That this comparison is found in these four documents, one of them so different from the others, reveals its firm place in the thought of the apostolic Church. It implies clearly that, to the writer's thought, Christ's relation to God, in virtue of His derivation from Him, differs in kind from that of even the greatest of men.

As recognised by St. Paul, but more conspicuously, Christ claims in Mt 7<sup>22</sup>, 13<sup>41</sup>, 16<sup>27</sup>, 25<sup>41-46</sup>, and in the parallel passages, that in the great day He will sit upon a throne and pronounce judgment on all men; while the angels do His bidding as His servants. This teaching raises Christ as much above the rest of mankind as the judge who sits in dignity on the bench is above the criminal who stands at the bar.

3. Another marked type of NT teaching is found in the Fourth Gospel, which a unanimous tradition, reaching back to the 2nd cent., and supported by powerful internal evidence, attributes to the beloved Apostle John. In it we have teaching of Christ given, apparently, not as in the Synoptic Gospels to the many, but to a favoured few, and of the utmost value.

Christ is here represented as making for Himself claims practically the same as those recorded in the Synoptic Gospels. In Jn 7<sup>37-38</sup> He bids all the thirsty to come to Him and drink; and declares that they who believe in Him shall themselves become fountains of living water. He calls Himself in 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>6</sup> 'the light of the world'; and in 10<sup>11, 16</sup> 'the good Shepherd' of the 'one flock.' In 10<sup>30</sup> He asserts, 'I and the Father are one.' In 11<sup>26</sup> He calls Himself 'the Resurrection and the Life'; and in 14<sup>6</sup> claims to be the only way through which men can come to God.

In close harmony with the Epistles of St. Paul and the Synoptic Gospels, Christ speaks of Himself in Jn 5<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 11<sup>4</sup> as the Son of God. The same title is in ch. 1<sup>34</sup>, 49 given to Him by the Baptist and by Nathanael. In ch. 3<sup>16, 18</sup> Christ claims to be the only-begotten Son. The same term is found in 1 Jn 4<sup>9</sup>, and a similar one in Jn 1<sup>14, 18</sup>.

In Jn 5<sup>22</sup> Christ asserts that 'the Father has given all the judgment to the Son, in order that all men may honour the Son according as they honour the Father'; and that an 'hour cometh when all that are in the graves will hear his voice and will go forth, they who have done the good things to a resurrection of life, and they who have done the bad things to a resurrection of judgment.'

In Jn 10<sup>33</sup> 5<sup>18</sup> the enemies of Christ assert that by speaking of God as His 'own Father,' Christ was making Himself God, or equal to God. This equality is involved in 5<sup>19</sup> 'whatever things he does, these also the Son does in like manner'; in 14<sup>9</sup> 'he that hath seen me hath seen the Father,' and in ch. 16<sup>15</sup> 'all things, so many as the Father hath, are mine.'

In close harmony with Col 1<sup>16</sup>, we read in Jn 1<sup>8</sup> 'all things through his agency came into being, and apart from him came into being nothing which hath come into being.' This careful repetition of a word denoting to begin to be is a marked contrast to v. 1 'in the beginning was the Word.' So v. 10 'the world through his agency came into being.'

In Jn 20<sup>28</sup>, in view of the pierced hands and side of the Risen One, Thomas accosts Him as 'my Lord and my God.' This supreme honour Christ accepts. It is given to Him, in express words, by the evangelist in Jn 1<sup>1</sup>, where we read 'the Word was God.' The assertion immediately following, that through His agency all things were made, compels us to accept this term as involving the infinite attributes of deity.

Similar honour is paid to Christ in the Book of Revelation. In Rev 5<sup>6</sup> we see Him in the midst of the throne as a slain lamb, an object of worship and lofty praise to those nearest the throne, and to every creature in heaven and earth and sea. Yet the interpreter angel twice (19<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>9</sup>) refuses worship from John, saying, 'worship God.'

ii. It is now evident that throughout the various documents and types of thought contained in NT we have one harmonious picture of the dignity of Christ. In the Epistles of St. Paul we noticed the profound reverence with which he bowed before Christ as in the presence of One far greater than himself or the greatest of men, and we found a complete counterpart to this reverence in the lofty claims which in each of the four Gospels He is recorded to have made for Himself. In all these documents the title Son of God is claimed by Christ, or is given to Him, as a title of unique dignity, and as noting a unique relation to God. The meaning of this title is determined by the Parable of the Vineyard recorded in each of the Synoptic Gospels, by the term only-begotten Son in the Fourth Gospel and in the 1st Ep. of St. John, by St. Paul's appeal to the love of God manifested in the gift of His own Son to save men, and by the contrast in the Epistle to the Hebrews between Moses, a faithful servant, and Christ the Son of God. This agreement, in writers so various, leaves no room to doubt that, as matter of historical fact, this title, and in this sense, was actually given to Christ by His earliest followers. It is equally clear that they looked upon Him as the designated Judge of the world. We have also seen that the two greatest writers of NT looked upon Christ as earlier than the universe, and as the Agent through whom it was created. One writer gives to Him the supreme title God, and records His own earlier acceptance of the same.

iii. In this harmonious account, by various writers, of the dignity of Christ we notice marks of development. In the Synoptic Gospels we find it in its most rudimentary form; in the Epistles of St. Paul it is more fully developed; in the Fourth Gospel the development is complete. Even within the writings of St. Paul, and again within the Fourth Gospel, we notice development. In 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup> we read of 'one Lord, through whom are all things'; and in Col 1<sup>16, 17</sup>, written in the mature thought of St. Paul's first imprisonment, we read that the Son existed before all creatures, and that through His agency even the successive ranks of angels were created,—a thought much in advance of anything in his earlier Epistles. Very much in advance of Christ's teaching about Himself before His death, are the exclamation of Thomas, and the assertion of the evangelist that 'the Word was God.'

It is worthy of note that this development proceeds always on the same lines, that whatever we read about Christ in the Epistles of St. Paul, and indeed in the Fourth Gospel, is either a necessary inference from the teaching of Christ about Himself in the First Gospel, or is needful in order to give to that teaching unity and intelligibility. Between the accounts of the dignity of Christ given by the different writers of NT there is no contradiction. They differ only in their degree of definiteness and completeness. Indeed there is much greater difference between Mt 19<sup>17</sup> and 28<sup>19</sup> and between Jn 1<sup>1</sup> and 14<sup>28</sup> than between the teaching of the First Gospel, taken as a whole, and that of the Fourth.

Possibly, the more fully developed teaching of the Epistles of St. Paul and of the Fourth Gospel about the Son of God may, in its literary form, have been influenced by Gentile modes of thought and expression. Certainly, St. Paul's modes of thought and expression were moulded by his Gentile surroundings. But the complete harmony of all NT writers about the Son of God, and the infinite gulf which separates their teaching from all other earlier or contemporary teaching, leave no room for substantial contributions from sources external to Israel. Contemporary Greek or Oriental thought does little or nothing to elucidate the teaching of NT about the Son of God.

iv. The teaching adduced and expounded above involves a new and definite conception of God. For the assertions of Christ in the NT are equivalent to a claim to share with the Father the infinite attributes of deity; and the contrast between Him who was with God in the beginning and the universe which sprang into being by His agency, suggests irresistibly that, whereas even the bright ones of heaven began to be, He exists, as a person distinct from the Father, from eternity.

Faint indications in the OT of a plurality of persons in the Godhead have been pointed out. But they are dim and uncertain. The definite and complex and yet harmonious conception of God, which underlies the teaching about Christ of the various writers of NT, is altogether different from every conception of God set forth in the entire literature of the world, except so far as later literature has been moulded by Christian teaching. It is a matter of simple historical fact that the NT embodies a complete revolution in man's thought about God.

This new and complex metaphysical conception of God has survived to our day, and has been in all ages the deep conviction of an immense majority of the followers of Christ, and esp. of nearly all those who have done most to spread His name and influence. We hear much about theological differences between contending Churches and schools of Christian thought. Far more wonderful than these differences is the agreement of the mass of the servants of Christ about the dignity of their Master, and about His relation to God.

Of this agreement, the various Creeds and Confessions of the various Churches are decisive proof. The so-called Nicene Creed is accepted by both Greek and Roman Churches, and even by the Armenian Church, which rejected the subsequent Definition of Chalcedon. Even this wide agreement is not the whole. While rejecting much of the teaching of the Church of Rome, the German and Swiss and Eng. Reformers clung tenaciously to the doctrine of the Son of God embodied in the Nicene Creed. It is to-day the deep conviction of both Anglicans and Nonconformists in England and of the various Churches in America. In other words, the remarkable agreement of the various writers of NT about the dignity of Christ finds a complete counterpart in the wonderful agreement of an immense majority of His followers in all ages and nations.

v. Of these well-attested historical facts, only three explanations are possible.

It may be suggested that Christ was Himself in error. If so, the greatest religious teacher the world ever knew, the author of a religious impulse which has changed and raised human thought and life, was in deep error touching the nature of God and touching His own relation to God; and His error has been shared by nearly all those who have done most for the religious life of men. If this be so, the Light of the World was, and they to whom He has been the Light of Life are, in deep darkness. So absurd a suggestion is not worthy of a moment's consideration.

The only remaining alternative is either that Christ is in very truth what the various writers of NT represent Him as claiming to be, and being, or that His immediate followers, those who gained for Him the homage of succeeding ages, and through whom He became the Saviour of the world, misunderstood altogether the teaching of their Master about Himself and about God, and made for Him, and represented Him as making for Himself, claims which He would have rejected with horror as blasphemous. This hypothesis requires us to believe that the various and very different writers of NT, including a friend and colleague of the murderers of Christ, fell into the same error, and adopted the same complicated metaphysical conception of God therein involved. Nay, more. It requires us to believe that this error survived the theological conflicts of later days, and is now the deep and cherished, but mistaken, conviction of nearly all those who have done most to spread the name of Christ and the blessings of Christianity. This is the easiest alternative open to those who reject the harmonious teaching of the NT about Christ and the historic faith of the Church of Christ.

vi. One more difficulty remains. Not a few intelligent and educated men who pay homage to Christ as the greatest of men refuse to accept as correct the portrait of Him given in NT. If this portrait be incorrect, these men have detected an ancient and serious error, and have restored to the civilised world the true conception of God. We expect to see in them as a fruit of their important discovery some moral and spiritual superiority to those who are still held fast by the great delusion. We look in vain. They who deny the divinity of Christ have done very little to carry the gospel to the heathen, to rescue the perishing at home, or to help forward the spiritual life of men.

On the other hand, if the confident belief of the apostles and of the mass of Christians in all ages be correct, the facts of modern Christendom are explained. If Christ be the only-begotten Son of God, His birth was by far the greatest event in the history of our race, and Himself infinitely greater than the greatest of men. We wonder not that His advent was a new era in human thought and in history, and that the Christian nations enjoy to-day a position of unique superiority to all others.

The precise relation of the Son to the Father belongs to the domain of systematic doctrinal theology. The various yet harmonious teaching of NT implies that the Son is, in a real and glorious sense, equal to, yet personally distinct from, subordinate to, and one with, the Father. But this mysterious subject lies beyond the scope of this article.

It has been sufficient for our purpose to show that the various and very different writers of NT give one harmonious account of the dignity of Christ and of His relation to God, that this conception has been in all ages the deep conviction of the mass of His followers, and that this remarkable unanimity, ancient and modern, can be explained only by the truth of the conviction so widespread and so firm.

This important result of our examination of documentary evidence receives wonderful confirmation from the direct inward moral and spiritual effects of the doctrine expounded above. In all ages the vision of the Son of God, divine yet human, has been a powerful stimulus to every kind of excellence, an encouragement in conflict, a joy in sorrow, and the Light of Life under the shadow of death. The moral helpfulness of this vision is a sure witness that the vision itself is an apprehension of objective reality. J. AGAR BERT.

CHRONICLES, I. and II.—POSITION IN CANON.—

The name Chronicles is given, in the English Bible, to two books written in historical form, which immediately follow 1 and 2 Kings. In the LXX their position is the same. This arrangement is due to similarity of contents. Heb. MSS place them as one book, in the third division of OT, Kēllāhūhim (כתובים), the Writings (Hagiographa), either at the beginning (so in the Massoretic lists and in Spanish MSS) or at the end (so in the Talmud, Baba bathra 13b–15, usually in German MSS, and from these in printed Heb. Bibles), rarely in some other position (e.g. third, after Dn and Ezr, Kennicott 30; it is not probable that Jerome (Prolog. Galcat.) had MSS authority for placing it third from the end, followed by Ezr and Est). Its position, whether prefixed or affixed to the other Hagiographa, is probably due to the late date at which canonical authority was ascribed to it. Exactly when this occurred we cannot say. The historian Eupolemus (c. B.C. 150) seems to have known, not merely the Heb. text, but the LXX translation of Ch, so that it appears to have been reckoned in the Canon not much after B.C. 200, at latest (Euseb. Præp. Evang. ix. 33, 34, cf. 2 Ch 2<sup>2-10</sup>; Freudenthal, Alex. Polyhistor, 108, 119, cited by Schürer, HJP v. iii. pp. 162, 204).

UNITY.—It is evident that the two Books of Ch are really one. The narrative is continuous, and the division due only to convenience, like the modern division of a book into volumes. Like the division of S and K, it was made in Alexandria prior to our oldest MSS of LXX, passed through the LXX into the Vulg. and the modern versions, including the Eng., appeared in Heb. in the printed text of the Bomberg Bible (1521), and is now customary in printed Heb. Bibles. The Books of Ezr and Neh form a continuation of the same work, by the same hand, and might with propriety be entitled 3 Chronicles, or included under the one name of Chronicles (see EZRA AND NEHEMIAH).

NAME.—The name of Chronicles in Hebrew is Dibbherē Hayyamim (דִּבְרֵי הַיָּמִים), a phrase occurring frequently in K and Ch with the meaning annals, or records of such and such a king (lit. the acts of the days of, etc.). The LXX. (followed by the Vulg.) adopted the name Τὰ Παραλειπόμενα, of doubtful meaning; the usual interpretation is of things passed over, by Sam. and Kings, but this does not explain the present tense of the participle. The Eng. name Chronicles is a fairly good translation of the Heb. name. It can be traced back to Jerome (Prologus Galat.; introduction prefixed to his trans. of S and K): 'Septimus [liber] Dabro Ajanim (דבר הימים), id est verba dierum, quod significantius Χρονικὸς totius divinae historiae possumus appellare. Qui liber apud nos Παρανεκρομένη primus et secundus inscribitur' (Migne, Hieron., ed. Vallarsi, ci. 554).

CONTENTS.—The period embraced in Ch extends from Adam to the Restoration of the Jews under Cyrus.

(1) 1 Ch 1-9 contain chiefly genealogies (beginning 'Adam, Seth, Enosh'), coming down through Noah's sons, and then particularly through the line of Shem to Esau and Israel and their sons, with their descendants. The last twelve vv. of ch. 1 contain a list of Edomitish kings and chiefs. In the various genealogies many problems arise, due in part to defective text, in part to lack of completeness in the tables, in part to a confusion between names of persons and names of places and peoples. Brief narratives, from various periods, are interspersed among the genealogies (e.g. 2<sup>33</sup> 49, 10, 29-43 5<sup>1</sup>, 10, 18-22, 25, 26). The last genealogy in this collection, 9<sup>35-44</sup> (repeated, with some differences, from 8<sup>29-38</sup>), makes a kind of transition to the following section.

(2) a. 1 Ch 10-29 are concerned with David's reign, the introduction being the last battle and the death of Saul (ch. 10), and the conclusion the accession of Solomon (23<sup>v</sup> 28<sup>off</sup>, 29<sup>22ff</sup>). b. 2 Ch 1-9 are devoted to Solomon's reign. c. 2 Ch 10-36 contain the history of the kingdom of Judah down to the fall of Jerus., with the division of the kingdoms as preface, and the Restoration-edict of Cyrus as appendix, or, more exactly, as introduction to the history of the Restoration and the early Jewish community given in Ezz-Neh. (On the parallels, see below.)

STYLE.—The style of Ch is strongly marked. The genealogical lists, the religious interests, and the edifying tendency of the author (see below) of themselves impart a certain tone to it; thus there is often comparative brevity and lack of precision in describing external affairs,—even such important ones as the temple-building, Sennacherib's invasion, and the fall of Jerus.,—while pedigrees, speeches, and matters relating to ritual are given at length. Other essential features of it are a peculiar vocabulary, peculiar syntactical habits, and noteworthy idiosyncrasies in phraseology (see esp. Driver, LOT 502 ff., and C. C. Torrey, Ezra-Nehemiah).

The following words and phrases occur (in Heb.) only in Ch (incl. Ezr-Neh), and in writings certainly still later (Est, Dn, Ec, Ps-titles) * :—

1. לָבַט howbeit, but, † 2 Ch 1<sup>4</sup> 19<sup>1</sup> 33<sup>17</sup>, Ezr 10<sup>13</sup>; also Dn 10<sup>7. 21</sup>.

2. תִּפְתָּח letter, † 2 Ch 30<sup>1, 6</sup>, Neh 27<sup>7, 8, 9</sup> 65<sup>17, 19</sup>; also Est 9<sup>28, 29</sup>.

3. אָרְבֶּק purple, ↑ 2 Ch 27 (Heb. v.<sup>6</sup>), cf. Aram. אַרְבֶּק Du 57. 16. 29;—the more common Heb. אֶרֶבֶק is most frequently late, and occurs in 2 Ch 23 34.

5. פֶּזֶז, pēz byssus, ↑ 1 Ch 4<sup>21</sup> 15<sup>27</sup> (but emend after 2 S 6<sup>14</sup>), 2 Ch 2<sup>14</sup> (Heb. v. <sup>13</sup>) 3<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>12</sup>; also Est 1<sup>6</sup>; it occurs also MT Ezk 27<sup>16</sup> but del. G. Cornill.

 7. skilled, skilled (in), † 1 Ch 15<sup>22</sup> 25<sup>7</sup> 27<sup>22</sup>, 2 Ch 34<sup>12</sup> (other kindred meanings are chiefly late).

There are also classes of peculiarities in Ch, many of them syntactical; e.g. omission of the relative; --ה־ for the relative; שָׁעַר וְשָׁעַר and other such repetitions with וְ in a distributive sense; וְכֵלָם and other temporal inf. phrases at beginning of sentence (for older קָדְמִי, etc.); and particularly the use of prepositions:—c. inf. with circumstantial force, at the end of sentences, as 1 Ch 15<sup>10</sup> etc.; ḥ. c. inf. denoting purpose, etc.; ḥ. c. inf. as the accusative sign after a verbal suffix, e.g. 1 Ch 5<sup>20</sup>, and without a preceding suffix 2 Ch 26<sup>14</sup>; לְרִבּוֹת יִסְּרֵם † 1 Ch 16<sup>27</sup>, 2 Ch 8<sup>14</sup> 31<sup>16</sup>; לְרִבּוֹת = without, e.g. 1 Ch 22<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ch 14<sup>12</sup>; לְרִבּוֹת = without † 2 Ch 15<sup>3</sup>. 3. 4; לְרִבּוֹת = wholly, namely, e.g. 1 Ch 13<sup>1</sup> etc.; ḥ. c. inf. and (oft.) לְרִבּוֹת, carrying on another preposition (לְרִבּוֹת, etc.), or introducing a nominative 1 Ch 26<sup>28</sup> 28<sup>1</sup>. 21 29<sup>6</sup>; the curious combination לְרִבּוֹת וְלְרִבּוֹת † 1 Ch 15<sup>13</sup>, and לְרִבּוֹת † 2 Ch 30<sup>3</sup>; the frequent and noteworthy לְרִבּוֹת before both verbs and nouns, e.g. 1 Ch 28<sup>20</sup>, 2 Ch 16<sup>12</sup> 36<sup>10</sup>; ḥ. c. inf. of accompaniment, without a verb, 1 Ch 16<sup>6</sup> etc.; ḥ. c. inf. before adverbs, e.g. 2 Ch 29<sup>38</sup>; and others (see esp. Driver, LOT 504–506).

The peculiar and often anomalous phraseology of Ch, which is apparent in every chapter, may be further illustrated by the following specimens chosen almost at random:—

1 Ch 10<sup>13</sup> says that (Saul died . . .) because he did not obey J<sup>h</sup>'s command, and because he made inquiry by necromancy; in Heb. thus: אָשַׁךְ אֶת עֵצֵי הַיָּבֵשׁ לְרִבּוֹת; לא שָׁמַע אֶת צֶוֶת יְהוָה בְּאָזְנוֹ לְרִבּוֹת;

11<sup>10</sup> speaks of heroes whom David had, and because he made inquiry by necromancy; in Heb. thus: אָשַׁךְ אֶת עֵצֵי הַיָּבֵשׁ לְרִבּוֹת; לא שָׁמַע אֶת צֶוֶת יְהוָה בְּאָזְנוֹ לְרִבּוֹת;

12<sup>18</sup> (Baer, EV v. 17) makes David say, 'I will heartily join with you,' in Heb. thus: וְהָיָה לְךָ לֵב יָחַד, lit. 'I will have a heart toward you for unitedness.'

28<sup>18</sup> לְחִנְיָה הַקְּרָבָה הַקְּרֹבִים וְהָיָה לְפָרֶשִׁים וְלִבְרָשִׁים עַל־אֲרָיוֹ וְהָיָה, i.e. (refined gold) for the pattern of the chariot, (viz.) the cherubim (viz. of) gold (making them, notice ל) to spreading out and covering over the ark, etc.

28<sup>19</sup> וְהָיָה כְּכֹהֵן יְהוֹשֻׁעַ בְּיָדְךָ, the whole by a writing from the hand of J upon me hath he taught.

29<sup>30</sup> וְהָיָה אֲשֶׁר עָבְרָה עָלָיו וְיִשְׂרָאֵל וְהָיָה and the times (i.e. experiences) which have passed over him and over Israel, etc.

2 Ch 11<sup>23</sup> וַיִּשְׁאַל הָמָן וְשָׂם, and he sought a crowd of wives (but rd. perh. וְיִשְׁאַל לָהֶם, so F. Perles, Anel. 47).

15<sup>3</sup> וְהָיָה לְיִשְׂרָאֵל לֵאלֹהֵי אֱמֶת וְלֹא כֹהֵן כֹּהֵן מֹרֶה וְלֹא וְהָיָה and long was Israel without a true God, and without a priest as teacher, and without a law.

16<sup>9</sup> וְהָיָה לְךָ לֵב יָחַד, to show himself strong in helping those whose heart is perfect toward him (אשר omitted before ללב).

21<sup>19</sup> וְהָיָה לְךָ לֵב יָחַד, i.e. and it came to pass after some days, even about the time of the outgoing of the end of two years.

DATE.—(1) The peculiarities of language already noted give an overwhelming presumption in favour of a very late date for Ch. (2) Specific evidence appears.—(a) 1 Ch 3<sup>24</sup> where Anani is named according to MT in the 6th generation after Zerubbabel, or about B.C. 350; (Ct, followed by SY, makes Anani the 11th from Zerubbabel, or about B.C. 250-200); probably also (b) the expressions 'kingdom of Persia,' 'king of Persia,' 2 Ch 36<sup>20, 22, 23</sup>, if, as is likely, these expressions were used to distinguish the Persian rulers, not from the Semitic Babylonian, but from the later Greek (note the absence of this expression in the contemporary references of Neh 2<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>; also 11<sup>23, 24</sup> etc.). (3) Further specific evidence appears in Ezr-Neh,—originally one work with Ch—(a) the terminus a quo is given Neh 13<sup>6</sup> 'the 32nd year of Artaxerxes' = B.C. 433; (b) Jaddua, Neh 12<sup>21</sup>, is 6th high priest after Joshua (Hag 1<sup>1, 12</sup> 2<sup>4</sup>, Zec 3<sup>1, 3, 6, 8, 9</sup> 6<sup>11</sup>); Eliashib, 3rd in this list, was a contemporary of Nehemiah (Neh 3<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>28</sup>); Josephus, Ant. XI. viii. 4, names Jaddua, as high priest in the time of Alexander the Great, B.C. 333; (c) Darius III. (Codomannus) reigned B.C. 336-332, and his reign ('Darius the Persian') is mentioned Neh 12<sup>22</sup>; (d) on 'the Persian' (i.e.), and 'king of Persia,' Ezr (1<sup>1, 2</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 7<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>27</sup> 4<sup>3</sup> 5<sup>6, 7, 24</sup> 6<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>1</sup>, cf. 2 (b) supra); (e) late words and constructions, evident Aramaic influence in the language, and extended Aramaic passages (Ezr 4<sup>8-23</sup> 5<sup>1-6</sup> 7<sup>12-26</sup>). On the other hand, if Eupolemus knew the LXX translation of Ch (cf. POSITION IN CANON, supra), the original must have had canonical authority not much later than B.C. 200. From all these indications it is safe to say that Ch was not composed before B.C. 300, and may have been composed as late as B.C. 250.

Comparison.—A. The foregoing table shows at once, that while parts of Ch have no parallel in the earlier books, there are still larger portions of those books unrepresented in Ch. The following are such portions of Samuel and Kings:—1 S 1-30, 2 S 1-4, 9, 11<sup>2-27</sup> 12<sup>1-16</sup> 13-20, 21<sup>1-14</sup> 22, 23<sup>1-7</sup>, 1 K 1<sup>1-32</sup> 21<sup>1-9</sup> 18-46 31-3, 16-23 41-34 13, 14<sup>1-20</sup> 15<sup>25-34</sup> 16-21, 2 K 1-7, 8<sup>1-15</sup> 9, (chiefly), 10, 13, 15<sup>8-31</sup> 17, 25<sup>22-26</sup> 27-30. They include (1) the entire activity of Samuel, and the reign of Saul (except the close); (2) David's lament for Saul and Jonathan, his conflict with Ishbosheth, and dealings with Mephibosheth; (3) the story of Uriah and Bathsheba; (4) the story of Amnon and Tamar, and Absalom's flight and recall; (5) Absalom's rebellion and David's exile; (6) the Psalm of 2 S 22 = Ps 18; (7) the 'Last Words of David' 23<sup>1-7</sup>; (8) the intrigues and struggles attending Solomon's accession; (9) evidences of Solomon's wisdom and poetic gifts; (10) Solomon's alliances with foreign women, and his idolatries in later life; (11) his vexation by adversaries, including Jeroboam; (12) the entire history of the Northern Kingdom, after the division, except when the account of the Southern Kingdom makes necessary some mention of the Northern; (13) the governorship and murder of Gedaliah, after Jerusalem's fall; (14) the exile-life of Jehoehin.

B. Ch condenses also, in several places, and as a result gives statements with less precision than the earlier books. These passages are chronological (as in the genealogies 1 Ch 1), architectural (as in the case of the temple-building 2 Ch 2-4; the building of Solomon's palace is not described at all), political (as Sennacherib's invasion 2 Ch 32<sup>1-22</sup>; the reigns of the last kings 2 Ch 36<sup>4-18</sup>), or humiliating (Michal's contempt 1 Ch 15<sup>20</sup>; sickness of Hezekiah 2 Ch 32<sup>24</sup>; fall of Jerusalem 2 Ch 36<sup>17-21</sup>); the same quality may partly account for the cases mentioned under the previous head). That Ch expands some political and military narratives is also true, and will be noticed below. Other narratives are modified in various ways, e.g. the sacrifice by Solomon at Gibeon (2 Ch 1<sup>3-6</sup>), the overthrow of Athaliah (2 Ch 23), and the reigns of Jehoram (2 Ch 21<sup>6-20</sup>), Ahaziah (2 Ch 22<sup>1-9</sup>), Joash (2 Ch 24), Ahaz (2 Ch 28), and Manasseh (2 Ch 33<sup>1-20</sup>); some of these will be noticed below under D.

C. In those parts of Ch which have no parallel in S and K, as well as in Ch's expansions and modifications of narratives occurring in them, certain definite interests are prominent:—(1) Moral reflections and explanations of calamities as divine judgments, e.g. 1 Ch 10<sup>13-14</sup>, 2 Ch 36<sup>11-13</sup>; so Shishak's invasion is explained 2 Ch 12<sup>5</sup>, and Jehoram's misfortunes 2 Ch 21<sup>10-16-19</sup>, cf. the 'letter of Elijah the prophet' vv. 12-15, and the wreck of ships at Ezion-geber 2 Ch 12<sup>17</sup>, and Amaziah's defeat 2 Ch 25<sup>14-16</sup>, and Uzziah's leprosy 2 Ch 26<sup>16-21</sup>, and Josiah's death 2 Ch 35<sup>21-22</sup>; (2) divine interpositions in war, e.g. 2 Ch 13<sup>15-16</sup> 14<sup>12-13</sup> 20<sup>22-24</sup>; (3) speeches and prophetic addresses, hortatory, didactic, etc.; also prayers: e.g. 1 Ch 29<sup>5-19</sup> 28<sup>1-10</sup> 29<sup>1-29</sup>, 2 Ch 13<sup>4-12</sup> 14<sup>7</sup> 15<sup>1-7</sup> 16<sup>7-9</sup> 19<sup>2</sup> 3, 9-11 20<sup>5-12</sup> 14-17 21<sup>12-15</sup> (writing of Elijah) 25<sup>7-8</sup> 28<sup>9-11</sup> 29<sup>5-11</sup> 30<sup>6-9</sup> (decree of Hezekiah) 32<sup>7-8</sup> 35<sup>21</sup>; (4) matters connected with worship, including Levitical, ritual, and especially musical appointments, e.g. 1 Ch 15. 16. (including the Psalm vv. 8-30) 22-26, 28, 29, 2 Ch 5<sup>12-13</sup> 7<sup>1</sup> 8<sup>14</sup> 15 11<sup>13</sup> 14, 16 13<sup>8-12</sup> 17<sup>8-9</sup> 19<sup>8-11</sup> 20<sup>19</sup> 21, 23 23<sup>2</sup> 4, 6, 7, 8, 18, 19 24<sup>5</sup> 6, 11 26<sup>16-20</sup> 29<sup>4</sup> 5, 7, 12-38 30, 31, 34<sup>9</sup> 12, 13, 30 35<sup>1-19</sup> 25; a peculiar case is 2 Ch 8<sup>11</sup> where Solomon's wife, the daughter of Pharaoh, is brought to the house built for her because the house of David has become too holy by reason of the coming of the ark; contrast 1 K 3<sup>1</sup> 7<sup>9-14</sup>. (On some additions of another kind, see below.)

D. It remains for us to examine the parallel passages a little more closely, selecting some of those most important for purposes of comparison:—

In some cases the agreement is close, almost exactly verbal, as 1 Ch 10<sup>1-12</sup> = 1 S 31, 2 Ch 9<sup>1-9</sup> = 1 K 10<sup>1-10</sup>, 2 Ch 18 = 1 K 22<sup>1-16</sup> (including the blunder of v. 28<sup>9</sup>), etc. In others there is important divergence, e.g. 1-:

1. 1 Ch 6<sup>3-16</sup> (1 Ch 6<sup>30-41</sup>) gives the list of chief priests through Eleazar, son of Aaron; most of the chief priests known to Sam. and Kings do not appear in this list, viz. Eli 1 S 19<sup>20</sup>, Ahitub, Eli's grandson (son of Phinehas) 1 S 14<sup>3</sup>, Ahijah 1 S 14<sup>3</sup>, and Ahimelech 21<sup>2</sup> 22<sup>9</sup> 11, 20 etc. (both described as 'son of Ahitub'), and hence identified by Bertheau, Klost. et al.; 'brothers,' according to Kittel, Gench. ii. 173, etc.), Abiathar, son of Ahimelech 1 S 22<sup>20</sup>, who was deposed by Solomon 1 K 22<sup>57</sup>. Zadok, whom Solomon substituted, appears as 10th in Ch's list, the son of an Ahitub, son of Amariah. Missing also are Jehoiaha 2 K 11<sup>4</sup> etc., and Urijah 2 K 16<sup>10</sup> etc. Azariah appears in Solomon's time, but 1 K 4<sup>2</sup> calls him son of Zadok, while in Ch he is son of Johanan; Hilkiah 2 K 22<sup>4</sup> etc. appears in Ch, and so does Seraijah 2 K 25<sup>18</sup>. These occasional agreements make the variations all the harder to explain. 1 Ch 24<sup>5-9</sup> makes Ahimelech a descendant of Aaron through his son Ithamar, and these and the following vv. make an attempt to satisfy their rival claims by recognising both in the temple service.

2. 1 Ch 13<sup>10</sup> explains the death of Uzzah as 2 S 6<sup>7</sup> does; but 1 Ch 15<sup>13</sup> gives a new reason, viz., because the Levites did not carry the ark.

3. 1 Ch 20<sup>5</sup> Elhanan killed Lalumi, brother of Goliath; but 2 S 21<sup>9</sup> he killed Goliath himself.

4. 1 Ch 21<sup>1</sup> it is Satan that moves David to number Israel, in 2 S 24<sup>1</sup> it is J'.

5. 2 Ch 13<sup>6</sup> explains Solomon's sacrifice at Gibeon by saying that the tent of meeting and the brazen altar were there (cf. 1 Ch 21<sup>29</sup>); but 1 K 3<sup>38</sup> says that Sol. worshipped at the high places, and sacrificed at Gibeon because that was the great high place; and v. 16 speaks not only of his coming back to Jerus. (2 Ch 13<sup>3</sup>), but also of his standing before the ark and sacrificing there, which Ch omits.

6. 2 Ch 7<sup>1-3</sup> the sacrifices at the temple dedication are consumed by fire from heaven; there is nothing of this in 1 K 8<sup>21-27</sup>.

7. 2 Ch 7<sup>12-23</sup> and 1 K 9<sup>1-9</sup> both describe a second appearance of J' to Solomon; but the language used by them differs, esp. in the condensation of 1 K 9<sup>1</sup> and the insertion of vv. 13-16 in Ch.

8. 2 Ch 14<sup>5</sup> 17<sup>6</sup> (cf. 19<sup>3</sup>) commend both Asa and Jehoshaphat for removing the high places; but 1 K 15<sup>4</sup> 22<sup>41</sup> tell us that these kings did not remove the high places (so also 2 Ch 15<sup>17</sup> 20<sup>33</sup>).

9. 2 Ch 20<sup>36</sup> 38 says that Jehoshaphat allied himself with Ahaziah of Israel to make ships (for an expedition by sea 1 K 22<sup>49</sup>); but 1 K 22<sup>49</sup> says that Ahaziah proposed the joint expedition, and Jehoshaphat refused.

10. 2 Ch 20<sup>38</sup> says that they made ships at Ezion-geber to go to Tarshish (on the Mediterranean, not accessible from Ezion-geber); but 1 K 22<sup>48</sup> simply speaks of Tarshish-ships (large sea-going vessels), and says they were destined for Ophir.

11. 2 Ch 21<sup>7</sup> says 'J' would not destroy the house of David, because of the covenant,' etc.; but 2 K 8<sup>19</sup> says 'J' would not destroy Judah for David his servant's sake.'

12. 2 Ch 22<sup>9</sup> describes Jehu's murder of Ahaziah thus: 'And he sought Ahaziah: and they caught him (for he was hid in Samaria) and brought him to Jehu: and when they had slain him, they buried him,' etc.; but according to 2 K 9<sup>21</sup>, Ahaziah drove out from Jezreel with Joram to meet Jehu, fled on discovering the treachery, and was killed in his flight. He died at Megiddo, was brought by his servants to Jerusalem, and buried there 'in his sepulchre with his fathers in the city of David.'

13. 2 Ch 23 represents the overthrow of queen Athaliah thus: Jehoiada and the captains of hundreds, and all the Levites in the cities of Judah, and the heads of families of the people, making 'all the congregation,' were gathered at Jerus.,—Athaliah being ignorant of it,—but while v.3 says 'all the congregation made a covenant with the king in the house of God,' v.6 provides that only priests and ministering Levites be allowed to enter the temple, and then the king is proclaimed, and Athaliah slain; but 2 K 11, while agreeing as to the main facts, represents a secret conspiracy between Jehoiada and the captains of the foreign mercenaries who served as temple guard; the meeting-place was the temple, into which the foreigners came and took their oath; the Levites, trained singers, burnt-offerings, law of Moses, etc., which appear in Ch, are all lacking in K.

14. 2 Ch 24<sup>14</sup>, speaking of the collection for repairing the temple, under Jehonah of Judah, says, 'they brought the rest of the money before the king and Jehoiada, whereof were made vessels for J's house'; but 2 K 12<sup>13</sup> says that no vessels were made for J's house out of the proceeds of the collection.

15. 2 Ch 24<sup>17ff</sup> makes Joash reign righteously 'all the days of Jehoiada the priest,' and after Jehoiada's death apostatise; but 2 K 12<sup>24</sup> says, 'And Jehonah did that which was right in the eyes of J' all his days, (namely) wherein Jehoiada the priest instructed him,' and K tells us nothing of any apostasy or wickedness, only criticising (v.3), as in other cases, the non-removal of the high places.

16. 2 Ch 25<sup>10</sup> describes slaughter and bondage inflicted on Judah by Pekah of Israel in the reign of Ahaz, which is not only unknown to 2 K 16 and Is 7, but is inconsistent with 2 K 16<sup>9</sup>, Is 7<sup>1-4</sup>.

17. 2 Ch 28<sup>10ff</sup> makes Ahaz send to the king(s) of Assyria for aid against the Edomites and Philistines; but 2 K 16<sup>7</sup> expressly says that it was against the kings of Aram and Israel.

18. 2 Ch 28<sup>20, 21</sup> says that 'Tilgath-pileser king of Assyria came unto him, and distressed him, but strengthened him not,' and again: 'he helped him not.' With this 2 K 16<sup>9</sup> is in contradiction.

19. 2 Ch 33<sup>1-19</sup> represents Manasseh as humbled and changed in heart by captivity, and as a reformer in the latter part of his reign. 2 K 21 knows nothing of this, paints him in colours wholly dark, and makes the fall of Jerus. a punishment specifically for Manasseh's sins (cf. also Jer 15<sup>4</sup>).

20. 2 Ch 34 represents Josiah's reforms as accomplished in his 12th year (v.3), and the law-book as discovered in his 18th year. 2 K 22, 23 represent the reforms as suggested and occasioned by the discovery of the law-book, and as occurring, like that discovery, in the 18th year of his reign.

E. One peculiarity of Ch, which involves some discrepancies with the earlier books, is a fondness for large numbers, e.g. 1 Ch 18<sup>4</sup> 19<sup>18</sup> make David capture 7000 horsemen and slay 7000 chariotmen, over against 700 of each in 2 S 8<sup>4</sup> 10<sup>18</sup>; according to 1 Ch 21<sup>25</sup> David pays 600 shekels of gold for Ornan's threshing-floor, according to 2 S 24<sup>24</sup> only 50 shekels of silver; 2½ tribes, according to 1 Ch 5<sup>21</sup>, capture from the Hagrites 100,000 prisoners, 50,000 camels, 250,000 sheep, and 2000 asses; 1 Ch 12 represents that 330,000 men came to make David king; 1 Ch 22<sup>14</sup> says that David provided for the temple building 100,000 talents of gold (=4,911,000 kilograms), and 1,000,000 talents of silver (=at least 33,660,000 kgs.); Shishak (2 Ch 23) came with 1200 chariots, 60,000 horsemen, and people without number; 2 Ch 13<sup>17</sup> makes Abijah, with 400,000 men, fight against Jeroboam with 800,000, and kill 500,000 of them; Asa (2 Ch 14<sup>9</sup>) had 300,000 men of Judah and 280,000 of Benjamin; Zerah the Ethiopian, his opponent, had 1,000,000 men and 300 chariots (2 Ch 14<sup>9</sup>); Amaziah (2 Ch 25<sup>6</sup>) had 300,000 soldiers of his own, and hired 100,000 more from Israel; Azariah (2 Ch 26<sup>13</sup>) had an army of 307,500 men; Pekah (2 Ch 28<sup>6</sup>) killed 120,000 Judean warriors in one day, and carried off 200,000 captives.

F. The combination of these various peculiarities of the author gives a very different aspect to the history from that found in the earlier books. The pre-royal time has only a genealogical interest for him. The beginning of the kingdom, the first reign, the attempts of Saul's dynasty to maintain itself, are no concern of his. Practically, David is his first king. David and Solomon are kings of almost spotless excellence, and enjoy undisturbed prosperity. The ceremonial law of the Priests' Code is recognised and observed by David, even before there is a temple. The service is stately and rich. After the division of the kingdom the ten tribes are not of importance enough to be mentioned, except incidentally. Interest is concentrated on Judah and Jerusalem. All good Judean kings, trained in the law of one exclusive sanctuary, of course forbade the high places. Sins, when they do occur, are sternly punished by God, and public calamities are due to sins. Huge numbers give majesty and importance to many scenes, and to the kingdom in its continuous history, and central in that history is the hand of God, His temple, His solemn ordinances, His ceremonial and impressive worship.

SOURCES.—I. For 1 Ch 1-9 the sources are apparently genealogical lists in Gn, Ex, Nu, Jos, and (occasionally) S,—the relation between Ru 4<sup>19ff</sup> and 1 Ch 2<sup>2ff</sup> is doubtful,—also other lists not found in the earlier canonical books. The latter is the case particularly in the latter half of 1 Ch 2, and in chs. 4, 6 and the middle of 7 (see esp. Wellh. De gentibus, and Kittel). Only twice in these chapters is there reference to an earlier writing; the first is in 1 Ch 5<sup>17</sup>, but whether this writing (or these writings, v. infra. II. 13) really served the Chronicler as a source is extremely doubtful (Kuenen, Und. 2 i. 483); the second is in 1 Ch 9<sup>1</sup> (see below).

The Psalm 1 Ch 16<sup>38-38</sup> is made up of parts of three Psalms found in our Psalter (see PARALLELS, above).

The question as to the origin of 2 Ch 36<sup>22-23</sup> (Restoration-decree of Cyrus)=Ezr 1<sup>1-3a</sup>, belongs rather to a discussion of Ezra-Nehemiah.

Ch's own references to earlier writings (with the exceptions noted above) are in the main part of the book, 1 Ch 10<sup>1-2</sup> Ch 36<sup>21</sup>.

II. Ch refers by name to the following works:—

2. The Book of the Kings of Israel, 1 Ch 9<sup>1</sup> (so Bertheau, Keil, Oettli, Kautzsch, RV; cf. Kuenen doubtfully. AV adds 'and Judah,' which otherwise is subj. of following vb.).

3. The Doings of the Kings of Israel (2 Ch 33<sup>18</sup> (for Manasseh)).

4. The Midrash of the Book of Kings, 2 Ch 24<sup>27</sup> (for Joash).

5. The Vision of Isaiah the Prophet, son of Amoz, in the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel, 2 Ch 32<sup>22</sup>.

6. The Words of Jehu, son of Hanani, which are taken up into the Book of the Kings of Israel, 1 Ch 20<sup>24</sup> (for Jehoshaphat).

The following were probably of limited compass:—

7. The Words of Samuel the Seer, and the Words of Nathan the Prophet, and the Words of Gad the Seer, 1 Ch 29<sup>29</sup>.

8. The Words of Nathan the Prophet, and the Prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite, and the Vision of Iddo the Seer regarding Jeroboam, son of Nebat, 2 Ch 9<sup>29</sup>.

9. The Words of Shemaiah the Prophet and of Iddo the Seer for reckoning by Genealogies, 2 Ch 12<sup>15</sup>.

10. The Midrash of the Prophet Iddo, 2 Ch 13<sup>22</sup>.

11. The rest of the Doings of Uzziah, first and last, did Isaiah the Prophet, son of Amoz, write, 2 Ch 26<sup>22</sup>.

12. The Words of the Seers, 2 Ch 33<sup>19</sup> (cf. v. 18; so cf. Bertheau, Kautzsch; cf. Hozaï, E, Oettli, RV).

The author refers also to—

13. A genealogical enrolment in the days of Jotham and in the days of Jeroboam [II.], 1 Ch 5<sup>17</sup> (since these kings were not contemporary, are two lists referred to?).

14. The Later Doings of David, 1 Ch 23<sup>27</sup>.
15. The Chronicles (תְּכֵנִים) of king David, 1 Ch 27<sup>24</sup>.

16. The Lamentations (a collection in which the lamentations over Josiah were included), 2 Ch 35<sup>25</sup>.

But these are not all separate works. 1 (α) and (b) and 5 refer obviously to the same; so probably do 2, 3, and 6; for although 'Judah' is not mentioned in the title (except possibly in the case of 2), 3 and 6 relate to kings of Judah, and the title is therefore presumably abbreviated. It is highly likely that 4 is another designation of the same work. The prophetic writings 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12 are possibly, though not demonstrably, sections of the same comprehensive book. If not, they are in any case of subordinate consequence. As to 13-16 it is not clear that these have actually contributed anything to Ch; 16 certainly has not.

It is true that the Chronicler explicitly appeals to none of the documents named as authorities for what he states, but only as repositories of (further) information. Nevertheless, it is probable that the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel, cited under different names, is the main source of Ch. The many agreements with S and K prove that Ch used either these books or some work based on these. There is no evidence that it used the sources of S and K; these books must themselves have been known to the author, for they had long been in existence in his time, and the order and choice of material follow theirs to a large extent; moreover, the matter which is peculiar to Ch shows the marked characteristics of the author's style, in sharp contrast with those of the matter corresponding to that of Samuel and Kings; in particular, the following additional proofs show that Ch does not go behind them for its materials:—

Other passages common to Kings and Ch, which must be original with Kings (several of them Deuteronomic, and none from the sources) are 2 Ch 10<sup>19</sup>=1 K 12<sup>19</sup>, 2 Ch 21<sup>7</sup>, 8, 10ab=2 K 8<sup>19</sup>, 20, 22, 2 Ch 25<sup>3-4</sup>=2 K 14<sup>5-6</sup> (verbally), 2 Ch 28<sup>4</sup>=2 K 16<sup>4</sup> (verbally), 2 Ch 31<sup>1</sup> based on 2 K 18<sup>4</sup>; cf. also 2 Ch 32<sup>12</sup>=2 K 18<sup>23</sup> (substantially), 2 Ch 33<sup>3a</sup>=2 K 21<sup>a</sup> (verbally).

A special class of passages consists of those which are appropriate in Sam. and Kings, but have become unfitting or meaningless because of omissions by Ch:—

1 Ch 20<sup>1</sup> 'But David tarried at Jerus.' = 2 S 11<sup>1</sup>; it is in conflict with 1 Ch 20<sup>2, 3</sup>; this is due to the omission of the story of Uriah and Bathsheba 2 S 11<sup>2-12</sup>, and of 12<sup>28, 29</sup> which tell of Joab's summoning David.

2 Ch 8<sup>11</sup> (=1 K 9<sup>24</sup> 31<sup>b</sup> in part) mentions the daughter of Pharaoh incidentally (not indeed with great respect) as Solomon's wife, although 1 K 3<sup>15-7</sup> are omitted.

2 Ch 10<sup>3</sup> speaks of Jeroboam's return from Egypt, 'whither he had fled from the presence of Solomon the king' = 1 K 12<sup>3</sup>, although 1 K 11<sup>26-40</sup> are omitted.

2 Ch 10<sup>15</sup> refers specifically to Ahijah's prophecy about Jeroboam = 1 K 12<sup>15</sup>, although the prophecy itself, 1 K 11<sup>29-39</sup>, is omitted.

2 Ch 32<sup>18</sup> specifies 'the Jews' speech' = 2 K 18<sup>28</sup>, although 2 K 18<sup>28</sup>, which gives point to this detail, is omitted.

Some of these passages are more cogent than others, but all are confirmatory of the position that our S and K and nothing earlier (with possible exceptions noted below) underlie Ch in its narrative portions.

It is, however, improb. that the Chronicler used these canonical books directly, as the chief source of his historical material. We have seen that his main interests are not political, and that he omits or greatly condenses many matters which do not contribute much to his purposes. At the same time some of his material not found in S and K is of a political and personal nature, e.g. the fortifications of Rehoboam, and his might and wisdom 2 Ch 11<sup>8-12</sup>, 17, 23, Asa's war with the Ethiopians 2 Ch 14<sup>9-15</sup>, Jehoshaphat's war with Moab, Ammon, and Edom 2 Ch 20, Amaziah's relations with his Israelitish mercenaries 2 Ch 25<sup>6-10</sup>, 13, Uzziah's wars and buildings 2 Ch 26<sup>6-15</sup>, the successful invasion of Pekah 2 Ch 28<sup>5-16</sup>, and of the Edomites and Philistines vv. 17, 19. Some of these narratives the Chronicler uses to point his own moral teachings, but it is most unlikely that he either invented them, or resorted to some special source for them; they are not such as particularly appeal to him. Most likely, therefore, he found them in the document which was his main source for other matter, and, finding them, used them to enforce his religious views. This source was probably the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel (see above), which was, in that case, based on our S and K, with additional matter of uncertain and probably varying value. Since the style of these additions (with a few minor exceptions) resembles that of the Chronicler, it may be that this Book of the Kings was produced in the school to which he belonged. The alternative is to suppose that he rewrote them. That he at least retouched them is probable. How far the peculiar religious and ecclesiastical tone of Ch is due to this source we cannot tell, but the presence of the same in Ezer-Neh., which do not depend on this Book of the Kings, makes it clear that this tone was such as the Chronicler himself would produce, and probably it is, throughout, mainly due to him.

HISTORICAL TRUSTWORTHINESS.—The late date of Ch presumably hinders it from being a historical witness of the first order. It could be so only if its sources were demonstrably such. But it has no sources certainly older than the canonical S and K; its chief source is probably much later. An interval of 250 or 300 years separates it from the last events recorded in K. In all cases of conflict, then (see the examples above), preference must be given to S and K. The obvious special interests of Ch also (see above) are not to its advantage as a simple witness to facts. Intrinsic probability points the same way in many instances (see especially Comparison D, Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 13, 16, 20, and Driver, Bertheau, Oettli, etc., on the passages); this holds true of the huge numbers of Ch as well.

If this is so in the parallel narratives, it must be so likewise in those matters which we owe entirely to Ch. Some of these conflict with the known course of the history, e.g. the complete Levitical arrangements of David and his successors; others are in themselves most unlikely, e.g. Amaziah's dealings with Israelitish mercenaries. It is plain that the character of Ch's testimony, when we can control it by parallel accounts, is not such as to give us reason to depend on it with security when it stands alone. Perhaps it does not enlarge our stock of historical matter beyond that given in S and K. We cannot say absolutely that it does not; e.g. Rehoboam's buildings, Uzziah's buildings and wars, Hezekiah's water-works, Manasseh's captivity, etc., may be in part, or altogether, stated accurately, and to some of them a certain degree of probability attaches (cf. Kittel), but on the unsupported evidence of Ch we cannot be sure of them. It is not certain whether his source derived them from other documents or from tradition, and we cannot tell with positiveness how far they are trustworthy. This uncertainty passes over into Ch itself. Its main value lies in another direction. (On the Restoration-edict of Cyrus, see Koster, Het Herstel van Israel, 1894, and art. EZRA AND NEHEMIAH.)

CHARACTER OF THE CHRONICLER.—It would be most unjust to call the Chronicler a falsifier. He shows himself, on the contrary, as a man of great sincerity and moral earnestness. Even if falsification had, in his time, when his conception of the history was widely accepted, had any sufficient motive, he would have been incapable of it. His view of the past is that of a son of his own age, in whom the historical imagination had not been largely developed. The Pent. had long been complete, and its latest code had a firm grasp on the lives and the minds of the people, and on his own. He did not conceive of a time, since the kingdom began, when it was otherwise. He was almost certainly a Levite, and probably a musician. He was trained in the law, and knew its religious power. God was near His people in it, God Himself enforced it. Membership in God's people was to him a great privilege, and genealogies that assured it, of great importance. These habits and convictions, the result of inheritance and of training, determined his mode of writing history. David and Solomon he idealised, presenting strongly and without much qualification those sides of their character which appealed to him, and depicting the religion of their time according to what seemed to him the necessary conditions of righteousness. The Northern Kingdom, as apostate, was of little interest for him. The history of the Southern Kingdom was his concern mainly because it was ecclesiastical history—'Ecclesiastical Chronicle of Jerusalem' Renss has called it (cf. Literature below). God was watching and judging it on the basis of His complete law; it fell at last because 'all the chief of the priests, and the people, transgressed very much after all the abominations of the heathen; and polluted the house of J', and when they were rebuked 'mocked the messengers of God, and despised His words, and misused His prophets' (2 Ch 36<sup>14-16</sup>). The whole conception of the history was not that of a mere individual, but that of an age, from which the individual could not separate himself.

VALUE OF CHRONICLES.—It follows from the foregoing paragraphs that the value of Chronicles is not mainly that of an accurate record of past events. Nevertheless, its value is real and great. It is, however, the value more of a sermon than of a history.

1. We must, indeed, remember that there is a certain negative historical value in the fact that Ch agrees with S and K to so large an extent. It is not an independent witness, but at least it appears that as to the main course of the pre-exilic history there was, when Ch was written, no variant tradition which the author thought worth noticing.

2. We must remember, further, that there may be good historical material in matter peculiar to Ch, e.g., in the genealogical lists and some scattered incidents (see Kuenen, Kittel, Gray), although the determination of its limits and the interpretation of it will require critical acumen.

3. The knowledge the author gives us of his own time, also, is historically important. The fact that he clothes old history with his own contemporary habits makes his own time more intelligible to us. We understand better how religious Jews thought and felt in the 3rd cent. B.C. This enlivens and vitalizes the period for us, and prepares us better to appreciate the conditions of the work of Jesus and His disciples.

4. The author's selection of matter emphasizes the fundamental and permanent elements in the history. He gives only a one-sided view of David, and yet he thereby throws stress on David's real, though, as we know, not unwavering desire for righteousness. He thinks chiefly of the Southern Kingdom, but that kingdom is the one of historical importance in the development of religion. And so with other details. In this, as in the particulars following, he served his own age, and the service continues to ours.

5. His belief in God was intense, as one actively governing the world, punishing the evil and rewarding the good, demanding obedience and worship, but long-suffering and gracious to His people in spite of their sin. There is at times something mechanical in his conception, but it is strong and effective.

6. He illustrates for us the value and the limitations of the law in spiritual education. Obedience to its smallest requirements was an avenue to God. Formalism, the subordination of the moral to the ceremonial, is the accompanying danger, and the Chronicler did not wholly escape it. But the law really was a means of spiritual growth, and this the Chronicler exemplifies. Devotion to it did not exclude some breadth of spiritual sympathy, as the beautiful passage 2 Ch 30<sup>18, 19</sup> distinctly shows.

7. He bears witness, also, to the value of the liturgical element in religion. Worship is to him a rich and stately thing. The art of music has its contribution to make. The most thorough preparation, and splendid execution, befit the service in which men approach the Almighty God. This thought, too, has its dangers. The essence of worship is always in the soul of the worshipper. But the ideal of worship includes both the genuine spirit and the fitting expression of it, and the Chronicler teaches here a permanent lesson.

Thus Ch illustrates for us God's use of a professedly historical writing to enforce His truth, both in spite of, and by means of, the very qualities which impair its excellence as pure history.

TEXT.—Ch appears to have been less read, and hence less often copied, than many other books. One source of textual error is therefore minimised. The history of its transmission is, however, long enough to give much room to textual criticism. The text of Ch can often be corrected, in parallel passages, by that of S and K, but more often the author is himself responsible for variations. The peculiar characteristics of Ch are certainly not textual. Sometimes Ch has preserved the better reading. The greatest number of textual questions is connected with proper names. The following, taken from parallel texts, may serve as illustrations:—

Ch has the worse reading:—

1 Ch 1<sup>6</sup> כְּרִי, EB Ερεφαθ, A Ριφας, GL Ριφαθ=כְּרִי Gn 10<sup>2</sup>, so G.

117 חֲפִיז, EB om., A GL Μοσοχ;=חֲפִיז Gn 10<sup>23</sup> (where G also Μοσοχ, but erroneously; חֲפִיז has already occurred, v.<sup>2</sup>).

139 אֲרִי, EB Αριαν, GL Ημαν=אֲרִי Gn 36<sup>23</sup>, GL Αριαν (interchange of א and א especially frequent).

140 יִלְיָ, EB Σωλαμ, A Ιωλαμ, GL Αλουαν=יִלְיָ Gn 36<sup>23</sup>, G Γωλων, GL Γωλαμ.

141 יִרְדִּי, EB Εμερων, A GL Αμαδα(μ)=יִרְדִּי Gn 36<sup>26</sup>, G Αμαδα.

151 כֶּתִיד, EB Κεθιδ, GL Γωλα, GL Αλουαν=כֶּתִיד Gn 36<sup>40</sup>, G Γωλα.

1 Ch 3<sup>6</sup> עֶשְׂרִי אֵלֶּם, CB Ελεισα, A GL Ελισαμα = עֶשְׂרִי אֵלֶּם
2 S 5<sup>15</sup>, CB Ελεισους, etc.

= Nu 26<sup>12</sup>, so CB in all.

18<sup>3, 5, 7</sup> יָרֵיב, CB Αδρα(α)ζαρ = יָרֵיב; 2 S 8<sup>3, 5, 8</sup> (CB here also, erron., Αδρααζαρ),

CHRONOLOGY OF THE OT.—The OT contains data from which a chronology may be compiled from the creation of the world to the destruction of Jerus. by the Chaldeans. For convenience, this chronology may be considered under several periods.

i. FROM THE CREATION TO THE FLOOD.—The data for this period, which are found in the genealogical table of Gn 5 and the notice of the year of the Flood in Gn 7<sup>6</sup>, are given differently in the Heb.
text, the Sam., and the LXX. These differences are exhibited in the following table:—

	Age of each when next was born or event occurred.
	Heb.	Sam.	LXX
Adam . . . . .	130	130	230
Seth . . . . .	105	105	205
Enosh . . . . .	90	90	190
Kenan . . . . .	70	70	170
Mahalalel . . . . .	65	65	165
Jared . . . . .	162	62	162
Enoch . . . . .	65	65	165
Methuselah . . . . .	187	67	167
Lamech . . . . .	182	53	188
Noah . . . . .	600	600	600
Years from Creation to the Flood	1656	1307	2242

Thus we have three different lengths assigned for the period from the creation of man to the Flood. The numbers of the Heb. text have generally been regarded as the original, although recently those of the Sam. have been defended by Dillmann and Budde. The LXX text, however, was accepted by the Hel. Jews and the early Christian Church, and has found defenders among certain Eng. scholars (Hales, Jackson, Poole, Rawlinson, and others), who have looked upon it with favour as furnishing a chronology more in accord with the antiquity of man than that of the Heb. text. But these numbers, whichever table may be regarded as the original, cannot, in any case, be accepted as historical, and hence for a real chronology of the early ages of man they are valueless. To accept them as genuine records is to assume from the creation of man a degree of civilisation high enough to provide a settled calendar, and a regular registration of births and deaths, and the preservation of such records from the creation of man to the time of the composition of Gn. All that is known of primitive antiquity is against such a supposition. The art of writing was not then known; and however tenacious may have been the memory of man, it is doubtful whether language then possessed the requisite terminology for the expression of such lapses of time. Man also has been upon the earth for a far longer period than that given even by the LXX chronology. The conjectural character of the table of Gn 5 may be also recognised from the variations of the three texts. Such liberties would probably not have been taken with figures supposed to rest upon authentic historical documents. The sacred writer chose the form of a genealogical table to represent the early period of the world's history.
The number of the patriarchs, ten, is a common one in the lists of the prehistoric rulers or heroes of many peoples. It appears at once to be a suggestion from the ten fingers. The length assigned for the period from the Creation to the Flood is more difficult of explanation. Accepting that of the Heb. text, the most probable explanation is seen in connecting the 1656 years with the subsequent data given for the period between the Flood and the Exodus, which together make 2666, or two-thirds of 4000 years. Four thousand years, according to a Jewish tradition, were to elapse from the creation of the world to the coming of the Messiah. Two-thirds of that period, then, would have passed at the Exodus, or the giving of the law and founding of the Jewish Theocracy at Mount Sinai.

ii. FROM THE FLOOD TO THE EXODUS.—For the period from the Flood to the birth of Abraham, we have a genealogical table in Gn 11<sup>10-26</sup> similar to that of Gn 5, and likewise given differently in the three ancient texts. In this instance, however, the Sam. and LXX VSS are almost identical, both giving a much longer period than the Heb. text. The LXX also has an extra name, Cainan, wanting in both the Heb. and Sam. texts, giving 130 additional years; and the years of Nahor at the birth of Terah in the LXX are 179, while in the Sam. 79. The variations are shown in the following table:—

	Age of each when next was born or event occurred.
	Heb.	Sam.	LXX
Shem . . . . .	100	100	100
Arpachshad . . . . .	35	135	135
Cainan . . . . .	...	...	130
Shelah . . . . .	30	130	130
Eber . . . . .	34	134	134
Peleg . . . . .	30	130	130
Rca . . . . .	32	132	132
Serug . . . . .	30	130	130
Nahor . . . . .	29	79	179
Terah . . . . .	70	70	70
Abraham . . . . .	...	...	...
Yrs. of Shem's life bef. the Flood	300	1040	1270
From Flood to birth of Abraham	*100	100	100
	230	940	1170

Of these three texts the Heb. is undoubtedly the original. The LXX and Sam. show an endeavour to gain more time by systematically heightening the birth year of the patriarchs. The extra name of the LXX probably arose from a desire to make the number of the patriarchs ten (perhaps they were so originally), and thus bring the table more into conformity with that of Gn 5. The LXX text has been preferred by Hales, Jackson, Poole, and others as providing a more adequate time than the Heb. text for the growth of the nations of antiquity. But the LXX period is too short. It places the Flood at about 3000 B.C. But Egyptian remains point to a civilisation whose beginnings were not later than 5000 years B.C., and very likely millenniums earlier (Maspero says 8000 or 10,000 years B.C.), and Assyr. discoveries have revealed an historic period extending to as early a date. This table came evidently from the same source as that of Gn 5, and is of the same artificial character, except that in some of the patriarchal names are reminiscences of peoples and places.

The data for the period from the birth of Abraham to the Exodus are given in the notice of the age of Abraham at the birth of Isaac (Gn 21<sup>5</sup>), and of Isaac at the birth of Jacob (Gn 25<sup>26</sup>), and of Jacob at his descent into Egypt (Gn 47<sup>9</sup>), and of the length of the sojourn of the children of Israel in Egypt (Ex. 12<sup>40</sup>). In this last passage the LXX and Sam. texts make the sojourning of the children of Israel to include also the sojourning of the patriarchs in the land of Canaan. From these data we present the following table with a summary of the preceding tables, with also the reference to the age of Abraham at his call from Haran (Gen. 12<sup>4</sup>):—

Age of Abraham on leaving Haran . . . . .	75	75
Age of Abraham at the birth of Isaac . . . . .	100	25
Age of Isaac at the birth of Jacob . . . . .	60	60
Age of Jacob at the descent into Egypt . . . . .	130	130
Years of the patriarchal sojourn in Canaan . . . . .	215	...
Years of the patriarchal sojourn in Egypt . . . . .	430	430
Years of the sojourn in Egypt according to LXX . . . . .	215	...
From the birth of Abraham to the Exodus . . . . .	...	720
From the Flood to birth of Abraham . . . . .	...	290
From the Creation to the Flood . . . . .	...	1656
From the Creation to the Exodus . . . . .	...	2666

How nearly these numbers represent the actual duration of the beginnings of the people of Israel, and of their sojourn in Egypt, cannot now be determined. They are evidently from the same original source as the previous tables, and there is no reason to suppose that authentic historical records underlie them.* Some early list. reminiscences, however, may be preserved in them. The number 400 for the years of the oppression in Egypt appears in Gn 15<sup>13</sup>, which belongs to one of the earliest sources of the Hexateuch.

The Period of the Sojourn in Egypt.—The descent of the children of Israel into Egypt, according to the story of Joseph, took place when a Sem. foreigner might be received at the Egyp. court with favour, and his people readily granted possessions in the land. The reign of the Hyksos or Shepherd-kings meets this condition, and the descent of the children of Israel at that time is both an ancient tradition and the view generally accepted by biblical scholars. The period of the Hyksos rule, owing to the obscurity and uncertainty of Egyp. chronology, cannot be very definitely determined. It lasted several centuries, and terminated not later than 1550 B.C.† A famine is recorded as occurring during the reign of Aphophis or Apepi, one of the last of the Hyksos rulers; and this monarch may have been the Pharaoh of Joseph. He is so mentioned by George Syncellus, a historian of the 9th cent. A.D.; and the supposition is received with favour by Sayce, Brugsch, Kittel, and others. It is, however, only a supposition.

The Pharaoh of the oppression, under whom the children of Israel built the treasure cities Pithom and Ramises (Ex 1<sup>11</sup>), was Ramses II. This fact, long conjectured, has been definitely settled by Naville's identification of Pithom, and discovery that it was built by Ramses II. The Exodus has usually been assigned (by Brugsch, Ebers, Rawlinson, Sayce, and others) to the reign of Menephtah (Merenptah) or Seti II., the immediate successors of Ramses II. Since, however, both of these kings were no mean sovereigns, and apparently controlled both Pal. and the Sin. Peninsula, it may be better (with Kittel, Maspero, Wiedemann, and others) to assign * More exactly, according to the statement of Gn 11<sup>10</sup> that Arpachshad was born 'two years after the Flood,' the years of Shem's life before the Flood are 98 years. But the 'two years after the Flood' is probably a gloss inserted by some one who, overlooking the round and systematic character of the data of the lives of the patriarchs, desired to make the birth of Arpachshad correspond exactly to the detailed statements of the duration of the Flood (Gn 7<sup>6</sup> 8<sup>13, 14</sup>).

† This is the date given by Ed. Meyer as the latest possible, and is thus accepted by Wendel and Erman. Other dates given for the close of this period or the beginning of the New Empire are Wiedemann, 1750; Brugsch, 1706; Mariette, 1703; Rawlinson 1640; Lepsius, 1591.

the Exodus to the period of royal weakness and general anarchy following their reigns at the close of the 19th dynasty (not later, according to Meyer, than 1180 B.C.; according to Rawlinson and others, about a cent. earlier). McCurdy (Hist., Proph., and the Mon.) places the Exodus in the 20th dynasty, in the latter part of the reign of Ramses III., or immediately after his reign. He does not think the Egypt. control in the Sin. Peninsula or in Pal. to have been sufficiently relaxed at an earlier period for either the Exodus or the conquest of Pal. to have been possible. He gives the date about 1200 B.C. The children of Israel, however, during the reign of Ramses III. (1180-1148) may have been wandering in the desert and taking possession of the country E. of the Jordan. This would allow about 50 years from their departure from Egypt to their entrance into W. Pal., corresponding roughly with the biblical 40 years. This much at least seems certain, that Pal. was for many centuries an Egypt. province, and that the conquests under Joshua cannot well have begun until the close of the 19th dynasty, and probably the close of the reign of Ramses III. The view of some writers (F. C. Cook, Conder, Köhler, Sharpe, and others), who have assigned the Exodus to earlier periods, is refuted by Naville's discovery of Pithou, built by Ramses II.; by the Tel el-Amarna tablets, which show that Pal. was thoroughly an Egypt. province during the 18th dynasty; and by the fact of the control exercised by Seti I. and Ramses II. over Pal. within the 19th dynasty.*

iii. FROM THE EXODUS TO THE FOUNDING OF THE TEMPLE.—The founding of Solomon's temple is said in 1 K 6<sup>1</sup> to have taken place in the 480th year after the Exodus (according to the LXX, in the 440th year). Such an exact statement, if historical, requires that an accurate system of reckoning time was employed by the children of Israel during all those years. A provision for this has been seen in the yearly Heb. festivals, and especially in the Sabbatical and Jubilee years. If this, however, was the case, it is strange that we do not find traces of such a mode of reckoning in the OT. While there are allusions to the recurrence of feasts as indicating a year's time, there is nothing to indicate festivals or Sabbatical or Jubilee years as being regarded as the units or termini of any calendar. The only method apparent is by the years of the monarch of the land. Before the royal period we have no evidence of any system of reckoning dates, and it is probable that during the period from the Exodus to the founding of the temple, Sabbatical years and years of Jubilee were not observed. The number 480 appears, like the numbers of the Pent., to be conjectural, arising from the supposition that from the Exodus to the founding of the temple there were 12 generations of 40 years each. This period, however, is too long. The interval from the Exodus to the founding of the temple is probably nearer 300 than 500 years. The Exodus we have seen can in no case be placed earlier than after the reign of Ramses II., and the building of the temple occurred not later than the middle of the 10th cent. B.C. Reliable chron. data for computing the exact length of this period we may well believe were not preserved. The disorganised condition of affairs during the period of the judges, when there was no central authority, is against the supposition of the use of a settled calendar and the official registration of events. The chron.

data of the Book of Judges appear also to be somewhat artificial. They are as follows:—

Israel serves Cushan-rishathaim (3 <sup>8</sup> )	8 years
Deliverance by Othniel: the land rests (311)	40 "
Israel serves Eglon (314)	18 "
Deliverance by Ehud: the land rests (319)	80 "
Oppression by Jabin (43)	20 "
Deliverance by Deborah: the land rests (531)	40 "
Oppression by Midian (61)	7 "
Deliverance by Gideon: the land rests (838)	40 "
Abimelech reigns over Israel (912)	3 "
Tola judges Israel (103)	23 "
Jair judges Israel (103)	22 "
Oppression by Ammon (108)	18 "
Jephthah judges Israel (127)	6 "
Ibzan judges Israel (129)	7 "
Elon judges Israel (1211)	10 "
Abdon judges Israel (1214)	8 "
Oppression by the Philistines (131)	40 "
Samson judges Israel (1529 1631)	20 "
Total	410 years

To these years must be added—

The sojourn in the Wilderness	40 years
The conquest under Joshua	X "
The judgeship of Eli (1 S 418)	40 "
The judgeship of Samuel	20 "
The reign of Saul	y "
The reign of David (1 K 211)	40 "
Of the reign of Solomon (1 K 61)	4 "
Total	144 + x + y years.

According to these figures the entire period is over 550 years, and the repeated occurrence of 40 or its multiple shows that some of the numbers are round, and probably conjectural.

Some of the judgeships recorded in the Book of Judges may have been local and contemporaneous with others. In that case no chronology can be computed from these statements. In all likelihood, however, the numbers were designed to represent 480 years,—the years of oppression, like those of a usurper, as is customary in Oriental reckonings, being not counted, their interval being included in the years of rest belonging to a lawful ruler. Arranged on this principle we have the following result:—

Moses	40 years.
Joshua and the Elders	X "
Othniel	40 "
Ehud	80 "
Barak	40 "
Gideon	40 "
Tola, Jair, Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon	76 "
Samson	20 "
Eli	40 "
Samuel	20 "
Saul	y "
David	40 "
	440 + x + y years.

If 30 years (cf. Jos. 24<sup>29</sup>) are given to Joshua and the elders, and 10 years to Saul, we have exactly 480 years.†

iv. FROM THE FOUNDING OF THE TEMPLE TO THE FALL OF JERUSALEM.—This era is marked by an advance in culture among the Hebrews, and in the office of royal recorders or scribes provision seems to have been made for the regular registration of important events. These events were probably dated by the years of reigning monarchs. At least we find this system in 1 and 2 K, Jer, and Ezk. A provision, however, for the keeping of exact chron. records does not necessarily imply their preservation, and the Books of Kings, our biblical source for the chronology of this period, were not written until its close, several

* The assignment of 20 years to Samuel is an inference from 1 S 72. The period of Israel's desire for the Lord is regarded as representing Samuel's judgeship, and ceasing when the people desired and chose a king.

† The above scheme is Noldeke's. Moore (Judges, p. xlii.) omits Saul as being to a Judæan writer an illegitimate sovereign, and assigns, after LXX, 20 years to Eli, and conjectures 40 years each for Joshua and Samuel.

* Since the above article was in type, the new inscription of King Merneptah mentioning the people of Israel has been discovered. This may call for a revision of the opinion expressed above in regard to the date of the Exodus, and may require its assignment to an earlier period. See EGYPT, Exodus (Route).

centuries after the earlier events narrated. The writer of these books, it is true, refers constantly to 'the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah,' and 'to the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel,' as sources of his information. But it is not known whether he had access to original royal records or only to two historical works based in some way upon them. Probably the latter, because (1) it is unlikely that the State records of the N. kingdom were preserved and brought to Jerus.; (2) the references are not to the chronicles or annals themselves, but to the book of the chronicles; and (3) it is difficult to account for the statements of the writer in reference to dates of accession and lengths of reigns, if he had access to original records.

1 and 2 K give a complete list of the monarchs of Judah and Israel, and the length of their reigns in years from Solomon to the fall of Samaria and of Jerusalem. The commencement of each reign is dated by the year of the reign of the contemporaneous king in the other kingdom. This mode of cross-reckoning is evidently that of the biblical writer, for it is scarcely possible that in either kingdom the year of the king of the other kingdom should be used to fix the date of its own king. An examination of the synchronisms leads to a similar conclusion. From the construction of the Heb. sentence in many instances the synchronisms appear to be an addition to a statement of the simple duration of a reign, and they seem in some instances to reveal an attempt at an adjustment of two unequal series of numbers. Rehoboam and Jeroboam came to the throne at the same time, also Athaliah and Jehu. The sums of the years of the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah between these two dates should be the same. That of Israel, however, as is seen in the following table, exceeds that of Judah by 3 years. (The 7 days of the reign of Zimri are omitted, for that week naturally was reckoned as belonging either to the reign of Elah or Omri.) :—

Rehoboam . . . . .	17	Jeroboam . . . . .	22
Abijam . . . . .	3	Nadab . . . . .	2
Asa . . . . .	41	Baasha . . . . .	24
Jehoshaphat . . . . .	25	Elah . . . . .	2
Joram . . . . .	8	Omri . . . . .	12
Ahaziah . . . . .	1	Ahab . . . . .	22
		Ahaziah . . . . .	2
		Joram . . . . .	12

Since the lengths of the reigns are expressed in even years, and since actual reigns must have embraced fractions of a year, it is apparent that these years are calendar years. The question now arises whether the calendar year in which a king died was reckoned as his own last year and the 1st year of his successor, or whether the 1st year of his successor began with the following new year. The former method of pre-dating introduces the confusion of a calendar year being reckoned as belonging to two reigns; and yet it is in accordance with the Heb. usage, which reckoned fractions of time as full units. For example, the siege of Samaria, which began in the 4th and ended in the 6th year of Hezekiah, is said to have lasted 3 years (2 K 18<sup>30</sup>). There is also the familiar example of 'the 3 days' of Christ's being in the grave. The latter method of post-dating was the usual one of the Assyrians. With them the general practice was to count the regnal years from the new year's day after the accession, and to call the period between the accession and the 1st new year's day 'the beginning of the reign'; while the year from the new year's day was called 'the 1st year,' and the following ones were numbered successively from it. Which of these methods was systematically used by the Hebrews cannot now be decisively determined. Possibly, neither of them consistently or entirely. The Talm. testifies apparently to the method of pre-dating (Wieseler, Chron. Synopsis, p. 47), and this has often been assumed as the Heb. method. Jer. and Ezk., however, post-dated, and many scholars (Dillmann, Stade, Wellhausen, and others) believe this to have been the Heb. method. The writer or compiler of 1 and 2 K, as will be seen from the following table of synchronisms, used both methods :—

Rehoboam . . . . .	1	1	Jeroboam.	17
In 18th of Jeroboam (1 K 15 <sup>1</sup> ), Abijam . . . . .	1	18		19
In 20th of Jeroboam (1 K 15 <sup>2</sup> ), Asa . . . . .	(1) 3	20		21
	2	21		22
	8	22	1. Nadab in 2nd of Asa (1 K 15 <sup>29</sup> ).
	26	24	1. 2. Baasha in 3rd of Asa (1 K 15 <sup>28, 30</sup> ).
	27	24	1. Elah in 26th of Asa (1 K 16 <sup>8</sup> ).
		27	2. Zimri in 27th of Asa (1 K 16 <sup>10</sup> ).
		1	Omri in 27th of Asa (1 K 16 <sup>10f</sup> ).
	38	12	1. Ahab in 38th of Asa (1 K 16 <sup>29</sup> ).
In 4th of Ahab (1 K 22 <sup>41</sup> ), Jehoshaphat . . . . .	(1) 41	4
	17	21	1. Ahaziah in 17th of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22 <sup>51</sup> ).
	18	1. 22	2. Joram in 18th of Jehoshaphat (2 K 3 <sup>1</sup> ).
In 5th of Joram (2 K 8 <sup>16</sup> ), Jehoram . . . . .	1. 22	5
	4. 25	8
In 12th of Joram (2 K 8 <sup>25</sup> ), Ahaziah . . . . .	S. 1	12

The method of post-dating is here applied to the reigns of the S. kingdom until the reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah, the former of whom is made co-regent with his father for four years. Asa and Jehoshaphat come to the throne in the years preceding their 1st years, while Abijam comes in his 1st year. Thus we have two methods of post-dating. The reigns of the N. kingdom are all pre-dated, and Ahaziah is made co-regent with Ahab for one year. Thus the total length of the reigns is shortened, and the interval from Solomon to Athaliah becomes 90 years.

In 1 K 16<sup>29</sup> Omri is said to have begun to reign in the 31st year of Asa, and in 2 K 17<sup>17</sup> Joram in the 2nd of Jehoram. Both of these statements are in general harmony with a scheme of post-dating the kings both of Israel and Judah. This fact, with the apparently systematic shortening of the intervals expressed by the reigns of the N. kingdom and then of the S. kingdom, to make them agree, suggests the possibility of the lengths of the reigns not being entirely derived from accurate historical sources, and yet representing a chronological scheme which the author did not feel free to modify.

Samaria fell, according to 2 K 18<sup>30</sup>, in 'the 6th year of Hezekiah, which was the 9th of Hoshea, king of Israel.' The durations of the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel from the accessions of Athaliah and Jehu to this year, then, should be the same. The figures recorded in 2 K, however, give quite a different result—

Athaliah . . . . .	6 years.	Jehu . . . . .	28 years.
Joash . . . . .	40 "	Jehonahaz . . . . .	17 "
Amaziah . . . . .	29 "	Joash . . . . .	16 "
Azariah . . . . .	52 "	Jeroboam . . . . .	41 "
Jotham . . . . .	16 "	Zachariah . . . . .	6 months.
Ahaz . . . . .	16 "	Shallum . . . . .	1 "
Hezekiah . . . . .	6 "	Menahem . . . . .	10 years.
		Pekahiah . . . . .	2 "
		Pekah . . . . .	20 "
		Hoshea . . . . .	9 "

Thus the years of the reigns of the southern kingdom exceed those of the northern kingdom by over 21 years.

The following table gives the biblical synchronisms of this period.* (The various statements have been adjusted to each other by allowing the variable factor of a co-regency, and reckoning the 1st year either from the commencement of the co-regency or of the sole reign):—

Athallah . . . . .	1	1 Jehu.
In 7th of Jehu (2 K 12 <sup>1</sup> )	6	6
Joash . . . . .	1	7
22	28
23	1	Jehonhaz in 23rd of Joash (2 K 13 <sup>1</sup> ).
37	15	(1) Jehoash in 37th of Joash (2 K 13 <sup>10</sup> ).
In 2nd of Jehoash (2 K 14 <sup>1</sup> ),
Amaziah . . . . .	(1) 38	16 (2)
	(2) 39	17 (3)
	(3) 40	4 (1)
	4	5 (2)
	(1) 6	7 (4)
(10) 15	16	(13) Jeroboam in 15th of Amaziah (2 K 14 <sup>23</sup> ).
In 27th of Jeroboam (2 K 15 <sup>1</sup> ), Azariah	(24) 29	27
33	41.	1. Zachariah in 38th of Azariah (2 K 15 <sup>24</sup> )
		2. Shallum in 39th of Azariah (2 K 15 <sup>13</sup> ).

The following tables (a) (b) (c) give dates for the accession of the kings of Judah, and (d) (e) (f) of the kings of Israel—(a) according to 1 and 2 Ch, in which the durations of the reigns are the same as those mentioned in 1 and 2 K, and are given without reference to the corresponding reigns of the N. kingdom, so that their sum would be naturally taken as the duration of the S. kingdom; (b) according to the tables of synchronisms given above; (c) according to a determination from the Assy. inscriptions. An asterisk indicates a co-regency; but see the following paragraphs. (d) corresponds to (a), and is adjusted to it by pre-dating the reigns of Nadab, Elah, and Ahaziah, and lengthening that of Jeroboam II. to 51 years, and Pekah's to 30. (e) and (f) correspond to (b) and (c). The explanation of (c) and (f) is given in the following paragraphs. (a) and (d) correspond essentially to Ussher's system of dates given in the margin of the AV. Of these tables only (b) and (e) represent approximately the course of history. The others are given merely for the sake of comparison.

* According to this table the number of years from the accessions of Athallah and Jehu to the fall of Samaria is 129. This table, with the one above of synchronisms, however, has not been given to present the course of history, but to give a bird's-eye view of the chronological statements of 1 and 2 K.

Our examination of the biblical statements shows from the variety of the modes of reckoning, and from the apparent inconsistencies of the synchronisms (unless an ever variable factor in co-regencies is assumed), that we must look to another source for determining the true chronology of this period. Such a source, in a limited degree, has been found in the Assy. inscriptions. These inscriptions are dated by the Assy. calendar or canon. In this canon, which exists in several copies, all of which closely agree, covering the period from about 900 B.C. to about 650 B.C., each year bears the name of an officer called an eponym. From the mention of a total eclipse, which occurred in 763 B.C., is determined the date of all the remaining years. The following persons and events of biblical history are mentioned in the Assy. inscriptions, and dated by the Assy. canon (COT ii. p. 167 ff.):—

Ahab (at the battle of Karkar) . . . . .	854
Jehu (the payment of tribute) . . . . .	842
Azariah (war with Tiglath-pileser) . . . . .	742-740
Menahem (payment of tribute) . . . . .	738
Pekah (conquered by Tiglath-pileser) . . . . .	734
Ahaz (payment of tribute) . . . . .	734
Hoshea (successor of Pekah) . . . . .	734
Fall of Samaria (near the close of the year) . . . . .	722
Invasion of Sennacherib . . . . .	701
Manasseh . . . . .	681-668

According to the Assy. sources, Tiglath-pileser III. (745-728) conducted a campaign (742-738) against Syria, Hamath, and Palestine. At the head of a coalition against him (742-740) is mentioned Azariah, king of Judah. Menahem is also mentioned as paying tribute in 738. During the years 737-735 Tiglath-pileser was campaigning in the East, but in 734 he returned to suppress another coalition in the West, when he conquered Pekah, and appointed Hoshea king of Samaria in his stead.

According to the biblical account, Menahem and Azariah were contemporaries, and Menahem paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser (called Pul in 2 K 15<sup>19</sup>); and after the brief reign of Pekahiah the son of Menahem, in the last year of Azariah, Pekah came to the throne. Pekah, with Rezin king of Damascus, in the reigns of Jotham and Ahaz, made war on Judah, evidently to coerce Judah to form an alliance against Assyria. During the reign of Pekah the N. kingdom suffered great loss of territory and inhabitants by Assyrian invasion, and Pekah was followed by Hoshea.

These two accounts, the biblical and Assyrian, harmonize, and it only remains for us to fix the dates. In 737 Pekahiah is king, perhaps having come to the throne in the previous year. His reign is brief, and in 736 or 735 he is slain by Pekah. In 737 or 736 Azariah dies, and Jotham, who for some 14 years may be thought of as having been co-regent, his father being a leper, becomes sole king. In 735 Ahaz succeeds Jotham; in 734 Pekah is slain, and Hoshea becomes king. Samaria falls in the winter of 722-721. Thus in this period the biblical chronological statements must be considerably modified. The result is given in tables (c) and (f).

A difficulty is also presented in 2 K 18<sup>10, 13</sup>, which date the fall of Samaria in the 6th year of Hezekiah, and the invasion of Sennacherib in the 14th; but the former event occurred in 722, and the latter in 701. According to the former reckoning, Hezekiah came to the throne in 723 or 727; and according to the latter, in 715 or 714. If we adopt the latter reckoning, the reign of Ahaz must be lengthened to some 20 years, and that of Manasseh or of Hezekiah shortened some 10 years. A coregency of Hezekiah with Ahaz has been suggested as the solution, or that the date of an invasion of Sargon in 711 may have been given for that of Sennacherib. According to this latter solution, however, Hezekiah would have come to the throne in 725 or 724.

The presence of Ahab at the battle of Karkar brings his reign down to 854 at least. At this battle, according to the Assyrian inscription, Ahab appears as an ally of the king of Damascus. According to 1 K 20<sup>34</sup> Ahab formed such an alliance, which lasted three years (1 K 22<sup>1</sup>). In the third year of the alliance the truce was broken, and Ahab was slain at Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22<sup>1-3, 37-40</sup>). Assuming the alliance to have been made in 855, the close of Ahab's reign, then, may be placed in 853.* See ATAB.

In the period before Ahab a change in the biblical length of the reign of Omri has been thought by some scholars necessary from the statement of Mesha on the Moabite Stone, where he says: 'And Omri took possession of the land of Mēhēdēba, and it (Israel) dwelt therein during his days, and half his son's days, forty years.' If 'his son' is Ahab, then Omri's reign must be lengthened at the expense of Baasha's. In favour of this is the importance and lasting impression of Omri's reign (Mic 6<sup>16</sup>). The 'land of the house of Omri' in Assyrian inscriptions is a standing designation for the N. kingdom. If, however, 'his son' means Omri's grandson Joram, then no great change is needed. This is more probable, agreeing with 2 K 1<sup>1, 3</sup>, which place the revolt of Moab (unlikely to have happened under the powerful king Ahab) in the reign of Joram. If we knew from Egyptian history the precise date of Shishak's reign and invasion of Palestine, we could fix definitely the reign of Rehoboam ('In the 5th year of Rehoboam, Shishak came up against Jerusalem,' 1 K 14<sup>25</sup>). As far as Egyptian history gives any light on this point, it confirms the date given in (c).

For the period between the death of Ahab and that of Azariah (Uzziah) it is necessary to shorten several reigns. The disturbed condition of affairs at the death of Jeroboam II.—a destructive rivalry of factions is indicated in the prophetic writings—suggests the shortening of Menahem's reign to three years to allow the others of Israel to stand. Internal evidence favours allowing the reigns of Athaliah and Joash to remain unchanged. The sole reigns of Azariah (Uzziah) and Jotham, then, may be shortened by making them co-regents for a number of years with their fathers.

The periods given for the reigns of Amon, Josiah, Jehoahaz, Jehoakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah are undoubtedly correct. The following table gives the dates and synchronisms of their reigns:—

	Amon's accession	641
	Josiah's	639
	" 1st year	638
	" 13th "	626	1st year of Jeremiah's ministry (Jer 1 <sup>2</sup> ).
	" 18th "	621	Discovery of the Book of the Law (2 K 23 <sup>2, 3</sup> ).
(2 K 23 <sup>31</sup> ) Jehoahaz 3 mos. reign and Jehoakim's accession	" 31st "	608	Battle of Megiddo (2 K 23 <sup>29</sup> ).
	Jehoakim's 1st	607
	" 4th	604	Jeremiah's 23rd and Nebuchadrezzar's 1st (Jer 26 <sup>1, 2</sup> ).
	" 11th	597	8th of Nebuchadrezzar (2 K 24 <sup>15</sup> ).
(2 K 24 <sup>18-19</sup> ) Jehoiachin's 3 mos. reign and Zedekiah's accession	Zedekiah's 1st year	596
	" 10th "	587	18th of Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 32 <sup>1</sup> ).
	" 11th "	586	19th of Nebuchadrezzar and destruction of Jerusalem (2 K 25 <sup>8</sup> ).

These dates are determined by Nebuchadrezzar's 1st year, which, according to Ptolemy's Canon,* is 604. The reigns given in the table above are post-dated. This arrangement is the one generally accepted. Some, however, have preferred to pre-date them. Then Jerusalem falls in 587 or 588. In favour of this are Jer 52<sup>28, 29</sup>, which place seemingly the captivity of Jehoiachin and destruction of Jerusalem in the 8th and 18th years of Nebuchadrezzar. The battle of Carchemish (Jer 46<sup>2</sup>) is dated in the 4th year of Jehoiakim. According to Tiele and others, this took place in 605, the year of Nebuchadrezzar's accession. This pre-dates the 4th year of Jehoakim.

From the facts presented, it is evident that only * Another explanation of the events of this period is, that the king present as a Syrian ally at the battle of Karkar was not Ahab but Ahaziah or Joram, the Assyrian scribe having unwittingly given the name of the father for that of the son, being ignorant of the latter's accession. The argument for this view is that Israel would not have assisted the Syrians except as a vassal, and that such vassalage immediately followed the battle of Ramoth-gilead. Ahab's death, then, probably would have occurred in 855.

* The Canon of Ptolemy is a chron. compilation by the celebrated Alexandrian scholar Ptolemy of the 2nd cent. A.D., with astronomical notes, commencing B.C. 747 with the reigns of the Bab. kings. As far as it has been tested, it has proved an accurate and reliable document. See ASSYRIA, p. 179b.

a few dates in Israel's history can be fixed with absolute certainty. The time of most events can only be given definitely within a space of two or three years. There generally remains that amount of uncertainty, hence few tables of dates furnished by OT chronologists exactly agree.

In view of the corrections which must be made in the OT chron. statements from the founding of Solomon's temple to the destruction of Jerns., and in view of the apparent endeavour of the writer of 1 and 2 K to preserve and harmonize in his synchronisms the recorded lengths of the reigns of kings, the question may arise whether in this period as well as the former ones the chronological data may not be partially conjectural or artificial, complete historical data for both the S. and N. kingdom not having been preserved. This is the view of W. R. Smith, Stade, Wellhausen, and others. In its favour is the fact that from the founding of Solomon's temple to that of Zerubbabel, according to the biblical numbers, there are 480 years, and the duration of the N. kingdom (omitting the 2 years of Elah or reducing Baasha's to 22) is 240 years. The combinations seen in the length of the reigns suggest also, it is said, artificiality.

Solomon . . . . .	37	Brought forward	259
Rehoboam . . 17 } 20		Jotham . . . . .	16
Abijam . . . . .	3	Ahaz . . . . .	16
Asa . . . . .	41	Hezekiah . . . . .	6
Jehoshaphat . . 25		Hezekiah . . . . .	23
Jehoram . . . . .	8	Manasseh . . . . .	55
Ahaziah . . . . .	1	Amon . . . . .	2
Athaliah . . . . .	6	Josiah . . . . .	31
Joash . . . . .	40	Jehoiakim . . . . .	11
Amaziah . . . . .	29	Zedekiah . . . . .	11
Uzziah . . . . .	52	Captivity . . . . .	50
Carry forward . .	259	Total . . . . .	480

The combination of  $41 + 81 + 38 = 40 + 80 + 40$ , it is said, cannot be mere chance.

A system likewise, it is claimed, appears in the years of the first eight kings of Israel.

Jeroboam . . . . .	22	Omri . . . . .	12
Nadab . . . . .	2	Ahah . . . . .	2
Baasha (24) . . . . .	22	Ahaziah . . . . .	2
Elah . . . . .	2	Joram . . . . .	12

Here are eight kings reigning 96 years, an average of 12 for each. Three reign  $12 + 10$ , three  $12 - 10$ , and two 12.

From the inaccuracy of some of the biblical numbers, and from the symmetry of their sum, it is not improbable that missing lengths of the reigns of some kings were supplied by conjecture, so as to make the duration of the N. kingdom 240 years, and the interval between the founding of the two temples 480 years. Such an arrangement would be helpful to the memory and analogous to reckonings of the early periods of the world and of Israel, and such an arrangement also finds a counterpart in the genealogy of Jesus in Mt, where the generations are reduced to three series of 14 each. But, taking the biblical data as a whole for this period, they do not present sufficient symmetry to be entirely or mainly artificial. Errors doubtless crept into lists of reigns, and the lengths of some probably were not preserved, and hence were supplied by conjecture.

V. CHRONOLOGY OF THE POST-EXILIC PERIOD.

—When Judah became a vassal, and her own kings ceased, the years of foreign rulers, as we have already seen at the beginning of the Captivity, were employed in dating events. The time of these rulers is fixed by the Canon of Ptolemy. The following table gives the principal OT chronological references of this period:—

" 2nd year . . . . .	520	Haggai and Zechariah prophesy (Hag 1, Zec 1)
" 6th " . . . . .	516	Temple finished (Ezr 6:15)
Artaxerxes' accession .	465	Ezra arrives at Jerusalem (Ezr 7*)
" 7th year . . . . .	458	Nehemiah's mission to Jerusalem (Neh 2)

CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

1. THE GOSPELS.

The data for the chronology of the Life of Christ group themselves round three points, the Nativity, the Baptism, and the Crucifixion, and the intervals between these, namely, the age of Christ at the Baptism, and the duration of the Ministry. If some of them could be settled conclusively, the rest could be deduced at once: for instance, the date of Christ's birth combined with his age when baptized would fix the date of the Baptism; if the moments of the beginning and end of the Ministry are known, its length follows; and so on. But as it is, since for no one of these dates or intervals is there demonstrative proof, while yet about each of them conclusions more or less probable can be reached, it is imperative to investigate them separately, and to check the tentative results by comparison with one another.

A. THE DATE OF THE NATIVITY.—1. The Year.—a. St. Matthew tells us that Jesus Christ was born in the reign of Herod the Great, who at some period not more than two years afterwards ordered a massacre of all the infants at Bethlehem, and that the Holy Family fled to Egypt, where they remained for the rest of the king's lifetime (Mt 2: 13-16, 19). Thus Herod's death is the terminus ad quem for the Nativity.

For the chronology of the events of Jewish history of NT times, the primary authorities are the BJ and Ant. of Josephus (quoted throughout this article in the critical edition of B. Niese, Berlin, 1887-1895). Josephus nowhere states the exact year of Herod's death, but he gives the length of his reign from two more or less fixed starting-points, and the length of his three successors' reigns to more or less fixed concluding points. (i.) Herod when he died, not very long before the Passover, had reigned 37 years* as king de jure since the Roman decree of the 184th Olympiad (middle of a.c. 44 to middle of a.c. 40), and consulship of Domitius Calvinus and Asinius Pollio (a.c. 40); Ant. xiv. xiv. 4, 6, xvii. viii. 1; BJ i. xxxiii. 8. Thus the decree belongs to the first half of a.c. 40; but as it is uncertain even so whether the month was earlier or later than the month (March?) of Herod's death, it is uncertain also whether the 37th year had begun before March a.c. 4, or only before March a.c. 3. (ii.) He had reigned also 34 years as king de facto since the death of Antigonus; and Antigonus died 'on the day of the great Fast [Sept.-Oct.] in the consulship of M. Agrippa and Canidius Gallus [a.c. 37], 27 years to a day since the entry of

* That is, according to the general rule of ancient calculations,—to which attention is here called once for all,—not 37 years or something over, but 37 years or something less.

Pompey into Jerusalem in the consulship of Antonius and Cicero [s.c. 63 less 27 = s.c. 36]. Of these two discordant reckonings for Antigonus' death, 34 years from the first would put Herod's death in the beginning of s.c. 3, 34 from the second in the beginning of s.c. 2; and if the second may reasonably be set aside as due to the confusion of all chronology previous to the introduction of the Julian calendar in s.c. 46, even s.c. 37 is inconsistent with the evidence of Dio, a later but equally well informed historian, who names the consuls of s.c. 38, Claudius and Norbanus, so that the 34 years would expire in s.c. 4 (Jos. Ant. xiv. iv. 3, xiv. xvi. 4, xvii. viii. 1; BJ i. xxxiii. 8; Dio, xlix. 22). (iii.) Of Herod's successors, Archelaus, king of Judaea, was banished in the consulship of Lepidus and Aruntius [A.D. 6], when in the ninth year of his reign according to BJ, the tenth according to Ant. As his accession was near the beginning of the year, the former reckoning would throw it probably in s.c. 3 (possibly in s.c. 4), the latter probably in s.c. 4 (possibly s.c. 5). If the two may be reconciled by supposing that the banishment fell very early in A.D. 6, before the anniversary of the accession, and that Ant. reckons Archelaus' second and succeeding years from Jan. 1, both would point to s.c. 4; if otherwise, Ant. as the later and fuller work is more likely to have corrected an earlier error than to have introduced a new one, so that s.c. 4 is in any case the more probable date (BJ ii. vii. 3; Ant. xvii. xiii. 2, 3, cf. Vita, i. Dio, iv. 26, 27). (iv.) Herod Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, reigned 37 years, and died in the 20th year of Tiberius—that is, reckoning from Augustus' death in August A.D. 14, between August A.D. 33 and August A.D. 34, which would leave Herod Philip's accession doubtful between s.c. 3 and 4 (Ant. xviii. iv. 6). (v.) Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, was issuing coins as late as his 44th year; and as his banishment by Gaius Caligula (March A.D. 37-Jan. A.D. 41) can hardly have been later than A.D. 39—his rival and nephew, Herod Agrippa, left Palestine after him, and was apparently at Lyons with the emperor in the winter of A.D. 39–40—his 2nd year would go back to s.c. 4, and his accession (since the Jewish princes apparently reckoned their years from Nisan 1) to the year preceding Nisan 1 s.c. 4 (Dio, iv. 24; see further, Philo in Flaccum, 6, ed. Mangey, ii. 521; Jos. Ant. xviii. vi. 11, vii. 2; Madden, Coins of the Jews, p. 122).

Thus the year of Herod's death was probably s.c. 4, possibly s.c. 3; and one further note of time in Josephus may help to resolve the doubt. An eclipse of the moon occurred at a moment when Herod, lying at Jericho in his last illness, had partially revived. He grew worse again, and was taken to the baths of Callirrhoe across the Dead Sea; but when all remedies failed he was brought back to Jericho, and thither as a last caprice of tyranny he summoned to his bedside all the leading Jews of Palestine, intending a general massacre of them at the moment of his death. Then the long expected authorization from Augustus of the execution of Antipater arrives and is at once acted on; five days later the king succumbs himself. The funeral rites occupy a week, and soon afterwards the Passover is 'close at hand' (Ant. xvii. vi. 4–ix. 3). Now the only lunar eclipses visible in Palestine during s.c. 5–3 were those of March 23, s.c. 5, Sept. 15, s.c. 5, and March 12–13, s.c. 4. But unless the events just catalogued can be spread over 12 or 13 months, from March 12, s.c. 4, to March 31 (the passover of s.c. 3), which is very unlikely, the year s.c. 3 for Herod's death is excluded. If, on the other hand, one month seems as much too little for them as twelve are too much, the eclipse may be that of September, s.c. 6, the king's death falling six months afterwards, about March, s.c. 4.

The Nativity, however, must be placed, not only before this, but, as St. Matthew's account seems to imply, some time before it; for the age limit fixed for the massacre of the innocents, and the sojourn of the Holy Family in Egypt, have both to be allowed for, even if the one is to be qualified by Herod's determination to set a limit on the safe side, and the other by St. Luke's silence. The Birth of Christ may so far be placed one, two, or even three years before Herod's death, B.C. 7–5.

With the longer interval from s.c. 7 would tally Kepler's astronomer's suggestion, that the star of Mt 2<sup>d</sup> was a conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn, such as occurred in the constellation Pisces in May, October, and December of s.c. 7. The statement of a mediæval Jew, R. Abarbanel, that the conjunction of these two planets in Pisces is to be a sign of Messiah's coming, may perhaps have been derived ultimately from ancient traditions known to the Chaldeans. On the other hand, it is maintained that the conjunction of s.c. 7 was never close enough for the planets to appear as a single star, though even this would hardly be conclusive against Kepler's view. But in any case chronological conclusions cannot be primarily rested on such a basis.

b. St. Luke dates the Nativity by a general census ordered by Augustus and carried out in Syria by the legate Quirinius (2<sup>a</sup> ἀρχὴ [ἡ] ἀπογραφὴ πρῶτῃ ἐγένετο ἡγεμονεύοντος τῆς Συρίας Κυρηναίου). The bracketed article is to be omitted with B D (and in effect κ); the clause is to be rendered, not 'this was the first census [of those that were made] while Quirinius was governor of Syria,' but 'this was taken as the first census [of the whole series down to the present] while Quirinius,' etc.: so Clement of Alexandria, ὅτε πρῶτον ἐκέλευσαν ἀπογραφὰς γενέσθαι (Strom. i. 21. 147, p. 407, ed. Potter).

A famous census did indeed take place, Quirinius being the governor sent to carry it out, ten years or more after the Nativity, when Judaea, on the deposition of Archelaus in A.D. 6, became a Roman province; and it provoked the revolt of Judas the Gaulonite or Galilean (Ant. xvii. xiii. 5, xviii. i. 1; Ac 5:37). But there is also reason to believe that Quirinius must be the name wanting on a mutilated inscription which describes some official who twice governed Syria under Augustus; and in that case another census might be postulated for his other tenure to justify St. Luke, if it were not that even this other cannot possibly have coincided with the Nativity. The period from s.c. 10 or 9 till Herod's death is exhausted by the tenures of M. Titius, C. Sentius Saturninus, and P. Quintilius Varus. Varus came as the immediate successor of Saturninus not later than the summer of s.c. 6—for coins of his are extant of the 25th year of the era of Actium [Sept. s.c. 81], i.e. Sept. s.c. 7 to Sept. s.c. 6—and was still in office at the time of Herod's death. Quirinius consequently had either left some years before the Nativity or did not arrive till after it (Ant. xvi. viii. 6, ix. 1, xvii. v. 2, ix. 3; Mommsen, Res Gestæ Divi Augusti, p. 169 ff.).

St. Luke then is in error in the name of Quirinius; it does not follow that he is in error in the fact of a census. It must be remembered that the chronological data of 1k 2 and 3 were in all probability supplied by himself and not by his 'sources'; Gore, Dissertations, p. 20. The evangelist's acquaintance with Palestine was perhaps limited to the two years of St. Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea; and if his source made mention simply of a census, he may easily have been misled into identifying it with the great Roman census of A.D. 6–7, made the more famous by the revolt it occasioned. Nor is there any inherent improbability in the hypothesis of a census in Judaea somewhere within the years s.c. 8–6. Of another client prince, Archelaus of Cappadocia, Tacitus happens to relate that he took a census 'after the Roman manner' under Tiberius; Ant. vi. 41. And if Herod did set himself to supply the information to his suzerain (for the statistics of the resources of the empire, dependent states included, were a favourite study of Augustus), it may well be believed that he veiled his purpose under forms adapted to the susceptibilities of his Jewish subjects, and so, in avoiding the scandal caused by the later Roman census, avoided also the notice of history.

St. Luke's evidence, then, adds nothing trustworthy for the chronology of the Nativity beyond its synchronism with a census.

c. But if St. Luke's census has no date, or rather a wrong one, does early Christian tradition help to fix the Nativity more nearly?

Patristic writers, in nearly all cases where a date is given for the Nativity, appear to deduce it from the date of the Baptism or Crucifixion; though it may be noted in passing that the earlier Fathers are a good deal nearer the mark with the year B.C. 3–2 than Dionysius Exiguus, the 6th cent. author of the present calculation of the Christian era (Iren. Hæc. iii. xxi. 3, ed. Massuet; Clem. Al. Strom. i. 21, p. 147; 'Tert.' adv. Judæos, 8; Hippolytus in Dan. iv., ed. Bratke, p. 19, l. 3).

There is, however, one casual statement of Tertullian's which serves in remarkable fashion to bridge the gap left by the dissociation of Quirinius' name from the census of the Nativity. The Marcionites defended their Doketic views of Christ's humanity by appeal to his own question, 'Who are my mother and my brethren?' interpreted as a denial of all human relationships; the assertion of the Jews, 'Thy mother and thy brethren stand without,' became on their view a mere desire to 'tempt' Christ. Tertullian reminds them inter alia that Christ's family could easily have been discovered from the census known to have been taken under Augustus in Judaea by Sentius Saturninus: census constat actos sub Augusto nunc in Judæa per Sentium Saturninum apud quos genus eius inquirere potuissent (adv. Marcionem, iv. 19). Here, of course, if Tertullian had said Quirinius, he would have been merely repeating St. Luke; but he names instead Quirinius' penultimate predecessor, governor about B.C. 9–6. Whether or not Tertullian himself means to connect this census with the Nativity is not quite clear; the point is, that the name Saturninus, since it can hardly be a mere slip for St. Luke's Quirinius, must have come from an independent authority, possibly the same as supplied another reference to Saturninus in Tert. de pallio, i. In general trustworthiness, Tertullian is immeasurably inferior to St. Luke; but a Roman lawyer could command familiar access to many sources inaccessible to a physician from the provinces, and it is hardly rash to believe that in this one instance the former has by a happy chance preserved the evidence which at once confirms and corrects the latter,—confirms the fact of a census, and corrects the name from Quirinius to Saturninus.*

If this correction be accepted, the census taken while Saturninus was Syrian legate cannot fall later than the time when Varus succeeded him, in or before the middle of B.C. 6. The order of events in St. Matthew will permit of an interval of two or three years between the Nativity and Herod's death; and the data appear to be best harmonized by attributing the census of the Nativity to B.C. 7 or the beginning of B.C. 6.

2. The Month and Day of the Nativity.—Of these nothing is really known; for the patristic evidence, interesting in itself, though too voluminous for discussion here, leads to no real results. It must suffice to say that the oldest traditional date for Christmas Day is, in the East, Jan. 6, in the West, Dec. 25. The earliest trace of the one is the observance of Jan. 6 as the festival, not of the birth of Christ but of his Baptism, by the Basilidian Gnostics of the time of Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 21.147, p. 408); and a Gnostic tradition is worth nothing at all. The other first appears in Hippolytus' newly-recovered Fourth Book on Daniel (p. 19, l. 2), and was probably deduced by him from March 25, a day which in his Chronicle marks not only the Crucifixion but the Conception, the γένεσις Χριστοῦ side by side with the πάθος.

B. THE INTERVAL BETWEEN THE NATIVITY AND THE BAPTISM.—St. Luke relates that Jesus at the time of the Baptism was about 30 years of age, 3<sup>23</sup> αὐτὸς ἦν Ἰησοῦς ἀρχόμενος ὥστε ἑτῶν τριάκοντα. The word ἀρχόμενος does not qualify the description of age, as supposed by the earliest known interpreters, Valentinians of the Ptolemaean school ap. Iren. II. xxii. 5, ad baptismum venit nondum qui triginta annos supplererat, sed qui inciperet esse tamquam triginta annorum; and so, too, Epiphanius, Her. li. 16, τριάκοντα μὲν ἑτῶν ἀλλ' οὐ πλήρης διὸ λέγει Ἀρχόμενος. It rather means 'when just commencing his ministry,' an idiomatic use of ἀρχεσθαι paralleled in Lk 23<sup>3</sup> ἀρχόμενος ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας; Ac 1<sup>22</sup> ἀρχόμενος ἀπὸ τοῦ βαπτίσματος Ἰωάννου; Ac 10<sup>37</sup> ἀρχόμενος ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας μετὰ τὸ βάπτισμα δ' ἐκήρυξεν Ἰωάννης.

The chronological reference, in fact, is limited to the words ὥστε ἑτῶν τριάκοντα, into which in turn the meaning has been read that our Lord waited till he had completed the 30 years of an authorized teacher. But Jewish ideas do not seem to have attached any such importance to this particular age. The minimum limit for the Levitical service, even if originally 30,—and against Nu 45. 47 (Heb.), 1 Ch 23<sup>3</sup> are to be set Nu 43. 47 (LXX) 824, which give 25,—had been reduced to 20 before the time of the Chronicler (1 Ch 23<sup>24</sup> 27), who ascribes the change to David. On the other hand, so far as there was any official age for teaching, it was not 30 but 40: see the treatise Aboda Zara in the Bab. Talin. (ed. Frankfurt, 1715, fol. 196: quoted by Schoettgen, ad loc.): Ad quodnam vero etatis momentum expectandum est antequam vir doctus alios docere possit? Resp. Ad exactos annos quadraginta. Similarly, Irenæus contrasts the prima indoles iuvenis of 30 years with the magistri perfectam etatem, which appears to be 40 (ii. xxii. 4, 6). The traces of an age standard of 30 for different offices of the Christian ministry are due, of course, directly to this very statement in St. Luke; so expressly the Council of Neo-Cæsarea, canon 11.

* It is possible that the same source is alluded to in Jos. Vita, 1, written at Rome under Domitian, τὴν μὲν τοῦ γένους ἡμῶν διαδοχὴν, ὡς ἐν ταῖς δημοσίαις δίδται ἀναγεγραμμένων ἔργων.

Thus there is no reason to press St. Luke's note of time into meaning either 'when not yet 30 years' or 'at the moment of attaining the teacher's age of 30 years.' The phrase is an elastic one, and will cover any age from 25 to 32. Reckoned from the Nativity of Christ in B.C. 7-6, the probable limits for the date of the Baptism would thus be A.D. 22-27, a result which must now be tested by its conformity with the direct evidence for this date.

C. For the BAPTISM the Gospels supply a terminus ad quem in the synchronism of the passover mentioned next after it with the years of the building of the temple (Jn 2<sup>20</sup>); and a terminus a quo in the synchronism of the beginning of the Baptist's ministry with the years of Tiberius (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>).

A. Jn 2<sup>20</sup> τριστράκοντα καὶ ἑξ ἔτην ὡδοποιήθη ἡ ναὶς αὕτη, say the Jews in argument with our Lord, meaning, not that Herod's temple had taken 46 years from its commencement to its completion at some moment of the past,—for the work was only just complete when the Jewish revolt broke out (Jos. Ant. ix. 7),—but that at the time of speaking it 'had been in course of building' 46 years, the aorist being exactly paralleled in the phrase used of the temple of Ezra (Ezra 5<sup>16</sup> ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡμεῖς τοῦ ἔν ὡδοποιήθη καὶ οὐκ ἠτελειώθη, 'from that time to this it has been in course of building, and has not been brought to completion'). Herod's temple was begun, according to BJ in his 15th, according to Ant. in his 18th year (BJ i. xxi. 1; Ant. xv. xl. 1); and as Jos. in both books summarizes the length of Herod's reign by a double computation from the de jure kingship in B.C. 40, and the de facto kingship in B.C. 37, an obvious solution of the discrepancy would be to count the 15th year from the later, the 18th from the earlier, of the two starting-points, both reckonings then converging on B.C. 23. But in fact Jos., when he gives a single date, invariably computes it from the de facto kingship only. So in Ant.—the book which on the hypothesis just mentioned would employ the reckoning from B.C. 40 for the commencement of the temple—the battle of Actium (Sept. B.C. 31) is put in the 7th year of Herod; Augustus' second visit to Syria, which was not earlier than B.C. 21 (for it was 10 years after the first, and that in turn was after Actium), is dated in the 17th year; and the completion of Caesarea is fixed in the 92nd Olympiad (B.C. 12-8), and in the 28th year (Ant. xv. v. 2, vi. 7, xvi. v. 1; BJ i. xx. 4). Seeing, then, that the divergence cannot be accounted for as a double reckoning, it must arise from the correction in Ant. of an error of BJ, so that Josephus' ultimate date is the 18th year from B.C. 37, or in other words B.C. 20-19. The passover of the first year will probably be that of B.C. 19, and the passover of the 46th year that of A.D. 27.

Thus the latest date for the Baptism is the early months of A.D. 27.

b. Lk 3<sup>1</sup> ἐν ἑτῇ πεντηκαιδέκτῃ τῆς ἡγεμονίας Τιβέριου Καίσαρος . . . ἰγνέτο Ἰησοῦς ἡμεῖς ἐπὶ Ἰωάννῃ. Reckoned from Augustus' death, Aug. 19, A.D. 14, the 15th year of Tiberius would run from Aug. A.D. 23 to Aug. A.D. 29, so that the Baptism of Christ could scarcely fall before A.D. 29. Even if Tiberius' 2nd year be dated from Jan. 1, A.D. 15, so that his 15th corresponds with A.D. 28, matters are hardly mended, for that year, too, would be irreconcilable with the results attained in the first two sections of this article, with the temple chronology just discussed, and with the conclusions which will be established below from a comparison of the length of the Ministry with the date of the Crucifixion. If St. Luke really places the opening of the Baptist's preaching as late as A.D. 28, he must, as in the case of Quirinius, have fallen into error. Writing half a century after the events, and perhaps himself sharing the view which limited the public Ministry of Christ to a single year, he might have deduced the 16th year for the commencement of the Ministry from A.D. 29, the date assigned by very early tradition for its close.

At the same time, it is not quite so easy to suppose him deceived about the beginning of the Ministry as about the census of the Nativity. Not only were the events 30 years nearer his own time, but they were of so much more public a character, that they must have been matter of knowledge in a far wider circle, among the Baptist's disciples—with whom St. Luke's writings seem to show a special acquaintance—as well as among the followers of the Christ. Is it certain, then, what is meant by the 15th year of Tiberius? A modern reader is tempted to transfer to the 1st cent. his own associations with hereditary monarchy, where each ruler's rights and powers come into existence at the moment of his predecessor's demise, neither sooner nor later. The Roman Empire of Augustus was scarcely in fact, certainly not in law, hereditary. The prerogatives of the emperor were due theoretically to the various offices which he held; and in dating events, as on coins and inscriptions, he would recite the number, not of the years of his reign, but of his consulships, his imperatorships, and his years of tribunician power. Clearly, none of these official methods were followed by St. Luke, for Tiberius was never consul more than five times, nor emperor more than eight, while his tribunician power, held permanently as one of the primary factors in the imperial character, was already in its 16th year at the time of Augustus' death. Nor was there yet any stereotyped literary usage upon the point. St. Luke's contemporaries, if Romans, would probably have been employing the old system of dating by the consuls of each year; if Orientals, they might still be using the Olympiads (B.C. 770), the era of Alexander or the Greeks (B.C. 312), the era of Sulla (B.C. 85), or the era of Actium (B.C. 31). So when he himself elected to adopt the still novel reckoning by imperial years, he would find no absolutely fixed tradition as to the moment from which to compute them; and it has lately been pointed out (Ramsay, St. Paul the Trav. p. 387) that not very long before the probable date of the Gospel, Titus had been associated in the empire with his father Vespasian by the simultaneous reception of the proconsular and tribunician power, together with other insignia of imperial rank (July 1, A.D. 71). The conditions of his own day, Ramsay thinks, may have led the evangelist to emphasize the similar elevation of Tiberius, on whom a special enactment had already in Augustus' lifetime conferred a position in the provinces co-ordinate with the elder emperor's, so that provincial custom may have taken that as the starting-point of his reign (Velleius Paterculus, ii. 121; Suetonius, Tib. 21; compare Bury, Students' Roman Empire, p. 64; Mommsen, Staatsrecht, ii. ed. 3, p. 1169, n. 3). As to the exact year of the law, authorities differ; most of them connect it with the grant of the tribunician power for life in A.D. 13; but there is no necessity to synchronize the two, and Mommsen, on the ground of the context in Velleius, puts it two years earlier, in A.D. 11.

If this solution is possible—and it is not given here for more—the various data are brought into complete harmony. The mission of the Baptist in the 15th year of Tiberius, calculated from A.D. 11, will fall in A.D. 25–26; the Baptism of Christ may be assigned to A.D. 26–27; and the first passover of the Ministry, being at the same time the passover of the 46th year of the temple building, will follow in the spring of A.D. 27.

D. The interval between the Baptism and the Crucifixion, or DURATION OF THE MINISTRY.—a. St. Mark's Gospel, the closest representative of the common synoptic tradition, contains few precise indications of time; events are strung together by no more than the vague expressions 'straightway,' 'after not many days,' 'after many days.' The general impression, however, which the synoptic narrative seems calculated to produce, and probably in primitive times did produce, is that the period described was one of no considerable length. In the absence of other data, especial importance accrues to two episodes which contain in themselves or their surroundings evidence of the season of the year. Describing the feeding of the 5000, St. Mark adds to the common tradition the descriptive touch that the grass showed the fresh green of early spring (ἐπὶ τῷ χλωρῷ χόρῳ Mk 6<sup>36</sup>; cf. Mt 14<sup>15</sup>, Lk 9<sup>12</sup>). And the plucking of the ears of corn (Mk 2<sup>23</sup>=Mt 12<sup>1</sup>=Lk 6<sup>1</sup>), the harvest being ripe but not yet cut, will fall, if the ears were barley, at earliest in April, and if wheat, at latest in June; see R. Samuel, quoted by Wetstein on Jn 4<sup>35</sup>.

Here, then, a spring or early summer in Mk 2 is succeeded by early spring in ch. 6, the lapse of one year intervening; while a second year is postulated by the events of chs. 6<sup>50</sup>–10<sup>22</sup>, which include journeys to the districts of Phœnicia, of Upper Galilee, and of Perœa (7<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>27</sup> 10<sup>1</sup>), and shut out the possibility that the miracle of ch. 6 and the passover of the Crucifixion can belong to the same spring; so that, at least if the order is even roughly chronological, a two years' ministry would already underlie the record. And though our earliest authority, Papias, seems to deny just this characteristic to St. Mark, saying that, while the facts were all accurate, the order was not (ἀκριβῶς ἔγραψεν οὐ μέντοι τάς, quoted in Eusebius, HE iii. 39), yet he probably does not mean by this more than the absence of a framework for the history such as St. Luke supplies by notices of movement towards Jerus., and St. John by notices of Jewish festivals. In any case an investigation of the internal evidence borne by the Gospel itself, though necessarily cursory, and limited to a single section, will best show to what extent it may be allowed or denied to be chronological.

From the opening of the Galilean ministry in Mk 1<sup>14</sup> the narrative runs continuously, the scene, the actors, the horizon being all Galilean, and Galilean only, as far as 3<sup>6</sup>. At this point a change takes place, and the larger world of Palestine begins to play a part on the stage. The audience is drawn, not from Galilee only, but from Jerus., Judæa, Idumæa, Perœa, and Phœnicia; the opposition is reinforced by scribes from the capital; the apostles are organized into a body for more systematic evangelization (3<sup>14</sup> 22). To this division, under which the first two chapters mark the inchoate stage of the Ministry, the character of the sayings and doings recorded in them fairly corresponds. Five miracles arouse the attention of the populace, and spread the fame of their author (1<sup>21</sup>–2<sup>12</sup>), just as five episodes bring out teaching which provokes the criticism, and soon the hostility, of the scribes and Pharisees (2<sup>1</sup>–3<sup>6</sup>); the cure of the paralytic with the forgiveness of his sins, where the miracle suggests the teaching, forming the transition from the first half of the section to the second. This presentation of development and progress is an argument for the substantially chronological character of the record, so far at least that an episode of the opening section, such as that of the ears of corn, would primâ facie be dated in the actual order of events before an episode so much posterior to the great break in 3<sup>6</sup> as the feeding of the 5000. With much less hesitation it may be laid down that the miracle of ch. 6 cannot possibly be placed in the same spring as the Crucifixion; so that these three data, the late spring of one year, the early spring of another, and the passover time of a third, suggest the testimony of St. Mark's Gospel to at least a two years' Ministry (but see below, p. 410<sup>9</sup>).

On the other hand, it does not follow that the arrangement of events within each section is chronological; rather, the evangelist would certainly seem to have here deserted the principle of temporal order for the principle of grouping. For instance, although his general scheme in 1<sup>14</sup>–3<sup>6</sup> is borne out by the natural presumption that some miracles arresting public attention preceded in time the opposition offered to doctrine which might otherwise have passed unnoticed, yet it is hardly likely that all the miracles came first and all the teaching after. That is to say, the probability that the episode of the ears of corn really preceded all events from 3<sup>6</sup> onward, does not carry with it an equal probability that it preceded also the events of 3<sup>1</sup>–6, or followed those of 1<sup>21</sup>–2<sup>22</sup>. Even if the sections as wholes are in chronological order, the events within each section are obviously massed in groups.

b. St. Luke's account of the Ministry divides itself in the main into two well-marked portions, of which the first (4<sup>14</sup>–9<sup>50</sup>) is parallel to the common tradition of the other Synoptists, while the second (9<sup>51</sup>–19<sup>28</sup>) is almost entirely peculiar; and with this division corresponds a (seemingly methodical) arrangement of notes of place which serves as a setting for the history.

In the first portion, representing the Galilean ministry of the common tradition, the localities named are, with one exception, and that more apparent than real, exclusively Galilean: 4<sup>14</sup> Galilee, 10<sup>1</sup> Nazareth, 11<sup>1</sup> Capernaum; 5<sup>1</sup> Lake of Genesareth; 7<sup>1</sup> Capernaum, 11<sup>1</sup> Nain; 8<sup>2</sup> Mary is of Magdala, and Joanna is wife of Herod's steward; 22<sup>28</sup> Lake of Galilee, with its opposite shore. Mention is made, as in St. Mark, of the gathering of hearers from Judæa, Jerus., Tyre and Sidon, and of the fame of Christ's miracles 'in all Judæa and the country round' (5<sup>17</sup> 6<sup>17</sup> 7<sup>17</sup>); but nowhere is our Lord himself removed from Galilee save in the single statement in 4<sup>44</sup> that he was 'preaching in the synagogues of Judaea': 'Ιουδαίας, « B C L Q R etc.; 'Ιαλιλάας, Textus Receptus. Apologetic interest has detected here an 'undesigned coincidence' with the Judaea ministry in St. John; but the truth is that in this and some other passages St. Luke is using 'Judaea' in the extended sense of 'Palestine,' a term unfamiliar to NT and to the 1st cent. A.D. generally. When St. Luke wrote, the Rom. province, though it then included all Palestine except Upper Galilee, was still known only as Judaea (Schürer, HJP i. ii. 257). Traces of this usage in his writings (side by side with the narrower sense in which Judaea was opposed to Samaria or Galilee) would be Ac 26<sup>20</sup> 'Damascus, Jerus., all the country of Judaea and the Gentiles'; Ac 10<sup>37</sup> 'throughout all Judaea, beginning from Galilee,' and the similar phrase Lk 23<sup>8</sup> (cf. 6<sup>17</sup> 7<sup>17</sup>), in each of which cases 'all Judaea' appears to mean Palestine. The phrase may have been used in 4th as a sort of comprehensive introduction to the Ministry; and though it does not, totidem verbis, confine our Lord to Galilee, it does not necessarily take him beyond its borders. The definite indications of the first half of the record are unanimously Galilean.

In sharp contrast with this, the section peculiar to St. Luke opens with the statement about Christ that 'as the days of his assumption were coming to the full, he set his face firmly to go to Jerusalem'; 9<sup>51</sup> ἐν τῷ συμπληροῦσθαι τὰς ἡμέρας τῆς ἀναλήψεως αὐτοῦ. Again and again the same direction is emphasized in the remaining chapters. He is journeying through cities and villages, teaching and making his way to Jerus. 13<sup>22</sup>; he passes through the midst of Samaria and Galilee on his journey to Jerus. 17<sup>11</sup>; he is going up to Jerus. 18<sup>31</sup>; he is near Jerus. 19<sup>11</sup>. It is clear that all these chapters, to the mind of the evangelist, represent a conscious working up (though not necessarily a direct journey) towards Jerus., and 'the filling up of the days of his assumption' is a phrase which cannot cover more than a few months at the outside. Nor is there anything to suggest that, the second group of chapters being thus limited in duration, the previous group, which occupy a shorter space in the record, extended over any much longer period. Indeed it is not improbable that St. Luke shared the view, widely spread from very early times, that confined the Ministry to a single year; it is even possible that he himself, like so many of the readers of his Gospel, interpreted in this sense the reference preserved by him to Isaiah's prophecy of the 'acceptable year of the Lord' (Lk 4<sup>19</sup>=Is 61<sup>2</sup>).

c. St. John's Gospel distinguishes itself from the other three by its careful enumeration of six notes of time, five of them Jewish festivals, between the Baptism and the Crucifixion; and these precise and detailed recollections of an eyewitness must be allowed decisive weight against the apparently divergent testimony of the third Synoptist, not to say that their very precision may have consciously aimed at a silent correction of impressions erroneously derived from earlier evangelical narratives.

21<sup>8</sup> καὶ ἰγγύς ἦν τὸ πάσχα τῶν Ἰουδαίων καὶ ἀνίβη εἰς Ἱερουσόλυμα ὁ Ἰησοῦς. 22 αἱ δὲ ἦν ἐν τοῖς Ἱερουσόλυμοις ἐν τῷ πάσχα ἐν τῇ ἱερῇ.

43<sup>8</sup> οὐκ ὤμειψεν λίγους ὅτι ἐν τετραμέσῳ ἔσται καὶ ὁ θάνατος ἔρχεται· ἰδοὺ λίγος ὤμειψεν τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς ὡς καὶ θάνατος τὰς χάρας ἐνὶ λαοῖς αἰὼν πρὸς ἑρμηνείαν.

61 μετὰ ταῦτα ἦν ἡ ἱερὴ [ἢ ἡ ἱερὴ] τῶν Ἰουδαίων καὶ ἀνίβη Ἱερουσόλυμα.

64 ἦν δὲ ἰγγύς τὸ πάσχα [ἢ ὅτι τὸ πάσχα] ἡ ἱερὴ τῶν Ἰουδαίων.

72 ἦν δὲ ἰγγύς ἡ ἱερὴ τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἡ ἐκρησσηγία. 1023 ἰρύνετο τότε τὰ ἱερὰ καὶ ἐν τοῖς Ἱερουσόλυμοις.

Of these, the first and last two are straightforward statements which need no comment. The second admits of alternative explanations either as harvest-time or as four months before it. To the third attaches, not only a variety of reading between 'the feast' and 'a feast,' but, whichever reading be adopted, a doubt as to the actual feast intended by it. The fourth involves, again, a question of reading, carrying with it the difference of a complete year in the chronology of the Ministry; and as this problem is at once simpler and more momentous than the other two, it will be on all grounds best to begin with it.

(1) Jn 6<sup>4</sup>. If the words τὸ πάσχα are retained, three passovers are mentioned by St. John (2<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>4</sup> 11<sup>55</sup>), so that the Ministry will extend over at least two years. If the words are excised, 'the feast of the Jews,' which was 'near' at hand, may be identified with the Feast of Tabernacles, described as 'near' in 7<sup>2</sup>, and the chronology of the Ministry can then be arranged on a single-year basis: 2<sup>13-23</sup> Passover in March or April, 4<sup>35</sup> harvest in May, 5<sup>1</sup> Pentecost in May or early June, or Trumpets in September, 6<sup>4</sup> 7<sup>2</sup> Tabernacles in October, 10<sup>22</sup> Dedication in December, 11<sup>55</sup> Passover again.

This latter reading, in the belief that it brought the Fourth Gospel into harmony both with the Synoptists and with the earliest extra-canonical tradition, was championed first by Browne in his Ordo Saeculorum (London, 1844), and afterwards with more hesitation by Hort in an exhaustive note ad loc. in Westcott and Hort's Gr. Test. (App. pp. 77-81), from which many of the data in this article have been drawn. But any prima facie presumption on such grounds in favour of the omission of τὸ πάσχα would be counterbalanced by the consideration that every known MS, whether of the original Gr. or of the VSS, contains the phrase or its rendering; moreover, the evidence of St. Mark is, as it stands, against the single-year Ministry, while the evidence of the Fathers is much more evenly divided than these two writers supposed. Still, the high authority which attaches to all that Hort wrote demands a closer investigation of his arguments. It will be shown that the shorter reading (α) is a phrase unlikely to have been penned by St. John; (β) is unsuitable, as interpreted by Hort, to the context; (γ) is unsupported by the direct witness of more than a single Father.

α. If the words τὸ πάσχα are not genuine, St. John wrote simply ἰγγύς ἦν ἡ ἱερὴ τῶν Ἰουδαίων, and by this he is supposed to have meant the Feast of Tabernacles, as being beyond all others 'the feast' of the Jews. No doubt both in the OT and as late as the Mishna 'the feast' is used to denote Tabernacles; see Cheyne on Is 30<sup>23</sup>. But even if Tabernacles retained this pre-eminence,* so that St. John as a Jew could have so used the phrase himself, would he have done it in writing for Gentile Christians? To them Passover and Pentecost were instinct with associations from the Gospel, while Tabernacles spoke only of the Law, and 'the feast' can only have suggested to them, as the same or a still vaguer phrase suggested in 5<sup>1</sup> to Irenaeus, the Feast of Passover. And the evangelist, who habitually means by 'the Jews' the enemies of Christ, can hardly have been so wedded to Jewish usage as to employ language which would have one meaning for himself and another for his Ephesian disciples.

β. The evidence of context tells the same tale. In the first place, the abundance of the grass (Jn 6<sup>10</sup> πολὺς· χλωρὸς in Mk 6<sup>39</sup> of the same occasion) points to spring and not to autumn. Further, 'after these things Jesus was walking in Galilee' (Jn 7<sup>1</sup> περιπατεῖ), and yet on Hort's hypothesis the same feast which was already near in 6<sup>4</sup> is still only near—ἰγγύς in both cases—in 7<sup>2</sup>.

γ. The patristic evidence for omission can be reduced from the four witnesses quoted by Browne and Hort—Irenaeus, a heretical sect described by Epiphanius and called by him Alogi, Origen, and Cyril of Alexandria—to the single testimony of Origen.

Irenaeus brings the Gnostic theory of a one-year Ministry to the test of agreement with St. John's Gospel, where he finds that our Lord went up to Jerus. after the Baptism to three Passovers—the first after the miracle of Cana, the second when he cured the paralytic, the third at the Crucifixion (Hær. ii. xxii. 8). This Father is so eager, it is urged, to swell the number of Passovers that he includes the unnamed feast of 6<sup>4</sup>, and it is impossible that he should have failed to note so clear a case as 6<sup>4</sup> would be, if the word Passover had stood there in his text. But, in fact, Irenæus is professing to quote only the Passovers at which Christ was present, quoties secundum tempus pasche dominicus post baptismum ascenderit in Hierusalem; and with this aim he catalogues minutely the journeys to and fro. He is not professing to exhaust the number of Passovers, for he goes on to argue that the Ministry lasted for ten years or more.

* On the one hand, it is for Passover that Joseph and Mary are said to have gone up yearly to Jerus., Lk 2<sup>41</sup>; on the other, Cyril Alex., probably from Origen, says on Jn 11<sup>55</sup> οὐκ ἐστὶ ἀνάγκη ἢ πάντας συνδραμεῖν εἰς Ἱερουσόλυμα ἐν τῷ πάσχα ὡς ἐστὶ τῇ ἐκρησσηγίᾳ.

The Alogi, according to Epiphanius (Hær. li. 22), rejected St. John's Gospel as inconsistent with the rest, for the reason, among others, that instead of one Passover it records the observance of two. While they were about it, says Epiphanius, they might have accentuated the inconsistency by pointing to, not two, but three Passovers in this Gospel. Here the answer is again that St. John does not speak of the 'observance' of more than two Passovers by visits to Jerusalem.

Origen's Comm. on St. John is defective for chs. 5-7. But on ch. 4<sup>35</sup> (tom. xiii. 39, 41), against the view of the Valentinian commentator Heracleon, that the material harvest was four months off, and the season therefore winter, he pleads for the alternative of actual harvest-time from the sequence of the events in the succeeding chapters, where 4<sup>35</sup> is followed almost at once by the feast of 6<sup>1</sup>, and the feast of 5<sup>1</sup> by a mention of the Tabernacles as 'nigh at hand' (6<sup>1</sup> or 7<sup>2</sup>). The argument clearly postulates the absence of any intervening Passover at 6<sup>4</sup>; and though it is possible in the loss of the commentary on the verse itself to attribute this to mere oversight, yet the omission of τὸ πάσχα in Origen's text is made more probable by the evidence of his follower Cyril, the fourth and last witness alleged.

Cyril of Alexandria's Commentary, like those of so many later Fathers, is composite; his own contributions are inextricably mixed up with those of his predecessors, notably of Origen. Hence, if Cyril (ed. Pusey, i. 398, 399, 401) both gives the disputed words τὸ πάσχα, not only in the biblical text at the head of the section (a position where, no doubt, scribes were prone to replace the more familiar reading), but in two allusions at an earlier point; and at the same time explains our Lord's removal beyond the Sea of Galilee (Jn 6<sup>1</sup>) by his desire to avoid the thronging crowds whom the near approach of the Feast (not of Passover but) of Tabernacles would attract to Jerus.—the simplest solution of the inconsistency is to suppose that τὸ πάσχα really stood in Cyril's own text, and that the connexion of the Tabernacles with the retreat beyond Tiberias is repeated from Origen.

Thus of Hort's four witnesses the evidence of two, Irenæus and the Alogi, does not really bear on the point raised at all; while the testimony of Cyril, so far as it is adverse to the words, appears to resolve itself into the testimony of Origen. But it is much easier to suppose that Origen in his Commentary either conjecturally emended or altogether passed over a notice that he saw to be irreconcilable with his earlier conception of a single-year Ministry, than that he has alone preserved the apostolic text against the concurrence of all other authorities.

On no ground, external or internal, can the omission of the reference to a Passover in 6<sup>4</sup> be defended as original or genuine. The Fourth Gospel excludes the possibility of anything less than a two-year Ministry. The result is a quite simple chronology for the second half of the Gospel. From 6<sup>4</sup> to 11<sup>15</sup> the space covered is exactly a year, the autumn Feast of Tabernacles (7<sup>2</sup>) and the winter Feast of Dedication (10<sup>22</sup>) being signalized in the course of it. The earlier chapters (2<sup>13</sup> to 6<sup>4</sup>) present a more complicated problem, the solution of which depends primarily on the meaning to be attached to the notices of the season in 4<sup>35</sup> and of the feast in 5<sup>1</sup>.

(2) Jn 4<sup>35</sup>. Allusion is here made to two seasons of the year, a period four months from harvest: 'Say ye not, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest?'; and the harvest itself: 'Behold the fields, for they are white already to harvest.' Of these, only one of course can be meant in the literal sense; and the question is, which? The patristic exegesis of the passage shows that the difficulty was felt from the first. The earliest recorded commentator, the Valentinian Heracleon, 'like the majority, interpreted literally, and said that the material harvest was four months off, but that the harvest of which the Saviour was speaking, the harvest of souls, was ready and ripe.' Origen answers that it was rather the middle or end of harvest-time, for the connexion of the narrative proves that it cannot have been winter. You cannot allow, he says, as much as eight or nine months—April to January—after the pass-over of ch. 2, for there is nothing in the story to suggest so long a period, and the impression made on the Galileans at that passover was still fresh in their minds when Christ came on to Galilee after leaving Samaria (4<sup>45</sup>); nor can you allow as much again—January to October—between this episode and the Feast of Tabernacles soon to be mentioned: * Orig. in Jn. tom. xiii. 39, 41.

It is not possible at this stage to dismiss either explanation as in itself inadmissible. The words of the verse, especially the ἐτι, 'still four months,' have, perhaps, a more natural meaning if the harvest was actually four months off. On the other hand, the immediate context, the promise of the water which should quench all thirst, has been thought to suggest a warmer season than January, the discourses in St. John's Gospel being, it is said, always fitted to their external surroundings. On this view it has been supposed that the τετράμηνον is a proverbial phrase for the interval between seed-time and harvest, οὐχ ὑμεῖς λέγετε standing for τὸ λεγόμενον, the regular idiom for a proverb. It is said in answer that no such words are elsewhere preserved; but phrases of similar meaning, emphasizing the interval between preparation and fruition, are common in all languages. It is said also that a strict reckoning would make the interval rather six months than four; but the Rabbis (see Wetstein, ad loc.) were accustomed to divide the year into six stages of two months—seed-time, winter, spring, harvest, summer, dog-days—so that four months does actually cover the period between the two. Considering, too, the differences of climate in different parts of Palestine, and the differences of season between barley and wheat harvest, there is nothing improbable in supposing that the interval which can be described as one of six months can be described also as one of four.

Origen has really hit the mark in making the relation of the passage to the general chronological arrangement of the Gospel the determining factor in a date which could otherwise only be left open. This relation involves, in the first place, a discussion of the third and last of the doubtful time-notices in St. John.

(3) Jn 5<sup>1</sup>. Alternative readings ἐορτή and ἡ ἐορτή, and alternative explanations of either reading.

ἡ ἐορτή was analyzed in the discussion of Jn 6<sup>4</sup> above, and was found to imply either Passover or Tabernacles, though the very existence of a doubt as to the relative precedence of the two feasts made the use of the phrase without further definition unlikely in itself.

ἐορτή would leave the feast intended quite uncertain. Origen and Epiphanius both argue rightly that the indefiniteness excludes Passover; the former apparently made it Pentecost (as does his follower Cyril, though the text at the head of this section of the Commentary contains the article), the latter gives a choice between Pentecost and Tabernacles (Orig. in Jn. tom. xiii. 39; Epiph. Hær. li. 21, Dind.).† But just as Tabernacles is important enough to rival the claim of Passover to be meant by the definite ἡ ἐορτή, so equally with Passover it is too important to satisfy the indefinite ἐορτή, which must be referred to one of the less important festivals, Pentecost (May), Trumpets (September), Dedication (December), or Purim (February).

* The latter part of the argument is, of course, vitiated by Origen's neglect of the Passover of 6<sup>4</sup>; see above.

† The fact that Origen, who certainly did not read the article, uses of the same feast the words ἐορτή καὶ ἡ ἐορτή καὶ ταυταῖς . . . παραγίγνεται (tom. xiii. 64), shows how easily in oblique references the article would creep in.

* The first ears of barley harvest would be ready in the most forward districts at the end of March; the most backward wheat would be cut in June. April and May would be the principal harvest months.

As between the two readings, the article is found in κ C L A 1-118 83, the Egypt. VSS, Eusebius of Caesarea, Cyril-text (perhaps, too, Irenaeus, since he made the feast a Passover, see above on Jn 6<sup>4</sup>); it is omitted by A B D, Origen, Epiph. Chrys. and the Paschal Chronicle. The weight of external evidence favours the latter group, for it has not only early but varied attestation; whereas the other is of more homogeneous type, originally purely Alexandrine, and may easily owe its post-Nicene supporters to the influence of Eusebius of Caesarea, and the theory [which he brought into prominence of a three years' Ministry with four Passovers. And when to this is added the suspicious character just shown to attach on internal grounds to κ C L A, ισρη, without the article may confidently claim to represent the text of the evangelist.

Thus the first half of the Gospel gives (1) a passover, 2<sup>18, 23</sup>; (2) a note of time, either May or January, 4<sup>30</sup>; (3) an unnamed minor feast, 5<sup>1</sup>; (4) a second passover, 6<sup>4</sup>. These could be combined in more than one way to fit into a single year: e.g. (a) Passover—May—any lesser feast—Passover; or (β) Passover—January—Purim (February)—Passover.

But, Is the minimum duration of the Ministry which results from St. John's Gospel also the maximum? Is it to be assumed that if the notes of time in 2<sup>18-6</sup> can be co-ordinated into a single year, and those of 6<sup>4-11</sup><sup>29</sup> into a second, no further latitude is possible? This is the crucial question.

A negative answer is implied in Irenaeus, the earliest in time, the most trustworthy in position, of all extant patristic authorities (Har. II. xxii. 3-6). The limitation of the Ministry by the Valentinians to a single year he disproves at once from the record of three visits to Jerus. for the passover (see on Jn 6<sup>4</sup> above); but he finds also three other considerations which prove that the total length of the Ministry was far in excess, not only of one, but even of two or three years' duration. (i.) A priori: The Lord came to save and sanctify every age, whether of infants, children, boys, youths, or men, and to be at once the perfect example and the perfect master and teacher of all; their example, by passing himself through each of the stages of human life; their teacher, by attaining the age of teaching.* (ii.) Scriptural: St. John records (8<sup>57</sup>) that the Jews asserted that Jesus could not have seen Abraham, because he was still under fifty years old—a phrase implying that he was not far off fifty, at any rate over forty, since to a man between thirty and forty the retort would have been, 'Thou art not yet forty years old.' (iii.) Traditional: The elders who gathered round St. John during his long old age in Asia, disciples some of them, of other apostles as well, have all handed this down as the apostolic teaching. Of these arguments the first two do not come to much; but the third does establish a prima facie claim, only to be rebutted by the overwhelming evidence on the other side. Is there, then, no method of explaining, or at least minimizing, this at first sight conclusive appeal to Johannine tradition? In a later passage (v. xxxiii. 3) Irenaeus makes a similar appeal to 'the elders who had seen John, the disciple of the Lord,' and embodies their witness to the Lord's teaching about the Millennial times in a passage which he then defines as the written testimony of 'Papias, the hearer of John and companion of Polycarp'; and since Papias' work was primarily a commentary on sayings or oracles of the Lord, it is a legitimate conjecture that if the earlier passage contains a particular exegesis of the text Jn 8<sup>57</sup>, accompanied by emphasis on the authority of the elders, there, too, the authority and the exegesis are those of Papias, and probably of Papias only. But Papias had no title beyond that of antiquity to the exaggerated deference which Irenaeus pays him. A writer so 'feeble-minded' (the phrase is from Eusebius) would have been just the one to press home to its narrowest meaning the à fortiori argument, 'Thou art not yet fifty years old,' of the Jewish controversialists; it is even conceivable that he attributed the 'forty and six years' of the literal temple to the human temple of our Lord.

But because a theory which extends the length of the Ministry to ten or fifteen years is on all grounds untenable, it does not at once follow that an addition of one year, or even two, to the minimum implied by the recorded passovers would be equally out of court. At the same time, the cumulative effect of the four following considerations seems decisive against even this amount of deviation from the stricter interpretation of St. John's narrative.

α. However widely patristic writers differ from one another in their estimate of the number of passovers mentioned, they all, save Irenaeus (i.e. Papias?) only, agree in believing that the enumeration, whatever it is, is exhaustive. Origen in his earlier writings appears to have reckoned no more than the two passovers; consequently the Ministry lasted only 'a year and some months' (de Principiis, iv. 6). If Eusebius and the Paschal Chronicle find four Passovers in the text, they allot to the Ministry a period of between three years and four. If Jerome, Epiphanius, and Apollinaris speak of three Passovers, they also define the length of the Ministry as two years, or two years and so many days. In itself too much weight must not be attached to this consensus, since the natural tendency of chronologers is to make the most of what they find in their authorities, and to build up conclusions even where the data are slight and insufficient. In this case, however, the Fathers appear to be doing no violence to the intentions of the evangelist.

β. For if St. John wrote with earlier forms of the Gospel tradition in his mind or before his eyes, and made it one of his objects to supplement their deficiencies by restatement of neglected facts,—as with regard to the Judæan Ministry or the day of the Crucifixion,—it is reasonable to suppose that the numerous notes of time which mark off his narrative into stages are purposely introduced in definite contrast to the looser Synoptic account; and he could only remove the erroneous impression which had perhaps been deduced already from other Gospels as to the length of the Ministry, by substituting in his own Gospel an exact or fairly exact chronology. The proof that St. John mentions so many passovers, and so many only, amounts, then, to a presumptive proof that there were no more to mention.

The two preceding arguments are independent of the particular number of passovers recorded in St. John's Gospel; the two which follow derive their force from the result above established, that three passovers, or a minimum of two years, are there assigned to the Ministry.

γ. An early tradition, dating back certainly to the Gnostics of the 2nd cent., and perhaps to St. Luke himself, limited the Ministry to a single year; every year, therefore, added to the minimum of two years required by St. John makes it more difficult to understand how the error can have had so ancient an origin or so wide a diffusion.

δ. If the apparent narrowness of the framework in which the Synoptic narrative is set paved the way in part for the theory of the single year, an almost equally rapid succession of events is implied by two indications in the Fourth Gospel—indications which, but for the actual enumeration of the feasts, might well have seemed to limit the Ministry to an even shorter duration than two years. Ch 4<sup>46</sup> 'the Galileans received him, having seen all things that he did at Jerus. at the feast,' refers to 2<sup>23</sup> 'when he was in Jerus. at the passover at the feast, many believed on his name, beholding the signs which he was doing'; and ch. 7<sup>21-23</sup> 'One work I did, and ye are all marvelling. . . I made a man sound every whit on the sabbath day,' reaches back to 6<sup>1-2</sup>. Not only can there have been no visit to Galilee between 2<sup>23</sup> and 4<sup>46</sup>, no visit to Jerus. between 5<sup>1</sup> and 7<sup>21</sup>, but the intervals themselves must have been relatively small; eight or nine months is the outside limit for the former; and since many signs were performed at the first recorded visit to Jerus., the impression of the one miracle which marked the second visit would scarcely stand out with unique distinctness for much more than a similar period. As 7<sup>21</sup> was spoken at Tabernacles, and a Passover intervenes at 6<sup>4</sup>, this is so far an argument for not putting back the visit of 5<sup>1</sup> beyond the previous Purim (February).

The cumulative effect of these considerations warrants the conclusion that while two years must, not more than two years can, be allowed for the interval from Jn 2<sup>18, 23</sup> to Jn 11<sup>55</sup>; and it now remains only to ask how far the results established from St. John's Gospel agree with the more tentative results deduced from St. Mark's.

α compared with c. St. Mark's Gospel was shown (p. 406), if its order of events can be taken as chronological, to imply, exactly like St. John's, a two-year Ministry. Its second note of time, the spring of the miracle of the 5000, corresponds exactly to the Passover mentioned as 'nigh' on the same occasion in St. John (Mk 6<sup>30</sup>=Jn 6<sup>4</sup>). Its first note, the harvest of the ears of corn (Mk 2<sup>23</sup>), must, if recorded in its proper place, belong to the months immediately succeeding the passover of Jn 2. It would follow at once that the visit welcomed by the Galileans (Jn 4<sup>45</sup>), being the first visit to Galilee after Jn 2, must precede Mk 2<sup>23</sup>; and St. John's note of time in Samaria (Jn 4<sup>45</sup>) must be placed between the passover and the episode of the ears of corn, i.e. at the actual harvest season. Very soon after the passover—room has only to be found for the visit of Nicodemus—perhaps about April 20, since passover in A.D. 27 fell on April 11 or 12, Christ leaves Jerus. with his disciples and makes a stay in the 'land of Judæa' while John was still preaching; but the Baptist's arrest probably followed shortly, and may actually have been the cause of our Lord's removal through Samaria to Galilee, at a time when at least the barley was ripe, say about the middle of May (Jn 3<sup>22-24</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>, and Westcott, ad loc.). 'After the arrest of John, Jesus came into Galilee' is St. Mark's description of the same moment, 1<sup>14</sup>. So far the chronology is smooth enough; the difficulty is to know whether the six weeks, which is the utmost that can be allowed between the middle of May and the end of wheat harvest, are enough to cover the opening stages of the Galilean Ministry down to the episode of the ears of corn. It has been shown above (p. 406<sup>b</sup>) that within his first section St. Mark certainly groups events by subject-matter rather than by time, so that there is no a priori reason against placing the episode of the corn during, or even before, the circuit of the village-towns (κωμοπόλεις, i. 38), which is almost the only distinctively marked occurrence in these chapters. No doubt, however, such a scheme as this would crush the early Galilean Ministry into an uncomfortably narrow space; the double call of the apostles, for instance, is more appropriate if a substantial interval, during which they had returned to their ordinary avocations, elapsed between the return to Galilee in May and the second and final call. But if the harmonization is thought impossible, it is the chronological order of the events in St. Mark, and not the limitation of the Ministry to two years, which must be given up. The corn episode must be transferred to the second year of the Ministry, and placed after the miracle of the Five Thousand.

d. A secure result being thus established from the Gospels for the length of the Ministry, want of space compels the omission of the section on the evidence of antiquity,—evidence the less essential that it is wholly secondary, being based on deductions, some correct, some incorrect, from the Scriptures themselves. Suffice it to say briefly, that among ante-Nicene writers, against the evidence for a single year of the Ptolemaean Valentinians, the Clementine Homilies (xvii. 19), Clem. Al. (Strom. i. 145, vi. 279), Julius Africanus (Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. pp. 240, 306), Hippolytus' later works (Paschal Cycle and Chronicle), and Origen's earlier (in Levit. Hom. ix. 5, de Princ. iv. 5), are to be set, for a two to three years' Ministry, Melito (Routh, Rel. Sac. i. p. 121), Heracleon (to judge from his interpreting Jn 4<sup>36</sup> of winter), Tatian's Diatessaron, Hippolytus' Fourth Book on Daniel, and Origen (c. Celsum ii. 12, Comm. in Matt. xxiv. 15, and probably in the lost Comm. on Is. xxix. 1). No writer before Eusebius maintains a three to four years' Ministry.

E. THE DATE OF THE CRUCIFIXION.—a. The Four Gospels.—1. The dating by officials: a, the governor; β, the high priest.

a. All the Gospels besides the Acts and Pastoral Epistles name Pilate (Pontius Pilate in Mt 27<sup>2</sup>, Ac 4<sup>27</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>13</sup>) as the governor before whom Christ was tried. His tenure of the procuratorship is approximately fixed by Josephus, Ant. XVIII. ii. 2, iv. 2: (1) he came as successor to Valerius Gratus, whose eleven years, since they fell wholly under Tiberius, must have extended at least to A.D. 25; (2) he left after ten years of office, and was still on his way to Rome when Tiberius died, March A.D. 37, so that he can hardly have reached Palestine before A.D. 27; and as Lk 13<sup>1</sup> 23<sup>12</sup> (not to speak of Lk 3<sup>1</sup>) show that he was not quite newly come at the time of the Crucifixion, the possible passovers for the latter are reduced to nine, A.D. 28-36.

β. As high priest Caiaphas is named by St. Matthew (26<sup>3, 57</sup>), and so emphatically by St. John (11<sup>49</sup> 18<sup>13, 24</sup>) as to suggest that he is correcting the less technically accurate statement of St. Luke, who includes under the title both Caiaphas and his sometime previously deposed predecessor Annas (3<sup>2</sup> ἐπὶ ἀρχιερέως Ἀννα καὶ Καϊάφα; but in Ac 4<sup>6</sup> Annas to the exclusion of Caiaphas, Ἀννας ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς καὶ Καϊάφας). Caiaphas was appointed under Valerius Gratus before Pilate's time. He was deposed by Vitellius, legate of Syria, on the occasion of a visit to Jerus. for the passover, the year of which can be established within certain limits, for (1) his successor Jonathan was deposed by the same Vitellius during another visit for one of the festivals of A.D. 37—probably Pentecost,* since the news of Tiberius' death on March 16 arrived at the same time; at latest, therefore, Caiaphas' deposition was at the passover of A.D. 36, and the Crucifixion at the passover of A.D. 35; (2) the death of Herod Philip in the 20th year of Tiberius, A.D. 33-34, is mentioned by Josephus a page or two after the account of Caiaphas' removal, with the fairly precise indication τότε, 'at that time,' so that, if this order of events is correct, the Passover of A.D. 34 is the terminus ad quem for Caiaphas, and that of A.D. 33 for the Crucifixion. See Josephus, Ant. XVIII. ii. 2, iv. 3-v. 3.

The Crucifixion under Pilate and Caiaphas can hardly then lie outside the years A.D. 28-33.

2. The dating by the calendar: α, the day of the week; β, the day of the (Jewish) month.

a. Since the Resurrection admittedly falls on the first day of the week, Sunday, the Crucifixion, which was according to Jewish reckoning on the 'third day' before, took place on a Friday. No proof of this would be needed were it not that it has been strangely suggested (by Westcott, Introduction to the Study of the Gospels<sup>2</sup>, appendix to ch. vi. p. 348) that the day of the Crucifixion was not Friday but Thursday, on the ground of the prediction that the Son of man was to be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, Mt 12<sup>40</sup>. But against this view tradition and the NT are equally decisive: (1) The Wednesday and Friday fast is now traced back as far as the Didache, 8<sup>1</sup>. (2) The most common NT phrase for the day of the Resurrection in comparison with the Crucifixion is τῇ τριτῇ (Gospels eight times, besides 1 Co 15<sup>4</sup>), which in Gr. never did or could mean anything but 'on the second day,' whether the day after to-morrow or the day before yesterday; cf. Lk 13<sup>32</sup>, Ac 27<sup>18, 19</sup>, Ex 19<sup>10, 11</sup>, 1 Mac 9<sup>44</sup>. Even the apparently stronger phrases μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας (Mk 8<sup>4</sup>, Mt 27<sup>63, 64</sup>) and τρεῖς ἡμέρας καὶ τρεῖς νύκτας (Mt 12<sup>40</sup>), mean exactly the same thing; cf. Gn 42<sup>17, 18</sup> καὶ ἕτερο αὐτοὺς ἐν φυλακῇ ἡμέρας τρεῖς· ἑτερ

* If it had been the passover, Josephus would probably have mentioned the fact, as he does on the previous occasion of Caiaphas' deposition. If the passover of A.D. 37 fell on March 20-21, Pentecost was about May 8-9, seven to eight weeks after Tiberius' death.

β. But the day of the week must be combined with the day of the month before any further results can be attained. On what day, then, of the (Jewish) month did the Crucifixion fall?

The passover was kept at the full moon of Nisan, the first month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year; and the months being lunar and commencing with the new moon, the full moon fell about the 15th. On the 14th, in the afternoon, the paschal lamb was killed, Ex 12<sup>6</sup> explained by Josephus, BJ VI. ix. 3, ἀπὸ ἐνάτης ὥρας μέχρι δέκατης, and Philo (ed. Mangey, ii. 292) κατὰ μεσημβρίαν ἕως ἑσπέρης; it was eaten on the evening of the same natural day, but as the Jewish day began at sunset, that was already Nisan 15. On the 16th the first-fruits of the barley harvest were offered or 'waved' before the Lord (Lv 23<sup>11, 15</sup>; Jos. Ant. III. x. 5). The whole feast of unleavened bread lasted seven days, from the 15th to the 21st inclusive.

Whether the Crucifixion fell on the 14th or on the 15th, whether (that is) the passover by a few hours followed it or preceded it, has always been a question. For the present purpose, however, it is only an important one in so far as it may happen that in any one of the possible years Friday might be reconcilable with one but not with the other of the two days. But the observation of the Jewish months often cannot be restored with such absolute certainty that if Friday could be Nisan 14 in any particular year it could not be Nisan 15, or vice versa. Moreover, the arguments on each side (unlike most of the points treated hitherto) are well represented in accessible authorities: see in favour of the 14th—Sanday, Authorship and Historical Character of the Fourth Gospel, ch. xii., or Westcott, Introduction to the Gospels, appendix to ch. vi.: for the 15th—Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, ii. 479–482; Lewin, Festi Sacri, p. xxxi; McClellan, New Testament, pp. 473–494. No more then need be said here upon the Gospels than that, while prima facie the evidence of St. John tells for the 14th and that of the Synoptists for the 15th, indications are not wanting in the synoptic narrative (e.g. the episodes of Simon of Cyrene and of the deposition from the Cross, Mk 15<sup>21–27</sup>), which confirm the Johannine view. Probably, here as elsewhere St. John in repeatedly implying that the passover was still future (13<sup>4</sup> πρὸ δὲ τῆς ἑορτῆς τοῦ πάσχα, 13<sup>29</sup> ἀγόρασαν ὧν χρεῖαν ἔχουσιν εἰς τὴν ἑορτήν, 18<sup>28</sup> ἵνα μὴ μανθῶσιν ἀλλὰ φάωσιν τὸ πάσχα) is intending to correct silently a false impression to which other accounts had, or might have, given rise.*

For the decisive evidence of Christian antiquity, reaching back probably to St. Paul himself, in favour of Nisan 14, see below, p. 412.

In which years, then, between the already established limits A.D. 28–33, could Friday have fallen on the 14th—regard being also had to the less probable 15th—of Nisan?

The matter is not so simple as it looks; for it is never possible to be certain which day was reckoned as the new moon or first of any given month, and not always possible to be certain which month was reckoned as the Nisan or first of any given year.

(1) How was the beginning of a Jewish month fixed? Theoretically, no doubt, by simple observation; and since astronomers can calculate the true time of conjunction for any new moon, it is possible, by adding so many hours (not less than about 30) for the crescent to become visible, and by taking the first sunset after that, to know when each month ought to have begun, if the Jewish observations were accurately made. But what was to happen when observation was impossible? Was the new month to be put off as long as every night happened to be cloudy? Were the Jews of the dispersion from Babylon to Rome to be left ignorant on what day the new month was commencing in Jerusalem? Empiric methods must have been qualified by the permanent rules of some sort of calendar. It must at least have been recognised that, the average length of a lunation being 29½ days, no month could be less than 29 or more than 30 days.

The subjoined table (cf. Salmon, Introd. to NT. appendix to Lect. xv.; Mas Latrie, Trésor de Chronologie, p. 94) gives, first, the terminus paschalis or 14th of the paschal moon according to the present Christian calendar; secondly, the beginning of the 14th day, reckoned from the time of the astronomical new moon of Nisan; and thirdly, the fourteenth day, reckoned from the first appearance of the new moon at sunset (it being remembered that the Jewish day began at that hour)—

A.D.	28	Sa.	27 M.	23 M., 2 a.m.	(29-) 30 M.
	29	F.	15 A.	15 A., 8 p.m.	(17-) 18 A.
	30	Tu.	4 A.	4 A., 8 p.m.	(6-) 7 A.
	31	Sa.	24 M.	25 M., 1 a.m.	(26-) 27 M.
	32	Sa.	12 A.	11 A., 1 p.m.	(13-) 14 A.
	33	W.	1 A.	1 A., 1 p.m.	(2-) 3 A.
					or (3-) 4 A.

The first and third columns may safely be taken to represent the possible extremes in any year, and it will be seen at once that Friday cannot have fallen on Nisan 14 or 15 in the three years A.D. 28, 31, 32—in each of these the choice lies from Saturday to Monday or Tuesday for the 14th, and from Sunday to Tuesday or Wednesday for the 15th—and must be sought for therefore in one of the remaining years, A.D. 29, 30, 33.

(2) But how is it certain that the full moons just given were those of Nisan rather than of some other month?

Nisan was originally that lunation before the middle of which the first ears of barley harvest were ripe (Dt 16<sup>9</sup>, Lv 23<sup>10</sup>); and it, when the previous month Adar ended, the earliest barley was not within a fortnight of being ripe, a 15th month, Veadar, was intercalated. But as with the month, so also for the commencement of each year, a systematic calendar must soon have replaced simple observation, for strangers from the Dispersion could not visit Jerus. for the passover unless they knew beforehand whether a 13th month were to be intercalated or not. Such a method as was wanted for correlating the lunar months with the solar year exists in the still familiar rule that the paschal full moon is that immediately following the spring equinox; and this was certainly in use—nor is there any trace of any rival system of harmonization—before the Christian era.*

But the equinox itself, though the reckoning of it varied only within narrow limits, was not an absolutely fixed point. The computation ultimately accepted by the whole Christian world, that of the Alexandrians of the 4th cent., fixed it on March 21. But Anatolius of Laodicea (see the passage of his κωνίσις τοῦ πάσχα, A.D. 277, preserved in Eus. HE vii. 32), assigning the first new moon of the first year of his cycle to Phenomenon 26 = a.d. xi kal. Apr. = March 22, says that the sun is then already in the 4th day of the first τμήμα (or 12th part of his annual course from equinox to equinox), which he therefore placed on March 19. Moreover, according to the same authority, there were those who, disregarding the equinoctial limit, erroneously took for the paschal month what was really not the first month of one year but the last of the preceding—and that against the testimony of the old Jewish authorities, Philo, Josephus, Maimonides, and the still earlier Agathobulus and Aristobulus. Who these people were whom he is attacking, Anatolius in the extant fragment does not say; but the evidence of various 4th cent. writers makes it all but certain that they were the Jews of his day. The Encyclical Letter of Constantine at Nicæa dissuades from imitation of the Jewish pascha, celebrated as it is 'twice in one year': the Apostolic Constitutions recommend independence of Jewish calculations and careful attention to the equinox, lest the feast should recur 'twice in one year'—i.e. once rightly, just after the one spring equinox, and once wrongly, just before the next; and the Paschal Homily of pseudo-Chrysostom (A.D. 387) appeals from the contemporary Jews and their neglect of the equinox to their wise men of antiquity, Philo, Josephus, and others, in terms which seem to be borrowed direct from Anatolius. (Socrates, HE i. 9; Apost. Const. v. 17; Chrysostom, ed. Bened. viii. Appendix, p. 277; cf., too, Epiphanius, Har. i. 3.)

It is quite likely that this supposed error of the Jews simply meant that they reckoned the equinox earlier than their Christian contemporaries, better equipped in astronomical knowledge, had learned to do; with the result that the Jews would be sometimes keeping the passover when the Christians, holding that the equinox was not yet past, waited for the next full moon. In any case the farther back the Church's paschal calculations can be traced, the earlier does the equinox appear to have been set. Anatolius himself put it two days before the Alexandrian reckoning, just as Hippolytus, the first known author of a Christian cycle (A.D. 222), put it a day before Anatolius. And both Jews and Christians of primitive times may quite possibly have reckoned it a day earlier even than the March 18 of Hippolytus.

* Philo (op. cit. ii. 293) connects the title of 'first month' given to Nisan in the OT with the concurrence of the spring equinox as an annual reminder of the beginning of all things; and see below for the catena of Jewish authorities appealed to by Anatolius, who quotes the actual language of 'Aristobulus, one of the Seventy.'

* The regular synoptic use of τὸ πάσχα for the supper on the evening of Nisan 13–14 is possibly illustrated by passages in Philo, περὶ τῆς ἰσθμῆς καὶ τῶν ἰσθμῶν, which seem to distinguish the πάσχα of the 14th from the εἴσημα of the 15th–21st (ii. 278, 292, 298); e.g. (1) τὰ ἑσπέρη δι' ἰσθμῶν τῶν διαβατηρίων ἢ καλῶν τῶν πάσχα πύργου δι' ἡ τῶν ἀποκρισίων ἀπαρχῆς, τὸ ἱερὸν δρᾶμα διὰ τὸ εἶναι. (2) εἴηται δι' ὃ παροξυσμὸς θύειν τὴν ἀποκρισίων τῶν μηνῶν. (3) τὰ ἑσπέρη δι' ἡ τῶν διαβατηρίων ἰσθμῶν. εἴσημα. Does St. Mark, ἡ δι' τὸ πάσχα καὶ τὸ εἴσημα ταῖς δύο ἡμέραις (14), imply a consciousness of this distinction? Contrast, however, Mt 26<sup>7</sup>, Mk 14<sup>12</sup>, Lk 22<sup>7</sup>.

Now, in the list of the six passovers of A.D. 28-33 there was one year, A.D. 29, in which the new moon of Nisan is placed as late as April 2, 8 p.m., and the 14th as late as April 15-18; but the argument of the last two paragraphs shows that the previous lunation, if its new moon fell in the early hours of March 4 and its 14th on March 17-19, has an equal or superior claim to be considered the month of Nisan. The 14th in this case, if it fell on March 18, would actually be a Friday; and March 18 is really the most probable of the alternatives. It is true that calculation from the phasis of the new moon after sunset would make Nisan 1=March 6, Nisan 14=March 19. But the caution has already been given that simple observation must have been superseded before A.D. 29 by calendar rules; and one of these rules, which may well go back to our Lord's time, was that Adar never consisted of more than 29 days; Nisan therefore commenced a day sooner in relation to the new moon than if it had followed a month of 30 days, so that in this year Nisan 1 would rather be March 5. Suppose, further, that the equinox was calculated one day earlier than by Hippolytus, two days earlier than by Anatolius, and Nisan 14=March 18, A.D. 29, satisfies the equinoctial limit also.

Three years then, A.D. 29, 30, 33, satisfy the Gospel evidence for the date of the Crucifixion: and the choice between them must now be made by recourse to other authorities.

b. Tradition outside the Gospels.

1. The Jewish Date.—Though the evidence obtained from these supplementary sources deals, as a rule, with Roman or other civil computations, the question as between Nisan 14 and 15 is definitely answered by a continuous chain of tradition from the 1st cent. to the 4th.

St. Paul wrote his First Epistle to the Corinthians about passover-time (5th ὥστε ἐορτάζωμεν, cf. 16th), and paschal symbolism underlies his allusions both to the Crucifixion, 5th ἐκαθάρσατε τὴν παλαιὰν ζύμην . . . καὶ γὰρ τὸ πάσχα ἡμῶν ἐτίθη Χριστός, and to the Resurrection, 15th νυνὶ δὲ Χριστὸς ἐγήγερται ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀπαρχὴ τῶν κεκοιμημένων. On Nisan 14 and 16, then, the days of the sacrifice of the passover and of the offering of the first-fruits, St. Paul's Churches appear to have kept the memorials of the Crucifixion and of the Resurrection. In the next century the Quartodecimans, by their name implies, observed Nisan 14, not 15: the theory of the Tübingen school, that what these Johannine Churches observed on the 14th was not the Crucifixion but the Last Supper, is too preposterous to call for refutation. Definite testimony for the 14th, from lost writings of three 'holy Fathers of the Church,' is quoted in the Paschal Chronicle (A.D. 641: ed. Ducange, pp. 6, 7). (i.) Claudius Apollinarius of Hierapolis, c. A.D. 180, in his περὶ τοῦ πάσχα λόγος accused of ignorance those who connected the 14th, not with the true Lord's passover, the great Sacrifice, but with the Last Supper,* and put the Crucifixion on the 15th, on the supposed authority of St. Matthew's Gospel: a view, he says, which is out of harmony with the law,—apparently because the paschal lamb is an OT type of Christ,—and sets the Gospels at variance with one another, obviously because St. John was admitted to give the quartodeciman date. (ii.) Clement of Alexandria, in a work bearing the same title, contrasted the years before the Ministry, when Christ ate the Jewish passover, with the year of his preaching, when he did not eat it, but suffered on the 14th, being himself the paschal Lamb of God, and rose on the third day [the 16th], on which the Law commanded the priest to offer the sheaf of first-fruits. (iii.) Hippolytus of Portus, in his De pascha and Adv. omnes haereses [to be distinguished from the now recovered longer treatise, Refutatio omnium haeresium], asserted that Christ ate a supper before the passover, but not the legal passover: οὗτος γὰρ ἦν τὸ Πάσχα τὸ προκεκρυγμένον καὶ τελειούμενον τῇ ὁρισμένῃ ἡμέρᾳ.

Of other early writers Irenaeus (iv. x. 1) is hardly clear; but Tertullian (adv. Jud. 8)* seems to imply Nisan 14. Africanus is quite unambiguous, πρὸ δὲ τῆς μᾶς τοῦ πάσχα τὰ περὶ τὸν Σωτῆρα συνέβη (Chronicon, fr. 50 ap. Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. 297). Even as late as the end of the 4th cent. three writers, all specialists on chronology, can still be cited on the same side: Epiphanius, Haer. l. 2, εἶδε γὰρ τὸν Χριστὸν ἐν τεσσαρεσκαίδεκάτῃ ἡμέρᾳ θύεσθαι; Ps.-Chrysostom (A.D. 387: ed. Bened. viii. App. p. 281), the Crucifixion fulfils the Mosaic ordinance that the lamb should be sacrificed between the evenings on the 14th; Julius Hilarianus (A.D. 397: de die paschae et mensis xv, ap. Gallandi, viii. 748), the sacrifice of a lamb from the flock is replaced by the sacrifice of the Lord Christ himself on luna xiv. Add to these Anon. in Cramer's Catena in Mt. p. 237, and Orosius, Hist. vii. 4. 15, the darkness took place ἐν τῇ δ' ἡμέρᾳ τῆς σελήνης, quartam decimam ex die lunae, as well as the Paschal Chronicle itself and the σύντομος διήγησις, an Egyptian system incorporated in it (ed. Ducange, pp. 221, 225).

But by this time the opposite view, which first emerges in the 3rd cent.—in the West, Ps.-Cyprian, Computus de pascha (A.D. 243: Hartel's Cyprian, iii. 248), § 9 manducavit pascha, § 21 passus est luna xv; in the East, Origen on Mt 26th (Delarue, iii. 895), Iesus celebravit more Iudaico pascha corporaliter . . . quoniam . . . factus est sub lege—was beginning to be the prevalent one. So certainly Ambrose, ad epp. Amilius (c. A.D. 386: ed. Bened. ii. 880), Chrysostom (e.g. Hom. in Mt. lxxxii. ed. Field, ii. 461), the passover superseded by the Eucharist, τὸ κεφάλαιον τῶν ἐορτῶν αὐτῶν καταλύνει ἐφ' ἑτέραν αὐτοὺς μετατιθεὶς τράπεζαν), Proterius of Alexandria, ad Papam Leonem (A.D. 444, printed as ep. cxxxiii. in the Ballerini Leo) xiv luna mensis primi . . . pascha manducans . . . sequenti die xv luna crucifigitur; and probably Theophilus of Alexandria, ad Theodosium Imp. iv. (A.D. 386: Gallandi, vii. 615); for though the Greek has τῇ τεσσαρεσκαδικαταίᾳ, the Latin decimaquinta tallies with Ambrose and Proterius, who both appear to be borrowing from Theophilus.

This later view appears to be derived from the use of πάσχα in the Synoptic Gospels: Origen, its most influential supporter, is directly commenting on the text of St. Matthew. On the other hand, none of the earlier witnesses for the 14th, save Apollinarius, the champion of the Johannine Churches of Asia Minor, appeal to St. John's Gospel; rather they represent an independent and * Strictly, of course, the Last Supper and the Crucifixion were on the same Jewish day; but early Christian usage soon began to use, even for these days of the lunar month, not the Jewish reckoning from sunset to sunset, but the ordinary reckoning from midnight to midnight. Apollinarius distinguishes the two days just in the same way as Clement puts the washing of the feet on the 13th, the Passover on the 14th.

* In favour of the genuineness of chs. 1-8 of this treatise see Fuller Dict. Christ. Biogr. iv. 827b; Harnack Gesch. der altchr. Litteratur, i. 671: against, Burkitt Old Latin and Italy, pp. 6, 7.

decisive confirmation of it by the living voice of primitive tradition.

2. The civil year may be identified either by the consuls or by the regnal years of the emperor; less frequently by reckoning from some one of the special eras in use in the East, such as the Olympiads or the era of Alexander (otherwise called of the Greeks), B.C. 312.

a. The earliest authority who appears to have fixed the Crucifixion by implication to a definite year is the pagan annalist Phlegon, whose 'chronological collection on the Olympiads' ranged from Ol. 1. 1 (n.c. 776) down to the times of Hadrian, A.D. 117-138. A general account of the work is given by the patriarch Photius (cod. 97), though even he failed to get beyond the fifth book, or about A.D. 170. Photius summarizes the last chapter which he read, as a sample of the style and contents of the whole, concluding that 'the reader gets regularly bored with the lists of names and of victors in the Olympic contests, and with the excessive and unseasonable details about prodigies and prophecies, which crowd out all real history.' Probably it was this interest in the marvellous which led Phlegon to mention the predictions of Jesus Christ, though his knowledge was so vague that, if Origen's phrase is rightly understood, he confused the personalities (or perhaps only the miracles) of Christ and of St. Peter (c. Cels. ii. 14, συγχύσις ἐστὶν τῶν ἀπὸ Πέτρου καὶ τοῦ Χριστοῦ).

What gives him his interest for the present purpose is that he recorded under Ol. 202. 4 (A.D. 32-33) the darkness which accompanied the Crucifixion; though, since the evidence is at second or even at third hand, it is difficult to disentangle his actual words. (i.) The reference in the middle of a fragment quoted by Syncellus from the Chronicon of Julius Africanus (Fr. 50; Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. 237, 477) is, as Routh has seen, probably an interpolation due to Syncellus' confused recollections of Eusebius. (ii.) The earliest genuine allusions are two in Origen: c. Cels. ii. 33, Phlegon recorded in the 13th or 14th book of his Chronicles the eclipse under Tiberius and the great earthquakes of that time: Comm. in Mt. 134 (Delarue, iii. 922), heathen opponents urge that an eclipse, such as the Gospels mention,* cannot possibly take place at full moon.—Phlegon recorded, indeed, an eclipse under Tiberius, but not an eclipse at full moon. (iii.) But though he did not mention the full moon in so many words, an Anonymous in Crainer's Catena in Mt. p. 237—followed by pseudo-Origen in Mt. (see Routh, op. cit. 479)—does assert that he related the eclipse as a marvel, συνάδελφος γὰρ αὐτοῦ, and the Christian writer naturally understood by the 'paradox' the coincidence with the full moon. (iv.) A further restoration of Phlegon is possible from the Chronicle of Eusebius as represented in the Armenian version, in Jerome's Latin version, and in the quotations of George Syncellus. 'In the same year as the Crucifixion (i.e. Tiberius 19; see below) the following notice occurs in pagan historians: "the sun was eclipsed; an earthquake occurred in Bithynia, and most of Nicæa fell to the ground": still more precisely Phlegon, the celebrated chronographer of the Olympiads, registers in his 13th book, under Ol. 202. 4 (A.D. 32-33), "an eclipse of the sun more striking than any previously on record, for it became night at the sixth hour of the day, so that stars were visible in the heavens; and a great earthquake in Bithynia overthrew most of Nicæa." Obviously, these two quotations are not independent of one another; the first and more general looks like a summary by some intermediate writer of the same passage from Phlegon which Eusebius then transcribes direct and in full.

That Phlegon was here drawing again on Christian sources, whether the canonical Gospels or not, appears not to have been suspected by Origen or Eusebius, but in face of the mention of the '6th hour' cannot admit of doubt. It does not, however, follow that he borrowed the year also from them; for an annalist, if he has not found a precise date in his authorities, is bound to invent one. If he ascribed the portents of the Crucifixion to the 202nd Olympiad simply, A.D. 29-33, he would not stand in manifest contradiction to the other early evidence. But if he really fixed them particularly to the 4th year, A.D. 33, he is the only witness before Eusebius' time to do so; and in that case the most probable hypothesis is that he knew from his Christian authorities no more (and from the Gospels as they stand he could hardly have learned more) than that the Crucifixion fell in the latter part of Tiberius' reign, and fixed on A.D. 33 because he may have already found reason to select that year for the Bithynian earthquake.

Eusebius, however, found Phlegon's date harmonize admirably with his own theory of the length of the Ministry, and so his Chronicle assigns the Baptist's mission (after Lk 3!) to Tiberius 16, the mission of Christ to Tiberius 16, and the Passion to Tiberius 19 (A.D. 33).† The latter item is guaranteed both by Syncellus, Trouv. d' Hist. Tiberien 361-362, and by the Armenians; Jerome, no doubt because he allotted to the Ministry only two to three years, and not like Eusebius three to four, substitutes Tiberius 18.

β. Far more important is the tradition—found, it is true, in no extant authority as ancient as Phlegon, but found in so many authorities that the common source must ascend to a remote antiquity—which fixes the Crucifixion in the consulship of the two Gemini, or in the 15th or the 16th year of Tiberius, or in the year 340 of the Greeks.

L. Rubellius Geminus and C. Fufius (or Rufius, or Rufus, or Fufius) Geminus were the consuls of A.D. 29. The Seleucid era (era of Alexander, era of the Greeks) commences Sept. B.C. 312, so that its 340th year runs from Sept. A.D. 28 to Sept. A.D. 29. But this same spring of A.D. 29 can be reckoned, according to different methods of calculation, as belonging either to the 15th or 16th year of Tiberius, who succeeded Augustus in Aug. A.D. 14, so that, on the strict reckoning, the passover falling in his 15th year will be that of A.D. 29. But the imperial year might sometimes be adjusted to the calendar year—to which corresponded the consul's tenure of office, Jan. 1 to Dec. 31—by beginning a second imperial year on the first New Year's day of each reign: compare the practice of Trajan and his successors in commencing a 2nd year of tribunicia potestas on the annual inauguration day of new tribunes next after their accession (Lightfoot, Ignatius, ii. 398). In this case the 15th year would be exactly equivalent to A.D. 28, the 16th to A.D. 29. Or again, the example of the chronographers suggests that the converse might be done and the fractional year simply omitted, each emperor's first year beginning on some fixed day: thus, for instance, it will be shown (see below in part II. of this article, THE APOSTOLIC AGE, under Felix and Festus, p. 418) that Eusebius appears to commence each emperor's 1st year in the Sept. following his accession. Either year then is compatible—but the 15th more normally—with the spring of A.D. 29, under the consulship of the Gemini.*

(i.) Clement of Alexandria, 'With the 15th year of Tiberius and 15th of Augustus, so are completed the 30 years to the Passion; and from the Passion to the destruction of Jerusalem are 42 years 3 months,' Strom. i. 147 (Potter, i. 407). (ii.) Origen, perhaps copying Clement, 'If you examine the chronology of the Passion and of the fall of Jerusalem . . . from Tiberius 15 to the razing of the temple, 42 years are completed,' Hom. in Hierem. xiv. 13 (c. A.D. 245; Delarue, iii. 217), and compare c. Cels. iv. 22. (iii.) Tertullian, 'In the 15th year of [Tiberius'] reign Christ suffered'; 'the Passion . . . under Tiberius Caesar in the consulship of Rubellius Geminus and Rufius (cf. Fufius) Geminus,' adv. Jud. 8 (but the authorship is doubtful). (iv.) Hippolytus, in his early 4th book on Daniel (ed. Bratke, p. 19), gives two irreconcilable data, Tiberius 18 [=A.D. 31, 32] and the consulship of 'Rufius and Rubellio,' the former doubtless his own combination of a three years' Ministry (for he also says that Christ suffered in his 33rd year, loc. cit.) with St. Luke's 15 Tiberius, the latter already traditional; and this year, 29 A.D., alone reappears in his other works. His Chronicle (Chronica Minora, ed. Mommsen, I. i. p. 131) reckons 206 years from the Passion to the 13th of Alexander Severus, A.D. 234-235; his Paschal Cycle marks the 32nd year as that of the Passion, and since it was a recurring cycle of 112 years beginning in A.D. 222, the 32nd year will be equivalent to A.D. 253, or 141, or 29 (v.) Julius Africanus, as represented in the Greek of Eusebius' Demonstratio Evangelica and Eclogia Prophetica, and in that of Syncellus—Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. pp. 301, 302, 304—wrote Tiberius 16, as represented in the Lat. of Jerome, Comm. in Dan. ix. (Vallarsi, v. 683), Tiberius 15; but since all authorities agree in the equation to Ol. 202. 2 [=A.D. 30, 31], it is practically certain that the 16th is correct. (vi.) Pseudo-Cyprian, Computus de Pascha, 20 (A.D. 243; Hartel, iii. 297) places the Passion of Christ in the 31st year of his age, and 16th of Tiberius Caesar's reign. (vii.) Lactantius, Div. Inst. iv. x. 18, 'In the 5th of Tiberius, that is, the consulship of the two Gemini' (viii.) The Apoc. legend as given in Eusebius, HE i. 13, dates the Resurrection and the preaching of Thaddæus in the 340th year (i.e. of the Greeks: A.D. 28-29). (ix.) Of one other authority, the apoc. Gospel narrative entitled 'Acts of Pilate,' the value turns entirely on the date of its composition, and on the true reading of its chronology of the Crucifixion; and both these points call for fuller discussion.

Date of the Acts of Pilate.—Tischendorf, the latest editor (Evangelia Apocrypha, ed. 2, 1876, pp. 312-410), concludes for the beginning of the 2nd cent.; Lipsius, the latest critic (Die Pilatus-Acten, 1886, pp. 33, 40), 'not before about the middle of the 4th,' 'probably in the reign of Julian' (A.D. 361-363). Appeal is made to these Acts for the date of the Crucifixion by pseudo-Chrysostom (A.D. 387; ed. Bened. viii. App. p. 277); so, too, Epiphanius (A.D. 376; HE i. 1) states that certain of the Quartodecimans commemorated the Passion always on March 25 in reference to these Acts, though he himself had found copies of them where the date given was not March 25 but March 18. Now, if in A.D. 376 these Acts were being claimed as the authoritative sanction for a practice unique in the Christian world, and if there existed already divergent traditions of the text on this very point for which they were cited, they must surely have had at that date a history behind them. So far from having been written under Julian, a presumption is raised that they are earlier than the lost Acts published under * Mt 27:45 = Mk 15:33 simply σκότος ἐγένετο; but in Lk 23:44 the true text appears to add τοῦ ἡλίου καὶ τῆς σελήνης with MBCL, both Egyptian versions, Origen 2/3, (rather 2/5) and Cyril of Jerusalem 4/5.

† On Eusebius' reckoning of imperial years see immediately below.

* But the 16th year—see below under Africanus and pseudo-Cyprian—may also be a combination of Lk 3! (Tib. 15), as giving the beginning, not of the Baptist's ministry only, but of Christ's, with the estimate of one year for the duration of the Ministry to which both these writers adhered. Julius Hilarianus, however (379/80, p. 414*), gives both Tiberius 16 and A.D. 29.

the same title by the apostate Theotecnus (minister of the persecutor Maximian Daza; Mason, Persecution of Diocletian, pp. 321-323), who perhaps drew from them the idea of his own forgery. That, as Lipsius has shown, the chronological prologue bears in all the extant authorities clear traces of Eusebius' influence, proves no more than that these Acts, like so many other apocrypha, were subject to successive recastings. Nor are the arguments by which Harnack (Chronologie, pp. 603-612) reinforces Lipsius at all conclusive. On the other hand, the treatment of the charge in scriptis signaverat seems to speak strongly for an early date; for even if Theotecnus revived the scandal, which is possible enough, a Christian counterblast would have used far stronger language than do the extant Acts about the virginity of the Mother of our Lord. The author was not improbably a second-century Palestinian of Ebionite tendencies.

Chronology of the Acts of Pilate.—Tischendorf's text of the prologue translated runs: 'In the 15th year [so with two Greek MSS; two others and one of the two Armenian recensions—see Conybeare's edition, Studia Biblica, iv., Oxford, 1896—give '18th'; the Latin, the second Armenian, and apparently the Coptic have '19th'] of the government of Tiberius Caesar, emperor of the Romans, and of Herod, king of Galilee, in the 19th year of his rule, on the 8th before the kalends of April, which is the 25th of March, in the consulship of Rufus and Rubellio, in the 4th year of the 202nd Olympiad, Joseph Calaphas being high priest of the Jews.' Undenially, the references to Tiberius 19, to Herod and his 19th year, to Ol. 202. 4, are derived from Eusebius' Chronicle; but these may be due to later revision, and there are other data, the 16th of Tiberius, the two Gemini, the 25th or 18th of March, which are as certainly not Eusebian, though the consulship at least is as constant a factor in the different versions as the year of Herod or the Olympiad. Considering how many vicissitudes befell all early Christian literature, how just the apocryphal Gospels would be picked out to satisfy the demand for sacred books in Diocletian's persecution, how easily each generation (all the more that exuberant fancies were allowed no play upon the canonical records) would embellish such material by aid of the newest lights, it is no unreasonable hypothesis that a 'Eusebian' recension has influenced all existing copies, while two of them still betray in their '16th of Tiberius' a relic of the unrevised document in a point where the redactor has most certainly been at work. On this view no more is original than 'In the 15th year of Tiberius, on the 8th [more probably 15th, see below] before the kalends of April, in the consulship of Rufus and Rubellio, in the high priesthood of Joseph Calaphas.'

Here, then, are nine ante-Nicene authorities, of whom four ('Tert.', Hipp., Lact., Act.-Pil.) give the consulship of the Gemini, four (Clem., Or., 'Tert.', Act.-Pil.) Tiberius 15, two (Afr., Ps.-Cyp.) Tiberius 16. Five post-Nicene Western authorities on the same side need simply be catalogued: Liberian Chronicle (A.D. 354; Lightfoot, Clement, i. 253) 'under Tiberius, consuls the two Gemini, March 25'; Julius Hilarianus, De mundi duratione xvi., and De die paschæ et mensis vi (both A.D. 397; Gallandi, viii. 238, 748), 'Tiberius 16', De mundi dur. xvii., also '809 years from the Passion to the consulate of Casarius and Atticus' (A.D. 397), which clearly cannot mean anything later than A.D. 29; Sulpicius Severus, Chronica, ii. 27 (A.D. 401), 'Herod 18, consuls Fufius Geminus and Rubellius Geminus,' where the Herod date must be from Jerome's version (A.D. 378) of Eusebius' Chronicle; Augustine, De civ. Dei xviii. 54, 'consuls the two Gemini, March 25'; Prosper Tiro, Chronica (A.D. 433; Chronica Minora, ed. Mommsen, i. ii. p. 400), distinguishes what quidam ferunt, i.e. Jerome's chronology, from the vetustior traditio of 'Tiberius 16, consuls the two Gemini.' The Western Church, then, during the century A.D. 350-450, notwithstanding the authority of Jerome's Chronicle, still upheld the traditional date for the Crucifixion in A.D. 29.

γ. (i.) Of divergent notices, the earliest after Philegon—not counting Hippolytus' 18th of Tiberius, since he himself discarded it—is again from a heathen writing, the Acts of Pilate by Theotecnus. Eusebius (HE i. 9) thought it enough proof of forgery that they ascribed the Crucifixion to Tiberius' 4th consulship, for this fell in the 7th year only of his reign (A.D. 21), and Pilate did not even reach Judæa till the 12th. But Lipsius (l.c. p. 31) points out that Tiberius' next consulship in A.D. 31, though Eusebius reckoned it the 5th, is the 4th in the Fasti Idatiani (the common ground-work of the consular lists in Epiphanius and the Paschal Chronicle), so that Theotecnus may really have meant, not A.D. 21 but A.D. 31. (ii.) Of Eusebius' Chronicle, both in the original and (iii.) in Jerome's version, mention was made in connexion with Philegon; of its followers there is no need to speak. (iv.) Epiphanius (A.D. 376; Har. ii. 22-25) writes out in full a consular list from his date for the Nativity, Jan. a.c. 2, to his date for the Baptism, Nov. A.D. 28.* Beyond this point the Ministry extends over two complete consulships, the one that of the two Gemini, the second that of Rufus and Rubellio, and closes only in the third, that of Vinicius and Longinus Cassius. Obviously intending to come down to March A.D. 31, he has, by the error—gross even for him—of splitting into two the single pair of A.D. 29, Rubellius Geminus and Fufius Geminus, named in fact for the Crucifixion the consuls of A.D. 30. It is possible that behind the confusion lies some older authority who reckoned a shorter Ministry with the Passion under Vinicius and Longinus in their real year. (v.) Paulus Orosius (A.D. 417; Hist. vii. 4. 13) gives Tiberius 17 for the Crucifixion, presumably reckoning two years as from the Baptism in Tiberius 15.

Summary of Patristic Evidence for the Civil Year.—A review of this witness from Philegon to Epiphanius, from Tertullian to Augustine and Prosper, sums itself up in two questions: (i.) Is it a priori probable that tradition would preserve independent evidence for the date of the Crucifixion? (ii.) If so, do the data suggest that such has actually been the case?

(i.) Patristic evidence for the duration of the Ministry was passed over for want of space, being unnecessary in face of the full testimony of the Gospels, and unhelpful because it is all based ultimately on them; is there cause for thinking that the case would be different here? Yes; for while the date of the Nativity, for instance, was known familiarly to too few, and the length of the Ministry was of too secondary importance, to have given occasion to a constant tradition, the conditions are quite dissimilar and indeed unique in respect to the date of the Passion. Here was to every Christian eye from the first the turning point of the world's evolution; and the Church's confession had always put in the forefront the historical setting 'under Pontius Pilate'—see 1 Ti 6:13 τῷ μαρτυρήσαντι ὑπὸ Ποντίου Πιλάτου, Ign. Magn. 11 (with Lightfoot's note) ἡ κατὰ τὴν ἡμετέραν II. 11., and the early Roman Creed, τὸν ὑπὸ Π. Π. σταυρωθέντα. It cannot, then, be considered improbable that a still more definite dating by consuls or by regnal years of the emperor may have been noted while there was yet opportunity, and may have filtered down in oral tradition or lost documents through the obscure generations that intervene, till it could come to light, together with so much else that is beyond question primitive, in the writings of the age of Tertullian.

(ii.) But do the facts bear out what is thus a priori not improbable? was there anything in the review of authorities that could claim to be a date of this sort for the Crucifixion? Nothing, clearly, unless it were A.D. 29 (consulship of the Gemini=15 Tib.=? 16 Tib.); for if Philegon's A.D. 32-33 had been traditional, it could not have failed to have reappeared somewhere or other in the ante-Nicene Christian testimony; Hippolytus' (ultimately discarded) 18 Tib. depended simply on a combination of the Johannine chronology of the Ministry with Lk 3:1; Theotecnus, if he really meant A.D. 31, probably arrived at it by the same process; Eusebius depended jointly on Philegon and on his own interpretation of St. John; Epiphanius' chronology is, even more than Eusebius', independent of all predecessors. It is easy enough to rid the field of rival theories; the only question is, to what epoch does the evidence for A.D. 29 go back, and how far can it be explained on other hypotheses than that of the survival of an independent and genuine tradition?

The three earliest witnesses for the consulship, the dating that most obviously means A.D. 29, are 'Tertullian', Hippolytus, and the Acts of Pilate. Of these, Hippolytus, at least, derived it from some pre-existent source, for (not knowing to what year it really belonged) he incorrectly synchronizes it with Tiberius 18. Further, he and Tertullian are independent of one another, since the latter distinguishes the Gemini as Rubellius and Rufus or Rufus, the former (with the Acts of Pilate) erroneously as Rufus and Rubellio. It is hardly possible on the evidence that the common source can be later than A.D. 160, and it may be indefinitely earlier. It is true that Philegon was apparently ignorant of the tradition, but it need not be supposed that it was universally spread by Hadrian's time, and after all Philegon was a heathen, and not likely to be conversant with all that was being handed down within the Christian body.

But granting this antiquity, can the year still be accounted for as a mere deduction from the Gospels, in the sense that the consulship is a secondary date developed out of 15 Tiberius (the date for the Passion in Clement and Origen), and that that in turn came from Lk 3:1? Possibly; yet it is surely not easy to believe that the evangelist's synchronism of the commencement of the Baptist's ministry with a certain year should have been so widely supposed to apply to the whole period, not only before Christ's Baptism, but also as far as his Passion. No doubt the Ptolemaean Valentinians of Irenæus' time (Iren. i. 1. 3, iii. 1-3; ii. xx. 1, xxi. 1) based calculations on 30 years as the whole Life of Christ, which is really the Gospel reckoning for his age at the commencement of his Ministry; but even they did not leave out of account the period of John's sole ministry.

It appears, then, not indeed certain, but possible and even probable, that a trustworthy Christian tradition does point to A.D. 29 and the consulate of the Gemini as the year of the Crucifixion.

3. A brief review, finally, of the evidence for the day of the civil month.

Perhaps the earliest witnesses are Basilidians quoted by Clement (Strom. i. 147, ed. Potter, p. 408), who varied between Phamenoth 25, Pharmuthi 25, and Pharmuthi 19 (March 21, April 20, April 14). To March 25 a larger and weightier group subscribes: in Latin, 'Tert. adv. Jud. 8, mensis Martii temporibus paschæ die vii calendarum Aprilium; and for A.D. viii kal. Apr. simply, the Liberian catalogue of A.D. 354, Julius Hilarianus De die paschæ xv (Gallandi, viii. 748), Aug. De civ.

* He counterbalances his omission of the consuls of A.D. 4, Aelius Catus and Sentius Saturninus, by inserting between A.D. 6 and 7 the fictitious pair Caesar and Capito. His consuls for A.D. 13, Flaccus and Silvanus, are only a corrupt form of the real names Plancus and Silius Cæcina.

xviii. 54, and the Martyrologium Hieronymianum: in Greek, τῇ πρὸ πάσης καλαινῶν Ἀπριλλίων, Hippolytus, Comm. in Dan., ed. Bratke, p. 19 (so too, the πάσης Χριστοῦ in his paschal tables is attached to this day); Acta Pilati, according to the Quartodecimans in Epiphanius, Haer. i. 1, and to pseudo-Chrysostom (ed. Bened. viii. App. p. 277)—most of Tischendorf's Greek MSS, supported by the Latin and Armenian versions add ἡμέτερον ἡμέτερον Μαρτίου; Φαμίονον δὲ, in the Σύστημα διήρησι incorporated in the Chronicon Paschale, ed. Ducange, pp. 224, 225. For March 23 are three witnesses: Lactantius, Div. inst. iv. x. 18, ante diem decimum kalendaram Aprilium; persons known to Epiphanius, i.e., τινὲς δὲ τῇ πρὸ δέκα καλαινῶν Ἀπριλλίων; and the Paschal Chronicle (op. cit. p. 221), τῇ κ' τοῦ Μαρτίου μηνός. Epiphanius had further seen copies of the Acta Pilati which gave March 18, while his own view is decided in favour of yet another date, March 20: Haer. i. 1, ἐτι δὲ εὐρεομεν ἀντίγραφον ἐν τῷ (λέγε ἄκων) Πλάτῳ ἐν οὗς σημειῖται πρὸ δεκαπέντε καλαινῶν Ἀπριλλίων τὸ πάθος γεννηθῆσαι τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ θεοῦ, ὅς ἐκ πολλῆς ἀκριβοῦς ἔγνωμεν, ἐν τῇ πρὸ δεκατρίῳ καλαινῶν Ἀπριλλίων τοῦ σωτῆρος παρουσίᾳ κατελθόντων; cf. Haer. ii. 23.

The first reflection suggested by this catena is the unanimity with which (apart from some of the Basilidians) Christian antiquity attributed the Crucifixion to a day not later than March 25; the second, that if a confusion between the πάσχα σταυρώσεως and the πάσχα ἀναστάσεως be allowed for, the dates, March 23 and 25, March 18 and 20, pair off with and explain one another—i.e. if March 25 was understood, not of the Crucifixion but of the Resurrection, March 23 became the day of the Crucifixion; or by a similar but converse process, March 20 might be transferred from the Resurrection (with the Crucifixion on March 18) to the Crucifixion. Thus eliminating the three Basilidian dates as probably mere Gnostic fancies, of the two pairs that alone are left, March 18–20 and 23–25, March 25 (Tertullian, Hippolytus, Acts of Pilate etc.) has clearly older and better testimony than March 23 (Lactantius, some known to Epiphanius, Paschal Chronicle), and March 18 (ἀντίγραφον of Acts of Pilate older than Epiphanius) than March 20 (Epiphanius himself). But these ultimate days, March 18 and 25, are exactly a week apart, and very likely the one is to be explained as a conscious alteration of the other; but which of which?

For that day of the two for which authority is vastly preponderant, March 25, Dr. Salmon in an admirable article on Hippolytus (Dict. Christ. Biogr. iii. 925) looks upon that writer's Paschal Cycle, published about A.D. 221, as the single source. Hippolytus there (very erroneously) supposes that after each eight years the full moon comes round to the same day of the solar month again; and accepting the traditional date A.D. 29 for the Crucifixion, he naturally assumes that, since the full moon in A.D. 221 did actually fall on March 25, the full moon in A.D. 29, 192 or 8 x 24 years earlier, must have fallen on the same day. 'Actually this is a week astray, the true day being March 18. We are safe in presuming that whenever March 25 is mentioned as the day of the Passion, the Cycle of Hippolytus is the source of the account.' Yet this theory, simple and attractive as it is, hardly satisfies all the elements of the problem. It might be possible to explain the wide acceptance of March 25 in both East and West by the dual position of Hippolytus, a Greek writer on Western soil; but 'Tert., Adv. Judeos, if genuine, and Hippolytus' own Commentary on Daniel, would still stand in the way of deducing March 25 as the day for the Passion directly from March 25 as the day of the full moon in A.D. 221. For Tertullian's Montanist writings commence about A.D. 200, and his whole literary activity was almost at an end by A.D. 220, so that if the first portion of the adversus Judeos is 'certainly Tertullian's, and Tertullian's while still a churchman' (Fuller in Dict. Christ. Biogr. iv. 827b), its chronology cannot be due to the Paschal Cycle of A.D. 221. In the same way Hippolytus' Fourth Book on Daniel 'was apparently written much earlier than the Chronicle and Paschal Tables (Lightfoot, Clement, ii. 392); and as it, too, gives March 25 for the Passion (from which also ultimately comes its Dec. 25 for the Nativity, see above, p. 406*), a second reason is supplied for pushing back the origin of the tradition of March 25 into the 2nd cent.

Genuine, of course, the tradition cannot be, because, as Salmon says—see also the table given earlier in this article—not the 25th but the 18th was the March full moon in A.D. 29. But this is exactly the day remaining still for discussion, that, namely, which was given in copies Epiphanius had seen of the Acts of Pilate. It is true that even in these Acts March 25 is supported (i.) by all existing MSS and versions; (ii.) by those Quartodecimans who regularly kept the Pascha on March 25 on the authority of the Acts; (iii.) by pseudo-Chrysostom in A.D. 387, who accepts the date as historically true on the same authority. It is possible, therefore, that the 18th is simply an accidental corruption, 18 instead of 17 before the kalends of April; but it is possible also that it is the genuine reading of the Acts, altered intentionally at some early period, whether because the 25th was already then the more popular date, or because the 18th was increasingly open to the suspicion of falling before the equinox. And if genuine in the Acts, it is a really curious and remarkable confirmation of a possible date for the Crucifixion, Friday Nisan 14 of the year A.D. 29.

Dr. Salmon indeed says (loc. cit.) that 'it is obvious that if early trustworthy tradition had preserved the day of the solar year on which our Lord suffered, the Church would not have perplexed herself with calculations of paschal full moons.' But (i.) not all traditions which may in fact be true were necessarily known to be true to the ancients; (ii.) after all, what the Church was aiming at in paschal cycles was a system for calculating beforehand in terms of the solar year a day that was not solar but lunar. As pseudo-Chrysostom lucidly points out, the different data of the chronology of the Crucifixion will not converge in ordinary years; the Church could only initiate the season as far as was practicable, combining elements from the solar year (the equinox as a first term a quo), from the lunar year (the full moon as a second term a quo), and from the week (Friday). But if the day of the solar year had been considered alone, the full moon would necessarily have been thrown over, and the full moon was the one point which all Christians united in treating as essential to a proper paschal celebration.*

It is not unreasonable, then, to hold that the solitary datum preserved by Epiphanius does add a slight additional weight to the probability that the Crucifixion should be placed on Friday March 18, A.D. 29.

Conclusion.—To sum up briefly: the separate results of five lines of enquiry harmonize with one another beyond expectation, so that each in turn supplies fresh security to the rest. The Nativity in B.C. 7–6; the age of our Lord at the Baptism 30 years more or less; the Baptism in A.D. 26 (26–27); the duration of the Ministry between two and three years; the Crucifixion in A.D. 29: these five strands, weak no doubt in isolation, become, when woven together, the strong and stable support of a consistent chronology of the Life of Christ.

LITERATURE.—For all the preliminary chronological matter which underlies subjects such as that of this article, Ideler, Handbuch der mathematischen und technischen Chronologie, 2 vols. 1825, is still standard. Of books more especially devoted to the chronology of the life of Christ special mention should perhaps be made of Wieseler, Chronol. Synops. der Evang. (Eng. tr. by Venables), and Caspari, Chronol. u. geog. Einleit. (E.T. by Evans). The writer of the present article—some points of which had been adumbrated in previous studies of his own, Patristic evidence and the Gospel Chronology in the Church Quarterly Review for Jan. 1892, pp. 390–415, and A Paschal Homily printed in the Works of St. Chrysostom, in Studia Biblica, ii. pp. 130–149, Oxford, 1890—has learnt much, and derived many references in certain parts of his work, from three writers (though with their general conclusions he in each case disagrees): H. Browne, Ordo Sacrorum, London, 1844; Hort on Ju 64, in Westcott and Hort's Greek Testament, 1881, App. pp. 77–81; and R. A. Lipsius, Die Pilatus-Acten, Kiel, 1886.

II. THE APOSTOLIC AGE.

The Apostolic Age may be defined, for the purposes of this article, as the period lying between the Crucifixion [A.D. 29, less probably A.D. 30] and the destruction of the temple. Outside these limits lie, no doubt, several of the NT writings, for the chronology of which see the articles on them; but NT history may fitly be said to close with the great catastrophe of A.D. 70.

These first 40 years of Christian history are roughly coterminous with the labours of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the principal documents concerned are, on the one hand, their Epistles, on the other, the Acts, one half of which book is in effect devoted to each of the two great apostles. But the writings in question do not bear on the face of them any continuous system of notes of time; and the chronology must be based, in the first instance, on such synchronisms as are given, principally in Acts, with Jewish or Roman history, namely—

- (1) The reign of Aretas of Damascus (2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>, cf. Ac 9<sup>24</sup>).
- (2) The reign and death of Herod Agrippa I. (Ac 12<sup>1–23</sup>).
- (3) The famine under Claudius (Ac 11<sup>28–30</sup> 12<sup>25</sup>).
- (4) The proconsulship of Sergius Paulus in Cyprus (Ac 13<sup>7</sup>).
- (5) The expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>).
- (6) The proconsulship of Gallio in Achaia (Ac 18<sup>12</sup>).

* The only exceptions to which Dr. Salmon might appeal are as late as the 4th cent.: (i.) the Quartodecimans and Cappadocians, said by Epiphanius, Haer. i. 1, always to observe March 25 as their πάσχα; (ii.) the Montanists of Asia Minor, said by pseudo-Chrysostom to observe the 14th, not of a lunar but of the 'Asiatic' solar month beginning on March 24, so that their πάσχα fell always on April 6.

- (7) The reign of Herod Agrippa II., and marriage of his sister Drusilla to Felix (Ac 24<sup>24</sup> 25<sup>13</sup> 26<sup>32</sup>).
- (8) The procuratorships of Felix and Festus (Ac 21<sup>38</sup> 23<sup>24</sup> 24<sup>10</sup> 27).
- (9) The Days of Unleavened Bread (Ac 20<sup>6</sup> 7).
- (10) The persecution under Nero.

Two preliminary notes may be offered here.

a. Imperial Chronology.—Augustus died Aug. 19, A.D. 14; Tiberius died March 16, A.D. 37; Gaius Caligula died Jan. 24, A.D. 41; Claudius died Oct. 13, A.D. 54; Nero died June 9, A.D. 68.

b. Authorities for the Period outside NT Writers.—These are principally three: for Jewish affairs, Josephus; for Roman, Tacitus and Suetonius; and as they are occasionally inconsistent with one another, it is important to define their position and opportunities as historians. (i.) Tacitus, born not later and probably not much earlier than A.D. 54, published his latest work, the Annals, or history of the empire from the death of Augustus to the death of Nero, at the end of Trajan's reign, c. A.D. 115; but the work as now preserved is imperfect, being deficient for the ten years A.D. 37-47, besides two shorter lacunae in A.D. 30 and 66-68. The materials at his command for all at least that passed in Rome were ample, though his anti-imperial tendencies may colour his version of the facts in relation not only to the emperors, but to their ministers or favourites. (ii.) Suetonius, the junior of Tacitus by some 20 years, wrote his Lives of the Caesars (from Julius to Domitian) under Hadrian, probably about A.D. 120. As private secretary to that emperor, he may have had access to additional personal details about the earlier sovereigns, such as distinguish his anecdotal biographies from the more ambitious and more orderly history of Tacitus. (iii.) Josephus, the historian of Judaism, was more strictly a contemporary of the infancy of the Christian Church than Suetonius or even Tacitus. Born in A.D. 37-38 and brought up in Jerus., he left that city for three years' stay among the Essenes, A.D. 53-56, and left Pal. on a mission to Rome in A.D. 63-64. His share in the Jewish revolt—for he commanded in Galilee, and was taken prisoner at Jotapata—did not prevent him from espousing at once the Roman cause, or attaching himself to the fortunes of Vespasian and Titus. Thus his works on the Jewish War (written before A.D. 70) and on the Antiquities (completed in Domitian's 15th year, A.D. 93-94) are dominated by the distinct purpose of presenting himself and his countrymen in as favourable a light as possible to the Romans. On the other hand, a writer in Rome enjoying imperial patronage, who had spent in Pal. most of the years with whose events this article is concerned, was unusually well placed for ascertaining the facts, and, except where his 'tendency' has to be discounted, his testimony cannot be dismissed off-hand even when confronted with that of Tacitus.

1. Aretas at Damascus.—This Aretas (the fourth Aretas in the line of Nabatean kings, on which dynasty see Schürer, HJP i. ii. 348 ff.) reigned within the rough limits B.C. 9-A.D. 40; the exact dates are unknown, but it is certain (a) that he reigned over 47 years, inscriptions being extant of his 48th; (b) that he died somewhere between the death of Tiberius—which brought to a close operations begun against him at that emperor's order by the legate of Syria, Vitellius (Ant. XVIII. v. 1, 3)—and the middle of the reign of Claudius, when his successor Abias is found waging war on Izates of Adiabene (about A.D. 48; Ant. XX. iv. 1). But Damascus did not belong to Nabatea, and was certainly under direct Roman administration in A.D. 33-34, and in A.D. 62-63, for Damascene coins of these years are extant and bear the heads of Tiberius and Nero respectively, without any such allusion to the local prince as was invariable in the coins of client states. It must have come, then, into the hands of Aretas after A.D. 33-34; if by force, the empire would hardly have suffered the Nabatean line to reign unmolested till A.D. 106; if by grant, the donor must almost certainly have been, not Tiberius, whose quarrel with Aretas has just been mentioned, but Caligula, who, unlike Tiberius (see the instance of Herod Philip in the next section), encouraged the dependent princelings of the East. [The silence of Tacitus will then admit of easy explanation, the Annals being defective throughout Caligula's reign.] In this case, St. Paul's escape from the ethnarch of the city must be placed not earlier than the middle of A.D. 37; in any case not earlier than A.D. 34.

2. Reign and Death of Herod Agrippa I.—The tetrarchy of Herod Philip (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>) was on his death, about A.D. 33-34, incorporated by Tiberius into the province of Syria, but 'not many days' after the accession of Gaius (March 16, A.D. 37) was conferred with the title of king on Herod Agrippa, son of Aristobulus, and grandson of Herod the Great, who was then living in Rome; and to this territory the tetrarchy of Antipas was added in A.D. 39-40, and Judaea, Samaria, and Abilene on Claudius' accession, early in A.D. 41. Agrippa reigned altogether, according to BJ, three years over the whole kingdom, and three years over the tetrarchies, according to Ant., four years under Gaius,—three over Philip's tetrarchy and the fourth over Antipas' as well,—and three under Claudius over all Pal., the year of his death being 'the 7th of his reign and 54th of his life.' The discrepancy concerns Gaius' reign only (Ant., the later and fuller work, appears the more accurate), and 'three years' under Claudius are common to both accounts. But Ant., as has just been said, also speaks of 'the 7th year,' which (reckoned from the spring of A.D. 37) suggests A.D. 43-44 rather than 44 simply. Against this, however, may be set the evidence of Agrippa's coinage, which apparently goes on to a 9th year; * for even if, as is likely enough, the Jewish kings commenced a fresh year on the 1st of Nisan following their accession,† the 9th year cannot possibly have begun before Nisan 1, A.D. 44, and even then only if the original grant from Caligula preceded Nisan 1, A.D. 37, so that Agrippa's second year may have begun on that day. The coinage reckoning by itself would suggest rather A.D. 45 than 44; Josephus would be compatible with the latter part of A.D. 43; the two in combination are most easily reconciled by a date in A.D. 44 after Nisan (BJ II. xi. 6; Ant. XVIII. iv. 6, vi. 10, vii. 2, XIX. v. 1, viii. 2).

3. The Famine under Claudius.—On Agrippa's death Judaea was made again into a procuratorship under Cuspius Fadus. He intervenes in a quarrel between the Jews of Persea and the city of Philadelphia, seizes and executes the brigand leader Tholomæus, and from that time forward keeps Judaea clear of similar disturbances; then (τότε) enters on a dispute with the authorities at Jerus. over the custody of the high-priestly robes.‡ 'About this time,' κατὰ τοῦτον τὸν καιρὸν, Helena, queen of Adiabene, and her son Izates become converts to Judaism; the story and antecedent circumstances are related at length, and it is added that Helena, seeing that their kingdom was at peace and her son envied even by foreigners for the divine protection he enjoyed, desired to go up to the temple at Jerus., while Izates made great preparations of gifts to be offered there. Her arrival was peculiarly well-timed, for famine was raging 'at that moment,' κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν κείνον. But Josephus does not say that all this happened under Fadus. On the contrary, having digressed to relate what was contemporary with Fadus, namely, the conversion of Helena and Izates, he continues the digression through the long chapters xx. ii. iii. iv., bringing the history of Adiabene down to a point much later even than this visit: and then, after returning to Fadus and recording the revolt and death of Theudas under him, he goes on to say that his successor was Tiberius Alexander, 'in whose time it chanced that the great famine in Judaea occurred in which' Helena acted so generously. After Alexander, of whom nothing further is related except the execution of the sons of Judas the Galilean, Cumanus comes as the new procurator; in the 8th year of Claudius [A.D. 48], Herod king of Chalcis dies. These two last events are reversed in BJ: 'after Herod of Chalcis' death Claudius gives his kingdom to the younger Agrippa, and Cumanus succeeds Alexander.' Both accounts, in fact, treat the two changes as practically simultaneous, so that Josephus certainly places Cumanus' arrival in A.D. 48. Thus the whole tenure of both Fadus and Alexander falls within the limits of the years 44-48 A.D.; and since the bulk of the events recorded under the former is considerably the greater, Alexander cannot have arrived before, say, the spring of A.D. 46. This is the terminus a quo for Helena's visit; and as Helena had not apparently heard of the famine before she arrived, it is the terminus a quo for the famine also, while Josephus' language leaves no doubt that 'the great famine' ran its whole course under the same governor. It is therefore possible that it should be placed, or placed partly, in A.D. 47; it is certain that even the earlier part of the crisis cannot be placed before A.D. 46 (Ant. xx. i. 1, 2, ii. 1, 5, v. 1, 2; BJ ii. xii. 1).

* See Madden, Coins of the Jews, ed. 2 (1881), p. 130. The ascription of these coins to Herod Agrippa II. is impossible; de Saulcy, however, thinks them Jewish forgeries, and Madden speaks hesitatingly, not having seen the coins themselves. But if the electrolytes may be trusted, the figure is quite certain, and there appears no reason except the chronological difficulty for doubting them.

† See the Gemara of Babylon, Tractate Rosh-hashanah or the New Year, fol. 2a: 'Our rabbis teach that a king who ascends the throne on the 29th Adar has completed a year as soon as he reaches Nisan 1.'

‡ The emperor's answer to the deputation sent to Rome on this subject is dated in the consulship of Rufus and Pompeius Silvanus; and if these were, as is generally assumed, consules suffecti of A.D. 45, the letter will fall somewhere after the early months of that year. [Older editors read πρὸ τισσάρων καλαυδῶν 'Iouliou', but the latter word is simply a retranslation of Iulii in the inferior Latin MSS; Niese omits it, and marks a lacuna.] But to date by other than the consules ordinarii would be so unusual, if not unexampled, that (especially in the absence of any other proof of the existence of these particular suffecti) the genuineness of the letter must be considered doubtful.

4. The Proconsulship of Sergius Paulus in Cyprus.—The name of this governor has been found in a Cypriote inscription ἐπὶ Παύλου [ἀνθ]ρατου 'in Paulus' proconsulship,' but unfortunately without any synchronism which would fix the year. On the other hand, a dedication to Claudius in the name of the city of Curium in Cyprus by the proconsul L. Amnius Bassus, 'in accordance with a decision previously taken by the proconsul Julius Cordus,' is signed 'A.D. in the 12th year,' i.e. of the emperor, A.D. 52. Cordus' tenure, if, as seems to be implied, he was Bassus' immediate predecessor, will cover the year 51, so that in neither of those two years can place be found for Paulus. (Cesnola, Cyprus, p. 425; Boeckh, CIG 2632.)

5. The Expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius is recorded in Suetonius (Claudius 25), Judaeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantis Roma expulsi; but as this writer's method is to group together the events in any one reign of similar character—in this case dealings with the provincials—no suggestion of a date is given at all. Tacitus, whose Annals, however, are extant during the last seven years only of Claudius' reign, A.D. 47-54, says nothing of the Jews, though he mentions, under A.D. 52, the expulsion of the astrologers from Italy, a measure at once 'cruel and ineffective.' Orosius, A.D. 417 (Hist. vii. vi. 15), is the earliest authority to give a date, Claudius ix. = A.D. 49, quoting it as from Josephus; but, in fact, Josephus is as silent as Tacitus, not about the date only, but about the whole matter. Nor is there any reason to believe that Orosius had access to Josephus direct; the only other reference to him (vii. ix. 7) appears to be repeated from Jerome's Chronicle. It must therefore remain uncertain whether or not Orosius' source in this case is trustworthy. (Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 68) supposes that all Orosius' dates for events under Claudius are a year too early (as might easily be the case if, for instance, he was copying a chronicler like Eusebius, whose 1st of Claudius began, not in Jan., but in Sept. A.D. 41; see below, No. 8. a), so that this expulsion would then rather belong to A.D. 50.]

6. The Proconsulship of Gallio in Achaia must fall after A.D. 44, in which year (Dio Cassius, ix. 24) this province, taken by Tiberius in A.D. 15 into his own hands, and ruled thenceforward by legati propraetore (ἀντιστράτηγοι), was restored to the control of the senate, and to administration by proconsuls (ἀνθύπατοι). Further, if Gallio so far shared the disgrace of his famous brother Seneca—who was only recalled in A.D. 49 (Tac. Ann. xii. 8) from an exile that had lasted about eight years—that he would have been passed over while it lasted, then the terminus a quo is not 44 but 49, or rather, since the proconsuls entered on their provincial governments early in the year, A.D. 50. At the same time, the distinction between the method of appointment to imperial and to senatorian provinces was just this, that the emperor was quite unfettered in his choice, while, in the other case, all ex-holders of offices in Rome, ex-consuls and ex-prætors, succeeded naturally to senatorian governorships; Dio, for instance (loc. cit.), describes this very change as one from selection to lot: τὴν δὲ Ἀχαλίαν καὶ τὴν Μακεδονίαν ἀλφεοῖς ἀρχουσὶν ἐξ οὗτερ ὁ Τιβέριος ἤρξε διδομένης ἀπέδωκεν ὁ Κλαύδιος τότε τῷ κλήρῳ. Still, it is likely enough that candidates obnoxious to the government either did not stand at all, or were unsuccessful by arrangement at the balloting. Gallio, then, entered on office in Achaia certainly not before A.D. 44, and probably not before 49, or even 50.*

7. The Reign of Herod Agrippa II. and Marriage of Drusilla to Felix.—This Agrippa, son of Herod Agrippa I., at his father's death was thought too young to succeed; but on the death of another Herod, his uncle, king of Chalcis, in the 8th year of Claudius (A.D. 48), he obtained that principality, from which he was transferred after Claudius had completed his 12th year, i.e. about the beginning of A.D. 53, to the two tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, i.e. the northern part of Palestine. On this accession to new dignity he bestowed his sister Drusilla in marriage on Azizus of Emesa, a husband whom, not long after, μετ' οὐ πολὺν χρόνον, she deserted for the Roman procurator Felix. Thus, if Josephus' order of events is correct, St. Paul's appearance before Felix and Drusilla, which was after, but not very long after, Pentecost (Ac 20<sup>16</sup> 24<sup>1-2</sup>), cannot fall in A.D. 53, but at earliest in A.D. 54 (Ant. xx. v. 2, vii. 1, 2).

8. a. The Procuratorship of Felix.—The events which led up to the deposition of the last-mentioned procurator, Cumanus (appointed in A.D. 48), are related in full by Josephus, Ant. xx. vi. 1-3, more briefly by Tacitus, Ann. xii. 54; the two writers, while consistent in the main about Cumanus, differ seriously in regard to Felix. Both agree that troubles broke out between the Galileans and Samaritans, originating, says Josephus, in an assault on Galileans travelling up to Jerus. for one of the feasts. Both agree that the Roman soldiery intervened; that the quarrel was taken before Quadratus, legate of Syria, who investigated the responsibility of the Roman officials for their conduct in relation to it; and that the ultimate result was the deposition of Cumanus. Both agree further on the date; for Tacitus records the proceedings under A.D. 52, Josephus mentions the recall of Cumanus immediately before the notice of the completion of Claudius' 12th year, Jan. A.D. 53. On the other hand, Josephus, throughout the story, speaks of Cumanus as the only governor, whether of Galilee, Samaria, or Judaea. Tacitus gives Cumanus in Galilee and Felix in Samaria co-ordinate jurisdiction; which of them ruled Judaea proper is not said by him in so many words (by his authority perhaps not at all), but he apparently assumes it to be Felix, whom he introduces as iampriorem Judaea impositus. Thus in Josephus, Cumanus is the only procurator arraigned before Quadratus, and even he is sent off to the imperial tribunal; in Tacitus, Cumanus and Felix are equally involved; but since Felix was brother to Pallas, the emperor's favourite and minister, the legate, to avoid having to condemn him, puts him on to the commission for the trial of his partner in guilt, who is condemned then and there for the crimes of both.

* See also Ramsay, Expositor, March 1897, p. 206: Seneca addressed his de Ira to his brother, not under the adoptive name Gallio, but under the name Novatus; and if it is true that he wrote this treatise after his return from exile, it follows that his brother's adoption, and subsequent appointment to a proconsulship under the name Gallio, must also be not earlier than A.D. 49.

How are these divergences to be reconciled? The answer is not without a direct bearing on the chronology of St. Paul's life; see below, No. 8. b. Let it be conceded, then, to Tacitus, that Felix must have been holding some position in Samaria of sufficient rank to qualify him as one of the iudices for Cumanus' trial. So much, indeed, is warranted by Josephus' statement, that the high priest Jonathan was continually urging good government on Felix when procurator, 'lest he himself should incur blame before the populace for having requested his appointment from the emperor' (Ant. xx. viii. 6), a request which was more natural if Felix were already known in Palestine. Some of the best modern authorities (Mommson, Roman Provinces, Eng. tr. ii. 202; Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 313) follow Tacitus further still. But Josephus, after all, is giving a detailed account of the history of his own country during his own lifetime; and to him it must be conceded in turn that Cumanus' rule certainly included Judaea (in the narrower sense) with Jerus., and that Felix was probably only a subordinate of his in Samaria. Prejudice against so near a relation of Pallas made it easy for Tacitus or his authority to project back on to the earlier years of Felix' residence something of the position, and a share of the misdeeds, of his later procuratorship.

A third authority for the dates of Felix' tenure is the Chronicle of Eusebius—the Armenian VS, with some MSS of Jerome's tr., placing his arrival in the 11th year of Claudius, the other Lat. MSS in the 10th. [In the Bodeleian MS of the Jerome, this note commences in the second of the two lines given to the 10th year, is continued through the two lines of the 11th year, and ends in the first line of the 12th.] But how are these imperial years reckoned?

So much weight is laid by Harnack (Chronologie, pp. 233-237) on Eusebius' evidence, that this preliminary difficulty must be disentangled in some detail. Both Harnack himself (ib. p. 234) and Lightfoot (e.g. Biblical Essays, p. 223, n. 2; but this essay is as old as A.D. 1803) assume a reckoning in the case of each emperor from his own accession-day. But it is in the last degree unlikely that a chronicle, where every year is reckoned continuously from Abraham, should admit in the parallel column of imperial years a system perpetually changing; and if Titus, though he reigned three months of a 3rd year (June 7-June 81 A.D.), or Trajan, though he reigned six months of a 20th year (Jan. 98-Aug. 117 A.D.), are yet allotted only two and nineteen years respectively, it seems clear that, as was to be expected, the imperial years are manipulated into accord with the more fixed arrangement. But two questions still remain.

(i.) Where did Eusebius fix his new year? It is natural to think first of Jan. 1, the commencement of the Roman consular year. But Eusebius was an Eastern, and in the East the year was all but universally commenced about September. The Jewish civil year began in September; the old Attic lunar year in July; the old Macedonian lunar year in October; the calendars of Asia Minor in imperial times used the Macedonian months made into a solar year, commencing Sept. 23; the similar calendar of Syria used the same months in the same way, only that each month was pushed down one place, so that the year presumably began at the end of October; the Alexandrian year on Aug. 29; the era of Alexander or the Greeks was reckoned from Sept. B.C. 312; the Indictions, an invention of Eusebius' own day, were counted, certainly from September, probably from Sept. A.D. 312. The strong presumption that Eusebius would range himself with all this mass of usage is reinforced by his use of the Olympiads as parallel, year by year, to his own years of Abraham, for the Olympiads began in July, and a year that began on Jan. 1 must be out of reckoning with an Olympiad year for either its first or last six months.

(ii.) Granted, then, that each Eusebian year began in the September of a Julian year, can that Julian year be conclusively fixed? Now, the starting-point of the Olympiads is known to be July of the Julian year B.C. 776; if, therefore, a fixed relation is established between Eusebian years of Abraham and Olympiads, a fixed relation between Eusebian and Julian years follows. Unfortunately, the two versions of the Chronicle differ by one year as to which year of Abraham is parallel to Ol. 1. 1, the Armenian giving Ann. Abr. 1240, Jerome 1241, and so throughout. That Jerome is the more trustworthy is now, through the labours of Hort and Lightfoot, recognised even by scholars who had pinned their faith to the Armenian (so, e.g., Harnack, Chronologie, p. 113 ff.); and in this particular case two synchronisms of years of Tiberius with the Olympiads, the one given in the preface to the Chronicle (Jerome), and repeated in the Præp. Evang. of Eusebius himself (x. 9. 1), the other given in the note on the Crucifixion (both Jerome and the Armenian), clinch the proof. In the first case Tib. 15 is said to coincide with Ol. 201, or more fully in the Præp. Evang. with Ol. 201. 4. Now, in the Chronicle itself Tib. 15 = Abr. 2044 (Jerome and Armenian) = Ol. 201. 4 Jerome, but Ol. 202. 1 Arm. In the second case the date for the Crucifixion is supported by appeal to Phlegon's date, Ol. 202. 4. Now, Tiberius 19 (which is unquestionably Eusebius' date for the Passion, see previous art. p. 413) = Abr. 2048 (Jerome and Arm.) = Ol. 202. 4 Jerome, Ol. 203. 1 Arm. Clearly, then, the parallelism of the columns is right in Jerome, wrong in the Armenian.

It follows from this investigation that, according to Eusebius, Tiberius 1 = Ol. 198. 2 (Jerome) = Sept. A.D. 14 to Sept. A.D. 15; Gains 1 = Ol. 204. 1 (Jerome) = Sept. 37-Sept. 38 A.D.; Claudius 1 = Ol. 205. 1 (Jerome) = Sept. 41-Sept. 42 A.D.; Nero 1 = Ol. 208. 3 (Jerome) = Sept. 53-Sept. 56 A.D. As the true accession-days of these four emperors were Aug. 19, A.D. 14; Mar. 16, A.D. 37; Jan. 24, A.D. 41; Oct. 13, A.D. 54, an entirely consistent result is obtained, namely, that Eusebius commences the 1st regnal year of each emperor in the September next after his accession. When, therefore, he puts the arrival of Felix in Claudius 11, he means not (as Harnack says) Jan. 51 to Jan. 52, but Sept. 51 to Sept. 52, and his evidence, instead of contradicting, comes into line with that of Tacitus and Josephus.

b. The Departure of Felix and Arrival of Festus.—The chronology of so large a period of St. Paul's apostleship can be reckoned without difficulty backwards and forwards from his imprisonment at Cæsarea, that this date of Felix' recall becomes the most important of the series of synchronisms that have been under discussion. Yet there is none about which opinions vary more widely, years so far apart as A.D. 55 and 61 being preferred by different enquirers; what may be called the received chronology (Wieseler, Chron. des apost. Zeitalters, pp. 66-99; Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, pp. 217-220; Schürer, HJP i. ii. 182, and the bibliography there given) assigning it to A.D. (61 or) 60, but not earlier, while a few older writers, reinforced now by Harnack (o.c. p. 233 ff.), push it back to quite the beginning of Nero's reign, A.D. 55 or 56. Blass (Acta Ap. pp. 21-24) leaves the question open, but is, on the whole, against the 'received' view; Ramsay (see No. 9, below) modifies the latter by one year, to A.D. 59.

(i.) Arguments for the later date, A.D. 60 or 61.

a. St. Paul at the time of his arrest, two years before Felix' recall, addresses him as 'for many years past a judge of this nation,' ἐκ πολλῶν ἐτῶν ὄντα κριτὴν τῷ ἔθνει τοῦτω (Ac 24<sup>10, 27</sup>), a phrase which it is said cannot mean less than six or seven years' procuratorship, i.e. from 52 to 58 or 59 A.D. But it has just been shown from Tacitus that Felix had been in Samaria before he came into office in Judaea; and since St. Paul's purpose is naturally to press all that could truly be said of Felix' experience, he would not too minutely distinguish between his present position as procurator and his previous position as a subordinate. The ἐτη πολλά are therefore to be reckoned from an indeterminate point previous to A.D. 52, and no certain deduction of any sort can be drawn about them.

b. Josephus, after the mention of Nero's accession, records as all happening under Felix: the death of Azizus, king of Emesa; the succession of Aristobolus in Chalcis, and readjustment of the dominions of the younger Agrippa; the jealousy between Felix and the high priest

Jonathan, and the reign of terror which, after Jonathan's assassination, prevailed at each of the feasts; the appearance of various robber chiefs or impostors, especially a certain Egyptian; and lastly, the 'great quarrel' between the Jewish and Syrian inhabitants of Caesarea (Ant. xx. viii. 4-8). Now, this long succession of incidents cannot, it is said, be brought within less than five or six years, i.e. from Oct. 54, Nero's accession, to 60 A.D., especially as the rising of the Egyptian was already 'before these days' (Ac 21<sup>38</sup>) at the time of St. Paul's arrest, two years from the end of Felix' tenure. But two considerations deprive this line of argument of a good deal of its force.

(1) Josephus naturally groups together all he has to say about Pal. under Felix. That he does this after Nero's accession, means that he conceived, not that the whole state of things described began only then to be true, but at most that the main part of Felix' government, and its most striking events, belonged to the new reign; and this, if Felix' procuratorship began in A.D. 52, could easily be the case so long as it ended not earlier than A.D. 57 or 58. Exact information about the latter date Josephus obviously did not possess, or he would, as in other cases, have given it.

(2) The various events described were not necessarily successive. The political arrangements in Galilee or Chalcis, the growing disorder in Jerus., the risings in Palestine, may all have been in progress at one and the same time. Even the revolt of the Egyptian is not given as the last in order of time of a series of such events, but as the most striking illustration of the deceptions practised on the highly-wrought minds of the populace by miracle-mongers of all sorts; for whereas the rest led their followers off into the wilderness with the promise of signs and wonders, 'a fellow from Egypt about this time,' κατὰ τούτων τον καιρον, gave rendezvous for the Mt. of Olives, that from thence he might show how the walls of Jerus. should fall down at his bidding. At the same time, if this rising is to be placed under Nero at all, then St. Paul's arrest cannot fall before Pentecost 55, or rather, if the full natural meaning is to be given to the words προς ταυτην των ημερων, before Pentecost 56, and Felix' recall before the summer of 57 or rather 58 A.D.

It appears, then, that the arguments used to support the 'received' date, A.D. 60, will not bear the whole weight placed on them, but that, so far as they go, they do suggest a year not earlier than A.D. 58, or at any rate than 57. The arguments used on the other side must now, in turn, be subjected to examination.

(ii.) Arguments for an early date, A.D. 55 or 56.

a. Eusebius' Chronicle places Festus' arrival in Nero 2, i.e. according to Harnack, in the year Oct. 55-Oct. 56 A.D.; and Eusebius' chronology of the procurators is probably derived from Julius Africanus (A.D. 220), who, whether through the Jewish kings of Josephus' contemporary, Justus of Tiberias,* or through personal enquiry (for he lived in Palestine), had excellent opportunities of arriving at the facts. But, again, a twofold answer may be given. (1) In any case Eusebius' true date for Festus is Nero 2=Sept. 56-Sept. 57 A.D., see above, p. 418<sup>b</sup>. (2) It cannot be too often repeated that chroniclers were tempted to invent dates for all undated events of historical interest; and as Festus' connexion with St. Paul would deter a Christian from passing him over without mention, it is possible that Eusebius (or Africanus), if the usual authorities failed him, simply set him exactly midway between his predecessor Felix, A.D. 51-52, and his successor Albinus, A.D. 61-62.

For the last procurator, Gessius Florus, Eusebius gives Nero 10=Sept. 64-Sept. 65 A.D.; this agrees well enough with Josephus' statement that the breaking out of the war—Aug. 66 A.D.—fell in the 12th year of Nero (i.e. on Josephus' system Oct. 65-Oct. 66) and 2nd of Florus, Ant. xx. xi. 1. For Albinus, the last but one, Eusebius has Nero 7=Sept. 61-Sept. 62 A.D.; and Josephus relates that a certain visionary was brought before Albinus at the Feast of Tabernacles, four years before the war, i.e. Oct. 62 A.D., BJ vi. v. 3, so that Eusebius' date is at any rate the latest possible, and is very likely correct.

β. Felix on his recall was prosecuted before Nero by the leading Jews of Caesarea, and 'would certainly have been condemned for his wrongdoings towards the Jews had not his brother Pallas, who at that moment stood very high in Nero's favour, interceded on his behalf,' Ant. xx. viii. 9. Now, according to Tacitus, Ann. xiii. 14, 15, Pallas was removed from office not long before Britannicus celebrated his 14th birthday; and Britannicus was born just after his father Claudius' accession, circa Feb. 41 A.D. But, again, if Pallas' retirement fell in Jan. 55 A.D., and Felix' trial preceded it, the latter must have fallen in the very first months of Nero's reign, and Festus must have come out as procurator in the summer of A.D. 54 under Claudius, a result which it is hopeless to try and reconcile with the other authorities.

Harnack, o.c. p. 238, on the ground of the confusion which besets even the best chronologists through the different methods of reckoning imperial years, conjectures that Tacitus has mistakenly put Britannicus' 14th birthday for his 16th, so that the whole story should be transferred from A.D. 55 to 56. But this is unlikely: in the first place, because Tacitus reckons his years, as a Roman naturally would, by consulships, and not by regnal years of the emperor at all; in the second place, because the detail about Britannicus' age introduces the account of his murder, and that was far too crucial an event to be likely to be misdated. It seems obvious—there is certainly no reason against the view—that Pallas retained sufficient influence in the early years after his retirement to be able to secure immunity for his family. Tacitus expressly says that he stipulated that no inquiry should be made into his conduct in office, a very different attitude to what most fallen ministers had to adopt under the empire. Doubtless, Josephus exaggerates when he speaks of Nero at the date of the trial as μαλιστα δε τους δια τωτων κρινειν, but this appears to be only his way of accounting for the acquittal of an oppressor of the Jews.

Stated as a proof for the year A.D. 55 or 56, this argument, too, breaks down; but if restated with a more modest scope, it will be found not without force. It is, in fact, difficult to believe that the Jews would not have gained their case against Felix had Poppaea already acquired that ascendancy over Nero which enabled them under the next procuratorship to win their cause in the matter of the temple wall against Festus and Agrippa combined, Ant. xx. viii. 11. It is under A.D. 58 that this woman's first introduction to Nero is recorded, but it was not till A.D. 62 that she set the crown to her ambition by marrying him, Tacitus, Ann. xiii. 45, 46, xiv. 60ff. It was in the same year, 62, that Pallas, who, according to Ann. xiv. 65, was too rich and too slow in dying for Nero's avarice, was poisoned. Not improbably, the interest of Claudius' favourite waned with that of Claudius' daughter, so that it was no mere coincidence that the same year saw the murder of Octavia to make room for Poppaea, and the murder of Pallas. Anyhow, considering the respective histories of Pallas and Poppaea, the years 57, 58 (59?) would appear to suit the circumstances of Felix' acquittal better than the years 60, 61.

In the result, then, the arguments for the extreme position on either side have been shown to be equally devoid of conclusive force. But, on the other hand, each set of them, though it does not establish its own case, tends to disprove the opposite. The facts about Pallas and Poppaea, not to speak of the evidence of Eusebius, do not prove that Festus succeeded Felix as early as 55 or 56, but they do seem to exclude a date as late as A.D. 60. Conversely, the account of Felix' procuratorship in Josephus, though it does not show that he was governor as late as 60 or 61, does seem to show that he remained later than A.D. 56. The probabilities, therefore, both sides being considered, concentrate themselves on the intermediate years A.D. 57-59 for Felix' recall (A.D. 55-57 for St. Paul's arrest).

9. The Days of Unleavened Bread (Ac 20<sup>6-7</sup>) in St. Paul's third missionary journey have lately been brought again into notice by Ramsay (Expositor, May 1896, p. 336) as a date which 'can be fixed not merely to the year, but to the month and day.' 'The Passover was celebrated and the Days of Unleavened Bread were spent in Philippi. Thereafter the company started for Troas; and their voyage continued into the fifth day. In Troas they stayed seven days; the last complete day that they spent there was a Sunday, and they sailed away early on a Monday morning. Now, on the system common in ancient usage and followed by Luke . . . the seven days in Troas . . . began with a Tuesday and ended with a Monday. Further, the Tuesday of the arrival in Troas must be also counted as the fifth day of the voyage.' 'It follows, therefore, that the party started from Philippi on a Friday. The only question that remains is whether the company started on the first morning after the Days of Unleavened Bread. Considering that the plan was to reach Jerus. by Pentecost, and that time was therefore precious, we need not hesitate as to this point. . . . The slaying of the Passover in that year fell on the afternoon of a Thursday, and the Seven Days of Unleavened Bread continued till the following Thursday. That was the case in A.D. 57, but not in any of the years immediately around it.'

On this thesis three remarks suggest themselves. (i.) The calculation of days from the departure from Troas back to the departure from Philippi, and the inference that the latter was made on the earliest day possible, Nisan 22, are probable, though not absolutely certain. (ii.) The only years considered by Ramsay as open to discussion are A.D. 56-59. But these years, though they include the latest, do not include the earliest possible dates for the end of the 3rd missionary journey and the arrest at Jerusalem, which of course followed this passover at Philippi at the interval of a few weeks. A.D. 56 was even found (see No. 8, b, above) to be so far one of the three most likely years, and for security's sake A.D. 54 may be also taken into account. (iii.) The uncertainty which day in any year was really kept as Nisan 14 is always considerable. Most investigators, and Ramsay among them, appear to think that the question is solved by labelling the first evening on which the new moon was visible Nisan 1. But the Jews must before this have modified the method of simple observation by something in the nature of a calendar or cycle (CHRON. OF THE GOSPELS, above, p. 411), and any such cycle no doubt deviated not infrequently from the results of simple observation. Certainly, the days of the terminus paschalis or Nisan 14 for these years according to the Alexandrine cycle, which has prevailed in the Christian Church ever since the 4th cent., differ sensibly from those supplied by Lewin's Fasti Sacri or Wieseler's Chronologie p. 116 (and accepted by Ramsay), being always one day, and sometimes two days, the earlier.*

A.D.	Alexandrine.	Lewin.	Wieseler.
54	Apr. 9, T.	Apr. 10, W.
55	Mar. 29, Sa.	Mar. 30, Su.
56	Apr. 17, Sa. (or Mar. 18? Th.)	Mar. 19, F.	Apr. 18, Su.
57	Apr. 6, T.	Apr. 7, Th.	Apr. 7, Th.
58	Mar. 25, Sa.	Mar. 27, M.	Mar. 27, M.
59	Apr. 13, F.	Apr. 15, Su.	Apr. 15, Su.

Now, supposing, as seems a fair estimate, that the Alexandrine date is the earliest possible for each year, and two days later the latest, Nisan 14 may have been a Thursday in any of the three years A.D. 54 (Apr. 11), 56 (Mar. 18), 57 (Apr. 7). What, then, can fairly be claimed for Ramsay's investigation is, that against the other three years, A.D. 55, 58, 59, a certain presumption of improbability does remain; and with regard to the two later of these three years this result serves to confirm the result attained in the last section. Combining this with the previous enquiry, A.D. 56 and 57 appear the probable alternatives for the year of St. Paul's arrest, A.D. 58 and 59 for the recall of Felix and close of the two years' captivity at Caesarea.

10. The Persecution under Nero, and Martyrdoms of St. Peter and St. Paul.—That the two apostles were martyred on the same day is an erroneous deduction from the common festival on June 29, which is really the day of the common translation of their relics to the safe concealment of the Cata-combs during the persecution of Valerian, Tusca et Basso coss. (A.D. 258). But that both were martyred at Rome, and both under Nero, has been in effect the constant tradition of the Church; Peter and Paul, with some date under Nero, headed the Roman episcopal list in Julius Africanus (Harnack, Chronologie, pp. 124 ff., 171); according to Dionysius of Corinth, they taught together in Italy, and were martyred κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρὸν (ap. Eus. H.E. ii. 25; c. A.D. 170); and St. Clement of Rome himself, addressing the Corinthians about A.D. 96, sets before their eyes 'the noble examples of our own generation,' the good apostles, Peter and Paul, and that great multitude of elect which was gathered together with them in divers sufferings and tortures, women being exposed as Danaids and Dirces (1 Clem. v. vi. : συνθηροσθη πολλοὶ πλήθος). That the 'great multitude' is that of the Neronian martyrs, would be all but certain from the parallel account in Tacitus of the multitudo ingens and addita ludibria of the Christian victims of Nero (Ann. xv. 44); and the whole proof is clinched by the coincidence of Tacitus' mention of the emperor's gardens—i.e. the horti Neroniani on the Vatican hill—as the scene of the executions, with the statement of the Roman Gaius (ap. Eus. H.E. ii. 25; c. A.D. 200), that the relics of St. Peter rested on the Vatican as those of St. Paul on the Ostian Way.

But the date of the apostles' martyrdom, if it fell in the Neronian persecution properly so called, can hardly have been far removed from the great fire of Rome in July A.D. 64, since Tacitus says expressly that it was to provide scape-goats to bear his own responsibility for the arson that Nero first devised an attack on the Church. It is true that Suetonius speaks of the punishment of Christians under Nero in general terms and without assigning any particular date: Nero 16 (in the middle of a list of things animadversa seivere et coercita) afflicti supplicia Christiani genus hominum superstitionis novæ ac maleficæ. But Suet. is not in the habit of giving dates at all; and further it is quite true that the Neronian trials did settle for good the crucial question of the illegality of Christianity, while yet it is clear from Tac. that the violence of the first outbreak stood out as something vastly different in degree if not in kind from the normal condition of occasional martyrdoms which followed. It is true again that Eusebius assigns the apostles' death to the very end of Nero's reign, A.D. 68. But he gives this date to the whole persecution, as the last and worst of all Nero's crimes. As he did not use Latin writers, Tacitus' account was unknown to him, and he has no idea that the persecution had anything to do with the fire at Rome, of which he only speaks in the vaguest terms under Nero 9 (10) ἡμερησίως γινόμενοι πολλοὶ ἐν Ρώμῃ. The actual year he doubtless selected because his (or rather Africanus') chronology of the Popes, calculated back from cent. 3 by the years of their tenure of office, brought the accession of Linus, and therefore the apostles' martyrdom, to A.D. 67-68. What is really important is that he, like Clement, closely associates the two apostles with the rest of the victims of the persecution; and this, taken into connexion with the evidence of Tac. and of Gaius, seems to fix their death to within a year at any rate of the great fire, middle of A.D. 64—middle of 65 (Harnack, o.c. p. 240, still more precisely, July A.D. 64; but this is to limit the possibilities unreasonably.)

Probably, modern writers would not have been so reluctant to admit this, if the received chronology had not prolonged St. Paul's first Roman captivity till at least the spring of A.D. 63, so that the two years or less which would intervene before his martyrdom on the dating just suggested would be insufficient to cover what is known or reasonably conjectured about his final missionary journey. But it has been now shown (see Nos. 8, b, 9) that not 60, but 58 or 59, is the true date of Festus' arrival in Judæa, and therefore not 63, but 61 or 62, the end of the two years (Ac 28<sup>39</sup>) of the first Roman captivity. Is there, then, any reason to suppose that the two to four years which intervene in this revised chronology are too few to satisfy the evidence as to St. Paul's movements? Properly perhaps this enquiry belongs to a later stage in the investigation; but as it stands outside the Acts, and establishes the terminus ad quem, parallel to the terminus a quo of the Crucifixion, for the subject-matter of this article, there is a special advantage in speaking of it at this place.

That St. Paul after his release carried out the desire long before expressed by him (Ro 15<sup>28</sup>) to go on from Rome to Spain, is made more than probable by the testimony of St. Clement, that the apostle 'preached righteousness to the whole world, and reached the boundary of the West' (ἐπὶ τὸ πέρα τῆς δόσεως ἐλθὼν, ad Cor. v.), and of the Muratorian Canon [c. A.D. 200], projectionem Pauli ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscentis. For a journey to districts so untouched, where the very foundations of Christianity would still have to be laid, at least a year must be allowed; and six months more must be added for the preaching on the route through Southern Gaul—Marseilles, Arles, Nîmes, Narbonne—if the Palatia to which Crescens was sent (2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>) was, as Eusebius, HE iii. 4, and other Greek Fathers suppose, not the lesser Gaul of Asia Minor, but the greater Gaul of the West.

* That the Alexandrine date is always beforehand with the date depending on simple observation will be due to the cycle computers reckoning Nisan 1 from the time of astronomical new moon, not from the time, about 30 hours later, when it first became visible to observers.

That St. Paul also revisited the East results from the Pastoral Epistles; and even critics who, like Harnack (o.c. p. 239, n. 3), reject these Epistles as a whole, admit that genuine accounts of St. Paul's movements after his release have been incorporated in them. But for the journey to Ephesus and Macedonia (1 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>), for the evangelization of Crete (Tit 1<sup>5</sup>), for the final visits to Troas, Miletus, and perhaps Corinth (2 Ti 4<sup>13, 20</sup>), for the winter at Nicopolis (in Epirus; Tit 3<sup>12</sup>),* a second eighteen months are required.

Thus three full years, though not necessarily more, appear to have elapsed between St. Paul's departure from and return to Rome; and it follows that if his martyrdom in the first great outbreak of Nero's persecution holds good, of the two alternative years to which his release was narrowed down (No. 9, above), A.D. 61 has an advantage over A.D. 62, and A.D. 56, 58 over A.D. 57, 59 as the years of his arrest at Jerusalem and of his journey as a prisoner to Rome.

So far, then, ten points from Jewish and secular history have been fixed with more or less probability: (1) Aretas in possession of Damascus, certainly not before A.D. 34, probably not before A.D. 37; (2) Herod Agrippa I.'s death, probably in A.D. 44; (3) the famine in Jerusalem, not before A.D. 46; (4) the proconsulate of Sergius Paulus in Cyprus, not in A.D. 51, 52; (5) the expulsion of the Jews from Rome, perhaps in A.D. 49 or 50; (6) the proconsulship of Gallio in Achaia, probably not before A.D. 49 or 50; (7) the marriage of Drusilla with Felix, not before A.D. 54; (8) the appointment of Felix as procurator of Judaea in A.D. 52, and his recall in one of the years A.D. 57–59; (9) of these three years the first seems to be excluded by the note about the days of unleavened bread; (10) and the third seems to be excluded by the calculation of the necessary interval between St. Paul's hearing before Festus and his martyrdom in A.D. 64 (64–65). Thus the crucial date of Festus' arrival seems to be established as A.D. 58, and therefore the close of the Acts after St. Paul's two years' captivity at Rome as A.D. 61; and a sort of framework is erected into which the details to be gathered, first, from the comprehensive history of the Acts, and, secondly, from the fragmentary notices in the Epistles, have now to be inserted.

(4) The Acts; second half (chs. 13–28). For the special criticism of this book, see ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. More need not be said here than that Ac is accepted in what follows as containing, on the whole, an accurate and trustworthy picture of events between Pentecost and St. Paul's (first) Roman captivity, A.D. 29–61. The picture is cut up, as it were, into six panels, each labelled with a general summary of progress; and with so careful an artist, the divisions thus outlined are, in the absence of more precise data, the natural starting-point of investigation. (i.) First period, 1<sup>1</sup>. The Church in Jerus., and the preaching of St. Peter: summary in 6<sup>7</sup> 'and the word of God was increasing, and the number of disciples in Jerus. was being greatly multiplied, and a large number of the priests were becoming obedient to the faith.' (ii.) Second period, 6<sup>8</sup>. Extension of the Church through Pal.; the preaching of St. Stephen; troubles with the Jews: summary in 9<sup>31</sup> 'the Church throughout all Galilee and Judaea and Samaria was having peace, being built up, and walking in the fear of the Lord and in the consolation of the Holy Spirit was being multiplied.' (iii.) Third period, 9<sup>32</sup>. The extension of the Church to Antioch; St. Peter's conversion of Cornelius; further troubles with the Jews: summary in 12<sup>24</sup> 'and the word of the Lord was increasing and being multiplied.' (iv.) Fourth period, 12<sup>25</sup>. Extension of the Church to Asia Minor; preaching of St. Paul in 'Galatia'; troubles with the Jewish Christians: summary in 16<sup>6</sup> 'the Churches then were being confirmed in the faith, and were abounding more in number daily.' (v.) Fifth period, 16<sup>6</sup>. Extension of the Church to Europe; St. Paul's missionary work in the great centres, such as Corinth and Ephesus: summary in 19<sup>30</sup> 'so forcibly was the word of the Lord increasing and prevailing.' (vi.) Sixth period, 19<sup>21</sup>. Extension of the Church to Rome; St. Paul's captivities: summarized in 28<sup>31</sup> 'proclaiming the kingdom of God and teaching the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ with all boldness unhindered.'

Of these six sections the protagonist in the first three is St. Peter, in the last three St. Paul; and the two halves into which the book thus naturally falls make almost equal divisions at the middle of the whole period covered. But the further consideration of the earlier half may best be postponed until the rich chronological material of the later sections has been set in order.

Starting-point of St. Paul's First Missionary Journey (1st M.J., Ac 13<sup>2</sup>). The summary which closes the third section of the Acts intervenes between the notices of the death of Herod Agrippa I. (A.D. 44; see No. 2, above), and of the completion of St. Paul and Barnabas' famine 'ministry' at Jerus.; so that it appears a legitimate inference that between these two events some considerable interval elapsed. Further, as there was no famine before the year A.D. 46 (No. 3, above), the delegates can scarcely have returned earlier to Antioch, unless the Antiochene Church had not merely begun to collect contributions in anticipation, which was natural enough, but had closed their fund before the famine was heard of, which does not seem natural at all. Certainly, if the delegates helped to administer the relief, the year 46 is the earliest possible.

Nor was the start on the 1st M.J. made immediately after their return to Antioch. The description introduced at this point (13<sup>1</sup>) of the personnel of the Antiochene 'prophets and teachers' suggests at least some further period of settled work; and as the journey westwards meant a start either by sea or over the Taurus, it would not be entered upon in the winter months,—indeed it will be assumed in the following discussion as axiomatic that St. Paul's journeys are as far as possible to be placed in the summer (March or April to Nov.), and that during the other months he was in general stationary. Thus the spring of A.D. 47, or more particularly the end of the paschal season (in that year circa Mar. 28–Apr. 4), is the earliest starting-point at all probable.

Duration of the First Missionary Journey (Ac 13<sup>4</sup>–14<sup>26</sup>).—Crossing to Cyprus the apostles landed at Salamis and passed through the whole island as far as Paphos, preaching in the Jewish synagogues (13<sup>5</sup>–6). The stay in Cyprus can hardly have been less than some months; the results, at any rate, encouraged the Cypriot Barnabas to select it as his share of the communities visited or founded in common (15<sup>36, 39</sup>). At earliest, then, in the summer of the same year, A.D. 47, the party crossed to the mainland of Pamphylia; and whether or not Ramsay's attractive conjecture be true, that the 'infirmity of the flesh' was a malarial fever caught there in the lowlands and necessitating an immediate move up into the hills, no stay is recorded anywhere short of Pisidian Antioch (Antioch P.). To the evangelization of this city and of Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, the main efforts of the journey were devoted; and as the return was made by the same route, the three first-named cities were visited twice. The first sojourn in Antioch P. was long enough for the word to be 'spread abroad through the whole district' (13<sup>49</sup>; cf. the similar but stronger phrase in 19<sup>10</sup> of the two years, stay at Ephesus). At Iconium a 'long time' was spent (ἰσχυρὸν χρόνον, 143). With Lystra and Derbe the 'surrounding country' was evangelized (146-7), and at Derbe the disciples made were 'many' (ἰσχυρὸν, 142). The return visits were no doubt shorter; but as they included the work of confirming and organizing the new communities (ἐπιστηροῦντες, χριστονομοῦντες περὶ οὐρανοῦ, 142-23), they cannot well have been hurried. The second stay at Perga, unlike the first, was sufficiently long for the preaching of the word (142; contrast 131-14). From the Pamphylian coast the voyage homeward was made direct.

Where the indications are expressed in such general language, opinions will differ as to the length of time signified. But as it is certain that no one will estimate the stay in the interior at less than six months, and the hills between Antioch P. and Perga would not have been recrossed in the winter (Dec.-March), the whole absence from Antioch in Syria (Antioch S.) must have prolonged itself beyond a year; indeed the smallest space of time which will reasonably cover the details of the Acts is 18 months. Let it be supposed roughly that the apostles arrived in Cyprus in April and left it in July; that they reached Antioch P. by Aug. 1, Iconium by Nov. 1, spending there the five winter months, down to the paschal season (probably circa Mar. 18-25) of A.D. 48, Lystra by April 1, Derbe by May 15, the two latter being far less populous or important cities than the two former; that they began the return journey about July 1, getting down to the Pamphylian lowlands at the beginning of Oct., and back to Antioch S. a month later, say Nov. 1, A.D. 48. It is easy to allow more than this, and Ramsay raises the total from a year and 7 months to 2 years and 3 or 4 months, ending in July A.D. 49 (Ch. in Rom. Emp., p. 65-73). But the shorter estimate, if it satisfies St. Luke's language, and it seems to do so, is to be preferred on the ground that it seems unlikely that the apostles on this their first missionary experiment should have separated themselves from their base at Antioch S., which was yet so near them, for as long a period as over 2 years.

Interval between the First and Second Missionary Journey: the Apostolic Council (Ac 147-153).—The two apostles after their return from the 1st M.J., and before their visit to Jerus., 'resided' at Antioch S. 'for no short time' (διετριβον χρόνον οὐκ ὀλίγον, 142); and although it is just possible that the phrase may be meant to cover the whole period up to the starting-point of the 2nd M.J., yet even so the earlier portion itself cannot have been less than the four winter months from Nov. 1, A.D. 48, onwards. For the Council, it may be taken for granted, would not have been held during those months; and indeed since the Twelve were by this time no longer settled at Jerus., the opportunity for the Council must have been found in their assembling for one of the great Jewish feasts. Thus the earliest possible occasion will have been the passover of A.D. 49, circa April 5-12. But as Paul and Barnabas are said to have 'passed through Phoenice and Samaria, expounding the conversion of the Gentiles' (165),—and though this does not, of course, imply the same delay as the foundation of new communities, it does exclude the idea of hurried movements,—it is really more likely that they kept their passover at Antioch S., and spent the six weeks following in a purely progress towards Jerus., arriving there for the Council at Pentecost (May 24). They may easily have been back again at Antioch S. by the end of June; and as the further stay only amounted to 'certain days' (ἡμέρας τινάς, 168), there is no reason why the start for the 2nd M.J. should not have been made in the late summer of the same year, say Sept. 1, A.D. 49, ten months after the return from the previous journey. (On the visit of St. Peter to Antioch, Gal 21, see below, p. 424-5.)

Duration of the Second Missionary Journey (Ac 153-182).—That St. Paul should start so late in the year, while it would have been very unnatural when he was breaking new ground in unknown districts, as in the 1st M.J., was natural enough when he was going primarily to revisit existing Churches; the winter would be spent among them, and they would serve in turn for bases from which, in the spring, he might make his way on again to further and more strictly missionary labours. This, in fact, is what St. Paul probably did do on his 2nd M.J. He left Antioch S. by land, 'passing through Syria and Cilicia confirming the Churches' (164) ἰσχυροῦντες; cf. 142-152, a phrase which certainly implies a good deal more than a night's rest at each place. Thus several Churches, such as, no doubt, that of Tarsus, were 'visited' before he reached the Churches of the 1st M.J. at all. That of these Derbe is first mentioned, and then Lystra (161), follows from the adoption on this occasion of the land route over Taurus, which must have been crossed not later than November. It is not St. Luke's habit to describe anything in much detail but the foundation of new Churches,—contrast, e.g., the first visit to Macedonia (161-175) with the second (202),—so that no deduction can be drawn from his silence as to any events beyond the circumcision of Timothy (163). On the contrary, the interpolation at this point of the fourth period-summary in 165, though no doubt primarily intended to emphasize the great step forward into Europe which follows, marks also a beating of time between the old work and the new, and suggests that the one was more than a mere episode on the way to the other; St. Paul must have stayed everywhere long enough to mark the progress going on, the 'daily increase in numbers.' Nor is it at all likely that fresh ground would be broken in the winter months. It can only have been after the passover (March 25-April 1) of A.D. 50 that he concluded at Antioch P. the seven months' 'visitation' of existing Churches, and plunged forward into the unknown.

That the phrase 'Phrygian and Galatian district' (τῶν Φρυγίας καὶ Γαλατίας χωρῶν, 169) or 'Galatian and Phrygian district' (τῶν Γαλ. χωρῶν καὶ Φρυγίας, 182) means not two places, but one and the same, follows as well from the inclusion of both under a single article, as from the fact that the names are given in reverse order on the second occasion, though the direction of the journey was the same as on the first, from east to west. St. Paul's object on leaving Antioch P. was naturally the group of famous and populous cities on the western coast. [The Phrygo-Galatic region, if it lay on the route to Ephesus, can have had nothing to do with Galatia in the narrower ethnical sense, which was far away to the N. and N.E.; and this is only one of many arguments which combine to make Ramsay's view that the 'Galatian' Churches are those of Antioch P., Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, all but demonstrably true.] Entrance, however, into the province of Asia was barred by divine intervention; and St. Paul directed his eyes to the next great group of cities, and turned northwards for Bithynia, only to find the same check when he reached the Bithynian border. This time the western direction was left open, and the party skirted Mysia until they touched the coast at a point north of 'Asia', namely Troas. But as it is implied throughout these verses that no settlement was made for preaching, not more than a month need be allowed between the departure from Antioch P. and the arrival in Europe. The proclamation of the gospel at Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, and Athens must have occupied all the summer of A.D. 50: the stay at the two former towns, at least, was long enough to found flourishing Churches, and the 'three Sabbaths' at the synagogue of Thessalonica (172) represent, no doubt, not the whole of St. Paul's residence, but only the time anterior to the separation of Christians and Jews, cf. 18<sup>8</sup>, 7 19<sup>8</sup>, 9. Ramsay, indeed, allots eleven months to these four places (Ch. in Rom. Emp., p. 85); but in the absence of any hint at specially lengthy sojourns—contrast 134<sup>9</sup> 14<sup>9</sup> etc.—six weeks at Philippi, two or three months at Thessalonica, and a few weeks each at Berea and Athens must be considered sufficient. The sea route from Berea to Athens is likely to have been taken before the autumnal equinox, and the apostle was doubtless eager to get on to his future headquarters, so that the arrival at Corinth may be placed in October A.D. 50. The total stay there of eighteen months (for the ἡμέρας ἑκατὸς of 181<sup>8</sup> are probably to be included in the ἡμερῶν καὶ μηνῶν of 181<sup>1</sup>) will last till April A.D. 52, thus covering two winters and a summer. St. Paul, as might be expected, arrives at the end of one travelling season and leaves at the beginning of another. The departure, if made, as in other cases, immediately after the paschal season (circa April 2-9, A.D. 52), would be timed to bring St. Paul (πρὸς Ephesus and Caesarea, 181<sup>8</sup> 22) to Jerus., as on the 3rd M.J., for the Feast of Pentecost. There the stay was only for the purpose of 'saluting the Church,' and the apostle went on at once to his old home at Antioch S., arriving, say, in June A.D. 52, after an absence of two years and nine months.

Duration of the Third Missionary Journey.—But Antioch was no longer an effective centre for St. Paul's work; it was out of reach of his new Churches in Macedonia and Achaia, while his 'Galatian' Churches would be supervised quite as easily from Ephesus, whither he was pledged to return if he could (182<sup>1</sup>). If advantage was to be taken of the travelling season for the highlands of Asia Minor, no long delay was possible; the farewells at Antioch S. were therefore probably brief (182<sup>1</sup> παύσαις χρόνις τινὰ ἡμέραις); contrast the continuous work implied in 126 135 142<sup>8</sup> 153<sup>8</sup>; and a start made on the 3rd M.J. about August A.D. 52.

This time the passage across Asia Minor seems to have been less protracted. Nothing is said of a stay in Cilicia (contr. 154<sup>1</sup>); it is only in the Galatian Churches of the 1st M.J. that St. Paul, as he moved in order from one to another, set himself to 'establish' all the disciples (ἐπιστατοῦντες καὶ ἐστηροῦντες, 182<sup>1</sup>). This visitation, and the not very long or difficult journey between Antioch P. the westernmost of these cities, and Ephesus, need not have extended over much more than the remaining months of A.D. 52. Perhaps about the turn of the year, while travelling in the less rugged districts was still feasible, St. Paul reached Ephesus, and entered on a long residence there, certainly of two years, almost certainly of two years and three months—that is, if 191<sup>9</sup> τοῦτο δὲ ἔργον ἐστὶν ἐν ἡμέραις refers only to the disputing in the school of Tyrannus, and excludes the three months of the synagogue preaching, 198. It is true that in the case of the stay at Corinth (see just above) the later and fuller calculation is inclusive and not exclusive of the earlier and briefer: for Ephesus, on the contrary, the supplementary evidence of Ac 20<sup>31</sup> τρίτην . . . οὐκ ἰκανοῦσιν appears to decide the question in favour of a total length of considerably over two years of residence. The period thus reckoned terminates at earliest in March or April A.D. 55. [A departure not before spring is confirmed by the evidence of the two Corinthian Epistles. 1 Co, written about the paschal season (March 30-April 6 in A.D. 55), announces a plan for leaving Ephesus after Pentecost, for travelling through Macedonia, and perhaps wintering in Corinth (1 Co 5<sup>9</sup> 16<sup>5</sup> 9).—a plan which would provide for a much longer, though less immediate, visit to Corinth than the original intention of going on the way to Macedonia (cf. 2 Co 1<sup>14</sup> and 1 Co 16<sup>7</sup> ὅτι οὐ θέλω γὰρ ὑμᾶς ἀπὸ ἐν παροῶν ἰδεῖν). The Ephesian riot may have even precipitated the departure before Pentecost (Ac 20<sup>1</sup>).] At some time, then, in the spring of A.D. 55, St. Paul launches himself on a new cycle of wanderings, intended to include Macedonia, Achaia, Jerus., and Rome (182<sup>1</sup>). [2 Co implies that he had planned to preach at Troas, and stayed there long enough to find an opening, but ultimately hurried on into Macedonia, the sooner to meet Titus and the news from Corinth (21<sup>2</sup> 13).] Through Macedonia he travelled slowly, visiting as he went the Churches of the 2nd journey, and possibly founding others (20<sup>2</sup> διελθὼν τὰ μέρη ταῦτα καὶ παρακαλέσας αὐτοὺς λόγῳ πολλῷ), until he reached Greece proper, or 'Hellas.' There, or

In other words in Corinth, he stayed three months—obviously the winter months of A.D. 55-56, since the return journey brought him to Philippi just in time for the passover (March 18-25 A.D. 56), 208. This longer route through Macedonia was a sudden substitute, at the time of starting, for the direct voyage to Pal. (209), and the party had to hurry in consequence if the distance from Philippi to Jerus. was to be covered in the six weeks between the end of the paschal season and Pentecost (201<sup>b</sup>). A week (six days) was spent at Trous, and another at Tyre, perhaps while waiting for weather or ships; but the journey between these two places was made with only necessary halts, and appears to have occupied not more than a fortnight. The days that remained to spare were spent at Caesarea (210<sup>a</sup>), and Jerus. was probably reached just in time for the feast.

St. Paul's Captivity.—At Jerus. St. Paul was arrested (May A.D. 56), and conveyed thence to Caesarea, where his imprisonment, though not of a rigorous character, had lasted a full two years (ἑξάμηναι, 247) when Porcius Festus succeeded Felix in the middle of A.D. 58. Festus, unlike his predecessor, gave a fairly prompt hearing to the case (251.6.13.23), and late in the summer St. Paul, having appealed to Caesar, was sent, with other prisoners, in charge of a centurion to Rome. But the voyage was much delayed by contrary winds, and they were still off Crete at a time when the great fast (Tisri 10—circa Sept. 15 in A.D. 58) had already gone by—how long gone by St. Luke does not say (27<sup>a</sup>). Even if the wreck took place as late as the beginning of November, and the three months at Malta (281<sup>a</sup>) are reckoned to the full, the voyage was continued early in February, before navigation would naturally have begun; but no doubt an official on government business would be more likely than ordinary folk to risk sailing at an unpropitious season. Anyhow, somewhere in the early months of A.D. 59 St. Paul may be believed to have arrived in Rome, and after 'two whole years' (ἑξάμηναι, 283<sup>a</sup>), i.e. in the spring of A.D. 61, the book of the Acts closes, and leaves him still a prisoner; though the mention of the particular period suggests that a different condition of things supervened at the end of it, in which case the release, and visit to Spain, would follow at this point. [See for the rest of St. Paul's life, supra, pp. 420<sup>b</sup> 421<sup>a</sup>.]

Thus the second portion of the Acts, from the beginning of the 1st M.J. (132-233), covers a period of fourteen years, certainly not less, and apparently not more; and if the starting-point was rightly placed in A.D. 47, the fourteen years will come to an end in A.D. 61.

(B) The Epistles of St. Paul.

Of these the Pastoral Epistles fall outside the Acts, and have been dealt with already (p. 421<sup>a</sup>). The two to the Thess. were written in the company of Silas and Timothy, the first not long after leaving Athens, 1 Th 1<sup>1</sup> 31-2. 2 Th 1<sup>1</sup>; that is to say, during the long stay at Corinth on the 2nd M.J., A.D. 51 (50-52). The two to the Cor. fall, the one just before, the other soon after, the departure from Ephesus for Macedonia, towards the end of the 3rd M.J., A.D. 55 (see above, p. 422<sup>b</sup>). The Epistle to the Rom. belongs to the winter residence at Corinth, A.D. 55-56 (Ro 16<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>23-26</sup> = Ac 19<sup>21</sup>). The Epistles to Philippi, Ephesus, Colossae, and to Philemon belong in all probability to the Roman imprisonment, A.D. 59-61. But the one Epistle which contains something of a chronology of St. Paul's life (Gal 1<sup>18-21</sup>), the one Epistle which would bring together a point in the second half of the Acts with a point in the first, is also, from the absence of allusions to contemporary history, unfortunately the most difficult to date of all the Epistles.

Date of the Galatian Epistle.—(i.) Resemblance of style and subject-matter has generally led critics to assign Gal to the second group of Epistles, with 1, 2 Co and Ro, or even to a particular place in that group, between 2 Co and Ro (so Lightfoot, Galatians, pp. 44-56), i.e. on the chronology above adopted, in the latter part of A.D. 55. But perhaps too much stress has been laid on such resemblances taken alone,—as though St. Paul's history was so strictly uniform that a given topic can only have been handled at a given moment,—and too little on the influence of external circumstances to revive old ideas or call out new ones. Thus the Philippian and Ephesian letters belong to the same period; but the difference of conditions between the 'Asiatic' province and a Romanized community in Macedonia has produced a marked difference of topics and illustrated a marked progress of thought. Conversely, Gal and Ro may grapple with the same problems on the same lines (and yet what an alteration of tone between the two!) without being at all nearly synchronous with one another. The Galatian Epistle must be earlier than the Roman, earlier, that is, than A.D. 56; nothing more can be asserted positively, so far. (ii.) At the other end, the terminus a quo for the Epistle is the 1st M.J.; thus, even if addressed, as is probable, to the Churches then founded, it falls after A.D. 48. Further, the phrase in 4<sup>3</sup> 'because of weakness of the flesh I preached the gospel to you τὸ πρότερον,' implies either some considerable lapse of years, 'in the old time,' or a second visit 'on the former of my two visits.' With the first alternative a date as late as A.D. 53-55 is possible; with the other, the Epistle must fall between the second and third visits, i.e. between the spring of A.D. 50 and the autumn of A.D. 52 (supra, p. 422).

[Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 180) dates the letter from Antioch S. immediately before the third visit, and finds a reason for this precision in the assertion that so critical a situation must have called of necessity for a prompt personal inspection; but it might be urged with at least equal reason, from Gal 1<sup>18</sup> ὅτι τὰς ταχέως μετατίθεις, that the interval after St. Paul's last visit—whichever that was—had not been a long one.]

Visits to Jerusalem in the Galatian Epistle.—

For the date, then, the years A.D. 50-55 remain open; and therefore St. Paul when he wrote had paid according to the Acts either three visits to Jerus.—Ac 9<sup>26-30</sup> after the flight from Damascus, Ac 11<sup>30</sup> 12<sup>28</sup> the contribution for the famine, c. A.D. 46, Ac 15<sup>4-30</sup> the apostolic Council, A.D. 49,—or four, adding to the three former Ac 18<sup>22</sup>, the flying visit at the end of the 2nd M.J., A.D. 52. In the Epistle, on the other hand, two visits only are named, the first a fortnight's visit to Cephas (Gal 1<sup>18</sup>), the second an official visit of the representatives of Gentile to the representatives of Jewish Christianity (Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup>). Thus, even if St. Luke's enumeration is exhaustive, St. Paul omits either one or two visits altogether. But if this seems a difficulty, the solution is simple; St. Paul is enumerating, not his visits to Jerus. per se, but his visits for intercourse with the elder apostles, πρὸς τοὺς πρὸ ἐμοῦ ἀποστόλους (Gal 1<sup>17</sup>), and would necessarily omit any visit when they were absent. What, then, of the occasion when the famine contribution was brought to Jerusalem? If St. Luke mentions only elders or presbyters as the recipients of the bounty (Ac 11<sup>30</sup>), the natural, though of course not the only possible, explanation is that the elders—that is, the local ministry with St. James the Lord's brother at their head—were by that time the supreme authority. Certain it is that, whether gradually or at some definite moment, the Twelve did separate themselves from the Church at Jerus., and became more completely the missionaries which after all their commission from Christ and their very title of 'apostles' meant them to be. After the persecution of Herod they are never mentioned at Jerus. save during the Council of ch. 15. Doubtless, they returned from time to time, as opportunity offered, to keep the feasts like other Jews; but neither at St. Paul's fourth nor at his fifth visit is there the least hint of their presence. [If the ancient tradition that the apostles, according to divine command, remained at Jerus. for twelve years after the Ascension (Prædicatio Petri, ap. Clem. Al. Strom. vi. 5; Apollonius ap. Eus. HE v. 18; Harnack, o.c. p. 243; von Dobschütz, Texte u. Unters. xi. 1, pp. 52, 148) substantially represents historic fact, as may well be the case, then A.D. 41 or thereabouts will mark their departure.] Here is ample reason for St. Paul's silence about the visit of Ac 11. 12 and (if the Epistle was written after the summer of A.D. 52) that of Ac 18. Thus the first visit of Gal corresponds with the first of Ac; the second of Ac is omitted; and the second of Gal answers to the third of Ac (A.D. 49).

[This connexion of Gal 2:10 with Ac 15 is generally accepted, and a strong argument for it is the common atmosphere of crisis which pervades both narratives, told though they are from different points of view. Ramsay, however (St. Paul, pp. 153-166), strongly maintains that the second visit of Gal can only be the second of Acts. Some of his points have been answered here by anticipation; some illustrate the micrologie which Harnack, not wholly without cause, attributes to him, e.g., that the same visit cannot be said in St. Paul to have been κατὰ ἀποκατάστασιν, Gal 2:1, in St. Luke to have been by commission from the Church of Antioch, as though the Spirit and the Church never spoke in harmony. Very attractive, however, is the identification of St. Paul's 'emissaries from James' (Gal 2:12 τὰς ἀδελφὰς τῶν ἀπὸ Ἰακώβου) with St. Luke's 'emissaries from Judaea' (Ac 15:1 ἐκ τῆς καυκάστου καὶ τῆς Ἰουδαίας), for this would make St. Peter's desertion of the Gentile Christians at Antioch to precede and not to follow his championship of their cause at Jerus., and would be a real point of superiority over the common view that St. Peter and St. James gave a formal pledge of brotherhood, and then violated it. But this identification of the two Judaizing missions from Jerus. to Antioch may be accepted side by side with the ordinary view that Gal 2:10=Ac 15, if Gal. 2:11-14 be allowed in order of time to precede Gal 2:10. There is nothing like the isara of Gal 1:18-21 to suggest that the chronological series is continued. On the contrary, St. Paul's argument may perhaps be best paraphrased as follows: 'I have not received my gospel from the elder apostles. I went up to their headquarters at Jerus., not on my conversion, but first at an interval of 3 years, and then at one of 14; the first a private visit, the second an official one, when I treated with them, and was recognized by them, on equal terms. So far from simply submitting to them, I once publicly rebuked their chief on the occasion when he was on my ground at Antioch, and backed out of his own liberal principles under pressure from representatives of James.' If this interpretation be correct, Ramsay has failed indeed to prove his main point, but has shown the way to a subsidiary rearrangement of much importance. The dispute at Antioch may then be placed in the winter (A.D. 48-49) before the Council, at which St. Peter 'employs to others the argument that had convinced himself.']

Date of St. Paul's Conversion.—The second visit of Galatians being thus identified with the Council, the date has already been fixed as in all probability A.D. 49 (above, p. 422*); and this visit itself was 'at an interval of 14 years' (δὲ δεκατεσσάρων ἐτῶν, Gal 2:1), while the first visit was '3 years after' the conversion (μετὰ τρία ἔτη, Gal 1:18). But are the 14 years of the second visit also to be reckoned from the conversion (11 years, therefore, from the first visit), with Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 382, or from the first visit (17 from the conversion), with Lightfoot, ad loc.? The Greek suits either alternative; the argument favours the former, for St. Paul would naturally state the intervals at the highest possible figure. The first of the synchronisms established above (p. 416*) gives weight to the same side; when St. Paul came to Jerus. on his first visit, he had just fled from the ethnarch of Aretas at Damascus (2 Co 11:32=Ac 9:23-25), and Aretas probably did not become master of Damascus till A.D. 37. But the addition of the 3 to the 14 years would throw back the first visit to A.D. 35-36, probably beyond the time of Aretas, and the conversion to A.D. 32-33, whereas the inclusion of the 3 in the 14 would put the conversion in A.D. 35-36, and the first visit under Aretas in A.D. 38.

(C) The first half of the Acts: chs. 1-12.

Thus, from the dates established in the second half of the Acts, it is possible, by means of the Epistles, to argue back to the first half of the Acts and to reach two rough dates for the conversion of St. Paul (Ac 9:10), A.D. 35-36, and for his first visit to Jerus. (Ac 9:30), A.D. 38. It remains only to adjust, by the help of these points, the division into periods (see p. 421*), which is the single hint at a chronology supplied by St. Luke in the earlier part of his work. St. Paul's conversion apparently followed not very long after St. Stephen's martyrdom, and that, in turn, is the first event recorded in the 2nd section of the Acts (9:1 8:67-9). The first period of relatively undisturbed progress will then end about A.D. 35, having covered six years from A.D. 29. The second period, marking a commencement, but only a commencement, of conflict, begins in A.D. 35, and the last event mentioned in it is St. Paul's first visit to Jerus., A.D. 38; but the peaceful development implied in the summary of this period (9:31) justifies, perhaps, the extension of the period as far as A.D. 39-40. The third period ends with the record of advance in 12:24, after the death of Herod in A.D. 44, and before St. Paul's second visit (at any rate before its conclusion) at the time of the famine in A.D. 46, and lasts altogether from A.D. 39-40 to, say, A.D. 45. That the chronology here adopted results in a more or less even division of periods—i. from A.D. 29; ii. from A.D. 35; iii. from A.D. 39-40; iv. from A.D. 45-46; v. from A.D. 50; vi. from A.D. 55 (to A.D. 61)—such as St. Luke seems to be contemplating, must be considered a slight step towards its verification. On the other hand, Harnack's chronology, which puts St. Paul's conversion in the same year as the Crucifixion, or, at latest, in the following, allotting even in the latter case no more than about 18 months to Ac 1:9-18, neglects these period-divisions altogether.

Conclusion.—This article may be concluded by a comparison of the dates here adopted (col. ii.) with schemes preferred by three representative writers—Harnack (col. i.), who throws everything early; Lightfoot (col. iv.), who throws all the latter part late; and Ramsay (col. iii.), who investigates independently, but is nearer to Lightfoot than to Harnack.

If these several schemes are brought to the test of agreement with the ten results established on a balance of probabilities in the first half of this article, it follows with regard to each in turn—

1. That certainly Harnack (A.D. 33), and probably Ramsay (A.D. 35-36), put St. Paul's first visit to Jerus., and therefore his flight from Damascus, earlier than it seems that Aretas can have obtained possession of the latter city.

2. That for the death of Herod Agrippa I., A.D. 44 is accepted in all schemes.

3. That Harnack, at least, puts the return from the second or famine visit to Jerus. [A.D. 44?] considerably before the famine can have begun.

4. That no scheme puts the 1st M.J. and visit to Cyprus (A.D. 45, 47, 48) in either of the two years which are impossible for Sergius Paulus' governorship.

5. That all schemes bring St. Paul to Corinth (autumn of A.D. 48, of 50, of 51, of 52) under Claudius; but that if Orosius' date for the expulsion of the Jews from Rome (A.D. 49-50) is correct, then, since Aquila's arrival immediately preceded St. Paul's (Ac 18:2 προσφάτως ἐληλυθότα), Harnack's date is certainly too early; Lightfoot's certainly, and Ramsay's possibly, too late.

6. That all schemes make St. Paul appear before Gallio at Corinth (A.D. 49-50, 51-52, 52-53, 53-54) in a possible year for the latter's proconsulship; but that the earliest of these years, Harnack's, is not a likely one.

7. That, in the same way, Harnack's scheme makes St. Paul appear before Felix and his wife Drusilla at Caesarea (A.D. 54), in the earliest possible year of the marriage.

8. That Harnack puts the recall of Felix and arrival of Festus too early (A.D. 56) to suit the evidence of Josephus, just as Lightfoot puts it too late (A.D. 60) to suit the evidence of Tacitus, and that a date equally distant from these two (A.D. 58) is perhaps best of all.

9. That Harnack's year for St. Paul's arrest (A.D. 54), and still more Lightfoot's (A.D. 58), are less easy to reconcile with the chronology of the passover at Philippi than A.D. 56 or 57.

10. That Lightfoot's year, and, to a less extent, Ramsay's year, for the release of St. Paul from the first Roman captivity, are difficult to reconcile with his martyrdom in A.D. 64-65.

The evidence from these synchronisms, taken individually, does not pretend to amount to demonstrative proof; but the whole of Harnack's scheme, and all the latter part of Lightfoot's, appear to contradict them at too many points to be entertained. Of the other two, Ramsay's is perhaps nowhere superior, and at several points inferior, to that of the present article, which is recommended as a consistent and fairly satisfactory harmonization of a good many results which, like the sticks in the faggot, are separately weak, but together strong.

LITERATURE.—The received view depends on Wieseler's Chronol. d. apost. Zeitalters, 1848. The English reader may find it expounded in Venables' tr. of Wieseler, in Lewin's Fest Saeri, 1895, or in Lightfoot's Biblical Essays, pp. 210-233, posthumously printed from notes of a course of lectures delivered in 1863, but seeming, in essentials, to represent his latest views. Most recent English writers had accepted this chronology without question, until Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895 (see also for some points his Church in the Roman Empire, 1893), subjected it to partial re-examination and restatement. His main contention, the identification of the visits of Gal 2:1-10 and Ac 12:25, has not met, and is perhaps not likely to meet, with much acceptance; but in spite of this, and in spite of an unnecessarily dogmatic tone, his contribution to the subject is a real and substantial one, and the present article is very much more indebted to him than to any other writer. German books have in the main acquiesced in Wieseler's results, e.g. Schürer's invaluable Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, ed. 2, 1886-1890. Some Roman Catholic writers, indeed, clung to the system which throws back the chronology of St. Paul's later life by four or five years behind Wieseler's; and these have been now reinforced by Blass, Acta Apostolorum, 1895, pp. 21-24, who does not commit himself beyond a trenchant criticism of the received view, and by Harnack, Chronol. d. altchristl. Literatur bis Eusebius, i. 1897, pp. 233-244, whose adhesion is thoroughgoing, though his treatment of the evidence is unequal and unsatisfactory. C. H. TURNER.

CHURCH (ἐκκλησία).—For the history of the word ἐκκλησία and its relation to such Heb. terms as קהל and קצו, see art. CONGREGATION.

In the present art. we shall discuss—

I. DEFINITION OF CHURCH IN NT.

II. THE ACTUAL CHURCH.

(A) Conditions of Membership.

(B) The Life of the Church.

i. The Public Worship.

ii. Christian Rule of Conduct.

(C) The Single Community. Its Functions and Organization.

(D) The whole Church.

III. THE IDEAL CHURCH.

I. DEFINITION OF THE CHURCH IN NT.—

Ἐκκλησία is used in NT of a single community of Christians, or of the sum of the single communities, the whole body of Christians. In the last sense, two points of view are possible, and both are found in NT. We may think of the Church as an 'empiric matter of fact,' i.e. as a collection of individuals, the actual Church, or we may cease to think of the Church as a noun of multitude and regard it as a single individual entity, the ideal Church. The second point of view is closely related to the first. If we ask what is in the minds of the writers in this usage, we find that ultimately they are thinking, not of a single entity, but of a collection of individuals. So when St. Paul says the Church is the 'body' or 'bride' of Christ, he is really expressing under the figure of a single entity, the Church, the relation in which Christ stands to the individual members. There is, however, a real difference between the conception of actual and ideal Church in two respects. (1) The conception of the actual Church regards it as it really is, i.e. a body of individuals of various degrees of imperfection; while the ideal Church is a body whose members represent the ideal of membership, i.e. it is a perfect Church, or at least one free from the negative aspect of evil. (2) The actual Church is composed of the members who are still alive and in the world at the time of speaking; while the conception of the ideal Church does not denote a definite number of members at a definite time, but implies a membership independent of time. The latter is, in fact, an ideal, not an empirical, body. Hence it splits off from the later conception of the 'invisible' Church, i.e. the Church as composed of all its members, dead and living; for it refers neither to dead nor living Christians, but to an indefinite body of members belonging to no time, present, past, or future, because it is a timeless ideal conception.

The conception of the Church in NT stands in so close a relation to two other conceptions, viz. the 'people of Israel' and the 'kingdom of God,' that it is necessary here to say something as to the connexion between these ideas.

(a) The Church and the People of Israel.—The Jewish nation, by the crucifixion of the Messiah, brought down upon themselves their final and irrevocable rejection. Jews were called upon to save themselves from 'this crooked generation' (Ac 2:40). Since Christ came there was 'none other name under heaven which is given among men wherein we must be saved' (1:2). It was no longer enough to live after Moses; it was only by accepting the baptism of Christ that the Jew could obtain remission of sins. But at the outset the Christian still remained a Jew. His new profession did not absolve him from the law and the institutions of Moses. So the Church starts as a society within the Jewish nation. The distinction is already to hand between the actual Isr. and the true people of God. The believers are the 'remnant' (cf. Ro 11:5) in the actual Israel, which is the preparation for the restored and perfected Isr. of the prophets. The Christ, who has already once appeared, is waiting for 'Israel' to repent and believe on Him, that He may come again and all things be restored (Ac 3:21, 21:56). All that do not accept Him shall be utterly destroyed from among the people (2:23). Here, then, we see the Church identified with the people of Israel, but distinguished, on the one hand, from the existing Jewish nation, and, on the other, from the restored Isr. of prophecy. The 'second coming' is to see the identification of the actual with the ideal Isr., by the incorporation of those who believe on Christ with the latter, and the destruction of the unbelievers. So in the Messianic age, Church and ideal Isr. and actual Isr. will be one and the same, but at present they are distinguished. It was necessary, however, that this view should be modified when the admission of Gentiles was permitted without demanding circumcision from them. The previous conception of the Church and of the future restored Isr. was confined to the exclusively national ideals of Jewish tradition. It did not travel beyond the 'Israel after the flesh.' In the Pauline conception, however, the Church is still regarded as the chosen folk, but a distinction appears between Isr. 'after the flesh' (1 Co 10:18) and the 'Isr. of God' (Gal 6:16). God has taken from the heathen a 'people for his name' (Ac 15:14), and in this new Isr. 'they are not all Isr. which are of Isr.' (Ro 9:6). The faithful remnant within Isr., which before was identified with the Church, is now but a small part of it. The 'oracles of God' are no longer entrusted to the Jewish nation, for the Christians have succeeded the Jews as the vehicles of inspiration (Eph 3:3, He 1:2, cf. with 23-4). The Church, then, stands over against the actual Isr. as a non-Jewish spiritual Israel. In the picture of Ro 11:17, the Church is an olive tree in which the patriarchs are the 'root,' the unbelieving Jews are rejected branches, and the Gentiles new branches grafted in from the wild olive. At the same time, to the Jewish and primitive Christian, belief in a restoration of the natural Isr. to the position of a world-subduing kingdom (cf. Ac 1:6) succeeds the idea of the kingdom of God as Christ Himself conceived it, i.e. the universal rule of Christian principles, a cosmopolitan instead of a national conception.

(b) The Church and the Kingdom (of Heaven) of God.—The fundamental conception underlying the various meanings of the kingdom of God is that of the Kingship (βασιλεία) of God or Christ. βασιλεία in Greek was a word with a wider range of significance than we generally attach to the Eng. word 'kingdom,' and the shades of meaning which it bore determine also the different conceptions of the kingdom of heaven. We have thus (α) the abstract sense of βασιλεία, i.e. those moral and spiritual qualities which are in consonance with the will of God. It is this that St. Paul says, 'the kingdom of God is . . . righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost' (Ro 14<sup>17</sup>); or that Christ compares it to the hid treasure and the pearl of great price (Mt 13<sup>44-46</sup>); or that He says, 'Seek ye first his kingdom and his righteousness' (Mt 6<sup>33</sup>, Lk 12<sup>31</sup>). 'The k. of God is within you' (Lk 17<sup>21</sup>). It is probably also used in this sense in the expressions, 'the glad tidings (or the gospel) of the kingdom' (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>, Lk 8<sup>1</sup> etc.), 'to preach the kingdom' (Lk 4<sup>43</sup>, Ac 20<sup>25</sup> etc.). (3) In a concrete sense the establishing of such a rule considered as an event. We have here two points of view from which such an event might be considered. (1) As soon as Christ's teaching found disciples, the kingdom was already established; or if we regard the miraculous power of Christ over nature, we might say with Him, 'if I by the spirit of God cast out devils, then is the k. of God come upon you' (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>, cf. Lk 11<sup>20</sup>). From the point of view of the kingdom already established, it is compared to the rapid growth of a mustard tree (Mt 13<sup>31-32</sup>), or leaven spreading through meal (ib. 33). (2) A future establishment of the kingdom. This idea is especially connected with the second coming of Christ 'with the angels of his power, in flaming fire' (2 Th 1<sup>8</sup>, cf. ib. 8-10), the establishment of the kingdom in power (cf. Mt 24<sup>610</sup>, Lk 17<sup>22</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>50-54</sup>). A third but rare use is (3) the present rule of God in heaven (2 Ti 4<sup>18</sup>, cf. Lk 23<sup>42-43</sup>, Jn 18<sup>36</sup>). (4) Realis = sphere of rule, not so much local, as in the prevailing use of 'kingdom,' but in the sense of the society or community over which the rule extends. This meaning has also two variations corresponding to the first two meanings of (3). They are (1) the actual society of professing Christians, including good and bad members; so in Parables of the Tares (Mt 13<sup>24-30</sup>), the Draw-net (ib. 47-50), and the Wedding Garment (ib. 22<sup>1-13</sup>), but always with a reference to (2) the blessed society of those who are admitted to the kingdom at the second coming, when it is established with power in its perfection. As the society of the blessed, to be rejected from which is eternal misery, its membership is the reward of faithful service; cf. the expressions, 'There is the k. of heaven' (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>, cf. Lk 6<sup>20</sup>), 'to enter into, to inherit the k.' (Mt 6<sup>20</sup>, Ac 14<sup>22</sup>, Gal 5<sup>21</sup>, Col 1<sup>12</sup>, and many other places).

Of these meanings ἐκκλησία coincides only with the last. It does not per se connote any moral or spiritual qualities, e.g. we would not say, 'The Church is righteousness and peace and joy,' etc. Nor could we use the word ἐκκλησία of an event. It is properly a collective noun, denoting the people of God. Even when it is spoken of ideally or as a person, the fundamental meaning is still that of God's folk.* The 'kingdom of God' is then a very much wider conception than 'Church.' Where the two occur side by side (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>), the 'kingdom' appears as the future and heavenly counterpart of the Church. The 'bindings' and 'loosings' of the latter shall be counted valid in the former; cf. the words 'on earth' (=Church), 'in heaven' (=kingdom), ib. 19 18<sup>18</sup>, cf. Jn 20<sup>23</sup>.

II. THE ACTUAL CHURCH is the society of Christians, or a part of it.

(A) Membership.—The necessary qualifications for membership were repentance of former sins and submission to baptism in the name of Jesus Christ (Ac 2<sup>38</sup>), which carried with it the demand of faith in Christ. The privileges of membership acquired at baptism were: (1) The Christian became reconciled with God through appropriating to himself Christ's satisfaction for sin (Ro 5<sup>19</sup> 6<sup>4-7</sup>, Col 1<sup>21-22</sup>). His past life of sin no longer stood against him in his account with God. He was justified. (2) He was sanctified, and henceforth was called 'holy' (ἅγιος), because he belonged to God by the consecration of baptism (1 Co 6<sup>11</sup>). (3) He received the gift of the Holy Ghost (Ac 2<sup>38</sup>) as a supernatural power within him. (4) He was admitted to the common life and sacraments of the Christian brotherhood. On his part, in turn, he was bound, so far as he could, to live up to the high standard of that life, 'to put on the new man, which after God hath been created in righteousness and holiness of truth' (Eph 4<sup>24</sup>).

(B) The Life of the Church.—The new life, to which the convert was introduced by his baptism, was the practical expression of the relation in which he stood to God as a member of His 'people.' His life was henceforth given up to the service of God. And that service was the worship of God in the public gatherings of worship and in the holiness of his private life. So we may consider the life of the Church under these two aspects: (1) the public worship, (2) the Christian conduct.

* Il 12<sup>23</sup> πανηγύρις καὶ ἐκκλησία πρωτοτύπων is not to the point as an instance of a distinctively Christian usage of ἐκκλησία. It is plain from the connexion with πανηγύρις that ἐκκλησία is used here in a quite general meaning, 'assembly,' without reference to its technical Christian significance.

i. The Public Worship.

This subject divides itself into two branches: (1) Occasional ceremonies. These were the rites of baptism and ordination. We hear nothing of special forms of service in connexion with marriage or burial. (2) Ordinary services. These were also of two kinds: (a) a public (i.e. not confined to Christians) service, which was of a didactic ('edification,' 1 Co 14<sup>26</sup>) and missionary character; (b) the 'breaking of the bread,' a private (i.e. confined to Christians) act of worship.

(1) Occasional Ceremonies.—(a) Baptism was the rite by which the convert was formally admitted as a member of the Church (Ac 2<sup>41-42</sup>). It was therefore (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>) to be administered to every Christian without exception. St. Paul always takes it for granted that his hearers have been baptized (e.g. Ac 19<sup>3</sup>, Ro 6<sup>3</sup>, Ac 2<sup>41-42</sup>). It is indeed regarded as necessary for salvation that a man should have undergone this ceremony (Jn 3<sup>5</sup>), which saves the Christian as the ark saved Noah (1 P 3<sup>20-21</sup>). At the same time, it is never regarded as a merely mechanical means of salvation, but is contrasted with circumcision by its spiritual significance (Col 2<sup>11-12</sup>), and the subjective element (i.e. faith and a good conscience) is insisted upon as the necessary accompaniment of the ceremonial act, if the receiver would obtain its advantages (1 P 3<sup>21</sup>). The ritual of baptism consisted of an immersion of the baptized person in water (Mt 3<sup>16</sup>, Mk 1<sup>10</sup>, Ac 8<sup>38</sup>). The baptizer accompanied the act with the formula 'in the name of Jesus Christ' (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>48</sup> 19<sup>5</sup>, cf. Ja 2<sup>7</sup>), or more fully 'in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost' (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, Didache 7). No limitations are expressly mentioned in NT which forbid us to suppose that the right to baptize did not belong to every Christian, but as a matter of fact we find no instances of persons baptizing except those with some sort of recognized position of authority. Our Lord (Jn 4<sup>2</sup>) and the apostles (Ac 10<sup>48</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>17</sup>) generally avoided baptizing in person, and relegated the duty to helpers and assistants. See BAPTISM.

(b) Ordination.—Every Christian had a charisma (=gift, talent), the nature and degree of which determined his position and duties in the community. But while the charisma in most cases is considered as coming direct from the Holy Ghost to the individual at the time of or after his baptism, without any further human agency, in some instances a charisma was bestowed through the 'laying on of hands.' The 'laying on of hands' in OT was the symbolic act of conveying a gift (as in blessing Gn 48<sup>14</sup>, appointing to office Nu 27<sup>23</sup>) or a curse (as the scapegoat Lv 16<sup>21</sup>). In the case of our Lord the 'laying on of hands' was especially attached to the miracles of healing (e.g. Mt 9<sup>18</sup>, Mk 5<sup>23</sup> etc.), and He left to His disciples the power of healing through the same act (Mk 16<sup>18</sup>). In the apostolic age it is also found in connexion with healing (Ac 9<sup>12, 17</sup> 28<sup>8</sup>). It thus had the significance of a miraculous power. In the passages where it is mentioned as an accompanying or supplementary ceremony to baptism, the miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost attends its employment (cf. Ac 8<sup>18</sup> ἰδ., i.e. the 'laying on of hands' is the instrument by which the Holy Ghost was given in this instance), and is contrasted with the ordinary gift of the Holy Ghost through baptism. So, too, when a man was to be 'set apart' for a particular work, he receives a special 'gift' for its performance through the 'laying on of hands.' This is especially mentioned of the Seven (Ac 6<sup>6</sup>), the mission of Barnabas and Saul (Ac 13<sup>9</sup>), and the work of Timothy at Ephesus (1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>), and it appears in the Pastoral Epp. as the regular form of ordaining a bishop or deacon (1 Ti 5<sup>22</sup>). It was accom-

(2) The Regular Worship.—We turn now to the regular services of the early Christian Church. At the first the community met for the purpose of worship daily (Ac 1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>46</sup>), and we find no intimation or allusion that any day was marked with more solemnity than the others. But at a later period the 'first day of the week' is singled out from the rest and observed with especial honour. The first occasion on which we meet with this is in 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup> 'upon the first day of the week let each one of you lay by him in store' his contribution to the collection. Then Ac 20<sup>7</sup> we notice the disciples of Troas gathered together on the first day of the week to break bread. By themselves these two instances could not be pressed. But in Rev 1<sup>10</sup> there is a mention of 'the Lord's day,' τῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ, which appears as κυριακὴ κυρίου in the Didache 14<sup>1</sup>, and as κυριακὴ simply in Ignatius (ad Mag. ix. 1). These all hang together with the fact recorded by all the evangelists that on the first day of the week Christ rose from the dead (Mt 28<sup>1</sup>, Mk 16<sup>2</sup>, Lk 24<sup>1</sup>, Jn 20<sup>1</sup>). The resurrection of Christ was the foundation of Christian hope (1 Co 15<sup>17-19</sup>), and therefore the day of the resurrection was par excellence the Lord's day (see Ignatius, loc. cit., Ep. Barn. 15), and when it became impracticable for the 'breaking of the bread' to be celebrated daily, it was celebrated with careful regularity on this day (Did. 14<sup>1</sup>; Pliny, Epp. x. 96, 'statō die convenire'). To what precise date this practice goes back in Christian history we cannot say. St. Paul (Ro 14<sup>5</sup>) speaks of those who esteem one day above another, and those who esteem every day alike, but he is here probably referring to the Jewish Sabbath. The Jewish Christians themselves observed the Sabbath, and some attempted to force its observance upon the Gentiles (Gal 4<sup>10</sup>, Col 2<sup>16</sup>). But the Sabbath and method of its observance are especially distinguished from the Lord's day [cf. Ign. loc. cit. 'no longer sabbatizing' (σαββατισμοῦ), but living according to the Lord's day], and Ep. Barn. loc. cit. Sabbaths are not pleasing to God, 'therefore we observe the eighth day for rejoicing'. On the early history of the Christian Sunday, see esp. T. Zahn, Skizzen aus dem Leben der alten Kirche, cap. vi.

Of the existence of yearly festivals we have no intimation at all in NT. The Jewish Christians still observed the Jewish feasts (Ac 2<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>8</sup>). There is no allusion in 1 Co 5<sup>7-8</sup> ('Our passover also hath been sacrificed, even Christ, wherefore let us keep the feast,' etc.) to the observance of Easter. The context shows that the apostle is not speaking literally. The starting-point of his theme is the comparison of the Church to a 'new lump' from which the old leaven has been purged out. 'We, too,' he says, 'as well as the Jews, have a Passover lamb; therefore let us keep the feast . . . with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.' His imagery is borrowed from the distinctively Jewish passover, but the lesson drawn applies to the whole Christian life, not to any special occasion—ἐορταζόμενοι is rather 'keep festival' than 'keep the feast.' It is noticeable, however, that in the later Paschal controversy both parties referred to apostolic usage (see Euseb. HE v. 23, 24), in view of which we are not justified in drawing an argument from silence against the apostolic foundation of the Easter festival, and the exact date of its institution must be left an open question.

In 1 Co we find that St. Paul presents to us a picture of two kinds of Christian worship. In ch. 14 is described a meeting whose chief aim is mutual edification; in 11<sup>17-34</sup> one of a very different character and ceremonial, the purpose of which is to 'eat the Lord's Supper' (κυριακὸν δεῖπνον). In the same way two kinds of religious observance are distinguished in the account of the primitive Church (Ac 2<sup>42</sup>), 'the breaking of bread and the prayers.' It is not quite certain whether ταῖς προσευχαῖς here refers to the public prayers in the temple which the Christians attended (e.g. 3<sup>1</sup>), or to the meetings of the community; but as the writer is describing the salient elements distinctive of the Christian life, the latter has a slight balance in its favour. In any case there is abundant evidence (e.g. Ac 1<sup>14</sup> 24<sup>26</sup> 46<sup>7</sup> 4<sup>21</sup> 31 etc.) that the Christians at this time held assemblies for worship distinct from the 'breaking of the bread.'

This distinctively Christian worship was not held to take the place of the temple services, which were attended with scrupulous regularity (Ac 3<sup>1</sup>). Neither—and this, of course, refers not only to the first days of Christianity—did it take the place of individual private prayer (cf. Ac 10<sup>9</sup> 16<sup>25</sup>, Eph 6<sup>18</sup>, Ph 1<sup>4</sup>).

(a) The public service.—The purpose of this service was before all things edification, and this not only for those who were already believers, but also for unbelievers. It had, then, a missionary aspect, and for this purpose was made as public and open as possible. At Jerus. it took place especially in the temple as long as this was permitted (Ac 2<sup>16</sup> 3<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>12</sup>), or in some public place (Ac 2<sup>4</sup>, cf. 9). Unbelievers were welcome to attend and listen (1 Co 14<sup>23</sup>). Every Christian had received the Holy Ghost and a 'gift' as the 'manifestation of the Spirit' within him (see 1 Co 12<sup>7-10</sup>). Whatever was the gift he possessed, he was bound to put it at the service of the community and use it in harmonious working with the whole (ib. 12<sup>26</sup>). But if we look through the lists of gifts in Ro 12<sup>6-8</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>8-10</sup>, we see that there are some (e.g. miracles, healings) which would not qualify their possessors to contribute to the worship of the community. So we find a distinction drawn in 1 P 4<sup>10-11</sup> between the gifts of speaking and the gifts of ministering (διακονεῖν = contributing by personal help or offerings to the common support). To the former it fell to take part in the public worship. St. Paul mentions (1 Co 14<sup>26</sup>) as constituent elements of this service 'a psalm,' 'a teaching,' 'a revelation,' 'a tongue,' 'an interpretation.' The division is not a rigid one: a 'psalm' might be also a 'tongue' (cf. ib. 15). Nor is the enumeration exhaustive; prayer is not included, though it formed an integral part of the service (cf. 11<sup>4</sup>). We may then, perhaps, divide as follows: (a) teaching, (β) prayer, (γ) praise.

(α) Teaching.—We are only considering here the place occupied by teaching in the services. We must treat later of the wider question of teaching in general. A discourse formed part of the service in the Jewish synagogue where it was connected with the reading of an appointed portion of the OT Scriptures (Lk 4<sup>16-17</sup>, Ac 13<sup>15</sup>; see Vitringa, de Syn. Vet. Bl. iii. pt. i. c. 5, pt. ii. c. 12; Schürer, II J.P. § 27). We have several instances of discourses in the Christian services (e.g. Ac 20<sup>7-11</sup>), and there is no doubt the 'teaching' in these assemblies took the form of one or more discourses. But the question of public reading is not quite so obvious. It is, however, on a priori grounds quite probable in itself, and is supported by certain supposed allusions in NT. Thus Timothy is told (1 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>) to 'give heed to reading, to exhortation, and to teaching'; and the writer of the Apoc. alludes to the arrangements for the public reading of his book (Rev 1<sup>3</sup>, cf. Col 4<sup>16</sup>). Somewhat later there arose a separate office called that of the 'reader,' whose duty it was to read in the public services (see Harnack, Die sog. apost. Kirchenordnung, 'Texte u. Unt.' Bd. ii. 11ft. 6).

(β) Prayer was made standing (Mk 11<sup>25</sup>) or kneeling (Ac 20<sup>36</sup> 21<sup>5</sup>) with uplifted hands (1 Ti 2<sup>8</sup>). Even if the words of the prayer were uttered by one person only, the prayer was regarded as that of the whole congregation. Thus in Ac 4<sup>24-30</sup> the prayer is given verbally, but is ascribed to the whole assembly καθ' ὅλην τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἡμῶν καὶ πάντων τῶν ἁγίων καὶ ἀποστόλων. We must not press this too literally, as if all actually spoke in the words given. It may mean that they followed it, and by their 'amen' at the end identified themselves with the speaker; or perhaps they repeated his words audibly after him; cf. Ac 20<sup>26</sup> εὐχαριστοῦντες αὐτῷ. All prayer did not, however, consist of definite language. The indistinguishable 'glossolalia' comprised prayer as well as praise (1 Co 14<sup>19</sup>), and such 'prayer with the spirit' was incomprehensible, both to the speaker and to the hearers, unless it were interpreted by one who had the gift of interpreting tongues. The object of the prayers would vary with the occasion. The necessity of the moment supplied the Church with the material for its daily supplications (cf. Ac 12<sup>5</sup>). We find, however, in addition to these occasional topics, injunctions to establish certain prayers as a permanent part of the worship. Such were prayers for the advance of the gospel preaching through the apostle (Ro 15<sup>30</sup>, Eph 6<sup>18</sup>, Col 4<sup>3</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>1</sup>, cf. 1 Th 5<sup>17</sup>, He 13<sup>19</sup>); prayers for the civil rulers and all men (1 Ti 2<sup>1</sup>); prayers for erring members (Ja 5<sup>16</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>16</sup>). But no special form of prayer is laid down to be followed. Of a formulated liturgy of prayer we find as yet no signs, but there are expressions in NT which bear the appearance of more or less stereotyped formulae. Such are especially (1) the form of salutation, 'Grace to you (and mercy) and peace from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ', which occurs with variations in the opening of all the Pauline Epp., and also of 1 P, 2 P, 2 Jn, Jude, and Rev; (2) the benedictions, 'The God of peace be with you' (Ro 15<sup>33</sup>), 'the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you' (ib. 10<sup>20</sup>), or the much fuller form, 'the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all' (2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>). These occur also in similar form at the close of all the Pauline Epp., He, 1 P, and Rev. The form of these opening and concluding prayers is in all cases so much alike, that it may very well represent the prayers of salutation and benediction with which the services were begun and finished, differing verbally in different churches, but agreeing in the main. Their liturgical aspect in NT is heightened by the frequent addition of 'amen' (e.g. Ro 15<sup>33</sup>, Gal 6<sup>18</sup>). The long prayer with which Clement of Rome concludes his Ep. to the Cor., and the set forms of prayer given in the Didache (chs. 9, 10), have a strong affinity with Jewish prayers, which suggests that the Church may have for some time used forms of public prayer borrowed from these sources.

It is remarkable that, except in the Gospels, we hear nothing in NT of the Lord's Prayer. It is not quoted at all, nor can we find instances in NT language which can be said to contain any distinct reminiscences of it. But in the Didache (ch. 8) the Christian is commanded to repeat the Lord's Prayer three times daily, which proves how universal its use became in the sub-apostolic age.

(γ) Praise, i.e. the giving of thanks (εὐχαριστία), the act of blessing (εὐλογεῖν), of praising (αἰνεῖν), or of glorifying (δοξαζέειν) God. Like prayer, it could be expressed in ordinary language, or in the 'tongue' (1 Co 14<sup>19</sup>). (See TONGUES.) From its more emotional character, it lent itself more to the latter than was the case with prayer. Examples of praise are to be found in the doxologies which occur with great frequency in the Epistles, e.g. Ro 9<sup>10</sup>, Gal 1<sup>5</sup>, Eph 3<sup>20</sup>, Ph 4<sup>26</sup>, 1 Ti 17<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>18</sup>, He 13<sup>21</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>11</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>18</sup>, Rev 1<sup>6</sup>. These, again, are given a liturgical form by the 'Amen' which almost invariably follows, but the language is not so stereotyped as in the case of the salutations and benedictions. We see also in sublime outbursts of praise, such as Ro 15<sup>33</sup> or the hymns of the Apoc. (e.g. Rev 4<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>7</sup> 15<sup>3</sup> etc.), examples of praise in freer and less stereotyped form than in the doxologies. We perceive in them the most intense religious emotion. Language of so sublime and ecstatic strain easily passed into the form of song. The singing of a 'psalm' or 'hymn' by a member of the congregation was a form which the giving of praise frequently took (Ac 16<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>26</sup>, Eph 5<sup>19</sup>, Col 3<sup>16</sup>, Ja 5<sup>13</sup>). Specimens of these extempore hymns are preserved in Lk 1 or in Rev (see cit.). Possibly, too, in rhythmic passages such as 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>, Rev 15<sup>3</sup> 4 are preserved fragments of hymns sung by the whole congregation together. As in the case of prayer, the congregation made the ascription of praise a corporate act by saying 'Amen' at the close (1 Co 14<sup>16</sup>, Rev 5<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>4</sup>).

The forms in which the teaching or prayer or praise might be delivered were three. From the prophet it came as a direct revelation from God, with all the force of a verbally inspired message, expressed in ordinary language, and therefore needing no explanation of its meaning. From the speaker in a tongue also it came as an 'inspired' utterance (Ac 24 'to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance'), but the language was incomprehensible to the hearers, and to the speaker himself, unless they possessed a further gift, viz. the power to interpret tongues (see 1 Co 14). From the others it did not come as an inspired utterance, but the teacher spoke with greater weight and authority, as one who had received, in a special degree, the 'gift of teaching' from the Holy Ghost. The 'teacher', by virtue of his gift, ranked higher than the 'speaker in a tongue'. He stood next to the apostles and prophets in the divinely appointed order of the Church (1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>).

To the necessity which St. Paul felt of correcting certain abuses in the Cor. services we are indebted for an interesting picture of these meetings (1 Co 14<sup>26-35</sup>). In their eagerness to exercise the gifts of which they were conscious, the Cor. Christians had made their services scenes of confusion. Members did not wait for one another to finish speaking. If a prophet received a 'revelation,' he stood up at once and delivered it while another was still speaking. Again, both the prophets and the 'speakers in a tongue' had allowed their enthusiasm to lead them to excess. The prophet unconsciously added a subjective element to his message. The 'speaker in a tongue' indulged his zeal without troubling whether the others understood what he meant. To prevent this confusion, the apostle lays down the following checks: (1) Not more than one to speak at a time; each must wait his turn. (2) The one who is speaking to stop if he perceives another waiting to deliver a 'revelation.' (3) The 'speaker in tongues' is not allowed to speak unless an interpreter be present. (4) The 'revelation' of the prophet is to be checked by those who possess the gift of 'discerning spirits' (διακρίσεις πνευματων, cf. 12<sup>10</sup>). St. Paul does not mention a president in the meetings, and he addresses himself directly to the congregation, as if everything were to be decided at their discretion. But it is almost impossible to suppose that there was no one to direct and manage the gathering, e.g. to appoint the time of meeting, to declare the opening and closing of the service, etc. There is no doubt that work of this kind is included in the labour of those 'presidents' described in 1 Th 5<sup>13</sup>, though we cannot go the length of saying that ἐκκλησία is a special allusion to these services.

Women were present at the services, and contributed to the worship (1 Co 11<sup>5</sup>, cf. Ac 21<sup>9</sup>). St. Paul directs that they shall keep their heads covered during worship, while the men shall pray with uncover of head (1 Co 11<sup>4-5</sup>). Both at Corinth (1 Co 14<sup>34</sup>) and Ephesus (1 Ti 2<sup>11-12</sup>) he forbids women to take an active part in the services, and the general language in which he speaks at Ephesus that he enforced the same rule in all his churches. "part of the service" (cf. 1 Co 11<sup>5</sup>).

(b) The breaking of bread.—The expression ἡ κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου in Ac 2<sup>42</sup> refers to something more than an institution of common meals. It is indeed doubtful, in the light of 6<sup>2</sup>, whether a system of universal common meals existed at all. But in any case the double repetition of the article ἡ κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου would be strange unless the term were technical, and referred to a special breaking of a special bread. And such we find to be the case in 1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>, where the expression 'the bread which we break' refers to a religious act, and in 11<sup>20</sup>, where the eating of the bread forms part of an act of worship called 'eating the Lord's Supper,' and its significance is to 'proclaim the Lord's death till he come' (ib. 26). From the action of Christ at the institution of this sacrament, the technical name by which it became known was 'the breaking of the bread.' The expression occurs sometimes without the article (e.g. Ac 20<sup>7</sup>, Didache 14<sup>1</sup>), where there can be no doubt as to its technical use. In some places (e.g. Ac 2<sup>42</sup> 27<sup>35</sup>) it may refer to an ordinary meal. The only other name which is given to it in NT is the Lord's Supper, 1 Co 11<sup>20</sup>, which refers, however, to the whole meal of which the κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου was the central act. As early, however, as the Didache (9<sup>2</sup>) the word εὐχαριστία is used to express the same thing (cf. also Ign. ad Smyrn. ch. 7).

By its nature this service was of a much more private character than the other. It was not held in public, with free admission for non-members, but restricted to baptized Christians (Didache 9<sup>2</sup> 'Let none eat or drink of your Eucharist save those who are baptized in the name of the Lord'). It was the secrecy with which the Christians shrouded the Eucharist that gave rise to the absurd accusations which were popularly brought against them. At the same time, it seems, when possible, to have been made the occasion of a general meeting of the whole Church, rich and poor (Ac 20<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>17-22</sup>).

The 'breaking of bread' originally took place daily (24<sup>6</sup>). In the Didache, however, it is enjoined weekly, on the Lord's day (cf. also Ac 20<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup>). It was held in the evening, as on the occasion of its institution (cf. Ac 20<sup>7</sup>), and the word ἀγαν (=evening meal) in 1 Co 11<sup>20-21</sup>). The whole ceremony was a 'remembrance' of the last supper which Christ ate with His disciples before His death. It was therefore made a common meal, of which the 'breaking of the bread' and the 'drinking of the cup' were a part (cf. 1 Co 11<sup>20</sup>, Didache 10<sup>1</sup> καὶ τὸ ποτεῖν ἀπὸ τοῦ ποτηρίου). To this common meal each brought his share. Chrysostom (Hom. 27 in 1 Co 11, § 1) says that in place of the original community of goods the Christians 'observed common meals on appointed days, and having gathered together after sharing the mysteries, they partook of a common feast, the rich bringing the viands, and the poor, who had nothing, being invited by them, and all feasting together.' The aspect of the meal as an act of love on the part of the rich is supported by the words κατακλιθεὶς τοὺς μὴ ἔχοντας in 1 Co 11<sup>22</sup>, which mean the poor generally, not those who have not houses. The common meal was called the 'love-feast' (ἀγάπη, found in NT only in Jude 12. The right reading in 2 P 2<sup>13</sup> is probably ἀγάπαις WH, not ἀγάπαις). Though at first occurring at the same time as the 'breaking of bread,' which formed part of it, the two were afterwards separated, and the Eucharist held in the early morning, while the Agapæ still took place in the evening; so first in Pliny, Epp. x. 96. See Lightfoot, Ignatius, ii. 312.

St. Paul gives us a picture of this act of worship as it was celebrated in Corinth at the time, which we can supplement by other hints in NT. A discourse preceded it in Ac 20: 11, but it is clear that this was not the case in Corinth, for the apostle complains that each one, as he arrived, at once ate up the food he had brought with him, without waiting for the rest (1 Co 11: 33). During the meal came the formal 'breaking of bread' (cf. 1 Co 10: 16), probably with a prayer of thanks (cf. εὐχαριστίας in the accounts of the institution by Christ, and the prayer of thanks in the Did. 9). All present then partook of the bread thus consecrated (1 Co 11: 26). Then perhaps after the meal (cf. ib. 22 'after supper') a cup containing wine (this is more probable than Harnack's theory that water was used, cf. Mt 26: 27, Mk 14: 23, 1 Co 11: 26) was 'blessed' (1 Co 10: 16), and all drank from it (11: 26). The prayers of thanks (εὐχαριστίας) by which the bread and wine were consecrated probably varied with the occasion. In the Didache (ch. 9) formal prayers are prescribed, but the prophets present are allowed to 'give thanks' (εὐχαριστούν) in words of their own choice (ὡς αὐτοὶ θέλωσιν), 10<sup>9</sup>. There is some doubt as to whether the bread or the wine came first in the order of service. In Lk 12: 70 (W11), 1 Co 10: 16, Did. 9, the blessing of the cup is placed before that of the bread. In all other places, however, the cup follows the bread, and this has always been the traditional order in the Christian Church.

ii. The Christian Rule of Conduct.

(1) The Christian in his Private Life.—By baptism the Christian died to the world, and so the negative, prohibitive, sphere of law had no longer any meaning for him (Ro 6, Col 3: 5-12, cf. Gal 2: 19 5: 21). His life was consecrated to Christ (Ro 12: 1), who is its goal (Ro 1: 4, Ph 1: 21), its example (Ph 2, 1 P 2: 21-24), and the source of its spiritual strength (Jn 6: 18, 2 Co 12: 9, Eph 4: 10). His body is the sacred temple of the Holy Ghost (1 Co 6: 19), a member of Christ (ib. 16), and therefore personal holiness and purity are his natural condition. The near expectation of the second coming of Christ led to two practical results: (a) a holy enthusiasm which buoyed him up under every trial with the consciousness that the present evils were only transitory (Ro 8: 18-23, 2 Co 12: 5-4, Eph 1: 4-6), and would be succeeded by a glorious future (Ro 6: 3, 1 Co 15: 50, Col 3: 4). Death itself is welcomed as a quicker realization of this (Ph 1: 21). (b) A severe and stern discipline of self. Men waited in hourly expectation of Christ's appearance (1 Th 5: 2, 1 Jn 2: 18). It was then no time to give oneself up to feasting. Even marriage and family cares are regarded as competitors against the service of the Lord, which should absorb every thought and feeling (1 Co 7: 34, 35). The Christian must be ever on his guard, watchful and vigilant, fasting (cf. Ac 13: 14-15, Did. 7-8), ever in arms against temptation (1 Th 5: 8, Eph 6: 10-17), and pray without ceasing (1 Th 5: 17). His mind is set on things above, not on things that are upon the earth (Col 3). But as he is on the earth he has to perform his human duties and to bring into all his relations with fellow-men principles in accord with this high and ideal life.

(2) The Christian and his Fellow-Christians.—The central principle of Christian ethics is love, the practical expression of faith, πίστις δὲ ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη (Gal 5: 6). Faith without works is dead, says St. James (2: 26), and St. Paul is at one with him, for above faith he puts love (1 Co 13: 13, cf. ib. 2), and love does not exist apart from works of love (cf. 1 Jn 3: 18). Love is the 'end of the charge' (1 Ti 1: 5), the bond of perfection (Col 3: 14). And this love was chiefly exercised towards the fellow-Christian (Gal 6: 10). The name of 'the brethren,' by which the Christians denoted their fellow-believers, was especially significant. It implies descent from a common ancestor, membership in the same family, and was used among the Jews to denote their fellow-countrymen, the 'sons of Israel' (e.g. Ex 2: 11, Dt 18: 15, Ac 2: 37). So when applied by Christians to one another it introduced the idea of a tie as strong as that of blood relationship binding them to one another. The love of the brethren (φιλὰδελφία, He 13: 1) manifests itself in a spirit of humility, gentleness, and kindness to all (Gal 5: 22 etc.), in obedience and gratitude towards the workers and rulers in the Church (1 Co 16: 16, 1 Th 5: 2, He 13: 17), forbearance of the stronger towards the weaker (Ro 15: 1, 1 Co 10: 33, 1 Th 5: 14), charity to the poor (Ro 12: 1, 1 Ti 6: 18, He 13: 16, 1 Jn 3: 17), compassion and help to the suffering and helpless (He 13: 3, Ja 1: 27), and hospitality to all who need it (Ro 12: 13, 1 Ti 5: 10, He 13: 2, 1 P 4: 9). By the strength of this Christian love is realized the truth of the gospel, that all outward distinctions of rank, nation, and sex are abolished in the common participation of membership in Christ (Gal 3: 28, Col 3: 11). At the same time, it is important to remember that even within the Christian community concrete social reforms were not aimed at, except so far as was demanded by the new morality. In the expectation of the second coming, social and political questions were matters of secondary importance. The general principle of St. Paul was that a man should stay in the position in which the 'call' of God was received (1 Co 7: 18), and work truly and honestly in that position (1 Th 4: 11, 2 Th 3: 10-12) until the Lord came. So the relations of rich and poor still remain, but are softened by the duty of charity; slavery is not abolished (Eph 6: 5-9, Col 3: 22-4, 1 Ti 6: 2, Philem), but its sting withdrawn by the proclamation of a higher equality; the current view of woman's position is accepted (1 Co 11: 3-10, 1 Ti 2: 11-15), but toned down by the same truth (cf. 1 P 3: 7). In regard to marriage, indeed, new principles were introduced which the laxity of heathen and even Jewish views made necessary on moral grounds. St. Paul (1 Co 7) in view of the second coming discourages the unmarried from seeking marriage, in accordance with his general principle, 'let each man wherein he was called, therein abide with God' (v. 24). But he condemns those who would forbid marriage on ascetic grounds (1 Ti 4: 3; cf. the same teaching in He 13: 4), and sanctifies the relation of man and wife by comparing it with that of Christ and His Church (Eph 5: 22). The reform which Christianity introduced was the sacred inviolability which it gave to the marriage bond by forbidding divorce (Mt 19: 9, 1 Co 7: 10). The question of remarriage, after the death of one party, is somewhat doubtful. The injunction as to bishops and deacons (1 Ti 3: 12, Tit 1: 6) that they should be the husbands of one wife, and to widows (1 Ti 5: 9) that they should have had one husband, were interpreted in the 2nd cent. as prohibitions against a second marriage. But this remarriage is recommended in the case of younger widows (1 Ti 5: 14, cf. 1 Co 7: 40), which leaves the question doubtful. On the other hand, it is very unlikely that the apostle would speak in such moderate language if he were referring to bigamy.

The natural result of this nobler conception of marriage was to quicken the sense of natural affection between husband and wife, parent and child (Eph 5: 22-6: 4, Col 3: 18-21 etc.), and to establish those beautiful family relations which distinguish the Christian home.

The chief difficulty in the way of mutual intercourse within the Church was the traditional exclusiveness which the Jewish Christian brought with him into the Church. The exact relation of Jew and Gentile Christians was one of the most perplexing problems of the apostolic age. St. Paul held with regard to his own relation to the law that, in the abstract, belief in Christ made him free (e.g. he says of himself, 'not being myself under [the principle of] law,' 1 Co 9<sup>20</sup>). But he rated far above this abstract claim to freedom, the love which he owed to his 'brethren in the flesh,' and so to the Jew he became as a Jew, and observed the commands of the law (e.g. Ac 15<sup>18</sup> 20<sup>16</sup> 21<sup>20</sup> 28<sup>17</sup>), although he recognized that a man could be saved, not by the works of the law, but only by faith; cf. Gal 2<sup>16</sup>. As regards the Gentile, however, the apostle of the Gentiles fought for the freedom which he thought the Jew should abstain from claiming. His position, that the Gentile should be free from circumcision and the law, was confirmed by the conference at Jerus., and at the same time the further question of daily intercourse between Jew and Gentile was also settled. It was assumed, as a matter of course, that the two should mix freely and without restraint; but to lessen the offence which this intercourse would give to Jewish instincts, the Gentile was required to abstain from things offered to idols, from blood, and from things strangled. (These prohibitions were possibly conceived as 'concrete indications of a pure and true religion,' and only indirectly as concessions to Judaism as they were specially revered by Jews. This explains the perplexing addition 'and from fornication.' See Hort, Judaistic Christianity, pp. 68-73.) Thus was established a modus vivendi for those communities in which Jew and Gentile converts were to be found together. It is too much to assume from Ja 2<sup>2</sup> that in such communities the Jews had their separate 'synagogue,' and lived apart. The author is writing from the standpoint of things as they were in his own church, i.e. where the community included only Jews who had formed themselves into a synagogue congregation. The incidents related in Gal 2<sup>11-14</sup> presuppose a close and daily intercourse (especially in the way of meals) between the Jewish and Gentile communities. If St. Paul condemned so strongly in this instance a reaction to the exclusiveness from which a break had been made, it is certain that he would not have encouraged the establishment of such a system in any of his own churches. We are therefore confident that in all Pauline churches the Jews, like the apostle, and even St. Peter himself (cf. Ac 10<sup>28</sup> 11<sup>3</sup>), did not refuse to mix with the Gentiles, even if to some extent the two did fall into separate congregations. And intercourse of any kind implied a mutual give-and-take. The Jew resigned his instinctive and traditional hatred of the Gentile and lived as a Gentile (ἡλικὸς 7<sup>5</sup>, Gal 2<sup>14</sup>). The Gentile had to subordinate his prejudice to the principle of love (1 Co 8<sup>1</sup>), that he might give no cause of stumbling to Jews. And there were grades between the pure Jew and the pure Gentile. The 'proselyte of the gate' on becoming a Christian naturally felt an instinctive sense of obligation towards the whole or parts of the law. St. Paul has in his mind, not only Jews, but the class of εὐσεβεῖς in Ro 14<sup>5</sup>. And Ro 14<sup>1, 2</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>1-13</sup> 10<sup>23-24</sup> must be understood generally without exclusive reference to Jew or proselyte.

In the mixture of religions from which Christianity drew converts, there were many scruples, serious enough to those in whom they were ingrained from childhood, but which might draw a smile of contempt from the man of 'knowledge.' St. Paul's line of teaching is that their observance or non-observance is accidental, but that the principle of love, which enjoins respect and forbearance towards them, is essential (see Ro 14<sup>13-17</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>13</sup>).

(3) The Christian and the World.—The earliest persecutions proceeded, not from the Romans, but from the Jews, either publicly, where they were allowed a measure of local authority (e.g. Ac 4<sup>1-22</sup> 5<sup>17</sup>, 9<sup>1, 2</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>24</sup>), or in the way of private maltreatment. The Jews succeeded in some instances in raising Gentile mobs against their enemies (e.g. Ac 9<sup>28</sup>, 13<sup>50</sup> 14<sup>2</sup>). On rarer occasions the hatred of the Gentiles was aroused by personal losses occasioned through Christian teaching (Ac 16<sup>19</sup>, 19<sup>24</sup>). But the Roman government and its responsible representatives neither originated nor supported these persecutions. Its attitude was one of indifference (e.g. Gallio in Ac 18<sup>17</sup>) or active protection (cf. Pilate's attitude Mt 27<sup>18-24</sup>, the authorities at Thessalonica Ac 17<sup>6</sup>, Ephesus 19<sup>35</sup>, Jerus. 21<sup>32</sup> 23<sup>17</sup>). The Jewish accusation, that the Christians were rebelling against the Romans and setting up another king, was never regarded seriously by the government (cf. Lk 23<sup>2</sup>, Jn 18<sup>38</sup>, Ac 17<sup>7</sup>). On occasions of tumult, indeed, Christians were apprehended as the apparent causes of disturbance, and treated with the rough-and-ready method of Roman provincial justice (Ac 16<sup>22</sup> 22<sup>24</sup>); but this was a universal practice, and not confined to Christians. The period of official persecution did not begin till Nero opened it in 64. So the Church looked to the Roman government as a protector rather than a persecutor (cf. 2 Th 2<sup>7</sup>). Those especially who were fortunate enough to possess the Roman citizenship found it a great safeguard against injustice (Ac 16<sup>37</sup> 22<sup>26</sup> 25<sup>10-11</sup>). These facts prepare us for the attitude of favour observed by Christian teachers towards the civil authorities, although they do not wholly account for it, since the principles upon which civil obedience is enjoined are independent of personal like or dislike. 'The powers that be are ordained of God,' says St. Paul (Ro 13<sup>1</sup>). The Christians are exhorted to obey and respect them as the representatives of divine justice (Ro 13<sup>1-6</sup>, Tit 3<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>13-17</sup>), to pray for them (1 Ti 2<sup>2</sup>), to pay them tribute as their due (Lk 20<sup>25</sup>, Ro 13<sup>6, 7</sup>).

From Pliny's letter to Trajan (Epp. x. 96) we find that the government regarded the Christian communities as clubs (lectaria), and the Christians acquiesced in this official definition of their position.

As regards the social and industrial world around them, the Christians did not cut themselves off from their former ties to a greater extent than was necessary. The regulation of St. Paul was, that each should remain as he was until the Lord came. So the believing husband or wife is not to leave an unbelieving spouse (1 Co 7<sup>12</sup>, cf. 1 P 3<sup>1</sup>). If the unbeliever depart, the believer is, however, not under bondage to follow. But this applies only to marriages contracted before the conversion of the one party. When this is not the case the believer is enjoined not to marry with an unbeliever (1 Co 7<sup>39</sup> 'she is free to marry whom she will only in the Lord,' i.e. a Christian husband, cf. 2 Co 6<sup>14</sup>). On the same grounds the slave is advised not to seek his freedom (1 Co 7<sup>21</sup>), but to do his duty to an unbelieving master as to a believer. We hear of Christians, too, carrying on their former professions, e.g. physician (Col 4<sup>14</sup>), tentmakers (Ac 18<sup>3</sup>), soldiers (Ac 10<sup>1</sup>, Ph 1<sup>13</sup>), public officers (Ac 16<sup>33</sup>, Ro 16<sup>23</sup>), purple dyers (Ac 16<sup>34</sup>), lawyer (Tit 3<sup>13</sup>), and as traders generally (Ja 4<sup>13</sup>).

A difficult question was the extent to which a Christian should join in heathen social gatherings. There was a danger in so doing, not only because of the actual immorality connected with them (1 P 4<sup>3-4</sup>), but also on the grounds of the ordinances against eating meat sacrificed to idols. St. Paul does not wish to cut his congregations entirely off from their former connexions (e.g. 1 Co 6<sup>10</sup>). He does not forbid them to accept an invitation to dine with a heathen (1 Co 10<sup>27</sup>), but leaves it to the individual judgment, 'if ye are disposed.' In regard to the scruple against ἑσθιέμενα, he recommends the Christian to eat what is given without question; but if the fact be forced upon him that it is an ἑσθιέμενον, to refuse it for the sake of conscience and example (1 Co 10<sup>27, 28</sup>). We find that some of the advanced liberal party at Corinth even attended the feasts in heathen temples. This St. Paul forbids, not only as 'sinning against the brethren and wounding their conscience when it is weak' (1 Co 8<sup>12</sup>), but also on the deeper ground that, in the interpretation put upon it, it is really an act of idolatry (ἰδ. 10<sup>18</sup>). At a later period it was made a general ground of complaint against the Christian that he held aloof from social gatherings (1 P 4<sup>4</sup>).

In his contact with unbelievers the Christian had to remember that the law of love extends to all men, although it found a greater outlet for its expression in the relation of Christian to Christian (Mt 5<sup>44-45</sup>, Ro 12<sup>20</sup>, Tit 3<sup>2</sup>). The same principles of honesty and charity were, accordingly, to be observed also towards 'them which are without' (Ro 12<sup>17</sup>, Gal 6<sup>10</sup>, Col 4<sup>5</sup>, Ph 4<sup>5</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>12</sup>), even towards the persecutor (Ro 12<sup>14</sup>), that thus the believers, by their life and conduct, might appeal to and touch the best conscience of the heathen world (1 Ti 3<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>12</sup>).

(C) The single Community.—The first centre of the Christian community immediately after the ascension of Christ was the upper room in a house. Hither they returned immediately after parting from Christ to wait 'steadfastly in prayer' for the coming of the promised Holy Ghost (Ac 1<sup>13-15</sup>). Thus the Christian community was in its origin a house-congregation; and when it outgrew the limits of a single house, it did not form a 'synagogue' (such as those, e.g., in Ac 6<sup>9</sup>), but spread as a number of house-congregations (cf. κατ' οίκον, ib. 2nd 5th). For their general assemblies and their missionary preaching the disciples were able to meet in the temple or its precincts (5th 2nd, 4th), but for their private worship they were divided into groups, the centre of each being the household of a convert, who was able and willing to provide the necessary accommodation in his house. Thus the Church presented the aspect of a number of household groups. The same principle of division was established in other places besides Jerus., as Christianity spread farther. It appears, e.g., at Thessalonica (Ac 17th), Troas (20th), Ephesus (20th), Corinth (1 Co 16th), Colossae (Philem 2nd), Laodicea (Col 4th), and in Rome (assuming that Ro 16th is an integral part of the Epistle: see vv. 14-15 τοὺς σὺν αὐτοῖς ἀδελφοίς). These house-congregations also bear the name of ἐκκλησία (e.g. Ro 16th, 1 Co 16th, Col 4th, Philem 2nd). The condition of the household in ancient society favoured this feature. The master of the house was its lord, and his conversion was generally followed by that of his family and dependants (e.g. Ac 10th, 16th 18th, 1 Co 1st). In this way the nucleus was at once formed for a house-congregation, and doubtless isolated converts attached themselves to the church in the house of a wealthier convert. The only passage in NT which seems to imply the existence of a church, i.e. a building set apart for purposes of worship, is Ja 2nd 'if there come into your synagogue,' etc. In this passage we have a picture of a Christian place of worship, with seats of honour like the πρωτοκαθεδραὶ in Jewish synagogues. Apparently, then, by the time this Ep. was written, the Jewish Christians of Jerus. (for the writer speaks from the standpoint of the conditions in his own church) had formed themselves into a synagogue and built a place of meeting (cf. Ac 6th 9th). The 'school of Tyrannus,' in which St. Paul taught at Ephesus (Ac 19th), was, however, not of this kind. It did not supersede the house-congregations (20th, 1 Co 16th), but was used, as the context shows (v. 10), for the missionary preaching, which had hitherto taken place in the Jewish synagogues.

The city-church was composed of a number of these house-churches, and it grew by the addition of new congregations. The first household which had received the apostle generally became the centre of these smaller groups. To its members, the first-fruits (ἀπαρχή) of the city, a special respect was due (1 Co 16th 1st). It had been the home of the apostle during his visit, and, in consequence, the centre of guidance and direction. In some cases the prominence of some other member caused the centre of the community to shift from the original household; e.g. the house of Mary, the mother of Mark, was at first the centre of church life in Jerus. (Ac 12th), but later (Ac 21st) James' house appears as the official place of meeting. The whole community met together on occasions of necessity either at this central house or some other convenient place (e.g. Ac 15th 21st, 1 Co 5th, 1 Th 5th, Col 4th). Thus, apparently, Gaius received the community in his house when they assembled to meet their apostle and founder (Ro 16th). The same community met on occasions for common worship (1 Co 14th), though their numbers do not allow us to suppose that this could always have been the case. For the purpose of worship the house must have been the unit. But for the purpose of direction and administration the unit was not the house, but the city-congregation (cf. Ac 11th 13th 20th). So the apostle directs his letters to the church of the city, e.g. at Corinth (1 Co 1st), because the city-church and not the house-church was the primary unit in the regulation of affairs.

The Organization of the Community.—The writer of Ac sums up the distinctive elements of the new Christian life in the words (2nd) προσκαρτεροῦντες τῇ διδαχῇ τῶν ἀποστόλων καὶ τῇ κοινωνίᾳ, τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου καὶ ταῖς προσευχαῖς (VII), 'abiding in the teaching of the apostles and the fellowship, in the breaking of the bread and the prayers.' The words go by pairs, the 'breaking of the bread' and 'the prayers' making up the common worship of the community, while the 'teaching' and the 'fellowship' cover the ground of their common life. No community can exist without organization, least of all a community in which are combined a religion and a common life. But before passing on to ask what was the nature of this organization, we must first see what was the nature of the work to be done. This will be found to group itself under four main heads: (1) The instruction of converts, (2) the collection and administration of the common funds, (3) general administration and direction, (4) discipline.

(1) Instruction.—When we remember how slowly the disciples assimilated the teaching of their Master, and what patient and careful labour it needed to perfect their faith, we shall realize the work which was involved in the instruction of new converts when the numbers of the Church were counted by thousands. And if this is true with regard to Jews, how much greater must have been the labour when the community included pure Gentiles, who had scarcely any knowledge of Jewish scriptures, and lacked the sound foundation of Jewish monotheism. The labour of 'watering' was not less than the toil of 'planting.' The instruction cannot have been confined to the discourse of the services, or the teaching of the apostle in person or by letter. Such a knowledge of the OT as St. Paul presupposes in Gentile converts (e.g. Ro 7th, 1 Co 6th 9th 10th, Gal 4th 21st) could only be the fruit of long and systematic instruction. This was the main work of men like Aquila and Apollos. There was a special 'gift' of 'teaching,' and a special class of men in the Christian Church who were called 'teachers' from the exercise of this gift. Of the content of this teaching we can only say on a priori grounds that it must have embraced the historical facts on which Christianity is based, together with their doctrinal significance, and the practical rule of life directly grounded on the doctrine. A systematic instruction in the OT writings must have been necessary for Gentiles to understand the very frequent allusions to them and interpretations of them which occur in the Pauline Epp. (e.g. Ro 9th, 1 Co 10th 1st, 2 Co 8th 15, Gal 4th 21st, cf. also 2 Ti 3rd). This last passage shows how the doctrinal and hortatory elements are inextricably interwoven with instruction in a narrower sense. St. Paul's Epp. also are a good example of the same. The historical facts of OT and of Christ's life are regarded as facts of doctrinal significance (e.g. Gal 4th 21st), and from doctrinal truths practical injunctions are drawn as their consequences (cf. the 'therefore' in 1 Co 15th, Eph 4th 17, Col 3rd 12).

The instruction proceeded on the Jewish method of repeated oral teaching (cf. the word καταλογία, Lk 14, Ac 15th 21st, 1 Co 14th, Gal 6th). In NT a convert was baptized as soon as he declared his belief in Christ (Ac 24th and often), but later the practice arose of deferring baptism until the convert had been instructed in the rudiments of the faith, and during this period he was called a 'catechumen' (κατηχούμενος). The content of the teaching had for its kernel first and foremost sayings of the Lord which were remembered and treasured up by those who had known Him (cf. 1 Co 7th 10, 12, 22, 9th 14, 1 Th 4th 1, 1 Ti 5th 16). These floating sayings were at an early date collected into a book of the 'oracles of the Lord' (Παπια ap. Eus. iii. 39), which was one of the main sources of the Gospels of Mt and Lk. To these sayings of Christ were added the divinely inspired teaching of the apostles and prophets. So there arose gradually a fixed body of teaching bearing the stamp of Christ's authority (1 Ti 3rd, 2 Jn 9th) or the apostolic approval (Gal 1st 9th, 1 Th 4th 2, 2 Th 2nd 13, 2 Ti 1st 13, 2nd 31, Tit 1st). The danger arising from the free activity of the 'teacher' was thus lessened by this firm and unalterable foundation of 'tradition,' παράδοσις, the faith handed on from one to another (2 Th 2nd 15, Ro 6th 17, 1 Co 15th 12, Lk 12), and guarded by each as a sacred deposit (παραθήκη, 1 Ti 6th 20, 2 Ti 1st 14, 2nd). This accredited teaching is also expressed by phrases such as τίποις διδαχῇ (Ro 6th 17), ὁποῦσας ἐνταλνόντων λόγων (2 Ti 1st 13, cf. 2nd), οἱ λόγοι τῆς πίστεως (1 Ti 4th). The especial frequency of such expressions in the Pastoral Epp. illustrates the more stereotyped form which this teaching assumed when death and imprisonment were removing the apostles from personal contact with their churches. The frequent recurrence of isolated dicta with the introduction πιστεύετε ὅτι (1 Ti 1st 16, 3rd 4th, 2 Ti 2nd 21, Tit 8th), shows that such sayings were highly valued and carefully preserved. Finally, after the death of the apostles we have a specimen of the way in which their teachings were collected, in a work which has been preserved to us under the title 'The Teaching of the Lord through the Twelve Apostles' (Did. 11).

(2) The Management of Common Funds.—(a) Sources of the common revenue.—In the early days of enthusiasm nothing but the surrender of all private property would satisfy the eagerness of the converts (Ac 2nd 4th). Those who had possessions sold them and laid the money at the apostles' feet as a contribution to the common fund. This condition of things was, however, the result of purely voluntary action in each individual case, and is not to be confused with a compulsory community of goods (422-54). It was probably not universal; thus, e.g., we find Mary the mother of Mark in possession of a private house (1212), and Tabitha at Joppa renowned for her many alms-deeds (936), which implies that she did not hand over all her property to the Church at the time of her conversion. It differed in degree only from a later condition of things in which poor and rich were to be seen in the church (e.g. 1 Co 11:22, Eph 6:9, Col 4:1, 1 Ti 6:17, Ja 22). It was a voluntary almsholding (Ac 4:35), but collective and organized instead of being individual and sporadic. The sole source of the Church's revenue remained always the voluntary offerings of the congregation. Under the head of such voluntary offerings we must include the contributions of food brought by the rich to the Agapae (implied in 1 Co 11:21, 22), the furnishing of the necessary accessories (e.g. seats, lights, etc.) for the public worship, which was probably undertaken by the owner of the house in which the services were held, the exercise of private hospitality on behalf of the Church towards visitors from other Churches (cf. 1 Ti 3:2 'given to hospitality,' 5:10 'if she hath used hospitality to strangers, if she hath washed the feet of the saints'), and the practice of private charity (Ac 9:36, 1 Ti 5:10). (b) The expenses.—The money thus offered to the community was spent mainly in the support of the poor and helpless in the Church. Part of this charity was permanent and regular (e.g. the support of widows, Ac 6:1, 1 Ti 5:9), except so far as they were provided for by private charity, 1 Ti 5:16, Ja 127; the support of the poor generally, Ac 24:35, 2, and part extraordinary and occasional (e.g. the offerings sent to the poor brethren in Judaea, Ac 11:29-34, Ro 15:25-27, 31, 1 Co 16:1-5, 2 Co 8-9, Gal 2:10). Another source of expenditure was the support of the ministers of the gospel. The labourer was worthy of his hire. They who proclaimed the gospel had the right to live of the gospel (cf. 1 Co 9:14, Gal 6:6, 1 Ti 5:18, 1 P 5:2). St. Paul remarks that he was an exception in this respect (1 Co 9:4), and resigned what was his right in order to avoid offence (2 Co 11:7, 12:10, 1 Th 2:5, 2 Th 3:6). From the Philipians alone did he receive any help (2 Co 11:9, Ph 4:10). In the Didache (11-13) order is given to receive and lodge the prophet, and send him on his way with food enough to last him until the evening, but no money gifts are allowed. The resident prophets are to receive the first-fruits of corn, wine, and oxen. We see from this that the burden of supporting these officers fell on certain individuals rather than on the community as a whole, and so came only in a limited degree from public funds. To these charges we must add also the indefinite administrative expenses which would inevitably be incurred from time to time in the management of affairs. See further on this subject ALMS, COMMUNION.

(3) General Administration and Direction.—Under this head we must include all such work as the arrangement of times for the services and other common meetings, the ordering of the services, and the management of the thousand and one details involved in the general direction of the common affairs. To this class of duties St. Paul would add the task of arbitrating in the case of disputes among brethren (1 Co 6:6) to avoid the scandal of Christian attacking Christian before the public law courts.

(4) The Enforcing of Discipline.—To the apostles (Mt 16:18, 19, Jn 20:22, 23) and to the Church as a whole (Mt 18:18) Christ solemnly committed the power which He Himself possessed (Mt 9:8 etc.) of remitting or retaining sins. These words laid on the Church the duty of enforcing discipline, of pronouncing punishment upon the sinner, or declaring his forgiveness when the punishment had been followed by repentance. Punishment and forgiveness were dealt out in the name and in the person of Christ (1 Co 6:4, 2 Co 2:10). This was, then, no arbitrary exercise of authority, but rested upon the guarantee that the decision coincided with the will of God in the matter. The disciplinary power thus belonging to the Church was in practice only exercised against sins which were a public offence to the community. It was only when an act of sinfulness became public, and therefore a scandal to the community, that the Church felt itself called upon to take cognisance of the matter. The searching out of private offences was no part of the common discipline, nor was the system of public confession yet instituted for such offences. Christians are encouraged to confess their sins to one another (Ja 5:16), that they may receive the benefit of others' prayers for their forgiveness (cf. ib. 15, 1 Jn 5:16). From this last passage we see that there are 'sins unto death' which cannot thus find forgiveness (cf. Mk 3:29, Lk 12:10). But above all, the Christian must settle his sins with God by confession to Him and prayer for pardon (1 Jn 1:9), and the punishment for sin comes direct from heaven (1 Co 11:30) as well as through the Church. Taking cognisance, then, only of these public offences, public punishment was administered in proportion to the wrong. The lightest punishment was simple reproof. This could be administered by any Christian to a fellow-Christian (Mt 18:15, 1 Th 5:14). It assumed an official form when the rebuke was publicly administered by a person of recognized authority (1 Ti 5:20, Gal 2:13) or by the community. In case of obstinacy on the part of the sinner, or of more serious faults, the offender might be expelled from the community, and its members forbidden to speak, or eat, or have any communication with him (Ro 16:17, 1 Co 5:11, 13, 2 Jn 10). Finally, when the sin was particularly grievous the same sentence of excommunication might be accompanied with the miraculous infliction of a physical punishment (Ac 5:1-10, 24, 1 Co 5:6, 1 Ti 1:20), or with the imprecation of a curse (ἀνάθεμα) on the offender (1 Co 16:22, Gal 1:8). Christ Himself directed that in the case of brother wronging brother the injured person shall (1) reprove the wrong-doer in private;

(2) if that fails, it is to be followed by formal reproof in the presence of witnesses; (3) in case he still refuses to repair the wrong, the matter is to be reported to the Church, by whom the offender shall be excommunicated, 'be to thee as the Gentile and the publican' (Mt 18:15-17). The object of the punishment is always reformatory and not retaliatory. This is the case even with the most severe sentences (1 Co 5:5, 1 Ti 1:20). Their purpose is not destruction, but repentance, and repentance is followed by forgiveness on the part of the injured community (2 Co 2:5-10, Gal 6:1, Jude 22, 23). During the time that the ban of the community is upon him the offender is not to be regarded as an enemy, but pitied as an erring brother (2 Th 3:15).

Under the four heads of teaching, administration of funds, direction, and discipline, we have summarized the work to be done in the government of the community. Now the question arises, In whose hands did this work lie? The problem here is wider than that of the right to take part in the public worship. There the right of speech was limited only by the nature and degree of the 'gift' received by the individual. All did not possess the higher gifts (1 Co 12:31) of prophecy and teaching, or even the lower gift of tongues (ib. 30). Some there were who, without being unbelievers, did not possess the special gifts which fitted a man to take part in the services (the 'unlearned' of 14:23, 24, cf. ib. 28, Ja 1:6). He who had not a 'gift' of speaking (1 P 4:10, 11) was not called upon to speak. In a case, then, where the number of those qualified to take part in the service was so indefinite, we cannot press the 'each one' of 1 Co 14:26 to mean 'every one.' There were other gifts of ministrations (see Ro 12:6, 1 Co 12:9, and cf. 1 Co 7:7) besides those of the word; every Christian had received his gift according to the will of the Giver (1 Co 12:7, Eph 4:7), and each exercised it in its appropriate sphere. But though the number of those qualified to speak in the services was limited, the limit was quite indefinite as far as human recognition was concerned. How far was this so in regard to teaching and general administration?

At the head of all stand the apostles. This term is not confined to the Twelve. The two are expressly distinguished in 1 Co 15: 'then to the twelve,' ib. 7 'then to all the apostles,' and others besides the Twelve are called apostles (Ro 16:7, 1 Co 9:1-6, Gal 1:9). The conditions of apostleship were to have 'seen the Lord' and to have done missionary work (1 Co 9:1-2). The superiority of the apostle's authority rested on this personal contact with Christ (cf. Ac 1:21), and for this reason he was of higher rank than the prophet. He received his authority from the Lord (2 Co 10:13, 13:10). His teaching was irrefutable because it came to him from the Lord (1 Co 11:23, Gal 1:12). The apostles then occupied the first rank in the Church (1 Co 12:28, Eph 4:11). There was no branch of government in which they had not the supreme right to command. In teaching their doctrine is the norm of truth (Gal 1:8-9). They lay down directions in all matters affecting the religious and social life of the community: they pronounce punishments (1 Co 5:5), and forgive 'in the person of Christ' (2 Co 2:7).

Next to the apostles come the prophets, who constitute the second order in the Church (1 Co 12:28, Eph 4:11). We find them, like the apostles, claiming and exercising an authority in every department of church direction, e.g. teaching (Ac 15:32, 1 Co 14:26, 31, cf. Didache 11), general direction (Ac 8:29, 9:10, 13:16, 1 Ti 1:18, 4:14, cf. Ignatius, ad Philad. 7; Didache 11).

These two classes of Church rulers (apostles, prophets) stand entirely above all others in the sole possession of a divine revelation (ἀποκάλυψις). Their command was more than human, because they spoke not of themselves, but as the direct mouthpieces of the Holy Ghost. To them have been revealed the mysteries of the gospel (cf. Gal 1:12 'the gospel . . . came to me through revelation of Jesus Christ,' Eph 3<sup>8</sup> 'which, i.e. the mystery of Christ . . . hath now been revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets in the Spirit,' cf. 1 Co 13<sup>2</sup>). Accordingly, in whatever department of the Church's government they issue their injunctions, they speak in the Spirit (ἐν πνεύματι, i.e. under the power of the Spirit, Eph 3<sup>8</sup>, Rev 1<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>, cf. Ac 21<sup>4</sup>). The Holy Ghost resided in every Christian as a power of supernatural strength; but He resided in the apostles and prophets as a revealer of God's will and purpose. The words and actions of apostles and prophets are often spoken of as the words and actions of the Holy Ghost Himself (e.g. Ac 13<sup>2</sup>, cf. 4<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>28</sup> 20<sup>23</sup>, 28 21<sup>11</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>, cf. Ignatius, ad Philad. 7). They represent, therefore, the pure theocracy in the same way as the prophets of OT, and in the same way their authority stood above all other as the direct rule of God. In the matter of government they were the only possessors of what we should call a supernatural gift, and therefore in a pre-eminent degree had the right to rule. (The other supernatural gifts, e.g. tongues, interpretations of tongues, working of miracles, gifts of healing, 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>, 29, are not gifts connected with government, and need not be considered here.) In making this division, 'supernatural' and 'natural' gifts, we are, indeed, guilty of drawing a distinction which was not present to the minds of the first Christians. To them every gift was supernatural, because it was the manifestation of the Holy Ghost in the individual. But it is a distinction which exists in the nature of things; and when the Christians regarded revelation as the paramount source of authority, they were unconsciously drawing a distinction between 'supernatural' and 'natural' government.

We see, then, that in the apostles and prophets rested an authority which was supreme, because it was based on revelation. Here we have the fundamental principle of NT church government, viz. direct divine rule of the Holy Ghost as expressing itself through its human mouthpieces the recipients of revelation. But the question we have now to consider is, To what extent was this principle carried out in practice? Did the apostles and prophets monopolize all the direction of the Church? If we look at the early chapters of Ac, we shall see that this was at first the case. Not only the general supervision, but also the executive work in all its details, falls upon the apostles (cf. 2<sup>42</sup> 4<sup>36</sup>, 37 5<sup>2</sup>). But when the work grew too large for them, a division of labour became necessary, and this led to the appointment of officers called 'the Seven,' whose work was to receive the offerings and attend to the 'daily ministration' of alms to the needy (6<sup>3</sup>). Here we see the delegation of a definite department of administration. While retaining their supremacy, the apostles surrender the actual daily working of this department to a new class of officers, who were not necessarily apostles or prophets, but appointed by popular election (ib. 2. 5). We hear nothing further of this office after the persecution by which one of its holders lost his life, and the rest were driven away from Jerus. (8<sup>1</sup>). When the community is reassembled, the 'presbyters' appear in connexion with the administration of funds (11<sup>30</sup>). This class of persons is mentioned without introduction, and indeed government by elders was so familiar to Jews, that it is highly probable that from the first the 'heads of families' had held a recognized position of influence. Later we find these same persons forming with the apostles a committee of general management with the widest powers. The great question of Gentile circumcision was first threshed out by them (15<sup>6</sup>; v. 12 πᾶν τὸ πλῆθος does not necessarily imply the whole community), and their decision put before the whole Church for approval (v. 22). Then the letter embodying this decision is drawn up by the committee of apostles and elders (v. 23; the reading πρεσβυτέρους καὶ ἀδελφούς is now generally abandoned). At their next appearance we find them in a similar position of authority (21<sup>18-19</sup>). The government of the Church at Jerus. appears in the hands of a body of presbyters with James at their head. We cannot avoid seeing here an imitation of the synagogal government among the Jews. We find with them also a body of elders who manage the affairs of the synagogue (Lk 7<sup>3</sup>). We may notice in this connexion that the Jewish Christians call their place of worship a synagogue (Ja 2<sup>2</sup>). Government by elders was a tradition among Jews (Nu 11<sup>24</sup>, Jg 8<sup>14</sup>, 1 S 16<sup>4</sup>) which had not declined, as with the Greeks and Romans, but was still active (cf. Mt 21<sup>23</sup>, Ac 4<sup>5</sup>, 23 6<sup>12</sup> etc.; Schlürer, IJP § 27). When we find the term, then, used as the name of the governing body in Jerus., it is almost certain that it had a technical meaning. The 'elders' were not merely the 'old men,' but those among the old men who were selected to manage the affairs of the community. How, or on what principle, they were selected at Jerus. we do not know. But we find the presbyteral organization in other Christian communities also,—Paul and Barnabas introduced it into the Churches founded on the first missionary journey (Ac 14<sup>23</sup>),—and in this case they appointed the officers at their own discretion.* Whether St. Paul continued this practice in all his Churches is at least doubtful. He speaks of those in the Church at Thessalonica who 'labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you' (1 Th 5<sup>12</sup>); but we cannot prove, except by the analogy of other Churches, that these were not prophets. Writing to the Corinthian Church (1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>), but speaking of the Church as a whole, he mentions 'helps' (ἀντιλήψεις) and 'governments' (κυβερνήσεις) in a list of gifts and workers. The names are vague, which suggests that he is using general terms to describe officers bearing different titles in different places. But he has already mentioned in his list 'apostles' and 'prophets,' so that he is thinking of persons distinct from these. This is important, because he is here describing a divinely appointed (ἐξ ἐμοῦ ὁ θεός) arrangement, i.e. one which in its outlines he understood to be universal. In Ro 12<sup>8</sup> he mentions ὁ προϊστάμενος, but he is here speaking of 'gifts,' some of them common to all Christians, not of officers, and the same men may have combined the gifts, cf. the list of gifts in 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>. He includes, e.g., 'giving' (ὁ μεταδίδως), 'pitying' (ὁ ἐλεῶν). We find, however, another list of officers in Eph 4<sup>11</sup>, where the division is apostles, prophets, evangelists,† shepherds, and teachers. From the Gr. τοὺς δὲ ποιμένας καὶ διδασκάλους we see that he is referring to one class of persons only, and the general language (πολυων is never used as the name of an officer, but to describe his position and work, cf. Ac 20<sup>28</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>2</sup>, Jude 12) shows that he is thinking of functions which were universal, while the persons performing them perhaps bore different names. We find, however, presbyters at Ephesus (Ac 20<sup>17</sup>), whom St. Paul calls ἐπισκόπους, 'overseers' or bishops (v. 28). The letter to the Philippians, written some years later than the events described in Ac 20, is addressed to 'the saints . . . at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons.' This is the first certain mention of these officers, for ἐπισκόπους in Ac 20<sup>28</sup> has probably only a general sense 'overseers,' and it is by no means certain that διδάκων in Ro 16<sup>1</sup> is used technically (cf. ib. 15<sup>8</sup> 12<sup>7</sup>), while identifications of the Seven with the deacons, though as early as 2nd cent., are only conjectural (see DEACON). In the Pastoral Epp. (1 Ti 3<sup>1-13</sup>) the bishops and deacons appear as the two local officers. (For the relation of presbyters to bishops, see BISHOP.) We see from these letters that it was the desire of the writer to establish a uniform organization of bishops and deacons (cf. Tit 1<sup>5</sup>), such as we find as an accomplished fact in the next generation (cf. the Ep. of Clement of Rome to the Cor., esp. chs. 42, 44). Amongst the Jewish Churches we find the presbyteral organization still in force (Ja 5<sup>14</sup>); so, too, in 1 P 5<sup>10</sup>. We see, then, in the local Churches of the apostolic age various stages of organization, tending towards the end of that period to assume a uniform aspect. In the earlier history we find the greatest contrasts in this respect. In the Church of Jerus. we see a highly developed organization with well-marked distinctions of rulers and ruled. But if we turn to the Corinthian Church of the same time, the state of things there presented to us implies organization of a most rudimentary type. In the proud consciousness of 'knowledge' (cf. 1 Co 17<sup>8</sup> 14<sup>26</sup>) the individual member placed too great reliance on his own judgment. The result was a forwardness and independence of action on the part of the individual in his private life and in the meetings for public worship (e.g. 8<sup>10</sup> 14<sup>20-28</sup>), which indicates the absence of firm central control and obedience to authority. The apostle has to teach them that love is better than knowledge or any other gift (8<sup>13</sup>), that gifts are to be exercised for the benefit of the whole, each in its place and measure (12<sup>12-13</sup>). We have not, then, to deal with an iron uniformity of local organization, but with a variety of degrees. We can trace in the Pauline Epp. the following stages in the growth of organization. (a) At the outset the idea of ruling does not appear. Earnest believers come forward and, according as their gifts permit them, volunteer their services in the work of carrying out the necessary arrangements for the community, in the way of teaching, collecting, and distributing the public alms, etc. The incentive is not the desire to rule, for as yet no position of command is attached to the work, but a purely disinterested labour of love. They 'set themselves to minister to the saints,' ἐν δακωνίας τοῖς ἁγίοις ἐκράζαν ἑαυτοῖς (1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>, cf. Ac 16<sup>15</sup>, 40 18<sup>25</sup>, 26, 28, Ro 16 passim, Ph 2<sup>30</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>10</sup>). (b) Those who thus volunteered were accepted by the apostle in the first instance. They worked under him in the task of constructing the new community. What would be, then, more natural than that in departing he should leave them in charge with instructions how to carry on the work? We cannot suppose that he went away without leaving anyone to superintend the affairs of the infant Church. Such persons are those to whom he alludes as 'presiding in the Lord,' προϊστάμενοι ἐν Κυρίῳ, 1 Th 5<sup>12</sup>, for whom he claims the respect and gratitude due to those who have laboured for the common good. Here we have a status, unofficial indeed, but recognized by the community and the apostle. Compare the position of Stephanus at Corinth (1 Co 16<sup>16</sup>). (c) This position becomes gradually of a more definite and official character. The work of ruling gravitates more exclusively to these presidents, and the appointment becomes more definitely regarded as an appointment. In the Churches of the first missionary journey such a well-marked and definite official position followed after the lapse of, at most, a few months from the first preaching. At Thessalonica (1 Th 5<sup>12, 13</sup>) such a definite position is perhaps not yet established, but there are persons possessed of a recognized authority to preside and admonish. In Corinth the indefiniteness of authoritative rule, suggested by 1 Co 16<sup>16, 16</sup>, is quite supported by the condition of things described in the Epistle, of which we have already spoken. Then in the later Epp. (Phil. and the Pastoral Epp.) we see the gradual tendency to a uniform organization of presbyter-bishops (cf. Ac 20<sup>28</sup> at Ephesus also) and deacons establishing itself in all the Pauline Churches. Later, as we know from the earliest Christian writings, outside NT, which have come down to us, this organization of bishops and deacons became more and more universal. Among Jewish Christians, where previous writers had spoken only of presbyters, e.g. Ja 5<sup>14</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>10</sup> (with perhaps a hint at the name bishop in 2<sup>25</sup>), Rev 4<sup>4</sup>, et saepe, we find in the Didache the Pauline system of bishops and deacons in full exercise (Did. 14<sup>10</sup>). Among Gentile Churches Clement of Rome (Rp. ad Cor. 42, 44) supposes it to be universal. The single bishop as the centre of all authority in the community appears first at Antioch and in the Asiatic Churches of the Ignatian Epistles.*

* The idea of popular election had become by no means an essential element in the meaning of χειροτονία in later Greek. It is still seen in some instances, e.g. 2 Co 8<sup>19</sup>, Jos. Ant. vii. xl. 1, but has quite disappeared in many others, e.g. Jos. Ant. vi. xlii. 9, τὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ χειροτονημένον βασιλῆα. It is immaterial to our present purpose whether πρεσβυτερία is here the name of the officers created or of the persons from whom they were chosen, but it would be a singularly abrupt way of speaking to say, 'They appointed elders for them' (i.e. to be rulers, χειροτονήσαντες αὐτοὺς πρεσβυτέρους. In a somewhat similar passage, Tit 1<sup>5</sup> ἵνα . . . καταστήσῃς κατὰ πόλιν πρεσβυτέρους, it would be just possible that πρεσβυτερία represents the class from which selection is made, because καθιστάναι (= to set down in a place) had a more technical meaning 'to put into office'; but even here the omission would be strange. With χειροτονία, which had a vaguer meaning, 'to appoint,' the omission would be still more remarkable.

† The evangelist was a wandering missionary working on new ground (Ac 21<sup>8</sup>; Eus. HE ii. 3, iii. 37), and not concerned with the organization of Churches already established. In 2 Ti 4<sup>5</sup> the word is used in a general (=preacher of the gospel) and not in a special sense. The application to the writers of Gospels is much later.

Over against the authority of these local officers, which did not extend beyond the single community, stands the universal authority of the apostles and prophets, who constitute the foundation of the whole Church (Eph 2<sup>20</sup>), whose sphere of action is not limited to the single Church (cf. Ac 11<sup>27</sup> 21<sup>10</sup>, Did. 11), though they might settle down for some length of time in one place (e.g. Ac 13<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>10</sup>, Did. 13). What was the practical relation of these two authorities in the actual working of affairs in the community?

It will be useful, first, to compare the two in regard to the method of their appointment. Every Christian possessed one or more 'gifts' of the Holy Ghost (1 Co 7<sup>7</sup>). These gifts were of many kinds, including all the mental, moral, and spiritual endowments of the Christian. Thus we find 'mercy,' 'almsgiving' (Ro 12<sup>8</sup>), 'faith' (Ro 12<sup>3, 5</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>9</sup>), 'wisdom,' 'knowledge' (1 Co 12<sup>8</sup>). They are the manifestations of the Spirit in the individual (ib. 12<sup>7</sup>). Every one possessing a gift is called to exercise it for the benefit of the community. Every one, therefore, is a minister to the community in his branch of service: 'each one as he has received a gift, ministering it towards one another as good stewards of the manifold grace of God' (1 P 4<sup>10</sup>). According, then, to the ideal of the Christian Church, there would have been no appointed officers, but each Christian would have performed his proper part of the work according to the 'gift' or 'gifts' granted to him. In the same way as the Christian was 'called' by the grace of God to be a believer, so he was 'called' by the gift of God to perform certain functions within the community. Among these gifts was that of 'prophecy.' He who possessed, then, the gift of 'prophecy' was 'called' to be an apostle or prophet. (For distinction of apostle and prophet see separate articles. The apostle's authority ranked higher because of his personal contact with the Lord.) So St. Paul speaks of himself, 'Paul, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ through the will of God' (1 Co 1<sup>1</sup>). He insists strongly on the direct nature of that call, 'an apostle, not from men, nor through man, but through Jesus Christ and God the Father' (Gal 1<sup>1</sup>, cf. Ac 20<sup>24</sup>, 'the ministry which I received from the Lord Jesus'). These facts show that he does not consider the events of Ac 13<sup>10</sup>, but those of his conversion, as the occasion of his appointment to the apostolate. The appointment of Matthias is not to be taken as typical. In the first place, the appointment was for a definite position, i.e. to fill up the number of twelve apostles; secondly, the descent of the Holy Ghost had not yet taken place, and the method of determining by 'charisma' was not yet possible. So the method here adopted (i.e. popular election, followed by the final selection by lot between the two thus chosen) is extraordinary.

* It is not probable that the 'angel' of these Churches in the Apoc. (130 21. 8. 12. 18 31. 7. 14) is meant to be a single episcopos. The messages are given (see the language throughout) directly to the Churches, not through an intermediate representative.

Like the apostle, the prophet was a prophet because he possessed the gift of 'prophecy.' The Holy Spirit divideth 'to each one severally even as he will' (1 Co 12<sup>11</sup>). It follows, then, that the prophet, like the apostle, received his appointment by a subjective 'call,' i.e. he exercised his authority without reference to human appointment or permission. St. Paul gives instructions to Timothy about the appointment of bishops and deacons, but says nothing of prophets. The Didache also gives instructions to elect bishops and deacons, but is equally silent as to prophets. Nor is this surprising, for the prophet was not an officer, but the exerciser of a spiritual gift. There could be no more question of electing him than of electing those who should speak with tongues. St. Paul's language in 1 Co 14 (e.g. <sup>24</sup> 'if all prophesy,' <sup>37</sup> 'if any thinketh himself to be a prophet or spiritual,' <sup>39</sup> 'desire earnestly to prophesy') would be perplexing if those only were prophets who were appointed to the office of prophet. It presupposes that the number of prophets is not fixed, but indefinite. But, on the other hand, the 'gift' might on occasions be regarded as coming through 'ordination.' We find instances in which men were appointed to carry out a special work through a prophecy put in the mouth of others, e.g. Paul and Barnabas, Ac 13<sup>2</sup> (but, as we said above, Paul did not regard this as an appointment to the apostolate); also Timothy (1 Ti 1<sup>8</sup> 4<sup>14</sup>). In the case of the latter the 'gift' is described as coming to him 'through prophecy, with the laying on of hands by the presbytery' (4<sup>14</sup>), or through the laying on of the apostle's hands (2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>). We have here a solemn transmission of gifts by the 'laying on of hands' (cf. Ac 8<sup>18</sup> 19<sup>6</sup>), which illustrates the absence of strict uniformity so characteristic of the first age of the Church. Absolutely fixed rules did not yet exist in either way; but, apparently like the possessor of any other 'gift,' the prophet, ordinarily, was neither appointed nor ordained to office, but the bearer of a 'revelation,' of which he was subjectively conscious.

But with the appointment of those who were to manage the daily affairs of the community it was different. The early condition of things in which this work was performed by the chance individual in the voluntary exercise of his gift, led (as in Corinth) to disorder. For the management of everyday administration, it was necessary, in the nature of things, that definitely recognized persons should undertake the work. The 'subjective' appointment was found to be impracticable and productive of confusion, unless confirmed by an objective recognition. And so, somewhat in the manner described above, the voluntary worker became an officer, since, from the moment that his appointment was determined by the community, or an apostle, or his delegate, organization had begun, and an office was created. The actual machinery of appointment varies considerably in NT. We find a system of popular election in the appointment of the Seven (Ac 6<sup>3</sup>), of Barnabas and Saul to carry alms to Jerusalem (Ac 11<sup>29</sup>), and of the officers appointed by the Churches of Macedonia and Corinth to take the collection to Jerusalem (2 Co 8<sup>19</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>3</sup>). Presbyters (bishops) and deacons are appointed by the apostle (Ac 14<sup>23</sup>) or his delegate (1 Ti 3<sup>1</sup> 13 5<sup>22</sup>, Tit 1<sup>9</sup>, Clem. Rom. ad Cor. 42).* In the Didache we find a system of popular election for bishops and deacons. These appointed officers have this in common with the apostles and prophets, that they are appointed because they have already shown themselves qualified for the work, i.e. because they have the necessary 'gifts,' and the will to exercise them (cf. 1 Ti 3<sup>8</sup> 10, Did. 15<sup>1</sup>). The Seven were especially selected because they were 'of good report, full of the Spirit and of wisdom.' Those to whom St. Paul gives a semi-official position by enjoining their ability for the position. Clement of Rome, Ep. ad Cor. 42, says the apostle 'appointed their first-fruits as bishops and deacons after testing them with the Spirit' (δοκιμασάντες τῷ πνεύματι) or, in other words, by first making certain that they really possessed the necessary gifts. When he speaks of the appointment of first converts to be bishops and deacons as a uniform practice of the apostles, his language is more universal than the evidence of NT warrants. This may have been occasionally true (e.g. Ro 16<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>), but not necessarily universal.

In the significance of the word 'office' we find the keynote of the relation between the prophetic authority and that of the officers in actual practice. Theoretically, the sphere of 'revelation' covered every branch of work; in practice, the actual details of the daily management fell upon the 'officers,' while the superior authority of revelation appeared in occasional direction on great questions (e.g. Ac 13<sup>16</sup>), or negatively in checking an abuse. Another fact is here brought before us. The apostles and prophets were largely an itinerant order. They belonged to the whole Church, not to any particular Church. Only occasionally did they settle in a particular place for any length of time. It was, then, impossible for them to carry on the daily administration of a Church in all its details. In no case does this come out more clearly than with regard to the collection and distribution of alms. This department was the first to be separated from the original centralization of all work in the hands of the apostles and put into the hands of 'officers.' Later we find it in the hands of 'presbyters' at Jerusalem (Ac 11<sup>30</sup>). In Galatia (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>), Achaia (ib., 2 Co 8. 9), Macedonia (2 Co 8<sup>19</sup>), the apostle gives general instructions about the collection for the poor brethren of Judaea, but the carrying out is left to local workers. In 1 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>, Tit 1<sup>7</sup> the qualification for the office of bishops and deacons, that they should not be 'lovers of money,' 'greedy of filthy lucre,' suggests that dealing with public moneys formed a part of their duties. In Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor. 44, they are spoken of as those who 'offer the gifts,' τοὺς . . . προσερχόμενους τὰ δῶρα. The management of finance constituted in later times also one of the most important of the bishop's duties.† In the same way as the manage-

* We have here a double aspect, according as the person who appointed proceeded on a 'revelation' or his own discretion. Thus, on the one hand, St. Paul speaks of the presbyters of Ephesus as those 'whom the Holy Ghost had appointed bishops'; on the other, he gives Timothy and Titus directions as to the character of those whom they are to select for office (1 Ti 3<sup>1</sup> 13, Tit 1<sup>9</sup>), and exhorts Timothy not to proceed with too great haste in this matter (1 Ti 5<sup>22</sup>), both of which suggest that he has in view a system of appointment by their human discretion, not one in which the proper persons were denoted by a revelation.

† Sohlm (Kirchenrecht, I. 73 ff.) assigns to the prophet this function of collection and distribution on the strength of Did. 13<sup>3</sup> 'The first-fruits shall be brought to the prophets.' But this passage is treating of the support of prophets and teachers by the community, not of financial management. It directs that if there are no prophets in the community, these first-fruits are to be given to the poor. And there is no other passage in which the prophets as such appear undertaking these duties. Occasional injunctions given by the prophet as a 'revelation' (e.g. Did. 11<sup>8</sup> 12) are different from permanent management. Still less is Sohlm's case proved from Did. 15<sup>1</sup> χειροτονῶσιν οὖν ἑαυτοὺς ἱερεῖς καὶ διακόνους ἀξίους τοῦ Κυρίου, ἀνδρας πραιῖς καὶ ἀφιλκαργύρους καὶ διδοκιμασμένους ὡς γὰρ λειτουργοῦσιν καὶ αὐτοὶ τὴν λειτουργίαν τῶν προφητῶν καὶ διδασκάλων. The γὰρ in this passage is most naturally referred back to ἀξίους τοῦ Κυρίου; this is the main thought which πραιῖς, ἀφιλκαργύρους, and διδοκιμασμένους describe more exactly. But if the ment of finance, the daily administration of discipline fell upon the local officers (cf. 1 Th 5<sup>12</sup>), as well as all those general duties included in presidency.

The exact division of labour between the 'prophetic' and the local rulers naturally varied with the strength and efficiency of the local organization. In Jerus., where the local organization was very strong, the work of the prophet sinks into the background. There were prophets at Jerus. (cf. Ac 11<sup>27</sup>), and their voice was heard on great occasions (e.g. ib. 15<sup>28</sup> 'it seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us'), but the presbyters are more prominent in the administration of affairs. In Corinth, where the local organization was lax to a degree, St. Paul finds it necessary to issue commands on the arrangement of a variety of matters connected with their private life and assemblies for worship, which, in a more organized community, would have been determined by the local officers. Another feature which would affect the relation of apostle and prophet to the local community, is the possibility that, in cases where the prophet was settled in a place, he was also a local ruler, i.e. not quid prophet, but appointed in the regular way; e.g. Judas and Silas, who were chief men among the brethren (Ac 15<sup>22</sup>), appear also as prophets (ib. 8<sup>29</sup>). In general, the direct rule by revelation appears as initiative in great steps (e.g. Ac 8<sup>29</sup> 9<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>6ff.</sup> 13<sup>4</sup> 16<sup>6</sup> etc.).

Growth of the local Ministry.—The closing days of the apostolic age witnessed a rapid advance in the importance of the local officers. The immense growth of the Church made the personal supervision of the apostle more and more intermittent, and naturally threw more initiative on the bishops. Again, certain dangers developed themselves in regard to prophecy. There had always been a risk that the prophet should introduce a subjective element into the message as it was revealed to him. But this was not all. There arose false apostles (2 Co 11<sup>18</sup>) and false prophets (Mt 24<sup>11</sup>, Mk 13<sup>22</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>, Rev 16<sup>13</sup>). Against these dangers there existed a special gift called the discernment of spirits (1 Co 12<sup>10</sup>). In Thessalonica (1 Th 5<sup>10-21</sup>) and Corinth (1 Co 14<sup>29</sup>) St. Paul found it necessary to remind the Christians to exercise discrimination in regard to the prophet's message. He lays down also (1 Co 12<sup>9</sup>) an objective criterion by which the false prophet may be detected (cf. 1 Jn 4<sup>1ff.</sup>, Rev 2<sup>2</sup> 19<sup>10</sup>). The great rise of false prophets in later days necessarily weakened the authority of the prophet, and this, again, tended to strengthen the bishops. There are three directions in which this increased authority developed.

(1) Teaching.—Of course the apostles and prophets were also teachers. Teaching was one of their main functions. But, exactly as in the case of other local administration, the daily burden of drilling new converts probably did not fall on them. Their teaching was occasional. On whom, then, fell the duty of regular teaching? The existence of a regular class of persons called 'teachers' answers the question for us. These were persons possessing in an eminent degree the 'gift' of teaching (Ro 12<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>), i.e. a power of grasping and imparting the truths of the Christian religion. They were not, like the apostles and prophets, guided by direct revelations, but they counted, next to these, as the third order in the Church (1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>). They appear, too, in the Didache, as wandering ministers, possessing authority in all Churches, and not confined to any one single Church. Again, they were not appointed to an office of teaching, but became teachers by the voluntary exercise of their 'gift' (cf. Ja 3<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>12</sup>). They appear, then, as a middle stage between the prophetic order and the local administrators, connected with the former by their voluntary exercise of an authority extending over the whole Church, but having, in common with the latter, no claim to a 'revelation.' Teachers, in fact, represent (except that they were not confined to the single Church) the position of the local ruler, before it became transformed, by appointment, into an office. Their right to teach lay in their possession of the gift, and submission to them was the result of a voluntary respect. But every Christian was in some degree a teacher, because every Christian had the responsibility of edifying his brethren (cf. Col 3<sup>16</sup>). And the local ruler was, from the very nature of his position, a teacher in a higher degree (cf. 1 Th 5<sup>12</sup>). With the growth of the tendency, already described, of incorporating the apostolic teaching into an approved body of tradition, the work of handing on this sacred 'deposit' became part of the bishop's duty. Timothy is enjoined to select faithful men, and instruct them carefully in this apostolic teaching (2 Ti 2<sup>2</sup>). At the same time, the voluntary teacher, who was teaching on his own lines, became discredited, in a similar manner as the prophet, by the rise of false teachers (1 Ti 4<sup>1</sup> 6<sup>etc.</sup>). Everything tended, therefore, to throw extra weight upon these accredited teachers, and diminish the authority of the others. But in 1 Ti 3<sup>2</sup>, Tit 1<sup>9</sup> St. Paul expresses the desire that the bishops shall be persons who possess, in an eminent degree, the 'gift' of teaching: in 1 Ti 5<sup>17</sup> he orders that elders who 'labour in the word and in teaching' (i.e. who are also teachers) shall be especially honoured (cf. Eph 4<sup>11</sup> τοὺς δὲ ποιμένας καὶ διδασκάλους, i.e. local officers of administration and teaching). Finally, he regards these rulers as the special guardians of the faith, the supporters of true and destroyers of false doctrine (Ac 20<sup>28-31</sup>, Tit 1<sup>9-11</sup>, cf. He 13<sup>17</sup>). Thus, on the one hand, the voluntary teacher was tending to become merged into the official bishop; and, on the other, the bishop was acquiring an authoritative right to teach. In the Didache the teacher still appears by the side of the prophet, but nothing is said of him separately, which shows that his importance was of the nature of a survival rather than active. The bishops and deacons, however, are spoken of as also performing the service of the prophets and teachers (15<sup>1</sup>). Thus we see in the Didache that what St. Paul desired had come to pass, viz. the bishops were all teachers.

(2) Spiritual Functions.—The 'ruler' had at first no exclusive right within the assemblies for worship except that he presided. The right of the 'word' belonged to every one who possessed a gift of speaking, and this was possessed in an eminent degree by the 'prophets,' who were regarded with a higher respect than any other possessors of 'gifts of speaking.' Now, when we turn to the Didache (chs. 9. 10) we find a fixed liturgy prescribed for the Eucharist, with formal prayers for the consecration of the cup and the breaking of the bread, and, at the close of the service, the whole is followed by the injunction, 'But permit the prophets to give thanks as much as they will,' τοῖς δὲ προφηταῖς ἐπιτρέπετε εὐχαριστῆν ὅσα θέλουσι. The contrast τοῖς δὲ προφηταῖς, κ.τ.λ., implies that the fixed formula of prayer was uttered, not by a 'prophet,' but by a bishop in his absence, or in addition to the free 'giving of thanks.' This prominence of the bishop in spiritual functions, which he shared with the 'prophet' and 'teacher,' is alluded to in the sentence already quoted (Did. 15<sup>1</sup>), 'For they also perform for you the service of the prophets and teachers.' There were cases in which no 'prophet' or 'teacher' was present in the community (Did.

13<sup>3</sup>), and in their absence functions which were mainly entrusted to them fell upon the bishops and deacons. This applies, not only to spiritual, but also to other functions.

The advance of bishops and deacons to something approaching an exclusive right to certain ministerial acts seems to have arisen somewhat as follows. In certain cases there were actions to be performed on behalf of the community which it was more convenient to carry out by means of a few representatives than by the whole body. This was, e.g., especially the case with the 'laying on of hands' at ordination. These acts were then naturally transferred to the acknowledged representatives of the assembly (the presbytery, 1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>). In the same way James (5<sup>14</sup>) directs that if any one is ill and desires the help of others' prayers for his physical and spiritual healing, he shall send for the 'presbyters' of the Church; not that the presbyters possess any exclusive privilege in this respect, for it is as 'believers' and 'just men' (vv. 16-17) that their prayers are potent, but because they are the natural representatives of the Church. In the Apoc. it is the elders who lead in the heavenly worship (4<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>16</sup> 18 19<sup>4</sup>), and present the prayers of the saints on behalf of the Church (5<sup>8</sup>).

(3) Discipline.—As the apostles one by one died or were hindered by imprisonment, etc., from personal communication with their Churches, and the position of the prophets and teachers began to decline, it was inevitable that the bishops and deacons, who were absorbing teaching and spiritual functions, should increase their powers of discipline. If we may argue from natural causes and the analogy of the Jewish elders, it will appear extremely probable that the presbyter from the first had enjoyed a recognized authority in matters of daily discipline. The maintenance of discipline was indeed part of the duty of every Christian, because every 'gift' entitled the possessor to admonish and exhort. It belonged to the prophet or teacher in a special way, because these were gifted in a special degree, and to the elder through the respect due to old age. But the Pastoral Epistles mark the appearance of a public discipline to be exercised by the bishops. This is the significance of the direction that the bishop is to be 'no striker, but gentle, not contentious' (1 Ti 3<sup>3</sup>, cf. Tit 1<sup>7</sup>). We see here a foundation laid for the establishment of public discipline, with its authority residing in the hands of the bishops.

(D) The whole Church.—Every baptized believer is a member of the Church. The Church universal is therefore the company of all the believers, 'all that call upon the name of the Lord Jesus in every place' (1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>), i.e. the sum of all the single Churches. Christ prayed for the unity of His future believers (Jn 17<sup>20, 21</sup>), that they might be one, cf. Jn 10<sup>16</sup> 'Other sheep have I which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and they shall become one flock, one shepherd.' And under the training of His apostles the local communities, wherever situated, regarded themselves as members of one body. Each was a Church of God (1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>14</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>4</sup>) in Jesus Christ (Ro 16<sup>6</sup>, Gal 1<sup>22</sup>). All believers are 'brethren' and fellow-saints without respect of nation or rank. On this feature of the Christian teaching St. Paul dwells most strongly, both as regards the individual Christians (e.g. 1 Co 12) and the individual communities (e.g. Eph 2<sup>20-22</sup> 4<sup>3, 12, 16</sup>). What, then, were the grounds on which this consciousness of unity were based?

1. Strongest of all was the identity of relation between all believers and the Persons of the Holy Trinity (Eph 4<sup>6</sup>). By baptism all entered into a corporate society (Ac 2<sup>41</sup>, Gal 3<sup>27</sup>), and that society is the 'body of Christ' (1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>). Faith has cleansed all from their former sins, has reconciled all to God, united all to Christ, and procured for each the presence of the Holy Ghost and His gifts within him. Every Christian has been called with the same calling to the same faith, enters by the same baptism into unity with the same Christ, receives the gifts of the same Spirit, owns the same Lord, worships the same God the Father, and is filled with the same hopes (Eph 4<sup>3-5</sup>). This is far more than a mere unity of belief: it is the consciousness of a common spiritual power (Eph 1<sup>19</sup>) working mightily and manifestly in each one. Hand in hand with it follows its practical result in

2. Participation of a common life.—The adoption of Christianity, which snapped so many of the old social ties both for Jew and for heathen, at the same time opened to the convert conditions and precepts of life for the most part new to ancient ideals. The hatred of the Jews and the contempt of the Gentiles, which drove the Christians into one another's arms, at the same time accentuated the division which separated them from the rest of the world. Common unpopularity made them feel their own unity. This affected primarily the single community, but in a lesser degree the whole Church. Within the community the persecuted Christians found an ideal of conduct which drew them together with the ties of brotherhood (ἀδελφότης). The first Christian community started with the principles of a family life, and when the practical conditions of these early days died out, the idea of the 'household of faith' still remained active. It expressed itself in the common worship and in the common daily life which we have described above. The sketch of that life, as we have given it, is in many respects an ideal. It is drawn not only from the statements, but also from the injunctions of NT, and therefore we must not suppose that it was always faithfully carried out. In fact, complaints of failings, and even cases of serious wickedness (esp. 1 Co 5<sup>11</sup>), prove that it was not so. But it was an authoritative ideal, and an ideal the acceptance of which implied a great separation from the heathen world, and was therefore one of the most potent factors in confirming the consciousness of Christian unity.

We have described the basis of Christian unity under the two headings of a common belief and a common life. It remains to see how this was strengthened by more personal means. These were (a) a common government. To its founder a Church naturally looked for guidance in the creation of its first institutions. But beyond its respect to the founder was the universal respect due to the prophet, and above all to the apostle. And the latter stood at the head of the Church government because he had derived his teaching from the Lord directly. We have, then, in the apostolic government of the Church the rule of a united band which traced its authority back to Christ. In spite of differences due to individual character and scope of work, the apostolic teaching agreed in its main outlines, so that the Church can be said to have been under the government of one common principle. (b) The intercourse between Churches. There exists no higher proof of the facilities afforded by the Roman government for travel and intercourse, than the evidence to be seen in NT of the close relations which the early Churches kept up with one another. (See esp. on this subject Th. Zahn, Skizzen aus dem Leben der alten Kirche.) This intercourse was kept up mainly by those who were travelling for the Church or on private business. Amongst the first class, of course, the apostles stand out most prominently, but only second to the extent of their journeyings comes that of their helpers and attendants. The prophets, too, were great travellers (e.g. Ac 11<sup>27</sup> etc.). As conspicuous examples of the extent of private travels we may point to the wanderings of Aquila and Priscilla, whom we find first in Italy (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>), then in succession at Corinth (ib.), Ephesus (18<sup>18</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>), Rome (?) (Ro 16<sup>5</sup>), Ephesus (2 Ti 4<sup>19</sup>); or those of Onesiphorus (2 Ti 1<sup>17-18</sup>); or the journeys involved in the collection and delivery of the Gentile collection for the poor of Judaea (e.g. Ac 11<sup>30</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>7</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>18-19</sup>), and the carriage of the apostles' letters. And besides the wanderings of official or well-known Christians, it must be remembered that there was a constant stream of other Christians moving from place to place on private business, who attached themselves to the community, and found in it a welcome and hospitality until they passed on farther (cf. Did. 12; 1 Ti 5<sup>10</sup>, He 13<sup>7</sup>). Intercourse by letter was also very frequent. A fruitful cause of this correspondence was the practice of furnishing travellers with letters of recommendation (πιστορικαί ἐπιστολαί; cf. Ac 18<sup>27</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>1</sup>). We have instances of other correspondence in the letter of the Jerusalem Church to that of Antioch (Ac 15<sup>23</sup>), and the letter of the Roman to the Corinthian Church (Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor.).

How far, then, did all this lead to the establishment of one organic unity, or of a higher unity of organization than the city-Church? We find, indeed, in a sense, an organic unity embracing the whole Church in the earliest period. In the Church of Jerus., and esp. in the apostles, is to be seen a centralization of government stretching over all the existing Church, viz. Judaea, Samaria, Galilee, and the district around Antioch, i.e. Syria and Cilicia (cf. Ac 8<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>32</sup> 11<sup>1, 2, 22</sup>). This condition of things continued nominally until the time of the conference at Jerus. (Ac 15<sup>24</sup>). But St. Paul's visit to Jerus. on this occasion (which must be taken as identical with that described in Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup>), beyond establishing the freedom of the Gentiles from circumcision, led to a further very important result. Now that a purely Gentile Church was possible, St. Paul saw that not only the separation of distance, but also in a greater degree the vast difference of life and thought, between the Pal. Jew and the ordinary Greek or Roman, made it impolitic that the centralization of power in the Church of Jerus. should continue. And the 'pillar' apostles, after convincing themselves of his authority and ability, resigned to him the care of the Gentiles, while they contented themselves with the management of the Jewish Churches (Gal 2<sup>9-10</sup>). The partition of authority here described was not regarded by either side as a rigid separation of spheres. The main work of the Apostle of the Gentiles was with Gentiles, while that of the pillar apostles was with Jews. Thus it was the practice of St. Paul to preach to the Jews first when breaking up new ground (see Ac 13-end, passim), and he occasionally, though very rarely, addressed himself to Jews in his epistles (e.g. Ro 2<sup>17</sup>). Again we find St. Peter active at Antioch (Gal 2<sup>11</sup>), Corinth (?) (1 Co 1<sup>12</sup>), and Rome. St. James addressed his Epistle to the Jews of the Dispersion, 1<sup>1</sup>; and 1 P is addressed, not only to Jews, but also to Gentiles throughout Asia Minor (cf. 1<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>8</sup>) at a time when St. Paul was probably still living. Nor was the separation accompanied by any bitterness in the relations between the two parties. The pillar apostles gave to St. Paul and Barnabas the 'right hand of fellowship.' These promised in turn to remember the poor of Judaea, and we know that the promise was faithfully kept. St. Paul always speaks with deep affection and respect of the Judæan Christians (e.g. 1 Th 2<sup>14</sup>, Ro 15<sup>27</sup>). The momentary break with St. Peter (Gal 2<sup>11</sup>), and the efforts of some to exaggerate and prolong its effects (1 Co 1<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>22</sup>), did not impede his recognition of the deeper truth, that all differences found their unity in Christ (3<sup>11</sup>).

Within these two great divisions, each of which had something of an organic unity in its common rule, resulting to a large extent in common practice (e.g. 1 Co 11<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>20</sup>), appear smaller divisions, according to the Roman provinces. Such are the Churches of Judaea (Gal 1<sup>22</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>14</sup>), Galatia (Gal 1<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>), Macedonia (2 Co 8<sup>1</sup>), Achaia (Ro 15<sup>23</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>2</sup>), Asia (1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>), Syria and Cilicia (Ac 15<sup>23</sup>, 41). This grouping was also something more than a mere form of speech. The Churches of Galatia (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>), Macedonia (2 Co 8<sup>19</sup>), and Achaia (1 Co 16<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 8-9) each formed a separate whole for the purposes of gathering and delivering to Jerus. the collection for the poor of Judaea. Officers were appointed by each province to act for and represent the province in this respect (1 Co 16<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>18</sup>, 23). St. Paul particularly notes the close and affectionate relationship which bound together the Macedonian Churches (1 Th 4<sup>10</sup>).

These provincial Churches (it is to be noted that ἐκκλησία is never used of the Church of a province, but always ἐκκλησίαι, 'the Churches') had their natural centre in the capital city (e.g. Corinth, 2 Co 1<sup>1</sup>; Ephesus, Ac 19<sup>10</sup>; cf. Rev 2<sup>1</sup> where it comes first in the list of the seven Churches). At a later period these districts were in some cases temporarily put under the authority of an apostolic delegate, e.g. Timothy in Asia (1 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>), Titus in Crete (Tit 1<sup>5</sup>). At the end of the apostolic age we find the Churches of Asia under the guidance of St. John (Rev 1<sup>4</sup>).

The extent of the apostolic Church included Palestine, Phœnicia (Ac 15<sup>3</sup>), Syria (the region around Antioch), Asia Minor (1 P 1<sup>1</sup>), Macedonia, Achaia, Illyricum (Ro 15<sup>19</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>), Italy (Ac 28<sup>14</sup>), Crete, and Cyprus. Thus much we know from certain evidence in NT. But there were doubtless many other Churches which are not mentioned, and which, nevertheless, were founded before the close of the NT period. It is quite probable that St. Paul himself preached in Spain (cf. Ro 15<sup>24</sup>, 28; Clem. Rom. ad Cor. 5; Murat. Fragment, l. 38). The Church of Alexandria ascribed its foundation to St. Mark (Eus. HE ii. 16, 21; Epiph. Har. li. 6; Jer. de vir. illust. 8; Nicephorus, HE ii. 43; Acta Barnabæ). And without setting any value on the traditions (e.g. in Eus. HE i. 13, iii. 1) current in the later Church, we may well refrain from drawing any arguments from the silence of NT in this respect.

III. THE IDEAL CHURCH.—So far as we have proceeded hitherto, we have considered the word ἐκκλησία always in the sense of the Christian body in its actual state of imperfection. We come now to a conception of the Church in which the empirical idea disappears and an ideal Church appears, still capable of progress, indeed, in some of the similes under which it is depicted (e.g. Eph 4<sup>16</sup>), but free from all the negative elements of evil. From one point of view, every Christian can be regarded as perfect. He was washed by baptism from every stain (cf. 1 Co 6<sup>11</sup>, He 10<sup>14</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>9</sup>), and from henceforth is holy (ἅγιος). The Christians are 'the saints' (οἱ ἅγιοι). So the distinction of the ideal from the actual body of Christians was a thought which lay near at hand. It is the actual Church to which reproof and blame are addressed; the ideal which 'shall judge the world,' 1 Co 6<sup>2</sup>. It is the actual Church upon the foundation of which some build badly and some well (1 Co 3<sup>10-15</sup>), the 'great house' in which some are 'vessels unto honour' and some 'vessels unto dishonour' (2 Ti 2<sup>20</sup>); it is the ideal which is a 'holy temple of God' (ναὸς=shrine) (1 Co 3<sup>17</sup>), sanctified and cleansed by 'the washing of water with the word . . . a glorious Church not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing . . . holy and without blemish' (Eph 5<sup>26, 27</sup>). The metaphors under which the ideal Church is spoken of, and its relation to Christ expressed, are of three kinds—(a) the Church as a building, (b) the Church as a body (σῶμα), (c) the Church as a bride.

(1) The Church as a Building.—This very natural comparison is, according to St. Matt., as old as the time of Christ Himself (Mt 16<sup>18</sup> 'On this rock I will build my Church'). St. Paul (1 Co 3<sup>10-15</sup>) compares the growth of the Corinthian community with that of a building, of which he himself laid the foundation, and upon which others are building. He then (still referring primarily to the Corinthian community) passes directly in v. 16 to the idea of the finished building, 'Ye are a temple of God.' The word used for 'temple,' ναὸς, means properly an inner shrine or sanctuary, and St. Paul evidently has in his mind the Holy of Holies in the temple at Jerusalem where 'the Lord sitteth upon the cherubims' (2 K 19<sup>16</sup>), as the Holy Ghost has His shrine in the ἐκκλησία (cf. 2 Co 6<sup>16</sup>), and for the same thought in regard to the individual believer 1 Co 6<sup>19</sup>). Then follows in the Ephesian Ep. the conception of the whole Church as a 'holy temple,' a 'habitation of God' in which the individual Christians or communities are the parts, each fitting into his proper place and the whole held together by Christ, the chief cornerstone (Eph 2<sup>20, 22</sup>). Here, where the thought is that in Christ Jew and Gentile are made one building by the breaking down of the 'middle wall of partition' (v. 14), Christ is the cornerstone and the apostles and prophets the foundation. But in 1 Co 3<sup>10</sup>, where the thought is the building up of the community, Christ is the foundation, and the apostles, etc., the builders.

(2) The Church as a Body (σῶμα).—The idea of the Christian unity in Christ seems to have suggested the comparison of the society to a human body, in which the individuals are members, each performing, according to his 'gift,' his proper function, and accepting his proper position (Ro 12<sup>5</sup>). Then comes the identification of this Christian body with the body of Christ (1 Co 12<sup>12, 27</sup>, cf. 6<sup>19</sup>, Jn 15<sup>1, 4</sup>), a conception which culminates in the idea of the believers all partaking in the one body of Christ in the Eucharist (1 Co 10<sup>17</sup>, Jn 6<sup>51, 56</sup>). Not until the later Epp. is the ἐκκλησία called outright the 'body of Christ' (Eph 1<sup>23</sup> 4<sup>12</sup> 5<sup>23</sup>, Col 1<sup>18</sup> 2<sup>19</sup>). In the earlier Epp. it is the vaguer 'we,' 'you,' i.e. primarily the community to which the apostle is writing, although the secondary idea of the whole Church was probably also present to his mind (Ro 12<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>13, 27</sup>, cf. 6<sup>19</sup>). In this relation Christ is sometimes identified with the whole body (1 Co 12<sup>13, 27</sup>), but in the later Epp. He is called the Head, as the guardian and director (Eph 5<sup>23, 24</sup>), as the source of its life, filling it with His fulness (Eph 1<sup>23</sup>), as the centre of its unity and the cause of its growth (Eph 4<sup>16</sup>, Col 2<sup>19</sup>). These last two passages represent the actual Church as growing gradually to this ideal perfection.

(3) The Church as a Bride.—We have to do here, not only with an ideal conception, but also with the further step of a personification. The comparison of the single community to a virgin is found first in 2 Co 11<sup>2</sup> 'I espoused you to one husband that I might present you as a pure virgin to Christ.' Here the idea of Christ as the bridegroom is also present. The expressions ἡ συνηλεκτή (1 P 5<sup>13</sup>), ἡ ἐκλεκτή ἀδελφὴ (2 Jn 13), ἡ ἐκλεκτὴ κυρία (Jb. 1), are also applied to single communities. But the application of this personification to the whole Church as the Bride of Christ is a step beyond these. We are here, says St. Paul (Eph 5<sup>22</sup>), face to face with a great mystery. Man and wife become one flesh, so that a man should love his wife as his own body. The Church is the Bride of Christ; the two are one body, just as man and wife are one body; and as Christ loved the Church and gave Himself up for it, so the husband should love his wife. We see here how closely connected is this conception with that of the Church as the body of Christ. The union of the two ideas is seen also in the relation of the individual Christian to Christ (1 Co 6<sup>15, 17</sup>). As man and wife become one flesh, so he who cleaveth to Christ (the expression ὁ κολλημένος τῷ Κυρίῳ is parallel to ὁ κολλημένος τῇ πόρῃ) becomes one 'spirit' (πνεῦμα) with Him, and belongs to His (spiritual) body,—'your bodies are members (μέλη) of Christ.' The idea of the Church as bride is found also in the imagery of the Apocalypse. The marriage table is spread (Rev 19<sup>7</sup>), the bride is arrayed in fine linen, 'which is the righteous acts of the saints' (Jb. 8). In c. 20 the powers of evil are bound or destroyed, and the New Jerusalem comes down out of heaven as a 'bride adorned for her husband' (21<sup>2</sup>); 'she is the Bride, the wife of the Lamb' (Jb. 9, cf. 22<sup>17</sup>).

SUMMARY.—Such were the life and teaching of the Church in NT times. If we compare them with that of the succeeding age, two features stand out as specially characteristic of the earlier period. The first is the much more vivid consciousness of the power and presence of God in His Church. The apostles, who were daily with them, had all been in close contact with the Lord, and most of them during a period of some years. The risen Lord was to them a living memory, and they imparted to the Church the force of that memory in all its freshness. The power of the Holy Ghost also was a fact of which men were more directly conscious in themselves than at any other time. Never have the central truths of Christianity—the position of Christ and the significance of His death—been more powerfully realized, and at no time has the Christian life in its practice been more closely connected with, and derived from, that belief. To the fixed apostolic tradition of doctrine and life all succeeding ages have looked as their authority. But in the strongest contrast with this fixedness of doctrine and moral life, stands the freedom from formal conditions in questions outside these. Thus, if we turn to the organization we notice the informal way in which offices grew up, and the comparative absence (until the close of the period) of a fixed division of labour. It is characteristic also of the time, that most of the technical terms are used also in a general sense, e.g. πρόεδρος, διάκονος (διακονία, διακονίω) διδάσκαλος. Or, if we turn to the worship, we are struck by the freedom of speech, the absence of exclusive ministerial rights, of a formal liturgy and fixed ritual, except in the case of baptism, laying on of hands, and the Eucharist. In the transition period immediately following the apostolic age came the fixing of organization with its clear-cut division of labour, and the stereotyping of liturgies and ritual. And along with these developments came, at once their cause and their effect, the decline of the prophet and prophecy.

CHURCH GOVERNMENT IN THE APOSTOLIC AGE.

—Our knowledge of Church government in the apostolic age comes almost entirely from the NT. We can glean something from Clement and the Teaching; but with Ignatius we are already in a new age, and later writers are too full of later ideas to help us much. Besides this, things were in a fluid and transitional state, complicated on one side by the indefinite authority held in reserve by the apostles, on the other by the ministry of gifts, which was crossed, but not yet displaced, by the local ministry of office.

The general development is clear, though its later stages may fall outside NT times. The apostles were of necessity the first rulers of the Church; then were added gradually divers local and unlocal rulers; then the unlocal died out, and the local settled down into the three permanent orders of bishops, elders, and deacons. The chief disputed questions are of the origin of the local ministry, of its relation to the other, and of the time and manner in which it settled down.

Twice over St. Paul gives something like a list of the chief persons of the Church. In 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup> he counts up 'first, apostles; second, prophets; third, teachers; then powers; then gifts of healings, helps, governments, kinds of tongues.' A few years later (Eph 4<sup>11</sup>) his list of gifts for work of service (διακονία) is 'some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers.' At the head, then, of both lists is the Apostle. The apostles were not limited to the Eleven, or to the number twelve. Whether our Lord ever recognized Matthias or not, Paul and Barnabas (e.g. 1 Co 9<sup>6</sup>) were certainly apostles, and we may safely add (Gal 1<sup>10</sup>) James the Lord's brother. There are traces of others, and the old disciples Andronicus and Junias (Ro 16<sup>7</sup>) even seem to be called 'notable' apostles. On the other hand, Timothy is tacitly (2 Co 1<sup>1</sup>) excluded. The apostle's qualification was first and foremost to have seen (Ac 1<sup>22</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>1-2</sup>) the risen Lord, and to have been sent out by Him; secondly, to have wrought (2 Co 12<sup>12</sup>) 'the apostle's signs.' His work was to bear witness of the things he had seen and heard (e.g. Ac 1<sup>8</sup>)—in short, to preach; and this implied the founding and general care of Churches, though not their ordinary administration. St. Paul interferes only with gross errors or with corporate disorder; and he does not advise the Corinthians on further questions without hinting that they might have settled them for themselves. His mission was (1 Co 1<sup>17</sup>) simply to preach, so that he had no local ties, but moved from city to city, sometimes working for a while from a centre, but more commonly moving about.

Next to the apostle comes the Prophet. He, too, sustained the Church, and shared with him (Eph 2<sup>20</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>) the revelation of the mystery. He spoke 'in the Spirit' words of warning, of comfort, or it might be of prediction. His work was universal like the apostle's, but he was not like him an eye-witness of the resurrection, so that he needed not to have 'seen the Lord.' Nor did 'the care of all the Churches' rest on him. His office, so far as we know, was purely spiritual, and there is nowhere any hint that he took a share in the administration of the Churches. Women, too, might prophesy, like Philip's daughters (Ac 21<sup>9</sup>) at Caesarea, or the mystic Jezebel (Rev 2<sup>20</sup>) at Thyatira. Yet even in the apostolic age we see the beginnings (1 Th 5<sup>20</sup>) of discredit, and false prophets flourishing (2 P, Jude). After the prophet comes a group of preachers, followed in 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup> by special 'gifts of healings, helps, governments, kinds of tongues.'

It will be seen that the lists leave no place for a ministry of special gifts, and leave no place for an ordinary local ministry of office, unless it comes in under 'helps and governments,' or 'pastors and teachers.' Any such ministry must therefore have been subordinate to the other: yet there is ample proof that one existed from a very early time. We have (1) the appointment of the Seven in Ac 6: (2) elders at Jerusalem in 44, in 50, and again in 58; mentioned by James and Peter; appointed by Paul and Barnabas in every Church about 48; at Ephesus in 58: (3) bishops and deacons at Philippi in 63; Phœbe a deaconess at Cenchreae in 58. Also (4) in the Pastoral Epistles, Timothy and Titus are in charge of four distinct orders of bishops (or elders), deacons, deaconesses (1 Ti 3<sup>11</sup> γυναῖκας, not τάς γυναῖκας, cannot be the wives of deacons), and widows. This great development, which some think points to a much later date, seems fairly accounted for by the vigorous growth of Church life and the need of organization which must have been felt near the end of the apostolic age. To complete our statement of the evidence, we may add (5) the νεώτεροι who carried out Ananias (Ac 5<sup>4</sup>), though the tacit contrast with πρεσβύτεροι is clearly one of age, not of office, for we note that νεανίσκοι buried Sapphira; (6) the prominent position of James at Jerus. in 44 (Ac 12<sup>17</sup>), in 50, and in 58; and (7) of Timothy and Titus at Ephesus and in Crete; (8) the indefinite rulers (ἡγούμενοι) of an unknown Church (He 13<sup>7-17</sup>) of Heb. Christians shortly before 70; and (9) the angels of the seven Churches in Asia.

Our questions may be conveniently grouped round the later orders of bishops, elders, and deacons—taken, however, in reverse order.

i. DEACONS.—The traditional view, that the choice of the Seven in Ac 6 is the formal institution of a permanent order of deacons, does not seem unassailable. The opinion of Irenæus, Cyprian, and later writers is not decisive on a question of this kind; and the vague word διακονία (used too in the context of the apostles themselves) is more than balanced by the avoidance of the word deacon in the Ac (e.g. 21<sup>8</sup> Φιλιππου τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ υἱοῦ ἐκ τῶν ἐπτά). If we add that the Seven seem to rank next in the Church to the apostles, we may be tempted to see in them (if they are a permanent office at all) the elders whom we find at Jerus. in precisely this position from 44 onward. In this case we are thrown back on the Philippian Church in 63 for the first mention of deacons. As, however, Phœbe (Ro 16<sup>1</sup>) was deaconess at Cenchreae in 58, there were probably deacons before this at Corinth, though there is no trace of them in St. Paul's Epistles to that Church.

ii. ELDERS.—We first find elders at Jerus. (Ac 11<sup>30</sup>) receiving the offerings from Barnabas and Saul in 44. They are joined (15<sup>6</sup>) with the apostles at the Conference in 50, and with James in 58 (21<sup>18</sup>). As Paul and Barnabas appoint elders (14<sup>23</sup>) in every city on their first missionary journey, we may infer that Churches generally had elders, though there is no other express mention of them before 1 Peter and the Pastoral Epistles, unless we adopt an early date for Ja 5<sup>4</sup>, where, however, it is not certain that the word is official.

The difference of name between elders and bishops may point to some difference of origin or function; but in NT (and Clement) the terms are more or less equivalent. Thus the elders of Ephesus are reminded (Ac 20<sup>28</sup>) that they are bishops. So, too, we find sundry bishops in the single Church of Philippi. In the Pastoral Epistles, Timothy appoints bishops and deacons, Titus elders and deacons, though (1 Ti 5<sup>17</sup>) Timothy also has elders under him. The qualifications also of a bishop as laid down for Timothy are practically those of the elder as described to Titus, and equally point to ministerial duties in contrast to what we call episcopal. Though the elder's proper duty is to 'rule' (1 Ti 5<sup>17</sup>), he does it subject to Timothy, much as a modern elder rules subject to his bishop.

iii. BISHOPS.—Is there any trace of an order of bishops in NT? The name of a bishop, as we have seen, is applied to elders; but are there permanent local officials, each ruling singly the elders of his own city? This is the definition of the bishop when he first appears distinct from his elders; and if we find this, we find a bishop, whatever he may be called. The instances commonly given are James the Lord's brother at Jerus., Timothy and Titus in Ephesus and Crete, and the angels of the seven Churches. The plural rulers (He 13<sup>7-17</sup>) of a single Church are hardly worth mention. Now, James was clearly the leading man of the Church at Jerusalem. His strictness of life and his near relation to the Lord (a more important matter with Easterns than with us) must have given him enormous influence. But influence is one thing, office is another. No doubt he had very much of a bishop's position, and his success at Jerus. may have suggested imitation elsewhere; but there is nothing recorded of him which requires us to believe that he held any definite local office. The case of Timothy and Titus is a stronger one, for we know that they appointed and governed elders like a modern bishop. But this is work which must be done in every Church, so that a man who does it is not necessarily a bishop. Neither Timothy nor Titus is a permanent official, and Titus is not connected with any particular city. They are rather temporary vicars-apostolic, sent on special missions to Ephesus and Crete. The letters by which we know them are (2 Ti 4<sup>9</sup>, Tit 3<sup>12</sup>) letters of recall; and there is no serious evidence that they ever saw Ephesus and Crete again. Titus is last heard of (2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>) in Dalmatia, Timothy from the writer to the Hebrews (13<sup>23</sup>), a work which there is no reason to connect with Ephesus. There remain the angels of the seven Churches; and it would be very bold to take these for literal bishops. In addition to the general presumption from the symbolic character of the Apoc., there is the particular argument that 'the woman Jezebel' at Thyatira (Rev 2<sup>20</sup>)—the reading τὴν γυναῖκα σου would make her the angel's wife) can hardly be taken literally. Moreover, these angels are praised and blamed for the doings of their Churches in a way no literal bishop justly can be. It is safer to take them as personifications of the Churches.

Our general conclusion is, that while we find deacons and elders (or bishops in NT sense) in the apostolic age, there is no clear trace of bishops (in the later sense), or of any apostolic ordinance that every Church was to have its bishop. This conclusion is fully confirmed by Clement and Ignatius. If Corinth had had a bishop in Clement's time, or been remarkable or blameworthy in having no bishop, we should scarcely have failed to hear of it in a letter called forth by the unjust deposition of certain elders. Instead of this, it seems clear that the elders at Corinth had no authority of any sort over them to compose their quarrels. Ignatius certainly uses the most emphatic language in urging obedience to the bishop; but the greater his emphasis the more significant is the absence of any appeal (Trall. 7 is not one) to any institution of an order of bishops by the apostles. The absence of an argument which would have rendered all the rest superfluous, seems nothing less than an admission that he knew of no such institution.

Nevertheless, his earnestness implies apostolic sanction. Episcopacy must have originated before the apostles had all passed away; and its early strength in Asia cannot well be explained without some encouragement from St. John. But it must have been at first local and partial, and due perhaps to more causes than one. On one side, the need of firmer government after the apostles and prophets died out, would often tend to raise the chairman of the elders into something like a bishop's position; on the other, vicars-apostolic of the type of Timothy might occasionally be left stranded by the apostle's death, and if they remained at their post would settle down into genuine bishops. See also Hort, Christian Ecclesia (1897), published too late for use in this article.

CHURCHES, ROBBERS OF, is the misleading rendering in AV Ac 19<sup>37</sup> of the word τεράσται (applying the word 'churches' in the wider old Eng. sense to pagan temples), while in RV the rendering is 'robbers of temples'; but both are unsatisfactory. The secretary of the city (γραμματεὶς τῆς πόλεως) of Ephesus points out to the riotous assembly in the theatre that St. Paul and his friends are not guilty of sacrilege, the category of crime under which it was natural for St. Paul's accusers to bring his action. After the word ἀσέβεια had been appropriated to translate the Rom. legal term læsa majestas 'treason,' τεροσύνη was the natural rendering for the Lat. sacrilegium; and here for emphasis the speaker uses the double term οὐτε τεροσύλους οὐτε βλασφημοῦντας τὴν θείαν, which implies 'guilty neither in act nor in language of disrespect to the established religion of our city.'

In 2 Mac 4<sup>2</sup> the epithet 'church-robber' (AV, 'author of the sacrilege' RV) is applied to Lysimachus, brother of Menelaus the high priest, who perished in a riot (B.C. 170) provoked by the theft of sacred vessels committed by his brother and himself.

CHURCHES, SEVEN.—See REVELATION.

CHURL.—The Saxons made three degrees of free-men; to wit—an earl, athane, and a churl—Risdon (1630). And soon 'churl' and 'churlish' were applied to any boorish person. In this sense churlish is used of Nabal, 1 S 25<sup>3</sup>, and of Nicanor 2 Mac 14<sup>30</sup>. But 'churlish' as applied to Nabal being popularly taken in the sense of niggardly, helped to give the meaning of niggard, miser, to 'churl.' In this sense alone churl occurs, 1s 32<sup>7</sup>, though the Heb. (חָרֵל, חָרֵל) probably means crafty (so RVm) or fraudulent (Vulg.). J. HASTINGS.

CHUSI (חוּסִי B, חוּסִי A).—Jth 7<sup>18</sup> mentioned with Ekrebel (Akrabeh) is possibly Kūzah, 5 miles S. of Shechem and 5 miles W. of 'Akrabeh. See SWP vol. ii. sh. xiv. C. R. CONDER.

CIELED, CIELING.—This is the spelling of the Camb. ed. of AV of 1629, the ed. of 1611 having sieled and sieeling in all the passages. Amer. RV prefers the mod. cieled, ceiling. Wright (Bible Word Book<sup>2</sup>, p. 134) identifies the word with seel, to close a hawk's eyes, and quotes—

'But when we in our viciousness grow hard,
O misery on't!—the wise gods seel our eyes.
Shaks. Ant. and Cleop. iii. xlii. 112.

'Come, seeling night,
Scarf up the tender eye of pitiful day.'
Macbeth, iii. ii. 46.

But Skeat (Etymol. Dict.<sup>2</sup> s.v.) denies the identification or connexion. Ciel, he holds, is from calum, 'heaven,' 'sky,' and has no connexion with sill, seal, or seel. Its meaning, therefore, is 'a canopy'; then, as vb., 'to canopy' or 'cover'; and the only meaning in AV, as in mod. Eng., viz. to cover with timber or plaster, i.e. wainscot, is a later derivation. The Heb. always means 'to cover.' In Dt 33<sup>21</sup> AVm gives 'cieled' (text, 'seated,' RV 'reserved,' the Heb. being šāphan 'to panel' [see Driver's note and Add. in Deut<sup>2</sup> ad loc.], trd 'ciel' in Jer 22<sup>14</sup>, Hag 1<sup>9</sup>). The 'cieeling' (only 1 K 6<sup>15</sup>, Ezk 41<sup>16m</sup>) is any part cieled, walls as well as roof, the roof indeed being formerly distinguished as 'the upper ceiling.'

CILICIA (Κιλικία), a country in the S.E. corner of Asia Minor, on the coast, adjoining Syria, always closely connected with Syria in manners, religion, and nationality, and generally more closely united with Syria than with Asia Minor in political and in Byzantine ecclesiastical arrangement. It was commonly divided into two territories—(1) on the W. (reaching as far as Pamphylia), Cilicia Tracheia (Aspera), a land of lofty and rugged mountains, drained by the considerable river Calycadnus; (2) on the E., Cilicia Pedias (Campestris), a low-lying and very fertile plain between the sea and the mountain ranges Taurus and Amanus. The entire double country is summed up as C. in Ac 27<sup>5</sup>, a geographical description of the lands touching the Cyprian Sea. But elsewhere it is clear that only the civilized and peaceful C. Pedias (in other words, the part subject to Roman rule) is intended when C. is mentioned in NT, whereas C. Tracheia was inhabited by fierce and dangerous tribes, loosely ruled by king Archelaus of Cappadocia from B.C. 20 to A.D. 17, and by king Antiochus of Commagene from A.D. 37 to 74. C. Pedias had been Roman territory from B.C. 103; and, after many changing arrangements for its administration, it was merged by Augustus in the great joint province Syria-Cilicia-Phoenice probably in B.C. 27; and this system probably lasted through the 1st cent. after Christ (though temporary variations may possibly have occurred). Hence Syria and C. are mentioned together in such a way as to imply close connexion in Gal 1<sup>3</sup>, Ac 15<sup>23, 41</sup>; the combined Rom. province is there meant, over which the influence of Christianity spread from the two centres, Tarsus in C. and, above all, Antioch in Syria. The close connexion of C. with Syria arose from two causes—(1) C. communicates with it by a very easy pass, the 'Syrian Gates' (Pylæ Syriæ, Beilan, summit level 1980 ft.), whereas the passes crossing Taurus into Lycania and Cappadocia are all difficult, incomparably the best being the 'Cilician Gates' (Pylæ Ciliciæ, Gulek Boghaz, summit level 4300 ft.); (2) C. Pedias was long separated from Roman territory on the W. and N. by a great extent of independent country, while it adjoined Rom. Syria. C. has been identified wrongly with the Tarshish which is so often mentioned in OT (Gn 10<sup>4</sup> etc.), by some modern scholars, following Jos. Ant. (I. vi. 1), who says that C. was originally called Θαρσός.

That a large Jewish population existed in C. is evident from Ac 6<sup>9</sup>; and it is rather strange that Cilician Jews are not mentioned in Ac 2<sup>9-11</sup>. The existence of Jewish colonists in the Seleucid cities of C. would be in itself highly probable, for they were always the most faithful and trusted adherents of the Seleucid kings in their foreign settlements; and the Cilician Jews are alluded to by Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, § 36 (ii. p. 587, Mang.). St. Paul had the rights of a citizen of Tarsus (which see), as he mentions in Ac 21<sup>39</sup>; these rights must have been inherited, and they imply, beyond doubt, that there was a colony of Jews forming part of the Tarsian State. An interesting memorial of the religious influence exerted by the Jews in C. is attested by the society of Sabbatistai, mentioned in an inscription, probably dating about the time of Christ, which was found near Elaïoussa and Korykos (see Canon Hicks in Journ. of Hellenic Studies, 1891, pp. 234-236); this society was evidently an association of non-Jews in the practice of rites modelled, in part at least, on Judaistic ceremonial.

LITERATURE.—Cilicia is very slightly described in Mommsen, Provinces of Rom. Emp. (Römische Geschichte, vol. v.) ch. viii. See Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, I. pp. 379-392; Ramsay, *Hist. Geog. CINNAMON (κιννάμωμον, κιννάμωμον, cinnamomum).—The identity of name makes it impossible to mistake the substance intended. It was early known to the Hebrews, as it entered into the composition of the holy anointing oil (Ex 30<sup>23</sup>). It is represented as being used to perfume a bed (1r 7<sup>14</sup>). The Oriental women use musk for a similar purpose. Like other tropical plants, it seems to have been cultivated in the botanical gardens of Solomon (Ca 4<sup>14</sup>). It is the product of Cinnamomum Zeylanicum, Nees, a plant of the Laurel family, indigenous in Ceylon and other E. India islands, and in China. The tree attains a height of 30 ft., and has panicle clusters of white blossoms, and ovate, acute leaves. The cinnamon is the inner bark, separated from the outer, and dried in the sun, in the shape of cylindrical rolls. The best oil is obtained by boiling the ripe fruit. In Rev 18<sup>13</sup> it is enumerated among the merchandise of the Great Babylon.

G. E. POST.

CIRCLE.—In AV c. means the vault of heaven. It occurs Is 40<sup>22</sup> 'It is he that sitteth upon the c. of the earth,' i.e. the c. overarching the earth (אָר, also in Job 22<sup>14</sup>, AV and RV 'circuit,' RVm 'vault'; 1r 8<sup>7</sup> AV 'compass,' RV 'circle'); and Wis 13<sup>2</sup> 'the c. of the stars' (κύκλος ἀστρον, RV 'circuling stars,' RVm 'c. of stars').

J. HASTINGS.

CIRCUIT occurs 4 times in AV, 1 S 7<sup>16</sup> (a late and doubtful passage acc. to which Samuel went on circuit [צָרַף] to various high-places), Job 22<sup>14</sup> (אָר RVm and Amer. RV 'vault,' i.e. the vault of heaven), Ps 19<sup>6</sup> (מַסְלַח, of the sun's course in the heavens), Ec 1<sup>4</sup> (צָרַף, of the circuits of the wind). Besides retaining these instances, RV substitutes 'made [make] a circuit' for AV 'fetch a compass' in 2 S 5<sup>23</sup> (where for MT צָרַף read with Driver and Budde צָרַף, 2 K 3<sup>9</sup>, Ac 28<sup>13</sup> (περιελθόντες, RVm 'cast loose,' following Wll περιελθόντες). See COMPASS.

CIRCUMCISION (כְּלִי Ex 4<sup>10</sup>, περιτομή Jn 7<sup>22</sup> etc.).—The cutting off of the foreskin, an initiation rite or religious ceremony among many races, such as the Jews, Arabians, and Colchians in Asia, the Egyptians, Mandingos, Gallas, Fulashas, Abyssinians, and some Bantu tribes in Africa, the Otaheitan, Tonga Islanders, and some Melanesians in Polynesia, certain New South Wales tribes in Australia, and the Athabascans, Nahuatl, Aztecs, and certain Amazonian tribes in America.

In Egypt its practice dates back at least to the 14th cent. B.C., and probably much farther. The circumcising of two children is represented on the wall of the temple of Khonsu at Karnak. The record of the invasion of Egypt by Mediterranean tribes in the time of Merenptah states that as the Aquashua (supposed to be Achaians) were circumcised, their dead were not mutilated by the Egyptians, except by cutting off a hand (Lepsius, Denkm. iii. 19).

Like other mutilations, such as tattooing, cutting off a finger-joint, filing or chiselling out of teeth, the operation may be a tribal mark. In all these there is the twofold idea of a sacrifice to the tribal god, and the marking of his followers so that they may be known by him and by each other. The sacrifice is a representative one, a part given for the redemption of the rest. Stade (ZAW, 1886) has collected a number of notices from many peoples, from which he infers that circumcision is not so much a mark of membership in a tribe as initiation into manhood and acquirement of the full rights of citizenship.

However originated, the rite is said to have been appointed by God as the token of the covenant between Him and Abraham, shortly after Abraham's sojourn in Egypt. It was ordained to be performed on himself, on his descendants and slaves, as well as on strangers joining themselves to the Heb. nation (Gn 17<sup>12</sup> etc. Ex 12<sup>48</sup> both P), to signify their participation in the benefits of the covenant and their acceptance of its obligations. It was practised by the Jews during their captivity in Egypt (Jos 5<sup>5</sup> D2), but discontinued in the wilderness. Even Moses neglected to circumcise his son (Ex 4<sup>24</sup> JE). On this occasion Zipporah recognized the cause of God's displeasure, and removed the reproach by operating (Ex 4<sup>25</sup>). She thus showed her acquaintance with the ceremony; and as she called Moses on this account a hathum of blood, which may mean one brought into a family by a blood-rite, it has been conjectured that the Jews received the rite from the Midianites. There is, however, no evidence that this was so, and it is contrary to the whole weight of tradition. As women were not permitted by the Rabbins to circumcise, the case of Zipporah is explained away in the Tosephta on Ex 4 as meaning that she caused Moses to operate.

The characteristic of Hebrew circumcision is its being performed in infancy. Wellhausen (Hist. 340) sees in Ex 4<sup>25</sup> the substitution of this for the older and more severe operation in youth or manhood. (See the same writer's Skizzen, iii. 151, 215; and cf. Nowack, Heb. Archæol. i. 167 ff.; Cheyne, art. 'Circumcision' in Encyc. Brit..)

On the arrival of the Jews in Canaan the rite was renewed at Gilgal (Jos 5<sup>3</sup>), the operation being performed at a place named Gib'ath ha'adrâlôth, or 'the hill of the fore-skins,' with flint knives, which, according to the Sept. addition to Jos 24<sup>31</sup>, were buried with Joshua. Although the ceremony is scarcely again mentioned in the historical part of OT, yet it was probably observed continuously, and there is no real ground for the statement made by the Rabbins (Yalkut on Jos), that on the separation of the two kingdoms circumcision was forbidden in Ephraim. The Midrash on La 1<sup>9</sup> conjectures that the priests were uncircumcised in the days of Zedekiah (see 1 Mac 1<sup>15</sup>); but this is doubtful.

Abraham was circumcised at the age of 99, and, according to Pirke R. Eliezer, the anniversary of the ceremony is the great Day of Atonement. Ishmael was circumcised at 13, and among Islamite nations it is performed at some age between 6 and 16, as soon as the child can pronounce the religious formulae. It is not enjoined in the Koran, but, according to the Arabian tradition, the Prophet declared it to be meritorious, though not an obligatory rite.

As Isaac was circumcised on the eighth day, so that period was named in the institution (Gn 17<sup>12</sup>), and is observed as the proper date by the Jews to this day. The child is named at the ceremony in memory of the change in Abraham's name (Lk 2<sup>21</sup>). At the present day the rite is performed either in the house of the parents or in the synagogue, and either by the father or by a Mohel or circumciser, who is usually a surgeon, and must be a Jew of unblemished character, who is not paid for his services. In former times the Rabbins preferred flint or glass knives, but now steel is almost invariably used. Blood must be shed in the operation, and the inner layer must be torn with the thumbnail; this supplemental operation is called pêr'ah, and is said to have been introduced by Joshua. The pêr'ah is peculiar to the Jewish mode of operating. In former days the flow of blood was encouraged by suction, and the bleeding stopped by wine, with which the Mohel's mouth is filled; but these practices, called by the Jews Mêzizah, are not now adopted in many places, where the operation is performed with antiseptic precautions. Chloroform may be used if the Mohel think it necessary.

The night before the rite the parents keep watch, a survival of the precautions formerly adopted to prevent the child being stolen by Lilith, the devil's mother; they are visited by their friends; and all the little children of the community are gathered together, and the teacher reads the Shema or verses from Dt 6<sup>4-9</sup> 11<sup>19-21</sup> and Nu 15<sup>37-41</sup>. On the day of the operation the child is carried to the door of the room by a lady, who is called the Baulath Berith, and is taken by a godfather or sandek, called also Baal Berith, who sits in a chair, beside which is a vacant seat dedicated to the prophet Elijah, in memorial of his jealousy for the maintenance of the covenant of which this rite is the token. The Mohel sets this chair apart with prayer, asking that the example of Elijah, the messenger of the covenant, may sustain him in his task. Prayers, according to a set form, are recited in Heb. by him, and the child's name is given, then the father and bystanders join in the recitation of formulae. After the operation a blessing is invoked by the Mohel, and the event is celebrated by feasting in the parents' house. The prayers for the occasion are set forth in the works of Bergson, Asher, Brecher, and Auerbach. The portion cut off is either burned or buried in accordance with ancient rabbinical directions.

After the defeat of Haman's plot, many are said to have been circumcised 'for fear of the Jews' (Est 8<sup>17</sup> LXX). Circumcision was also imposed by Hyrcanus upon the Idumeans (Jos. Ant. XIII. ix. 1). Occasionally Gentiles submitted to it. Elagabalus, Antoninus, and the two sons of Ptolemy Epiphanes (Midrash Bereshith) were circumcised; but in the Justinian Code the performance of the operation on a Rom. citizen was prohibited on pain of death (i. 9. 10). Antiochus Epiphanes also prohibited the rite, and many Jews were tortured and put to death on this account (1 Mac 1<sup>48</sup>, 2 Mac 6<sup>10</sup>). Similar prohibitions were issued by Hadrian and Constantius, as well as by the Spanish Inquisition in later years.

In apostolic times the Judaizing section of the Church wished to enforce circumcision on Gentile converts; and in order to avoid contention, St. Paul circumcised Timothy as he was a Jew by his mother's side (Ac 16<sup>3</sup>). He refused to perform the rite on Titus (Gal 2<sup>3</sup>), and argues in the Ep. to the Rom. (4<sup>10</sup>) that Abraham was as yet uncircumcised when God made His covenant with him. On this subject the Council of Jerusalem gave a final decision adverse to the Judaizers (Ac 15<sup>23-29</sup>). In some of the Ethiopian and Abyssinian Churches, however, the operation was continued, being the persistence of a pre-Christian ethnic practice. In the 12th cent. a short-lived Christian sect of circumcisi arose in Italy (Schrökh, Christl. Kirchengesch. xxix. 655).

Among the Jewish teachers circumcision was regarded as an operation of purification, and the word foreskin has come to be synonymous with obstinacy and imperfection. The rite was regarded as a token in the flesh of the effect of Divine grace in the heart, hence the phrases used in Dt 30<sup>6</sup>. Philo speaks of it as a symbolic inculcation of purity of heart, and having the advantage of promoting cleanliness, fruitfulness, and avoidance of disease. Jeremiah (9<sup>25-26</sup> RV) recognized that the outward rite and the inward grace do not always go together, and he groups together Egypt, Judah, and Edom as races which, though circumcised in the flesh, are uncircumcised in heart.

St. Paul also contrasts strongly the circumcision in the flesh and the purification of the spirit (Ro 2<sup>28-29</sup>), and hence in Ph 3<sup>2</sup> he calls the fleshly circumcision καταστροφή, or Concision, a paronomasia, probably indicating, as Theophylact suggests, that those who insist on the fleshly circumcision are endeavouring to cut in sunder the Church of Christ.

CISTERN (כִּסְתָּר, λάκκος, cisterna, lacus).—A tank for the collection and storage of rain-water, or, occasionally, of spring-water brought from a distance by a CONDUIT. It was always covered, and so distinguished from the POOL (כֶּתֶף, κοιμηθῆρα, piscina), which was a reservoir open to the air.

Cisterns must always have been necessary in Pal., where there are large areas ill supplied with natural springs, a long dry summer, and a small annual rainfall. They were required not only for domestic purposes, but for ceremonial ablutions, irrigation, the watering of animals, and the convenience of travellers. The cisterns in Pal. vary in size and character, and may be classified as follows: 1. Cisterns wholly excavated in the rock. These are the most ancient, and the oldest form is probably the bottle-shaped tank, with a long neck or shaft, which is common in Jerus., the Hauran, and elsewhere. Small rectangular tanks, with draw-holes, are found by the wayside and in vineyards. At Jerus. there are some very large cisterns, and in these the roofs are supported by rude rock-pillars. The finest example is the 'Great Sea' in the Haram esh-Sherif, which has several rock-pillars, and is estimated to hold 3,000,000 gallons. It derived its supply partly from surface drainage and partly from water brought by a conduit from Solomon's Pools, near Bethlehem. 2. Rock-hewn tanks with vaulted roofs are found in many localities. A few of these may possibly be as old as the 3rd cent. B.C. 3. Cisterns of masonry built in the soil are found everywhere. Some of them are of large size, and have vaulted roofs, supported by pillars arranged in parallel rows. They are of all ages, from the Rom. occupation to the present day. Most of the cisterns have their sides and floors coated with cement, which is often very hard and durable. All have one or more openings in their roofs, through which water is drawn to the surface; and many have a flight of steps leading to the floor, partly to facilitate cleansing operations. The rain-water, which falls on the flat roofs of the houses and the paved court-yards, is conveyed to the cisterns by surface gutters and pipes, and carries with it many impurities. This renders periodical cleaning necessary, as the water would otherwise become foul, full of animal life, and dangerous to health. Much of the fever and sickness so prevalent in Pal. is due to the neglected state of the cisterns.

Jer 2<sup>2</sup> alludes to the rock-hewn cisterns of Jerus., and it would appear from 2 K 18<sup>31</sup> that every house in the city had its own cistern for the collection of rain-water (cf. Pr 5<sup>16</sup>, Is 36<sup>10</sup>). One of the great works of Simon, son of Onias, was to cover the large cistern of the temple with plates of brass (Sir 50<sup>9</sup>). When a cistern was empty it formed a convenient prison. It was into one of the roadside cisterns (AV 'pit'), which had become dry, that Joseph was cast by his brethren (Gn 37<sup>20, 22, 24</sup>); and it was into a cistern in the court of the guard, near the temple, in which the muddy deposit was still soft, that Jeremiah was let down with cords (Jer 38<sup>6ff.</sup>). The custom of confining prisoners in an empty cistern is alluded to in Zec 9<sup>11</sup>; and it may be noted that the word כִּסְתָּר 'cistern' is used for the dungeon in which Joseph was confined in Egypt (Gn 40<sup>16, 41<sup>14</sup></sup>). In Ec 12<sup>8</sup> there is an allusion to the wheel used in drawing water from a cistern. Jos. mentions the rock-hewn cisterns at Masada (Ant. XIV. xiv. 6; BJ VII. viii. 3) and at Machurus (BJ VII. vi. 2), and describes those constructed in the towers of the walls of Jerus. for the collection of rain-water. In the smaller towers the cisterns were above the apartments, but in the tower Hippicus the cistern was on the solid masonry, and the apartments were built above it (BJ v. iv. 3, 4).

CITHERN.—See MUSIC.

CITIZENSHIP.—So RV for πολιτεία, Ac 22<sup>28</sup>, instead of the vague AV rendering 'freedom.' Here Claudius Lysias says that he had obtained his c. by purchase, possibly from the wife or the freedman of the Emperor Claudius whose name he bore. Cf. Dio Cass. lx. 17, where, however, it is said that the price of the franchise had fallen to a mere trifle. But the interest of civic privileges in NT lies in their importance in the career of St. Paul. Rom. citizenship was one of the special qualifications of the 'chosen vessel,' and it is a chief purpose of St. Luke (in Ac) to exhibit the apostle as a citizen who, though a Christian, receives for the most part courtesy and justice from the Rom. officials. His citizenship, however, was double, of Tarsus and of Rome. That the former did not carry with it the latter, we know from independent sources; hence a comparison of Ac 21<sup>39</sup> with 22<sup>27</sup>, by which the separateness of Tarsian and Rom. citizenship is made evident, furnishes proof of the accuracy of the narrative. Tarsus was not a 'colonia' or 'municipium,' but an 'urbs libera,' Plin. NH v. 27 (22), that is to say, a city within a Rom. province, yet enjoying self-government (Marquardt, Rom. Staatsverw. i. 349-353). St. Paul's citizenship of Tarsus was of no substantial advantage outside that city. But his Rom. citizenship availed throughout the Rom. world, including, besides private rights, (1) exemption from all degrading punishments, e.g. scourging and crucifixion; (2) right of appeal to the emperor after sentence in all cases; (3) right to be sent to Rome for trial before the emperor if charged with a capital offence (cf. Plin. Epp. x. 96; Schürer, HJ II. ii. 278). These rights, at least (1) and (3), are illustrated by Ac 16<sup>37, 22<sup>28-29</sup> 25<sup>11</sup></sup>. But there is nothing to show whether he possessed the full citizenship, including the public rights of voting and qualification for office. It was by birth that St. Paul had become a 'Roman.' The word citizen is not used in describing his status. 'Ρωμαῖος alone is enough (cf. 'cive di quella Roma onde Cristo è Romano,' Dante, Purg. xxxii. 101-2). There were several ways in which St. Paul's father or ancestor might have obtained citizenship. The most probable are by manumission (cf. Philo, Leg. ad G. § 23), or as a reward of merit bestowed by the emperor (cf. case of Jos. Vit. 76), or by purchase, in which case the contrast implied in Ac 22<sup>28</sup> would have had less force. The large number of Jews in Asia Minor who were Rom. citizens appears from the decrees quoted in Jos. Ant. XIV. x.

Lastly, the metaphorical use of the words citizen and citizenship requires notice. This use is closely connected with Plato's conception of the heavenly city (Rep. ix. 592 B), and with later Stoic thought. It appears in Ph 3<sup>30</sup>, where for 'conversation' we should substitute 'commonwealth' (RVm). See parallels given by Lightfoot, in loc. Saints on earth are to live as worthy citizens of the heavenly commonwealth (Ph 1<sup>27</sup> RVm). The conception of the Church, not as a kingdom subjugating the world, but as a commonwealth gradually extending its citizenship to other lands and alien tribes (cf. Eph 2<sup>12</sup> and Ps 87), and thus making them fellow-citizens with the saints (Eph 2<sup>19</sup>), ran parallel with the extension of Rom. citizenship which was going on at the time, and was to culminate in the inclusion of all Rom. subjects by the edict of Caracalla (A.D. 212). The preference for 'Civitas Dei' over 'Regnum Dei,' as the aspect of the Church and of its goal, was, however, also due to OT influence. The picture of the restored Jerus. in Is 60-62 combined easily with the Platonic 'pattern' of a heavenly city, and it is this combination in varying proportions which we have before us in He 11, 12, and 13, in the 'Jerusalem which is above' of Gal 4<sup>26</sup>, and, perhaps, in Rev 21.

It is worth noticing that it is only in the writings of St. Luke, thorough Greek as he was, that the word 'citizen' occurs, Lk 15<sup>19</sup> 19<sup>14</sup> (add RV reading in a LXX quotation in He 8<sup>11</sup>).

E. R. BERNARD.

CITY (עיר, palais).—1. Origin.—The Oriental city owed nothing to organized manufacture, and was only in a few instances, such as Arvad, Sidon, Tyre, and Joppa, dependent upon maritime trade. It was a creation of agriculture, which was an outcome of the pastoral life. As the country settled down to the cultivation of the soil, the peasantry found themselves in constant danger from the wandering tribes of the desert, who often sent their flocks among the standing crops, and carried off the cattle and grain. The necessity of protecting life and property from such enemies was the chief factor in the creation of the village, out of which in turn grew the city. These would naturally be found near those who could protect them, or in grain-growing districts, or in positions of natural strength and in possession of a sufficient water-supply. Hence the village or town was often named from the local well (Beer-, En-), the hill on which it was built (Gibeah-), or its sanctity as 'a high place' (Baal-), or became distinguished by the name of its ruling family, or of some conspicuous house (Beth-).

2. Development.—The city grew out of the village, as the village owed its origin to the house. The expansion was on the same lines as that of the nation from the tribe, and the tribe from the family. Looking, therefore, to these ultimate factors, we find that each house had its ba'al or lord, and under him the family was an independent organism, seeking its own livelihood and welfare. An act of hospitality to a stranger gave him the sacred privileges of the family guild, and the sanctity of the guest became the right of later citizenship. The gradual slackening of this bond is given in the Arab. proverb, 'My brother and I against my cousin, my cousin and I against the stranger.'

These two facts of authority and combination made up the aristocratic and democratic elements of the village and city. It might be under the protection of a feudal lord living in a fortress around which the city clustered, or near which it was built; or it might depend entirely upon its own wall and the courage and fidelity of its inhabitants. The agricultural life of Palestine knew nothing of separate farmsteads dotting the landscape. The peasants had to retire for the night to the village, like the sheep to the fold. It was customary for the smaller villages to recognize the motherhood or superior protection of a large city. Thus the inhabitants of Laish looked to Zidon the Great (Jg 18<sup>28</sup>), and at the present day every inhabitant of Syria is considered to belong to Esh-Shâm (Damascus). Hence the expression 'cities and their villages,' 'cities and their daughters,' in Nu 21<sup>25</sup> 32<sup>42</sup>, Jos 15 and 19. The feudal lords or the superior cities, in return for protection offered against nomad invasions and other dangers, received payment in service and produce (see Taxes). The service rendered by the peasant to his superior was originally of the nature of a son's obedience to the father's command, and passed eventually into corvée labour.*

3. Characteristics.—The chief feature of an Oriental city was its wall. This gave it the right to be so named (Lv 25<sup>30</sup>), though in later times the title turned upon the ecclesiastical distinction of having ten men of leisure and suitability for the services of the synagogue. The wall had one or more gates, which were closed from sunset to sunrise; hence the explanation of their remaining open where there is no night (Rev 21<sup>25</sup>). All within the wall were of one mind, pledged to obey the laws of the city, and seek the welfare of its inhabitants. The newspaper office and court of tribunal were found at the city gate by which strangers entered and the inhabitants went out to their daily occupation in the fields. Domestic news circulated around the fountain while the women waited their turn to fill the water-jar. The bank was represented by the seat of the money-changer, while our modern factories of organized labour appeared as special streets allocated to special trades. This last arrangement was due to the different artisan guilds, in which the son usually followed the occupation of his father; it was also of fiscal convenience in the collection of taxes through a recognized and responsible head. On occasions of general taxation, each man, wherever he might be living and working, was reckoned as still belonging to the city of his birth. Thus Joseph went up from Nazareth to Bethlehem, the city of his family (Lk 2<sup>4</sup>).

In an Oriental city each house had its own inviolability, its power to admit and exclude. The passer-by in the narrow street could know nothing of what was going on within those dead walls, with their windows and balconies all opening on the central court. He was as much outside as the dog at his feet. It is probable that the streets of Oriental towns have always by preference been narrow, sufficient for the foot passenger and baggage-animal, and affording shelter from the sun to the merchants and tradesmen. Such are the streets of Hebron and Zidon; and in Damascus the 'street called straight' (Ac 9<sup>11</sup>), once a broad Roman carriage-way, with a foot-path on each side of the stately colonnade, now shows a return to the Oriental type.

Again, each quarter of a large city might have its own homogeneity. At the present day the distinction is generally a religious one, as Christian, Jewish, Moslem; or of race, as Western and Oriental. In Damascus, for example, the ringing of an alarm bell in the Greek church can cause the gates of the Christian quarter to be closed, and the district in a few minutes to assume the character of a fortress.

* Any payment made from time to time by the Emir or Sheikh was of the undefined nature of a gratuity, the term for which in Arabic, fuḍl-in-Na'amah, is the equivalent of St. Paul's 'exceeding riches of grace.'

Then, lastly, the entire city, with its massive girdling wall, had the attitude both of friendly enclosure and hostile exclusion.

DAMASCUS CITY-GATE—ENTRANCE TO STRAIGHT STREET.

The chief meanings of an Oriental city are thus found to be Safety, Society, Service. Thus we read in Ps 107 of 'a city to dwell in,' 'a city of habitations,' around which men 'sow fields' (vv. 4, 36, 37). Abraham, dwelling in his black movable tent, journeyed by faith towards a fair city 'which hath foundations' (He 11<sup>10</sup>). In Rev 21, 22 these various features appear as borrowed from the green earth in the glorified vision of the Holy City. 'There the tabernacle of God is with men; the city has its wall and gates; as an extended family-house it has 'foundations' like the special cornerstone; it is a place of safety into which the nations bring their glory and honour; it has its own fountain-head supply of water, and abundant means of sustaining life; there the servants serve their Lord; and all who are hostile to its order and interests shall in no wise enter into it. CLAUDIA (Κλαυδία).—A Christian lady at Rome, who, with Eubulus, Pudens, and Linus, was on intimate terms of friendship with St. Paul and Timothy at the time of St. Paul's second imprisonment (2 Ti 4<sup>21</sup>). The name suggests a connexion with the imperial household, but whether as a member of the gens Claudia or as a slave there is nothing to decide. Tradition treats her as the mother or, less probably, the sister of Linus (Apost. Const. vii. 46, Αἰὼς ὁ Κλαυδίας); she may also have become wife of Pudens, if they are to be identified with Claudius Pudens and Claudia Quinetilla, whose inscription to the memory of their infant child has been found between Rome and Ostia (CIL vi. 15,066). Another very ingenious but precarious conjecture identifies her with Claudia Rufina, wife of Martial's friend, Aulus Pudens (Martial, Epigr. iv. 13, xi. 53). On this theory she would be of British origin, a lady of high character and cultivation, and the mother of three sons; perhaps the daughter of the British king Tiberius Claudius Cogidubnus, who had taken the name of Rufina from Pomponia, the wife of Aulus Plautus, the Roman commander in Britain, and had come to Rome in her train (T. Williams, Claudia and Pudens, Ilandoverly, 1848; E. H. Plumptre in Ellicott, N.T. Comm. ii. p. 185; but against the theory, Lightfoot, Apost. Fathers, Clem. i. pp. 29 and 76-79). W. Lock.

CLAUDIUS (Κλαύδιος), the name by which the fourth emperor of Rome is commonly known. Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus was the son of Nero Claudius Drusus and of Antonia, whose mother, Octavia, was a sister of the emperor Augustus. Born at Lyons on 1st August, B.C. 10, he was of weak health and apparently feeble intellect (see the opinion of Augustus as given in Suet. Claud. 4, and the excuse of C. himself in Suet. Claud. 38); consequently he was kept in retirement, without being allowed to hold any but unimportant offices, until the reign of Gaius, while the honours conferred upon him by the latter would scarcely seem to have been seriously meant. His time was occupied in historical and literary studies, as well as in less creditable occupations (Suet. Claud. 33, 41-42), until the praetorian guards, by a freak which disappointed all previous expectations (cf. Tac. Ann. iii. 18, 7), raised him to the principate on 24th Jan. A.D. 41—a position which he occupied until he was murdered by his wife Agrippina, on 12th Oct. 54.

Recent inquiry has conclusively shown that the government of the Roman Empire under Claudius compares not unfavourably with that of the other early emperors. It is pointed out that C., although originally appointed through military influence at a time when the restoration of the republic was being seriously discussed, managed to conciliate the Senate and to obtain a permanent reputation as a constitutional 'princeps'; while, at the same time, considerable advances were made under his rule towards concentrating power more completely in the hands of imperial officers. The views of C. on the citizenship (see the speech quoted in Furneaux, Annals of Tacitus, ii. 208) show him to have been very different from the colourless figure to which traditional historians, following exclusively one side of the picture drawn by Tacitus and Suetonius, have reduced him. It might, however, be argued that the present reaction in his favour is going too far. He allowed his wives, Messalina and Agrippina, whether through their influence over him, or even without his knowledge, to interfere with the course of justice, and to do incalculable harm in Rome; he entrusted power to subordinates in a way which (in spite of the just remarks of Bury, Student's Rom. Emp. 244) shows him to have been but a weak ruler; and it is probable that C. should be considered to have had good intentions in certain respects, but to have been, for most practical purposes, powerless; while the effects of his reign, for good or evil, will have to be mainly set down to the credit of his leading freedmen, over whom he had proverbially little control (cf. Seneca, Ludus de morte Claudii, vi. 2).

For the events mentioned in NT which fall in the reign of Claudius, see CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The emperor is twice mentioned by name:—

(1) In Ac 11<sup>28</sup> the prophecy by Agabus of a famine 'over the whole world' is said to have been fulfilled 'in the time of C.' Meyer and others protest against interpreting these words of any other famine than that to which Josephus refers (Ant. xx. ii. 5, v. 2) as occurring under Cuspius Fadus and Tiberius Alexander. Wieseler (Chron. apost. Zeit. p. 159), though puzzled by the allusion in Ant. III. xv. 3 to the high priest Ishmael, fixes the date of this famine, with considerable probability, at A.D. 45, adding that it may well have lasted for more than one year. There seems to be no reason to doubt that this famine is the one referred to in Ac 11<sup>28</sup>. At the same time it must be noted that famines seem to have been unusually prevalent during the reign of C. (see, for instance, Dio, ix. 11; Eus. Chron. ii. p. 152, ed. Sch.; Suet. Claud. 18, 'assidue sterilitates'); the person of C. was in danger from this cause (Tac. Ann. xii. 43), and the emperor became so sensitive on the point as to allow a dream, which was interpreted as foretelling dearth, to bring about the ruin of two Rom. knights (Tac. Ann. xi. 4). The carelessness of Gaius as regards the corn supply (Sen. de Brev. Vit. xviii. 5; Dio, lix. 17. 2) caused great difficulties to C. on his accession, and very vigorous measures were at once taken by the latter, and continued throughout his reign (Suet. Claud. xviii. 20; cf. Lehmann, Claudius, p. 135). When it was noticed that, in spite of these special precautions, famines were a characteristic of the time of C., it is not hard to see how the prophecy may have come to be regarded as amply fulfilled, even if taken in the widest sense.

(2) St. Paul met at Corinth two Jews, Aquila and his wife Priscilla, who had come thither 'because C. had commanded all the Jews to depart from Rome' (Ac 18<sup>9</sup>). Suetonius says (Claud. 25) that C. 'Judeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes expulit.' Dio (lx. vi. 6), perhaps correcting Suet., asserts that the Jews, whose numbers were so great as to make expulsion difficult, were not indeed expelled, but only forbidden to assemble together. The general policy of C. towards the Jews was favourable, as is shown by the two edicts, one relating to Alexandria, the other to the whole empire (Jos. Ant. XIX. v. 2, 3; cf. the edict of Petronius in XIX. vi. 3), which granted to them religious toleration, exemption from the hated military service, and some measure of self-government. But we are expressly told that he was influenced by his personal feeling towards Herod Agrippa I. (id. ib. xx. i. 1; cf. XIX. v. 2), to whom the emperor was indebted at the time of his accession (XIX. iv. 5). Not only did Agrippa receive 'consular honours' and such extensions of territory as to make his dominions coincide with those of Herod the Great, but his brother was given 'praetorian rank,' the rule over Chalcis, and, subsequently, certain other districts, as well as the oversight of the temple (Dio, l.x. viii.; Jos. Ant. xx. vii. 1, i. 3), while his son is described as having great influence at court (Jos. Ant. xx. i. 2; cf. vi. iii.). Anger has accordingly shown that the edict of Ac 18<sup>2</sup> must be put during the years when Agrippa II. was absent from Rome. As he remained in the capital till A.D. 50 (Wieseler, p. 67 n., 124), and had returned before the end of 52 (Jos. Ant. xx. vi. 3), these limits may be regarded as reasonably certain; but the attempt of Wieseler (pp. 125-8) to fix the date absolutely by a comparison with Tac. Ann. xii. 52. 3, though interesting and ingenious, is hardly convincing. It is no doubt true that the Jews often practised magic (e.g. Ac 8<sup>9</sup>), and Jews and magicians are often mentioned together, but they are, as Wieseler admits, clearly distinct, and Tacitus does not mention the Jews at all in this connexion.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS (Κλαύδιος Λυσίας), the military tribune of the Roman cohort in Jerus., who is mentioned in Ac 21-23. Hearing that all Jerus. was in confusion, he came down with soldiers and centurions to investigate the cause of the uproar, and bound St. Paul with two chains. As the 'sicarii' had recently become very prominent in Judaea (cf. Jos. Ant. xx. viii. 5, 6), and were especially in evidence during the great festivals (id. BJ II. xiii. 3, 4), he imagined, the season being Pentecost, that St. Paul was an Egyptian who had recently led out 4000 'assassins' into the wilderness (Ac 21<sup>28</sup>), and who is described by Jos. (BJ II. xiii. 5) as having had 30,000 associates in all. On discovering his mistake, L. allowed St. Paul to address the people from the castle stairs; but the mention of the Gentiles renewed the disturbance, so that the tribune was obliged to bring him into the castle, and was only prevented from examining him by scourging through receiving the news that he was a Rom. citizen, and therefore by the Lex Porcia exempt from such treatment. L. next arranged an interview between St. Paul and the Jewish Council, but a dispute between the Sadducees and Pharisees was the only result; subsequently he learned that a conspiracy had been formed with the object of killing St. Paul, so he sent him to Caesarea by night under an escort of 200 foot-soldiers, 70 horsemen, and 200 'spearmen' (δρεκτοδσφου, see Meyer on Ac 23<sup>22</sup>). The letter given in Ac 23<sup>28-30</sup> as written by L. to the procurator Felix on this occasion has been considered by some eminent critics to be an invention by the historian. The letter would almost certainly have been written in Latin, and the word τύπος (v. 25) would seem to imply that only the general sense is given. But it must be noticed that in v. 27 L. represents himself as having rescued St. Paul because he discovered him to be a Roman, a falsification and inconsistency with Ac 23<sup>25-27</sup> of which the author of Ac, had he been inventing, would not have been guilty (see, on opposite sides, Wendt and Nösgen on Ac 23<sup>27</sup>). The admission of L. that he had gained Rom. citizenship 'for a large sum' (implying his incredulity that a native of Tarsus should be a citizen and yet apparently so poor) illustrates the 'avarice of the Claudian times,' and the traffic in honours by Messalina and the imperial freedmen, partly due, no doubt, to a desire to replenish the treasury, partly to even more questionable motives, on which Dio Cassius indignantly comments (lx. 17. 6). See CITIZENSHIP.

CLAW.—In older Eng. c. was used for an animal's hoof, and for any of the parts into which a cloven hoof is divided. So in Dt 14<sup>6</sup> AV we read, 'And every beast that parteth the hoof, and cleaveth the cleft into two claws, . . . that ye shall eat' (RV 'and hath the hoof cloven in two'); and in Zec 11<sup>10</sup> 'he shall eat the flesh of the fat, and tear their claws in pieces' (RV 'hoofs'). The Heb. is parṣah, the ordinary word for 'hoof,' in both passages. Cf. Lovell (1661) 'With claws like a Cow; but quadrifide.' The bird's c. is mentioned only Dn 4<sup>33</sup> 'his [Nebuchadrezzar's] nails like birds' claws' (no word in Heb., 'nails' [יָרֵשׁ] being understood). J. HASTINGS.

CLAY, (טע, רָהֵב, קְהָלֵס).—This word is frequently used in the Bible either in a literal or a metaphorical sense, in which latter it is parallel with 'dust' (comp. Gn 2<sup>7</sup> and Is 64<sup>8</sup>). Clay is widely distributed over the surface of nearly all countries, especially in valleys, and from the earliest times of the human race was used both for the construction of buildings and habitations and for the manufacture of pottery and works of art. It is a mixture of decomposed minerals of various kinds, and hence is exceedingly variable in composition. Alumina, silica, and potash are the principal constituents; but along with these may be variable quantities of lime, magnesia, and iron, which give variety both to the quality and colour. Hence various kinds of clay are suited for different uses in the arts.

1. As a building material, clay has been used from the earliest ages. Ancient Babylon, as described by Herodotus, and verified by modern discovery, was built altogether of brick, either baked in kilns or dried in the sun; and amongst the other remains is the great quadrilateral pile of brickwork,—known as Babil, the Gate of God, corrupted by the Jews to 'Babel,'*—which might well have been supposed to be the 'Tower of Babel' described in Gn 11<sup>3-7</sup>, but that the inscriptions found thereon, by Sir Henry Rawlinson, show it to have been the famous Tower of the Seven Planets built by Nebuchadrezzar II. (B.C. 604-562). Of similar materials was built, in the main, the capital of Assyria, though blocks of limestone, alabaster, and other materials were also employed. The clay used in Nineveh was derived from the alluvia of the Tigris.† The brickmaking in Lower Egypt of the time of the Exodus is still carried on, the clay used being derived from the silt of the Nile; and bricks in the British Museum, inscribed with the names of Tahutmes I., B.C. 1700, and Ramses II., B.C. 1400, show straw mixed with the clay in order to bind it together as described in OT (Ex 1<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>7</sup>). Most of the villages both in Lower Egypt and in the Nile Valley are built of sun-dried clay; bricks of clay were also largely used in the construction of ancient Troy.‡

2. The use of clay for pottery was coeval with its use for building purposes. Remains of jars, vases, bowls, and other vessels are found amongst the most ancient ruins of Assyria, Babylonia, and Egypt. The potter's wheel was commonly employed in such works, and is often referred to in the Bible; but of all the purposes for which clay was employed in very ancient times, none was more interesting than its use for imprinting letters of cuneiform characters on tablets which have been discovered in immense numbers amongst the ruins of Assyria and Babylonia;§ they were either in the form of bricks or cylinders of clay, baked after the inscription had been impressed.|| Amongst the inscriptions is the story of the Creation, the Fall, and the Deluge, deciphered by the late George Smith of the British Museum:¶ of only less interest are the Tel el-Amarna tablets in Egypt, one of which has been discovered by Bliss amongst the ruins at Tell el-Hesi in Southern Palestine (supposed to be Lachish, one of the five Amorite cities, Jos 10<sup>9</sup>), and dating as far back as B.C. 1480.** E. HULL.

CLEAN (see also UNCLEAN, UNCLEANNESS).—1. The orig. meaning of the word is clear, free from impurity, as applied to glass, gold, and the like, as Wyclif's tr. of Rev 21<sup>18</sup> 'The citee it silf was of cleene gold, lik to cleene glas.' Whence it is used of the transparent purity of white garments, Rev 19<sup>8-14</sup> 'fine linen, c. and white' (καθαρός, RV 'pure'). And then it is applied to anything that is not dirty (its modern use), as Pr 14<sup>4</sup> 'Where no oxen are, the crib is c.' (כר); Is 30<sup>24</sup> 'c. provender' (חֵיכִי, salted, RV 'savoury'); Zec 3<sup>3b</sup> Amer. RV 'a c. mitre' (קִיטָה, AV and RV 'fair'); Mt 27<sup>59</sup> 'a c. linen cloth' (καθαρός).

2. Before passing from its physical uses we may notice an early application in the sense of complete, still retained in such a phrase as 'a c. sweep.' The only example of the adv. is Lv 23<sup>22</sup> 'thou shalt not make c. riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest' (RV 'shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field'). But the adv. is more frequent, Jos 3<sup>17</sup> 'all the people were passed c. over Jordan' (לְעָבְרָם were finished crossing), so 4<sup>1,11</sup>, Ps 77<sup>8</sup> 'Is his mercy c. gone for ever?' J1 17 'he hath made it c. bare'; Zec 11<sup>17</sup> 'his arm shall be c. dried up'; Wis 2<sup>12</sup> 'he is c. contrary to our doings' (ἐναντιοῦνται); 2 P 2<sup>18</sup> 'those that were c. escaped' (Τῆς θύρας ἀποφύγοντας, edd. ἀλλ' ὡς ἀποφύγοντας, RV 'those who are just escaping'); and Ezk 37<sup>14</sup> RV 'we are c. cut off' (AV 'cut off for our parts'). Cf. Hooker, Ecc. Pol. iii. i. 13 'Excommunication neither shutteth out from the mystical, nor clean from the visible Church.'

3. At a very early period the word passed into the language of religion to designate (1) that which does not ceremonially defile, whether (a) beasts, as Gn 7<sup>2</sup> 'of every c. beast thou shalt take to thee by sevens'; Dt 14<sup>11</sup> 'Of all c. birds ye shall eat'; or (b) places, as Lv 4<sup>12</sup> 6<sup>11</sup> 'without the camp unto a c. place'; or (c) things, as Is 66<sup>20</sup> 'the children of Israel shall bring an offering in a c. vessel'; Ezk 36<sup>25</sup> 'I will sprinkle c. water upon you'; Lk 11<sup>4</sup> 'all things are c. unto you' (where the ethical [see 4] closely approaches); and Ro 14<sup>20</sup> RV 'All things indeed are c.' (καθάρως, AV 'pure'); (2) persons who are not ceremonially defiled, as Lv 7<sup>19</sup> 'all that be (RV 'every one that is') c. shall eat thereof'; 1 S 20<sup>28</sup> 'Something hath befallen him, he is not c.; surely he is not c.'; Ezk 36<sup>25</sup> (see above) 'ye shall be c.' (passing into 4).

4. Closely related to this ceremonial use is the ethical, and quite as old. In passages like Ezk 36<sup>25</sup> Lk 11<sup>4</sup>, and esp. Jn 13<sup>10</sup> vs. 15<sup>3</sup> we see the one passing into the other; in others the ethically stands out from the ceremonially religious meaning. Take first of all some passages where the Heb. is the usual vb. (tāhēr or adā). (tāhór) used for ceremonial cleanness: Ps 19<sup>9</sup> 'The fear of the LORD is c.' (that is, the religion of J<sup>n</sup> is morally undefiled, in contrast to heathen religions; cf. Ps 12<sup>9</sup> 'the words of the LORD are pure words,' where the Heb. is the same, a word freq. applied to 'pure' gold); Lv 16<sup>30</sup> 'from all your sins shall ye be c.'; Gn 35<sup>2</sup> 'Put away the strange gods that are among you, and be c., and change your garments'; Ps 51<sup>7</sup> 'purge me with hyssop, and I shall be c.'; 51<sup>10</sup> 'Create in me a clean heart.' Next, where the Heb. is bar, that is, 'clean' because cleansed, 'bright' because polished (as a p. arrow, Is 49<sup>2</sup>); Ps 73<sup>1</sup> 'such as are of c. heart'; Job 11<sup>4</sup> 'I am c. in thine eyes'; cf. Is 52<sup>11</sup> 'be ye c. that bear the vessels of the LORD' (קִרְיָ). Finally, where the Heb. is zākhāh or zākhak, 'be c.', zak, 'c.', always in a moral sense, Job 15<sup>14</sup> 'What is man that he should be c.?'; 9<sup>30</sup> 'If I wash myself with snow water, and make my hands never so c.'; 15<sup>15</sup> 'the heavens are not c. in his sight'; 33<sup>9</sup> 'I am c., without transgression'; Pr 10<sup>3</sup> 'all the ways of a man are c. in his own eyes.'

5. In Ac 18<sup>9</sup> 'Your blood be upon your own heads; I am c.,' the sense is guiltless, a very rare meaning for this word. Skene (1609) says, 'Gif he be made quit, and cleane: all his gudes salbe restored to him.' See under CLEAR.

J. HASTINGS.

CLEAR, CLEARNESS.—The orig. meanings of these words (from Lat. clarus) are 'bright,' 'brilliant,' 'manifest,' 'famous.' But the Eng. words early adopted the moral sense of 'pure,' 'guiltless,' partly through the natural association of these ideas, and partly through confusion with the native words clean, cleanness. 1. Of the orig.

meanings, we find in AV (in add. to the mod. sense of 'manifest') (a) Brightness, 2 S 23<sup>4</sup> 'By c. shining after rain'; Am 8<sup>9</sup> 'I will darken the earth in the c. day'; Zec 14<sup>6</sup> 'the light shall not be c.' (RV 'with brightness'); Is 18<sup>4</sup> 'like a c. heat upon herbs' (RV 'like c. heat in sunshine'); Rev 22<sup>1</sup> 'c. as crystal' (λαμπρός, RV 'bright'); 21<sup>11</sup> 'c. as crystal (κρυσταλλίζων): so with 'clearness,' Ex 24<sup>10</sup> 'as it were the body of heaven in his c.' (RV 'the very heaven for c.'); 2 Es 2<sup>21</sup> 'let the blind man come into the sight of my c.' (RV 'glory'); (b) Brilliance, Job 11<sup>17</sup> 'thine age (RV 'thy life') shall be clearer than the noonday' (RV 'arise above'). Cf. Wyclif's tr. of Wis 6<sup>13</sup> 'Wisdom is cler' (λαμπρός, AV 'glorious,' RV 'radiant'). A thing is bright often because it is unspotted, whence the transition is easy to moral spotlessness. We see the transition taking place in Ca 6<sup>10</sup> 'fair as the moon, c. as the sun' (RV); and Rev 21<sup>18</sup> 'the city was pure gold, like unto c. glass' (καθαρός, RV 'pure'). 2. Purity, innocence, Ps 51<sup>4</sup> 'that thou mightest be . . . c. when thou judgest' (RV); Gn 24<sup>31, 41, 44</sup> 'thou shalt be c. from my oath' (RV); Sus 46<sup>6</sup> 'I am c. from the blood of this woman' (ἀθώος); 2 Co 7<sup>11</sup> 'ye have approved yourselves to be c. in this matter' (ἀγνός). In this sense only is the verb used, Ex 34<sup>7</sup> 'that will by no means c.' [the guilty]=Nu 14<sup>18</sup>; Gn 44<sup>10</sup> 'how shall we c. ourselves?' (RV); 2 Co 7<sup>11</sup> 'what clearing of yourselves' (ἀπολογία). And in this sense there is a solitary instance of the use of 'clearly,' Job 33<sup>3</sup> 'my lips shall utter knowledge c.' (RV 'speak sincerely'), with which cf. Tillotson (1694), 'Deal clearly and impartially with yourselves.'

J. HASTINGS.

CLEAVE, CLEFT, CLIFF, CLIFT.—There are two verbs 'to cleave' distinct in origin and meaning. (1) Cleave, to split asunder, cleave, cloven. (2) Cleave, to adhere, cling, cleaved, cleaved. But the one has affected the other so as to cause some confusion. Thus c.=to split, has also a past ptep. cleft, Mic 1<sup>4</sup> 'the valleys shall be cleft'; and c.=to stick, has the quite irregular past tense cleve, more common in AV than any other form of either verb. Clift, meaning a fissure or crevice, is a word of distinct origin from either verb. It occurs in AV Ex 33<sup>22</sup> 'I will put thee in a clift of the rock'; and Is 57<sup>5</sup> 'under the clifts of the rocks.' In other places where it occurs in mod. edd. of AV it is spelt cleft (and RV so spells it in these passages) through confusion with the verb cleave, 'to split.' Thus Ca 2<sup>14</sup>, Jer 49<sup>16</sup>, Ob 3, Is 2<sup>21</sup> (RV 'caverns'), Am 6<sup>11</sup>. In Dt 14<sup>6</sup> 'Every beast that parteth the hoof, and cleaveth the cleft into two claws' (lit. 'cleaveth the cleft of the two hoofs'), the word 'cleft' no doubt means the division of the hoof, but it is formed directly from 'cleave' in imitation of the Heb. (cf. Lv 11<sup>3</sup> פָּרָה שֶׁעַל שְׁנֵי אֲזָנוֹתָיִךָ, the division or toe of the hoof being properly represented by 'claws.' This word 'clift' has been further confused with cliff, a steep face of rock; whence in Job 30<sup>6</sup> it is spelt 'cliff' in mod. edd. of AV (1611 'clifts,' RV 'clefts'). The word 'clift' itself occurs once, 2 Ch 20<sup>16</sup> 'they come up by the c. of Ziz' (RV 'ascent').

CLEMENT (Κλήμης), a fellow-labourer with St. Paul at Philippi (Ph 4<sup>9</sup>). It was commonly held in the early Church that this C. is to be identified with Clemens Romanus, one of the first bishops of Rome, who wrote the well-known Epistle to the Church of Corinth (cf. Orig. In Joan. i. 29; Eus. HE iii. 4). But, though in the absence of fuller information it is impossible to say for certain, there are serious difficulties both as to place and time in accepting this view. Thus we hear of St. Paul's fellow-labourer in connexion only with Philippi, while the other C. is associated with Rome. Nor is it likely that the former can have lived till A.D. 110, that is, about 50 years after the date of the Philippian Epistle, and before which date we cannot well place the death of the Rom. bishop. Again, as proving the commonness of the name, it has been pointed out that Tacitus alone mentions five Clements (Ann. i. 23, ii. 39, xv. 73; Hist. i. 86, iv. 68). (See Lightfoot on Ph 4<sup>9</sup>, and detached note p. 166; and the same writer's St. Clement of Rome.) G. MILLIGAN.

CLEOPAS (Κλεόπας).—Only Lk 24<sup>13</sup>; whether to be identified with Clopas of Jn 19<sup>25</sup> and Alphæus of Mt 10<sup>3</sup> etc., see ALPHÆUS and BRETHERN OF THE LORD.

CLEOPATRA (Κλεοπάτρα, 'sprung from a famous father').—A female name of great antiquity (Apollod. ii. 1. 5; II. ix. 556), and very common in the families of the Ptolemies and Seleucids.

1. A daughter of Antiochus the Great. In B.C. 193 she was married to Ptolemy Epiphanes, with the taxes of Cæle-Syria and Pal. as her dowry (Jerome ad Dan. 11<sup>17</sup>; Jos. Ant. xii. iv. 1; App. Syr. 5; Liv. xxxvii. 3; Polyb. xxviii. 17). After her husband's death she ruled with vigour as regent for her son until her own death, in B.C. 173.

2. A daughter of Cleopatra and Ptolemy Epiphanes. She married in B.C. 173 her own brother Ptolemy Philometor (Ad. Est 11<sup>1</sup>), and afterwards her second brother Ptolemy Physcon (Liv. xiv. 13; Epit. 59; Justin, xxxviii. 8). She greatly favoured the Jews in Egypt (Jos. c. Apim. ii. 5), and encouraged Onias IV. in the erection of the temple at Leontopolis (Jos. Ant. xiii. iii. 2).

3. A daughter of Cleopatra and Ptolemy Philometor. In B.C. 150 she was given in marriage by her father to Alexander Balas (1 Mac 10<sup>57, 59</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 1). When Balas was driven into Arabia she became (B.C. 146) at her father's bidding the wife of his rival, Demetrius Nikator (1 Mac 11<sup>12</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 7; Liv. Epit. 52). Whilst Demetrius was detained in captivity amongst the Parthians, she married (B.C. 140) his brother, Antiochus Sidetes (Jos. Ant. xiii. vii. 1). Sidetes died in B.C. 128; but when Demetrius, after his restoration, sought help from Cleopatra, she refused to see him, and possibly instigated his murder (Jos. Ant. xiii. ix. 3; Justin, xxxix. 1; App. Syr. 68; Liv. Epit. 60). Her son, Antiochus Grypus, became king through her influence; but, being detected in treason, she was compelled to take poison in B.C. 120 (Justin, xxxix. 2).

4. A native of Jerus., and wife of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xvii. i. 3). She was the mother of Philip, tetrarch of Ituræa (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>).

R. W. MOSS.

CLOKE, so in both AV and RV instead of mod. cloak (לִבְשׁ מֵ'יל, לְבָשׁ simlah, etc.; λυάτιον, στολή, etc., Arab. jubbah, abdal, etc.).—The cloke was the ordinary upper garment worn over the coat (kēthōneth). The two occur together in Mt 5<sup>40</sup>, Lk 6<sup>29</sup>. The prominent meanings in these different terms are those of spaciousness, length, ornament, envelopment. Hence they are used to represent clothing in general, and translated 'apparel,' 'garment,' 'raiment,' 'vesture,' and metaphorically as the cloke of zeal (Is 59<sup>17</sup>) or the robe of righteousness (Is 61<sup>10</sup>). In size and material it varied according to age and sex, the class and occupation of the wearer: as shepherd, tradesman, priest, prince. In shape it might be sewn up to have the surplice form of the robe of the ephod (Ex 39<sup>23</sup>), or be worn loose and open, like a Geneva gown or Spanish cloak. It was the 'garment' not to be kept as a forfeited pledge (Ex 22<sup>26</sup>, Dt 24<sup>13</sup>), the 'garment' of Joseph in Potiphar's house (Gn 39<sup>12</sup>). It is the equivalent of 'mantle,' 'robe,' &c.

the robe that Jonathan gave to David (1 S 18<sup>4</sup>), Saul's cut robe (1 S 24<sup>4</sup>), Samuel's robe (1 S 28<sup>14</sup>), the 'best robe' of the parable (Lk 15<sup>22</sup>). The cloke of 2 Ti 4<sup>18</sup> (φελδης) may have been a light mantle like a cashmere dust-cloak, in which the books and parchments were wrapped. The use of cloke in 1 Th 2<sup>5</sup> (πρόφασις), 1 P 2<sup>16</sup> (ἐπικάλυμμα) is general for covering, excuse. See DRESS, under μέν.

G. M. MACKIE.

CLOPAS (AV Cleophas) is named only in Jn 19<sup>25</sup> Μαριάμ ἡ τοῦ Κλωπά. As to his identity see ALPHAEUS and BROTHERS OF THE LORD.

CLOSE in the sense of secret occurs Lk 9<sup>36</sup> 'they kept it c., and told no man' (ἐσίγησαν, RV 'they held their peace'). Cf. Pref. to 1611, 'How shall they understand that which is kept close in an unknown tongue?' The 'close places' of 2 S 22<sup>46</sup> = Ps 18<sup>46</sup> are castles or holds, places shut in with high walls, and so deemed safe. Cf. More (1529), 'all close religious houses.' J. HASTINGS.

CLOSET (from Lat. claudere, through Fr. closet, dim. of clos, 'an enclosed space').—Any private apartment, as Shaks. Jul. Cæs. III. ii. 134—

'But here's a parchment, with the seal of Cæsar;
I found it in his closet, 'tis his will';

Hamlet, II. i. 77—

'As I was sewing in my closet.'

The king's private secretary was called 'clerk of the closet.' Closet occurs Jl 2<sup>16</sup> (מִן הַבֵּית 'to cover,' prob. of the bridal tent, used also of the bridegroom's c., Ps 19<sup>6</sup>); Mt 6<sup>6</sup>, Lk 12<sup>3</sup> (RV 'inner chamber.' Gr. ταμείον, properly 'a storeroom,' as in Lk 12<sup>34</sup>: 'store-chambers,' says Plummer in loc., 'are commonly inner-chambers, secret rooms, esp. in the East, where outer walls are so easily dug through'). See HOUSE. J. HASTINGS.

CLOTH, CLOTHING.—See DRESS.

CLOTHED UPON in 2 Co 5<sup>2-4</sup> has been chosen to express the force of the ἐπὶ ἐπενδύουσαι (only here in NT), to put on something in addition to what is already on. In Jn 21<sup>7</sup> Peter 'girt his coat' (ἐπενδύσας) about him, 'without which he was 'naked,' that is, had on only the light undergarment, perhaps only the loin cloth. See DRESS. J. HASTINGS.

CLOUD (πρᾶν 'anân; νέφος).—Much of the precious and beautiful thought of the Bible is written on the clouds, and in the sky of Syria this writing of religious symbolism and moral teaching is as readable to-day as the inscriptions engraved on Assyrian brick or Egyptian granite. Though the Hebrews had various names for clouds, it is probable that their knowledge of the weather, like that of the modern Syrians, was confined to such general and obvious points as the direction of the wind and the deeper flame of the evening sky. This indifference is partly due to the uniformity of the climate, with its recognized season of rainfall from Oct. to April, and of sunshine from May to Sept. Forecasting the changes of the weather would also be difficult on account of their suddenness in that narrow land of mountains and valleys, with a desert on one side and the sea on the other. Except to the fishermen of Galilee, and the husbandmen at the time of sowing, the interpretation of the signs of the sky was a matter of small importance. Further, the Moslems, who generally preserve most of the ancient piety of the land, disapprove of criticising the weather, as savouring of irreverence. Any pointed reference to the weather or inquiry about it usually finds a Syrian surprised and unprepared for comment, as it is a matter out of the usual round of his salutations.

Such attention to the clouds is in fact not held in high repute; as the Arab proverb says, 'The man who will not work becomes an astrologer.'

I. CLOUDS AS AN INDICATION OF RAIN.—1. 'A cloud rising in the West' (Lk 12<sup>44</sup>).—The rainy quarters are W. and S.W. Hence Gehazi was told (1 K 18<sup>44</sup>) to look toward the sea for the first sign of rain. He saw what is still often seen at the end of Sept., when the dry summer season is about to end in the early rain, namely, a small cloud of cool ashy-grey colour rising over the glittering horizon. It is the first token that a strong steady S.W. wind has set in, and will carry everything before it. In a few hours the sky becomes a course of swiftly moving black clouds, which congregate in dense masses on the mountains, and before long the storm breaks with a grand prelude of thunder peals and incessant flashes of lightning. 2. 'Clouds of the latter rain' (Pr 16<sup>16</sup>).—Such is the king's favour. This refers to the light showers in March and April. These do not affect the deep roots of the fruit trees, which depend on the more continuous winter rains, but they refresh the ripening fields of barley and wheat, delaying the harvest, and causing the ears to mature into a heavier crop in May and June. 3. 'Clouds of dew in the heat of harvest' (Is 18<sup>4</sup>).—The season is here the autumn harvest of fruits, when unusual moisture in the sky, or a wandering shower, is an unwelcome phenomenon, causing withering heat in the vineyards and feverish symptoms among the people (see, however, Del. ad loc.). 4. 'Heat by the shadow of a cloud' (Is 25<sup>5</sup>).—This is most likely an allusion to the prostrating wind from the Syrian desert, S. and S.E., which covers the sky with hot sand-clouds (Sirocco, from Arab. shirk, East). It is this that gives the 'sky of brass' (Dt 28<sup>23</sup>), and the 'cloud without water' (Jude v. 12).

II. CLOUDS AS A SYMBOL OF THE TRANSITORY.—It is a common phenomenon of the Syrian sky to see a cloud, borne eastward by the sea-breeze, suddenly and mysteriously dissolve as it encounters the hot dry air of the inland district. The cloud is something that melts and leaves no vestige of its existence. The artistic appreciation of landscape did not exist in ancient times: the thought had not been expressed that the floating clouds can lend their state and grace of motion to those who live in communion with them. The eye was occupied with moral issues. Thus the cloud becomes a text on life's brevity (Job 7<sup>9</sup>). Such was prosperity (Job 30<sup>15</sup>). In the same way, it represents the deep reality of forgiveness (Is 44<sup>22</sup>). Such evanescence is the special peculiarity of the morning cloud, which appears at sunrise in the valleys and melts away an hour afterwards. It was the moral emblem and historical epitome of Ephraim and Judah (Hos 6<sup>4</sup>). Its companions were the chaff of the threshing-floor and the smoke of the chimney (Hos 13<sup>3</sup>).

III. CLOUDS AS A COVERING.—In this connexion the meaning passes from the screening of the sun's rays (Ezk 32<sup>7</sup>), to imply shadow, obscurity, and oblivion. Job prays that a cloud may rest upon the day of his birth (Job 3<sup>9</sup>). Again (Job 38<sup>9</sup>) we have the majestic metaphor of the cloud as the swaddling-clothes of the new-born world. The union of power and humility in the king, 'when mercy seasons justice,' is likened to the bright benediction of a morning without clouds in spring-time (2 S 23<sup>4</sup>).

IV. CLOUDS AS THE DWELLING-PLACE OF THE ETERNAL.—The highest stratum of cloud-imagery was reached when, in addition to what was merely high and wonderful and mysterious in nature, clouds came to be recognized as a means of revelation the vesture of the divine presence, and the vehicle of the divine purpose. 'The bow in the cloud' (Gn 9<sup>14</sup>) was so far in the line of the old astrology, which saw a divine meaning in the heavens. The cloud (ânân) seems here to mean the whole circle of the sky: hence mē'nēn, soothsayer; cf. Arab. falāk 'sky,' falaki 'astrologer.' Throughout the Bible the cloud often appears as the indication and emblem of God's presence, power, and protection. He keeps the rain-clouds suspended (Job 26<sup>9</sup>). He numbers, balances, commands them, and has a purpose in their mysterious spreadings and motions (Job 36<sup>29</sup> 37<sup>18</sup> 38<sup>27</sup>, Ps 78<sup>23</sup>). The cloud of His presence settled upon the mount, and left there the light of His commandments. In this form His presence crowned the preparations of the sanctuary, rested upon it when it rested, led its marches in the wilderness, and reappeared in the completed temple (Ex 13<sup>21</sup> 40<sup>34</sup>, 1 K 8<sup>10</sup>). Clouds are the chariot of God (Ps 104<sup>3</sup>, Is 19<sup>1</sup>, Ezk 10<sup>4</sup>), and the dust of His feet (Nah 1<sup>3</sup>). The same emblem of intercepted light, partial knowledge, and hidden glory appears in NT, where a cloud closes the story of the Incarnation (Ac 1<sup>9</sup>), and clouds are the heralds of the Second Advent (Rev 17). See also PILLAR.

CLOUD.—As subst. Jer 38<sup>11-12</sup> 'So Ebed-melech took thence old cast clouts and old rotten rags, and . . . said unto Jeremiah, Put now these old cast clouts and rotten rags under thine armholes under the cords.' As vb. Jos 9<sup>6</sup> 'old shoes and clouted upon their feet' (Amer. RV 'patched'). Cf. Shaks. 2 Henry VI. iv. ii. 195—and Latimer, Serm. p. 110, 'Paul yea, and Peter too, had more skill in mending an old net, and in clouting an old tent, than to teach lawyers what diligence they should use in the expedition of matters.' The word is Celtic, and came in early, but Wyclif, in Jos 9<sup>6</sup>, has 'sowid with patchis.'

'Spare none but such as go in clouted shoon;'

CLUB (Job 41<sup>29</sup> RV).—The 'club' was a common weapon among shepherds. See HAND-STAVES and also under DAIR (Heb. shebhet).

The rod, sceptre, or club of iron (shebhet barzel, Ps 2<sup>9</sup>) was carried by kings, as seen in the Assyrian reliefs in the Kouyunjik Gallery, B.M., esp. the figure of Assur-nazir-pul. Cf. Is 10<sup>6</sup> 'Ho Assyrian, the rod (shebhet) of mine anger.'

W. E. BARNES.

CNIDUS (Κνίδος), a city of Caria, a Dorian colony, was situated at the extremity of a narrow peninsula which juts far out towards the W. into the Aegean Sea. In this situation it was the dividing point between the western and southern coast of Asia Minor. Hence a coasting voyage westward along the southern coast of Asia Minor came to an end off C.; and from thence the ship had to begin a new period and method in its course towards Rome (Ac 27<sup>7</sup>). The city was situated partly on the peninsula, partly on a small island off the peninsula on its south side; the island was connected with the mainland by a causeway in ancient times, and is now joined to it by a sandy isthmus. There were two excellent harbours at C., one of which could be closed by a chain. Like Chios (which see), C. had the rank of a free city. It contained Jewish inhabitants as early as the 2nd cent. (1 Mac 15<sup>22</sup>; see CARIA, DELOS).

LITERATURE.—Newton, Hist. of Discov. at Ialicanassus, Cnidus, etc., and Travels and Discov. in the Levant, superseded all older descriptions.

COAL (חֶמֶד, חֶמֶס, רָצָה, רָצָה, שָׁחֹר; ἀνθραξ, ἀνθρακιά).—The variety, esp. in OT, of the words rendered 'coal' in AV makes it advisable to consider them separately, first of all. For philological details the lexicons must be consulted.

1. Gaheleth (LXX uniformly ἀνθραξ, Vulg. pruna, carbo, scintilla) is the most frequently used, occurring seventeen times. It designates glowing fuel, live embers, and is sometimes found in the full expressions 'coals of fire,' or 'burning coals of fire.' Its special meaning is well seen in Pr 26<sup>21</sup> (RV embers), where it evidently denotes burning, as contrasted with fresh unburnt fuel (see Peham below). In 1r 6<sup>28</sup>, Is 44<sup>19</sup> 47<sup>14</sup>, Ezk 24<sup>11</sup> it is used of a fire in reference to such ordinary effects as burning, baking, warming, boiling. In 2 S 14<sup>7</sup> it describes figuratively the life of a family as embodied in the last surviving member of its line (Vulg. scintilla). In 2 S 22<sup>13</sup> and the parallel Ps 18<sup>13</sup>, and also in Ezk 1<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>2</sup> 'coals of fire' are associated with the manifestation of God, the reference being to lightning, or to the elemental fires from which lightning is supposed to proceed. Gaheleth occurs in Job 41<sup>21</sup> in a metaphor (similar to that in Ps 18 above) descriptive of the fiery breath of leviathan. In Ps 120<sup>4</sup> we find 'coals of broom' (עֵצ, genista monosperma, not JUNIPER, which see) used to denote either the punishment of the false tongue's speech, or its devouring character, the embers of the plant in question being known to retain their heat for a specially long time. In Ps 140<sup>10</sup> 'coals of fire' form one of the punishments of the wicked, as also in the famous figure of retribution by kindness in Pr 25<sup>22</sup>, repeated in NT Ro 12<sup>20</sup>.

2. Peham (LXX ὀσάρα, ἀνθραξ; Vulg. carbo, pruna) occurs three, perhaps four, times. In the passage referred to above (Pr 26<sup>21</sup>) it clearly means unburnt coals put on live embers. In Is 44<sup>12</sup> 54<sup>16</sup>, however, the reference is to the live coals used in smiths' work. In Ps 11<sup>6</sup>, if the conjectural reading עֵצִים (for עֵצִים) be correct, we have 'coals of fire' (so AVm) rained on the wicked, along with brimstone, instead of the less congruous 'snaros, fire,' etc.

3. Ilzpuh is found twice, in the phrases 'a cake baked on the coals' (1 K 19<sup>6</sup>), and 'a live coal . . . from off the altar' (Is 6<sup>6</sup>). It is probable that in both cases the word means a hot stone (RVm). In the latter, LXX has ἀνθραξ and Vulg. calculus, while in the former both VSS are less literal (LXX ἐγκυβλάς ἀλυπετρῆς, Vulg. subcinericius panis), with a general allusion to the process of BAKING (which see).

4. Resheph is twice rendered 'coal' in AV, Ca 8<sup>8</sup> (LXX πεπλεγρον, Vulg. lampas, RV 'flash'), Hab 3<sup>8</sup> (LXX omits the subject in clause b, Vulg. diabolus, AVm 'burning diseases,' RV 'fiery bolts'). The word occurs elsewhere in OT (Dt 32<sup>24</sup>, Job 5<sup>7</sup>, Ps 76<sup>3</sup> 78<sup>48</sup>), and means 'a pointed, darting flame.' In Dt and Hab it seems to denote 'the fiery bolts by which J' was imagined to produce pestilence or fever' (Driver). In connexion with this it is suggestive that Resheph appears to have been the name of a Phoen. fire-god. He is referred to as an Asiatic deity in inscriptions found in Egypt and elsewhere, particularly in certain bilingual (Gr. and Phoen.) ones in Cyprus, where he is identified with Apollo. (For this point see the note in Driver, Deut. pp. 367, 368, and the authorities there given.)

5. Shēhor is tr. 'coal' in La 4<sup>8</sup>. The literal meaning of the word is 'blackness' (RVm).

6. Anthraξ (tr. 'carbuncle' To 13<sup>4</sup>, Sir 32<sup>6</sup>) means 'coal' in Sir 8<sup>10</sup> (ἀνθρακας ἀμαρτωλοῦ), Ro 12<sup>20</sup> (from Pr 25<sup>22</sup>). Anthrakidá is found in Sir 11<sup>32</sup>, 4 Mac 9<sup>20</sup>, Jn 18<sup>18</sup> 21<sup>9</sup>.

'Coal' therefore is, strictly speaking, a correct rendering only of gaheleth and peham and their Gr. equivalents. Gaheleth may denote the glowing embers of any kind of fuel (wood, bones, etc., Ezk 24<sup>11</sup>), but by it and peham, apart from their poetic and figurative use, we are generally to understand charcoal, which is a common article of fuel in the E., and in the preparation of which the forests of Pal., as well as those of other districts, are rapidly disappearing. The subject of fuel will be more fully dealt with under FIRE.

True mineral coal has not been found in Pal. proper, where the geological formation as a whole is recent. The rocks of the carboniferous period, if they exist, are not near the surface. Two strata of this age, however, have been recognized. They are those known as the Desert Sandstone and the Wady Nash limestone, but they are not accompanied by any coal. Coal of an inferior quality has been found at Sidon, and coal-mining was also carried on for a time in Lebanon, but was abandoned after some 12,000 tons had been extracted (Conder, Tent Work in Pal. ii. 326. For the geology of Pal. see Hull, Survey of W. Pal. and the literature there mentioned, pp. 5, 6). JAMES PATRICK.

COAST (Lat. costa, rib, side) is now confined to the sea-shore, but formerly was used of the side of any person, place, or thing, and in AV is freq. used for the border or neighbourhood of any place, inland or other. Thus Mt 2<sup>6</sup> 'Herod . . . sent forth, and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof.'

'It would be unreasonable,' says Lightfoot (On a Fresh Revision<sup>2</sup>, p. 194), 'to expect the English reader to understand that when St. Paul passes "through the upper coasts" (τὰ ἀνωτερικά μέρη) on his way to Ephesus (Ac 19), he does in fact traverse the high land which lies in the interior of Asia Minor. Again, in the gospels, when he reads of our Lord visiting "the coasts of Tyre and Sidon" (Mt 15<sup>21</sup>, Mk 7<sup>31</sup>), he naturally thinks of the sea-board, knowing these to be maritime cities, whereas the word in one passage stands for μέρος "parts," and in the other for ὅρια "borders," and the circumstances suggest rather the eastern than the western frontier of the region. And perhaps also his notions of the geography of Pal. may be utterly confused by reading that Capernaum is situated "upon the sea-coast" (Mt 4<sup>13</sup>).' J. HASTINGS.

COAT (כִּתְּוֹן kēthōneth, χιτῶν), made of cotton, linen, fine wool, and probably silk. The garment of home-life and ordinary work, worn under the cloak and over the undershirt, or sheet (ῥῆς), and sometimes instead of it, drawn tightly round the waist by belt or girdle, in shape like a dressing-gown or cassock (see DRESS, under kēthōneth). It is the coat of Joseph (Gn 37<sup>3</sup>), of the priests (Ex 28<sup>4</sup>, Lv 8<sup>13</sup>), of women's dress (Ca 5<sup>3</sup>), of Christ (Jn 19<sup>23</sup>), of the disciples (Mt 5<sup>40</sup>, Lk 6<sup>29</sup>). Coat is translated 'garment' in 2 S 13<sup>18, 19</sup>, Ezr 2<sup>60</sup>, Neh 7<sup>70</sup>, Jude <sup>23</sup>; 'clothes' in Mk 14<sup>63</sup>; 'robe' in Is 22<sup>21</sup>. The coat of I S 2<sup>4</sup>, the annual present to Samuel, was a woollen cloak (mē'el); that of Jn 21<sup>7</sup>, fisher's c. (ἐρεβδέρης), would be a large cloak for covering in public and protection at night, the fisherman merely wearing a large apron or waist-cloth when busy with the net. The coat of Dn 3<sup>21</sup>, RV hosen (כִּתְּוֹן, Arab. sirwāl), was the skirt-trousers of Persian costume.

Coat of Mail.—See BRIGANDINE and BREAST-PLATE. G. M. MACKIE.

COCK (ἀλέκτωρ, alektor, gallus).—The domestic fowl may be the bird mentioned 1 K 4<sup>23</sup>, כְּרִבְרִים barburim, and translated in AV and RV fatted fowls. It is not unlikely that Solomon, who had commerce with the far E., and imported peacocks and apes from Ophir (1 K 10<sup>22</sup>), might have brought barnyard fowls from the same direction. The original stock of these fowls is usually supposed to be indigenous in farther India and China. Gallus giganteus, of Malacca, seems to be the feral state of some of the larger tame breeds, and G. bankiva, of Java, which is regarded by many as specifically the same as G. ferrugineus, the jungle fowl, is supposed to be the parent of our ordinary poultry. In India, poultry have been domesticated from the earliest times. But no representation of them is found on the Egyptian monuments. Pindar mentions the cock, and Homer names a man Ἀλέκτωρ, the word for a cock. Aristophanes calls it a Persian bird. It may have been introduced into Pal. before it came to Greece. Nevertheless, unless in this doubtful passage, it is not mentioned in OT. Commentators have tried various other renderings of barburim, as swans, guinea fowls, geese, eapons, and fatted fish. But these are pure conjectures.

The Romans were very much given to raising fowls, both for food and for cock-fighting. The Mishna states that cocks were not allowed in Jerus., for fear of polluting the holy things. But there is rabbinic evidence that the Jews kept fowls. The Romans and other foreigners also kept them.

The cock is mentioned in NT in connexion with Peter's denial of Christ (Mt 26<sup>74, 75</sup> etc.). Cock-crowing (Mk 13<sup>35</sup>) refers to the habit of crowing before the dawn. This is the second cock-crowing (Mk 14<sup>30</sup>), the first being at midnight, but less certain or less heard than the second. Hence the other evangelists speak of the crowing of the cock without specifying that it was to be a second one (Mt 26<sup>34</sup>, Lk 22<sup>34</sup>, Jn 13<sup>38</sup>). In point of fact, cocks crow somewhat irregularly at intervals in the night. The hen is alluded to (Lk 13<sup>34</sup>) with reference to her motherly care of her brood, with which the Saviour compares his solicitude for Jerusalem. G. E. POST.

COCKATRICE.—See SERPENT.

COCK-CROWING (ἀλεκτοροφωνία, Mk 13<sup>35</sup>).—See COCK, TIME.

COCKER.—Sir 30<sup>9</sup> 'C. thy child, and he shall make thee afraid,' that is 'pamper' (Gr. τιθηνέω, nurse, suckle). Cf. Shuks. King John v. i. 70—

'Shall a heedless boy,

A cocker'd silken wanton, brave our fields?'

and Hull (1611) 'No creatures more cocker their young than the Asse and the Ape.' The word is not found earlier than the 15th cent. Its origin is obscure. J. HASTINGS.

COCKLE (כִּפְתָּר bo'shakh, βάρος, spina).—The last word of the second member of a parallelism (Job 31<sup>40</sup>), 'instead of wheat let thistles grow, and instead of barley, cockle.' The signification of the parallel word כִּפְתָּר bo'shakh is general, brier or bramble. Therefore this word should be general. And as the first is harmful, the second should be the same. The root of the word is כָּפַר='stink,' hence the marginal renderings, AV stinking weeds, RV noisome weeds, suit the case well. There is no want of such in the Holy Land. There are a number of ill-smelling goose weeds, Solanum nigrum, L., Datura Stramonium, L. (the stink-weed par excellence), D. Metel, L., and several fetid arums, and henbane, and mandrake. Neglected fields are overrun by the host of thorny and unsavoury weeds which afflict the farmer in all parts of Pal. and Syria. Some have thought that bo'shakh means ergot or smut or bunt, and others tares. There is, however, no ground for this.

A word from the same root, כִּפְתָּר bē'ashkām (Is 5<sup>2, 4</sup>), is tr. in AV and RV wild grapes. The context and the etymology are against this rendering. The terrible judgment pronounced against the vineyard (vv. 5-6) might seem unjust if the product were simply inferior. The contrast must be as sharp as in v. 7—between judgment and oppression, between righteousness and the cry of the oppressed. We should therefore look for some ill-smelling fruit, having some resemblance to a grape, and occurring in vineyards. Such plants are Solanum nigrum, L., and its congeners S. miniatum, Berb., and S. villosum, Lam., called in Arab. 'inab-edh-dhib, wolf's grapes.' They are of a heavy narcotic odour, and poisonous, and grow commonly in the vineyards. Celsius supposes aconite; but the latter is not found south of Amanus, and hence would not be known to the readers of Isaiah. It is perhaps better to regard bē'ishim as stinking fruits in general, and bō'shah as stinking weeds.

COELE-SYRIA (Κολη Συρία, 'hollow Syria') was the name given under the Seleucids to the valley between the Lebanons (Polyb. i. 3; Dionysius, Perieg. 899, 900), and this restricted meaning is retained in 1 Es 4th. The same restriction appears in Am 1st, where, however, 'the valley of Aven' (which see) cannot be certainly identified with Coele-Syria. 'The valley of Lebanon' (Jos 11th 12th) denotes the same district. Strabo (xvi. 2) confines the term to this valley in describing the boundaries of the separate parts of Syria; but he also uses it more widely as covering the whole of Συρία or 'Syria of Damascus.' Theophrastus, too (Hist. plant. ii. 6. 2; see also ii. 6. 8), extends the name to the valley of the Lower Jordan, and in ii. 6. 5 to the neighbourhood of the Red Sea. Under the later Seleucids it almost loses geogr. limitations altogether, and becomes a convenient name for a political division of the empire, the central valley always being included, but the boundaries being extended or contracted with every change in the relative influence of the local governors. For some time Phœnicia and Coele-Syria include between them the whole of the southern part of the Seleucid kingdom, and the latter term covers the entire district E. and S. of Lebanon. The term is so used in 1 Es 2nd 27. 24. 27 6th 7th 8th, 2 Mac 3rd 4th 8th 10th; and the relation between the two provinces is so close that a single governor generally suffices for both. In 1 Mac 10th the settlement of Jewish affairs is entrusted almost as a matter of course to the governor of Coele-Syria, and in 2 Mac 3rd Jerus. is expressly represented as within that province. In later times Jos. (Ant. xiv. 4. 5) wrote of the province as stretching from the Euphrates to Egypt; and within it were the Phil. coast towns of Raphia (Jos. Wars. iv. xi. 5; Polyb. v. 80) and Joppa (Diodor. xix. 59). But he generally confines the term to the districts E. of the Jordan, including Moab and Ammon (Ant. i. xi. 5; Ptol. v. 15), and admitting Scythopolis (Bethshan) because of its connexion with the Decapolis (Ant. xiii. xiii. 2). He mentions also specifically Gadara (Ant. xiii. xiii. 3) as in the province, whilst the evidence of coins places within it also the neighbouring towns of Abila and Philadelphia (Rabbah); and Stephen of Byzantium adds Dium, Gerasa, and Philotera (Polyb. v. 70). Strictly, therefore, the term does not cover Judæa and Samaria, but was made to do so when it was wished to assert or enforce Syrian claims to those districts. In Jos. Ant. xii. iv. 1-4, in the time of Ptolemy Evergetes, the fiscal system and prob. the entire administration of C. are distinct from those of Judæa and Samaria. In the civil wars between the sons of Antiochus Grypus (B.C. 95-83), C., with Damascus prob. as its capital, was the name of a trans-Jordanic kingdom, separate from that of Syria proper. In B.C. 47 Herod was appointed by Sextus Cæsar (Jos. Ant. xiv. ix. 5; Wars. i. x. 8), and again by Cassius in B.C. 43 (Jos. Ant. xiv. xi. 4; Wars. i. xi. 4), military governor of C.; but on neither of these occasions did his appointment carry the exercise of any authority within Judæa.

COFFER occurs only in 1 S 6th 11. 15, and the Heb. term (קֶפֶס, LXX θησαυρος), of which it is the tr<sup>a</sup>, is also found nowhere else. From the fact that in the above passages the word has the article, some have inferred that an 'argāz was an appendage to every cart (āghālāh), but this is not necessary (Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. p. 43 f.). The 'argāz appears to have been a small chest which contained (?) the golden figures sent by the Philistines as a guilt-offering. (Cf., however, the LXX, and see Wellhausen and Budde on the text of the passage.)

COLLAR.—1. The collars of Jg 8th (נִשְׁמִיתָ) are golden ear-drops, RV pendants. 2. The ref. in Job 30th is to the collar-band (חֶגֶר) of the undergarment or coat (kēthōneth). In v. 17 the symptoms of high fever are pierced bones and gnawing pains; hence in v. 18 the complaint that his large outer-garment or cloak (צִדְדֵי), in which he vainly tried to sleep, had become so completely soaked through with the fever-sweats that it clung around him like the collar of his coat. It is frequently assumed that the reference is to Job's emaciated condition, which causes his outer garment to cling to him like the neck of the close-fitting inner tunic. Davidson suggests that the idea may be that through Job's writhing under his pains his clothes are twisted tightly about him. Dillmann finds a reference to the unnatural swelling of Job's body by elephantiasis, till his garment becomes tight like a collar.
G. M. MACKIE.

COLLECTION occurs in AV of 2 Ch 24th 9 as tr<sup>a</sup> of מַסָּעִת (mas'eth), and in 1 Co 16th as tr<sup>a</sup> of λογία (logia, a ἀν. λογ.) [all]. In v. 17 the reference is to the tax prescribed in Ex 30th 16 (P), and RV more suitably tr<sup>a</sup> 'tax.' The NT reference is to the collection made by St. Paul in the Gentile Churches for the poor at Jerusalem. RV retains the word and also substitutes 'collections' in v. 3 for AV 'gatherings' (where the same Gr. word occurs in the plur. λογισται). See COMMUNION 3, TRIBUTE, MONEY.

COLLEGE (קֶלֶה; LXX 2 K 22nd 14 μασὲν; 2 Ch 34th μασαραν; Zeph 1st ἀπὸ τῆς δευτέρας; Vulg. in secunda).—This word properly denotes the 'second quarter' of the city; RV 'the second quarter,' m. 'Heb. Mishneh'—comp. AvM 'in the second part'; in 2 Ch 34th AvM. gives also 'the school.' From Zeph 1st, where the term occurs again (AV 'the second'), it appears that this quarter of Jerusalem was not far from the Fish-gate, which lay on the north or north-west of the city (Neh 3rd 12th). It was perhaps first enclosed within the walls in the time of Manasseh (2 Ch 33rd). Probably the 'second quarter' lay to the west of the temple-mount, in the hollow between this and the northern portion of the western hill, the modern Sion. It would thus occupy the upper end of the Tyropœan Valley (comp. Jos. Ant. xv. xi. 5).

The Targ. Jonathan on 2 K 22nd 14 renders by בֵּית מִשְׁנָה, i.e. 'house of instruction.' This Jewish tradition is clearly the origin of the rendering 'college' in the AV. It is doubtless due to the influence of the post-biblical Heb. word Mishna, which, meaning originally 'repetition,' deutērosis, came to signify the doctrine of the law, and especially the oral law.

COLLOP.—A collop is a slice of meat, but in Job 15<sup>27</sup> 'he . . . maketh collops of fat on his flanks,' it is used in the now obsolete sense (except in dialects) of 'a thick fold of flesh on the body as evidence of a well-fed condition.' Cf. Fuller, Worthies, i. 166, 'Fat folk (whose collops stick to their sides) are generally lazy.' J. HASTINGS.

COLONY.—Colony (Κολωνία, a literal transcript of the well-known Latin designation) occurs in NT only at Ac 16<sup>12</sup>, where it is applied to Philippi. The Roman colonies belonged to three periods and classes: (1) those of the earlier republic before 100 B.C.—the burgess and Latin colonies, which served as curb-fortresses and influential centres of Roman authority in conquered or annexed territory; (2) those of the Gracchan times—the agrarian colonies, provided as an outlet for the starving and clamorous proletariat of the capital; and (3) those of the Civil wars and the Empire, termed military colonies, intended for the reception and settlement of soldiers disbanded at the end of their service or at the close of war. While in the former classes the colony was initiated by a formal law (lex), and carried out by a commission (generally of three), the later, or military colony, was established simply by the imperator, in the exercise of his imperium, nominating a legate to give effect to his will. To this latter class Philippi belonged. It had already received (as we learn from Strabo, vii. fr. 41) something of this character after the defeat of Brutus and Cassius in the adjoining plain in the year 42 B.C.; but its full organization as a colony was the work of Augustus, who, having to provide for his soldiers after the battle of Actium (B.C. 31), gifted to them (as we learn from Dio Cassius, li. 4) cities and lands in Italy which had belonged to partisans of Antonius, and transferred most of the inhabitants thereby dispossessed to other quarters, esp. to Dyrrhachium and Philippi. The latter thenceforth bore, in inscriptions and on coins, the name Colonia Aug. Jul. Philippi or Philippensis. The community thus constituted possessed (Dig. 50, tit. 15, sec. 8) the privileged position known to jurists as that of the ius Italicum, which apparently carried, in addition to the right of freedom (libertas), and that of exemption from poll-tax and tribute (immunitas), the right of holding the soil in full ownership under the forms of Roman law (ex iure Quiritium). (On the development of the Roman colonial system, see Marquardt, Handb. iv. 427 ff., on the military colonies, pp. 449-56; and on Philippi in particular, Mommsen, CIL iii. i. p. 120.)

WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

COLOSSÆ (Κολοσσαί) was an ancient city of Phrygia (very important in early history, dwindling in the later centuries as Laodicea waxed greater), overhanging the river Lycus (a tributary of the Mæander) on the upper part of its course. It was distant only about ten miles from Laodicea and thirteen from Hierapolis; and hence the three cities formed a single sphere of missionary labour for Epaphras, an inhabitant of C. (Col 4<sup>12,13</sup>). Churches were formed in these three cities at a very early period, partly by the work of Epaphras, but also through the work of Timothy, who had evidently come into personal relations with C. (Col 1<sup>1</sup>), and probably of other preachers. In Rev 1<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> the single Church of Laodicea must be taken as representative of the Churches of the whole Lycus valley. Paul himself had not been at Laodicea or at C. (Col 2<sup>1</sup>). C., like Laodicea (which see), stood on the most important route of commerce and intercourse in the eastern part of the Rom. Empire; it was therefore a place where new ideas and new thoughts were always likely to be simmering, and the new religion seems to have developed there with feverish rapidity, and not in a direction that satisfied St. Paul. During his first imprisonment in Rome, the report which was brought to him by Epaphras of the religious views and practices in C. called forth an Epistle, in which he rebuked the tendency of the Colossians to stray from the straight path under the influence partly of Judaism (observance of Sabbaths, etc., Col 2<sup>16</sup>; circumcision hinted at, 2<sup>11</sup>), and partly of a species of theosophic speculation, which sought to find demonic or angelic powers intermediate between the supreme unapproachable God and human beings,—a kind of speculation springing from an attempt to express the ideas of Christianity in the terms and forms of the philosophic and religious thought current in Phrygia and in Asia generally. The Judaic elements in this Colossian development of Christianity show that Jewish teachers had visited it, and that Jewish religion and thought had influenced the population; and from the position of the city such influence is natural, and Jewish traders had probably settled in it for commercial purposes (especially trade in the beautiful wool of the peculiar colour called Colossinus, perhaps dark purple). There is, however, no evidence that an actual settlement of Jews at C. as colonists by any of the Seleucid kings ever occurred (as is probable or certain at Laodicea, Tarsus, etc., which see); for such a settlement was considered as a re-foundation, and was usually accompanied by change of name. Again, the semi-Gnostic style of Colossian speculation revealed to us by the Epistle shows that the Lycus valley was the seat of some philosophic activity, which had doubtless its centre at Laodicea (which see), but extended to the other cities. The same kind of speculation long clung to the valley, as Theodoret mentions in the 5th century; and in the 9th and 10th centuries Michael, the leader of the host of angels, was worshipped as the great saint of C. (and of its later representative Chonæ), and a legend was told of his appearance to save the city from a great inundation. C. disappeared from history during the 7th or 8th cent., being too much exposed to the terrible raids of the Saracens; and it was succeeded by Chonæ (now called Chonas), a fortress about three miles farther south, in a lofty situation, with an impregnable castle upon the steep slope of Mount Cadmus (summit 8013 ft.). In 787 Bishop Dositheus took his title from C., but had his actual home in Chonæ (ἐπίσκοπος Κολοσσῶν ἤτοι Χωνῶν); but in 870 and 879 Samuel was bishop (afterwards archbishop) of Chonæ, and C. had been practically forgotten.

Colossæ is a grecized form of a Phrygian word (modified to give an apparent meaning in Greek, as if connected with κολοσσός); and the native form was more like Κολασσαί (cf. Abbott on Col 1<sup>2</sup>). Hence the ethnic Κολασσαῖος occurs in the (not original) title of the Epistle, and in several Byzantine lists of bishops. Κολοσσαῖος is the invariable ethnic on coins.

LITERATURE.—The exact site of C. was first determined by Hamilton, Researches in Asia Minor, i. p. 508; Arundel and other travellers had previously visited the modern Chonas, and believed it to be C. The situation and history of C. and Chonæ are very fully described in Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, chs. i. and vi., and Ch. in the Rom. Emp. ch. xix.

W. M. RAMSAY.

COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—This Epistle forms one of a closely connected group of three. It is linked on the one hand to the little letter to Philemon by the group of personal salutations common to the two, and on the other to the Ep. to 'the Ephesians' by a remarkable and intricate community of contents, by the fact that the two letters are entrusted to the same messenger (47, cf. Eph 6<sup>21</sup>), and probably by an express reference in the Colossians to the sister Epistle under the title of 'the Ep. from Laodicea' in 4<sup>10</sup>.

I. AUTHORSHIP AND DATE.—The various questions which have been raised during the present cent. with respect to the authorship of this group of Epp., and the particular stage in St. Paul's first imprisonment (assuming them to have been written by him) to which they may be most suitably assigned, can be best dealt with in connexion with the Ep. to the Ephes. (which see). For the present it will be enough to say (1) that the admitted differences in language, style, and, to a certain extent, in doctrine, between this group of Epp. and those of the central period, 1 and 2 Co, Gal, Ro, are by no means sufficient to establish a diversity of authorship; and (2) that two facts, (a) the conversion of Onesimus, who, as far as we know, could hardly have had access to St. Paul in Caesarea, and (b) the remarkable development in the doctrine of the Ecclesia, which marks Eph, make it on the whole most probable that the whole group was written from Rome shortly before the outbreak of the Neronian persecution.

II. DESTINATION.—The situation of Colossae and the chief elements in its population have already been described (see COLOSSÆ). It will be enough here to notice that whatever may have been the proportion of resident Jews in the place, St. Paul treats the Church throughout as specifically a Gentile Church (1<sup>27</sup>). It is this fact which brings them within his sphere of influence, and explains the tone in which he addresses them. The difficult and obscure references in 2<sup>14</sup> τὸ χειρὸν γραφὸν τοῖς δόγμασιν ὃ ἦν ὑπερνάντιον ἡμῖν, and in 2<sup>8</sup> τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, both of which must refer chiefly, if not exclusively, to the law of Moses, are not really inconsistent with this. Language of fundamentally the same import occurs in Gal 3<sup>23</sup> 4<sup>3</sup>, esp. 4<sup>9</sup> (πρωτὰ στοιχεῖα οἱς πάλιν ἄνωθεν δουλεύσαι θέλετε). Before the coming of Christ the only way by which a Gentile could enjoy the privileges of the covenant people was by accepting circumcision and submitting to all the ordinances of the law.

St. Paul's language in the Epistle leaves no doubt that the Church at Colossae had not been directly founded by him, and that he was personally unknown to the bulk of its members, though individuals among them, such as Philemon, may have met him during his long stay at Ephesus, and have owed their conversion to him.

Ramsay's interpretation of τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη (Ac 19<sup>1</sup>) would make it probable that St. Paul had not, even on his third missionary journey, traversed the valley of the Lycus. But in any case there is no hint of the existence of a Christian Church in that locality at the time of that journey, and still less of any evangelistic activity of St. Paul's there, and so, by whatever road St. Paul reached Ephesus, there is nothing in Ac inconsistent with the obvious meaning of the Epistle.

III. OBJECT AND CONTENTS.—The object of this Ep. is to bring before the Colossians a true ideal of Christian life and practice, based on a true conception of the relation of Christ to the universe and to the Church. It was occasioned by the appearance in Colossae of a form of false teaching, which, under the garb of a 'philosophy' (2<sup>9</sup>), was enticing men back to the trammels of an outward asceticism. The practices to which reference is made (2<sup>16</sup>), are in some cases, perhaps in all, distinctively Jewish. And it is probable that they were put forward as the gateway to a higher state of purification than that which was accessible to the ordinary believer. It is uncertain to what extent these practices were connected with any definitely formulated metaphysical or cosmological theories. The term 'philosophy,' as Hort has shown (Judaistic Christianity, p. 120 ff.), does not necessarily imply more than an ethical system. Yet the Colossians were in danger, actual or prospective (2<sup>3-4</sup>), of doctrinal error respecting the Person of Christ. And some of St. Paul's language regarding Christ's relation to 'the principalities and powers' (1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>10</sup>) would gain in point if we might suppose that a speculative justification of the 'worship of angels' had already been put forward, involving expressly 'either a limitation of His nature to the human sphere, or at most a counting of Him among the angels.' On the other hand, substantially similar language occurs in Eph 1<sup>21</sup>, where there is no necessity to postulate any polemic reference. And it is hard to believe that St. Paul would have contented himself with this indirect method of attack, if the error had already taken such definite shape. In any case there seems no sufficient ground for postulating a specifically Gnostic or Oriental (non-Jewish) influence on the Church at Colossae. Above all, the later Valentinian usage of πλῆρωμα throws back no light on the meaning of the term in the cardinal passages in which it occurs in Col 1<sup>19</sup> 2<sup>9</sup> and Eph 1<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>.

The key to the positive teaching of the Ep. is certainly to be found in the conception of the Person and the Work of Christ which it unfolds. Over against the false philosophy, and as the assurance of the perfect satisfaction of the genuine human need of assistance in the attainment of truth to which that philosophy appealed, St. Paul sets the thought of Christ as the Image of the Invisible God (1<sup>15</sup>), the perfect manifestation in human form of the Eternal Truth, 'the Mystery of God' (2<sup>3</sup>), in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Did men aspire after a new ideal of moral development? Their aspirations were not in vain, because the fulness of the divine perfections had found a permanent embodiment and home in One who had taken our nature upon Him, and borne and bears a human form (2<sup>8</sup>, cf. 1<sup>10</sup>). Did they quail before the material forces of this world's potentates that were arrayed against them, or lose their hold of the inherent dignity that belonged to them, as men in the presence of the countless multitudes of the hosts of heaven? There was no power in the universe but from Him. And He had revealed upon the Cross the impotence of all the powers that had set themselves in array to thwart His purposes (2<sup>15</sup>). The evil from which they were longing to get free clung so close that it might seem almost an integral part of their being; and they were willing to submit to any discipline that would set them free. In the death of Christ they could attain to the reality of that deliverance from the corruption of their nature which had been foreshadowed by circumcision (2<sup>11</sup>), as they realized the newness of life which was theirs by union with His resurrection.

The following analysis may help to bring out the sequence of thought, and to show how this central conception is interwoven with the whole of the Epistle.

A. The opening section, after the salutation (vv. 1, 2), is devoted to an elaborately expanded thanksgiving (3<sup>24</sup>). St. Paul singles out for special mention the fruitfulness of the knowledge of the truth among the Colossians as witnessed by their evangelist Epaphras (3<sup>18</sup>), and prays for a further development, springing from the same source, to take practical effect in walking worthily of the Lord, as they give thanks to the Father for their deliverance from the power of darkness into the kingdom of the Son of His love (3<sup>15</sup>). This reference to the Son leads to a full, though condensed, statement of the office of the Son—

(a) In relation to the universe as the source and goal, and the present principle of coherence for all creation (1<sup>15-17</sup>), and not only the permanent home of all the divine perfections, but also the source of an all-embracing reconciliation by His death (18-20).—a reconciliation the power of which the Colossians had already experienced, and which would not fail of its final consummation if they continued as they had begun, faithful adherents of the world-wide gospel, of which St. Paul was in a special sense the minister.
(b) In relation to the Church as being, now in His risen state,

B. This personal reference forms the starting-point of the second section of the Ep. (124-25), in which St. Paul introduces himself to his correspondents, explaining his unique position in relation to the consummation of the divine revelation, and his efforts to bring the hearts of all men under the full power of its influence (124-25). This will help them to understand the interest that he takes in them and in their neighbours, even though they had never met in the flesh, and also the ground for his prayer for their enlightenment (21-3). This section closes with a brief warning against some plausible deceiver, coupled with a renewed assurance of his close sympathy with them, and his joy in their constancy (4-5).

C. He passes now to a series of special exhortations and warnings, which occupy two chapters (26-49), and fall into five subdivisions.

(a) The first of these (26-19) is in its main purpose an exhortation to retain their hold on and to develop into all its practical consequences the personal relation to Christ which the gospel had made known to them. As this was the point on which the Colossians had most to fear from false teachers, the exhortation (4-7) is accompanied by an explicit warning (8), and a careful statement of the grounds on which the Christian who grasps the true conception of the Person of Christ is assured of a complete moral development, and receives, by union in baptism with the death and resurrection of Christ, the reality of that separation from his evil nature which had been foreshadowed by circumcision (9-15). In the light of this thought, the attractiveness of outward observances for the attainment of purity and the necessity for angelic mediation disappear (16-19).

(b) In the second subdivision (20-34) union with the death of Christ is shown to be a deliverance from formal and material restrictions, and union with His resurrection determines the true sphere of Christian thought and life.

(c) The third subdivision develops the same thought in its present practical application to moral effort, with relation (1) to the appetites and passions (the members on the earth) which need to be done to death, and the evil habits which must be stripped off (35-41); and (2) to the new graces which the Christian must seek to acquire (12-14), and the new principles by which he should regulate his practice (15-17).

(d) The fourth subdivision (31-41) applies the new principle to the fundamental relations of family life, husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants.

(e) The last subdivision (42-9) contains an exhortation to perseverance in prayer, and to discretion in their relations with the heathen world.

D. The letter closes with a commendation of the messengers, Tychicus and Onesimus, by whose hands it was sent (47-9), and a group of personal salutations (10-16).

IV. INTEGRITY.—Now, if this be a true account of the connexion between the different parts of the letter, there is little room left for questioning the substantial integrity of the document as it has come down to us,—least of all for any such theory as that of Holtzmann, even in the modified form proposed by von Soden, which requires us to believe that its most characteristic christological passages have been added by an interpolator. The letter must clearly be accepted or rejected as a whole. Holtzmann's theory no doubt deserves all the respect which is due to honest and scholarly workmanship. But it has failed to find support even in the land in which it was produced. And after Sanday's criticism of it in Smith's DB<sup>2</sup> no useful end would be served by a detailed examination of it here.

There remains, however, the subordinate question of the integrity of the text. And here it is by no means so easy to speak with confidence. In one or two cases, notably in 2<sup>18</sup> and 2<sup>2</sup>, it is difficult, if not impossible, to accept any of the attested readings. We are therefore forced to accept Hort's conclusion (App. p. 127), that 'this Epistle, and more especially its second chapter, appears to have been ill preserved in ancient times.' And it may well be, as Sanday has suggested, that some of the harshnesses which have led to suspicion of interpolation may be due to primitive corruptions in the transmitted text.

LITERATURE.—Of Eng. Comm. the most complete is that of Lightfoot, whose conclusions should, however, be carefully checked by reference to the sections in Judaistic Christianity, in which Hort examines minutely into the characteristics of the false teaching prevalent at Colossae. Other commentaries:—Barry, J. Id. Davies, H. C. G. Moule, Maclaren, T. K. Abbott, and (German) De Wette, Ewald, Lange, Meyer. COLOURS.—In his Juventus Mundi (p. 540) Gladstone sums up the main conclusions of his investigations into the sense of colour in Homer (cf. Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age, iii. 457 ff.):—1. His perceptions of colour, considered as light decomposed, though highly poetical, are also very indeterminate. 2. His perceptions of light not decomposed as varying between light and dark, white and black, are most vivid and effective. 3. Accordingly, his descriptions of colour generally tend a good deal to range themselves in a scale (so to speak) of degrees rather than of kinds of light. Very much the same may be said of the colour-sense among the Hebrews. Even in Mesopotamia the colours used in the painting and enamelling of walls were only some five or six in number, and were used for effects of brilliance rather than of actual representation of natural coloured objects (Perrot and Chipiez, History of Art in Chaldaea and Assyria, vol. ii. p. 295). Among the Hebrews the pictorial arts seem to have been at first unknown, and later were discouraged on religious grounds. Dyeing was the only art connected with colours known to them before the time of Ezekiel, and even here the result rather than the process was familiar. Consequently, the references to colour in the oldest literature are very simple. In the Song of Deborah (Jg 5<sup>30</sup>) dyed stuffs and embroideries (of various colours) are mentioned without any further distinction. In the Song of the Bow (2 S 1<sup>24</sup>), 'scarlet' raiment is the gift of the king. In the 'Oldest Book of Hebrew Hist.' (JE), the only colours mentioned are black (Gn 30<sup>20-21</sup>), white (Gn 49<sup>12</sup>), scarlet (Gn 38<sup>28-30</sup>), red (Gn 25<sup>25</sup>), and grey (Gn 44<sup>20</sup>). All these are used of natural objects. Later, the dyed wares of Phoenicia were introduced and largely used among the Hebrews, whose acquaintance with colours was thus enlarged, though at no time was it very precise in its nature or extensive in its comprehension.

In like manner the symbolism of colours in OT and NT is very simple. It may be classed as (a) literary, (b) apocalyptic, (c) ritual.

(a) Illustrations of the first use will be found under the individual colours. It is to be found in the literature of most nations, especially in poetical language.

(b) The apocalyptic use of colour as symbol is found in a simple form in Zec, in a more developed in Dn, and in its most complete form in the Apocalypse.

(c) In matters pertaining to ritual (esp. in the tabernacle), colours are frequently used, but it has not yet been satisfactorily shown that they were used symbolically, or that they were other than the most brilliant colours procurable when the descriptions were given. They are only thus mentioned in P and Ch. In Alexandria, however, in the 1st cent. they were all interpreted symbolically by Philo, who says (de Vita Mos. iii. 6) that they represent the elements—fine flax (white), the earth; purple, water; hyacinth (blue), air; scarlet, fire (so also Jos. Ant. III. vii. 7).

BLACK is used in OT only of natural objects. (1) שָׁחָר of hair Lv 13<sup>36</sup>, Ca 5<sup>1</sup>, horses Zec 6<sup>2,6</sup>, skin that is burnt with the sun Ca 1<sup>5</sup>, and that peels off in disease Job 30<sup>30</sup>. (2) שָׁחָר is used of sheep only Gn 30<sup>21,35</sup>, and is rendered in LXX by φαῖος, a word denoting the greyness of twilight, or any mixture of black and white. In v.<sup>40</sup> it is an interpolation. (3) The verb שָׁחָר (originally 'to be dirty, foul') is used of the darkened sky Jer 4<sup>28</sup>, 1 K 18<sup>36</sup>, and from its original meaning comes to signify mourning Jer 8<sup>21</sup> 14<sup>2</sup>, Ezk 31<sup>15</sup>, Mal 3<sup>14</sup>. It is also used of the dark colour of ice-covered water Job 6<sup>16</sup>. In Pr 7<sup>2</sup> 'blackness of night' is literally as in RVm 'pupil of eye of night.' In Ep. Jer (v.<sup>21</sup>) faces are blackened (μελανομήνους) by smoke. In NT μέλας is used of hair Mt 5<sup>36</sup>, of horses Rev 6<sup>5</sup>, and especially of ink 2 Co 3<sup>3</sup> etc.; γνόφος for the darkness of night He 12<sup>18</sup> (cf. Dt 4<sup>11</sup>), and ὄσφος for the darkness of the nether world 2 P 2<sup>24</sup> (cf. Homer, Il. xxi. 56). It is used symbolically for affliction and death Zec 6<sup>2-6</sup> ('famine in consequence of a siege,' cf. Hitzig-Steiner's Comm.), La 4<sup>8</sup>, and as above for 'mourning' generally Mal 3<sup>14</sup>.

BLUE (חֹלֶחַ, LXX βάκινθος, δασυρόφυρος only in Nu 4<sup>7</sup>, cf. Xen. Cyrop. VIII. iii. 13). In NT there is no mention of this colour. In Assy. the word tu-kil-tu occurs in several inscriptions (Delitzsch, Assyr. Heb. p. 706). This colour seems to have been a violet-purple as distinguished from שָׁחָר (see PURPLE), but even in early times there was great indefiniteness in its use (cf. Talm. Bab. Menachoth 44<sup>a</sup>, and for use of βάκινθος and hyacinthus in classical writers see Kitto, Cyclop. of Bibl. Lit. i. 40 f.). It was obtained from a shell-fish found on the Phoen. coast attached to the rocks. The Targ. pseudo-Jonathan to Dt 33<sup>19</sup> calls it חֹלֶחַ, and this is usually identified with Helix ianthina. (For other purple-producing shell-fish see PURPLE.) Blue was used often with purple (see below) and scarlet (see SCARLET) in the curtains of the tabernacle (Ex 26<sup>1</sup>), the veil of the ark (26<sup>31</sup>), the screen of the tent-door (26<sup>36</sup>), the screen of the gates of the court (27<sup>16</sup>), parts connected with the ephod (28), the mitre (28<sup>37</sup>), and the girdle (39<sup>29</sup>) of the priest, also in the coverings of the table of shewbread, the candlesticks, the golden altar, and the vessels of the sanctuary (Nu 4). A cord of blue was to be put on the fringes or tassels of the Israelites' garments (Nu 15<sup>38</sup>). In the veil, before the holiest place in Solomon's temple, blue was inwrought with purple and crimson according to the Chronicler (2 Ch 3<sup>14</sup>). It was also used in the clothing of idols (Jer 10<sup>9</sup>). In Ezk it is the colour of the clothing of young Assy. nobles (23<sup>6</sup>), and in his description of the luxury of Tyre, awnings of blue and purple were their coverings on ships; and bales of blue and brodered work were among their merchandise (27<sup>17-24</sup>). Hangings of white and blue cloth figure in the palace of Ahasuerus (Est 1<sup>6</sup>), and royal apparel is of blue and white (Est 8<sup>15</sup>). In Pr 20<sup>26</sup> the AV 'blueness of a wound' is correctly given in RV as 'stripes that would.'

GREEN (in Heb. various derivatives of the root קָרַן, cf. Assy. arāku, 'to be pale' [Delitzsch, Assyr. Heb. p. 243]. Gr. χλωρός).—It is used exclusively of vegetation Gn 1<sup>30</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, Mk 6<sup>39</sup>, Rev 8<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>4</sup> etc. Greenish, יֶרֶקֶק, that is, inclining to yellow, is used of the plague of leprosy in skin or garment Lv 13<sup>49</sup> 14<sup>37</sup>. The same word is used of gold Ps 68<sup>18</sup> (RV

'yellow'). In the many other passages where the word 'green' occurs in RV, the Heb. equivalent contains no reference to colour.

GREY is used only of 'grey hair,' Heb. שֵׁבֶרֶק Gn 44<sup>29</sup> etc.

PURPLE (LXX and NT πορφύρα, πορφύρεος, Heb. קָרְמָז, Aram. קָרְמָז, Assy. Argamannu, Del. Assyr. Heb. p. 129).—This was a precious dye of a red-purple colour obtained from the shell-fish Murex trunculus, near Tyre, and Murex brandaris on the shores of Taranto and the Peloponnesus. The Phoenicians seem to have long monopolized the sale (and perhaps the preparation) of it, not only on their own coasts, but on those of the 'isles of Elishah' (acc. to Targ. on Gn 10<sup>1</sup>=Italy, more probably=Greece, Ἐλλάς; cf. Smend's Comm.), Ezk 27<sup>7</sup>, and in the manufactories of Syria (Ezk 27<sup>16</sup>). In later times the dye was sold (and manufactured?) in Asia (Ac 16<sup>14</sup>), and in Pliny's time in the islands on the N. coast of Africa and Madeira (HN ix. 36, vi. 36; cf. Strabo, 835). For other methods of preparing purple see Vitruvius, vii. 13, 14. Purple was used—generally in combination with blue and scarlet—in the curtains and veils of the tabernacle, in certain parts of the priests' dress and ornaments, and alone in the cloth spread on the altar (Ex 26-28. 35. 39, Nu 4<sup>13</sup>, cf. Sir 45<sup>10</sup>), also in Solomon's temple (see BLUE). It was especially the colour used in the raiment and trappings of royalty. The kings of Midian wore purple raiment (Jg 8<sup>26</sup>), so did the royal courtiers of Persia (Est 8<sup>16</sup>), of Babylon (Dn 5<sup>7-16</sup> 20), and of Syria (2 Mac 4<sup>36</sup>). The fittings of Solomon's palanquin (Ca 3<sup>10</sup>) and the cords in the hangings of the palace of Ahasuerus (Est 1<sup>6</sup>) were of purple; and the absence of this colour from the dress of the all-powerful Romans was noted with surprise (1 Mac 8<sup>14</sup>). Purple is thus the sign of royalty and nobility (Pr 31<sup>22</sup>, Rev 17<sup>4</sup> 18<sup>12,16</sup>), and hence it is used in the dressing of idols (Jer 10<sup>9</sup>, Ep. Jer<sup>12</sup>). A purple robe was put on our Lord in mockery before his crucifixion (Mk 15<sup>17</sup> [πορφύραν], Jn 19<sup>2</sup> [ἱμάτιον πορφύρεον]), but Mt 27<sup>28</sup> reads 'scarlet' [χλαμύδα κόκκινην]. In Ca 7<sup>2</sup> the brilliance of the hair is compared with that of purple (see SCARLET, Comm.).

RED (אָדָם and אָדָמָה; for other words see below, LXX and NT πυρρός, πυρρόακτος, πυρρόζων. In Assy. the root adn is used for dark-red as of blood [Delitzsch, Assyr. Heb. p. 26]).—This colour is in most passages used of natural objects, as of pottage Gn 25<sup>30</sup>, a heifer Nu 19<sup>2</sup>, water discoloured 2 K 3<sup>22</sup>, wine Pr 23<sup>31</sup> (cf. RVm to Ps 75<sup>8</sup>, Heb. קָרַק), horses Zec 1<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>2</sup>, Rev 6<sup>4</sup>, the face red with weeping Job 16<sup>16</sup> (RVm), and the sky Mt 16<sup>2,3</sup>. But it was also artificially produced (Flinders Petrie says that red-dyed leather was made in Egypt before B.C. 3000). Rams' skins dyed red were used for the covering of the tent of the tabernacle Ex 25<sup>5</sup> 35<sup>7-23</sup> 36<sup>19</sup> 39<sup>24</sup> (see TABERNACLE). Garments dyed red are mentioned in Is 63<sup>2</sup>. In Nah 2<sup>3</sup> the words 'made red' mean dyed red according to Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Siegfried-Stade, but 'lit up by the sun' (cf. 1 Mac 6<sup>30</sup>) according to Hitzig-Steiner's Comm. In Gn 49<sup>12</sup> the word translated 'red' means 'dull' (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. to יָקֵלֵל, and Assy. akālu), and in Est 1<sup>6</sup> 'red' is either 'porphyry' (RVm, cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. to קָרְמָז) or malachite (Ryssels's Commentary). In one passage (Wis 13<sup>4</sup>, see VERMILION) it is the RV rendering of ἐρυθράς.

A lighter shade of the same colour is expressed by the word reddish (רֹדֶדֶק), used of leprous spots on the flesh Lv 13, or on the wall of a house Lv 14<sup>37</sup>.

SCARLET (חֹלֶחַ, חֹלֶחֶה, שָׁחָר, and very commonly חֹלֶחַ, LXX and NT κόκκινος. See also CRIMSON).—It denotes the source of the colour, שָׁחָר the brilliance of it (cf. Pliny, HN xxxiii. 40, 'Cocci nitor'; Martial, x. 76, 'cocco mulio fulget'). It is an artificial colour obtained from the female of an insect (Coccus ilicis) which is found attached to a species of oak, and forms a berry-like protuberance about the size of a cherry-stone. It was found chiefly in Palestine, Asia Minor, and South Europe. The poor of Spain at the time of Pliny paid half their tribute by means of this insect (HN xvi. 12). In OT scarlet is used chiefly of thread (Gn 38<sup>28, 30</sup>, Jos 2<sup>18, 21</sup>), cloth (Nu 4<sup>8</sup>, 2 S 1<sup>24</sup>), and wool (He 9<sup>19</sup>). In the coverings of the tabernacle it was used sometimes alone Nu 4<sup>8</sup>, oftener with purple and blue Ex 26<sup>1, 31</sup> etc. So also in the dress of the priests Ex 28<sup>6</sup> etc., cf. Sir 45<sup>11</sup>. In ordinary life scarlet clothing was a sign of prosperity 2 S 1<sup>24</sup>, Pr 31<sup>2</sup>, La 4<sup>8</sup>. Its brilliance made it a source of attraction Jer 4<sup>30</sup>, and led to the figurative use for what was glaring Is 1<sup>18</sup>. Once only it is used of a natural object, when the lips are compared to a thread of scarlet Ca 4<sup>3</sup>.

SORREL (שָׁרָד) occurs once of horses in Zec 1<sup>8</sup>, where LXX translates by σαρβός, 'dappled grey,' cf. 6<sup>8</sup> (LXX).

VERMILION (Heb. שָׁשִׁי, Gr. μύλτος [but ἐν γραφίδι in Ezk]).—A pigment used among the Assyrians (for refl. see Smith, DB i. 623). Rooms were painted with it Jer 22<sup>14</sup>, images of the Chaldeans are portrayed on a wall with it in a description in Ezk 23<sup>14</sup>, and wooden idols are smeared with it in Wis 13<sup>14</sup>. The Vulg. translates by sinopide in Jer, coloribus in Ezk, and rubrica in Wis. Virgil (Ecl. x. 26 f.) and Pliny (HN xxxv. 45, cf. xxxiii. 36) describe Roman images of deities thus adorned.

WHITE.—In OT the most usual word employed is כָּהָל, LXX λευκός. It is used of such objects as snow Is 1<sup>18</sup>, milk Gn 49<sup>12</sup>, manna Ex 16<sup>31</sup>, horses Zec 1<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>3, 6</sup>, and leprous hair Lv 13. Lebanon seems to have received its name either from the white snow on its summits or the limestone of which it was composed (see Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies, p. 103). In Ca 5<sup>10</sup> the word כָּהָל 'white' (RV) denotes dazzling, and in Dn 7<sup>9</sup> a late word נָהַל is used of raiment. The same root is used in the word translated 'white bread' Gn 40<sup>16</sup>. In NT λευκός is used of natural objects and of linen, but chiefly as the symbol of purity or innocence and holiness, as in the Transfiguration, or of angels Jn 20<sup>12</sup>, etc., the saints Rev 6<sup>11</sup>, or the throne of God Rev 20<sup>11</sup>, or of victory Rev 6<sup>2</sup> 19<sup>11, 14</sup> (cf. Virgil, Aen. iii. 537 f.).

YELLOW (כִּנָּף, ξανθίζουσα) is used in OT only of the hair in leprous sores Lv 13<sup>30, 32, 36</sup> (but see Greenish). In Est 1<sup>6</sup> the word כִּנָּף tr. 'yellow' in RV, 'alabaster' in RVm, probably means 'pearl' or 'mother-of-pearl' (Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Ges-Buhl under כִּנָּף).

In addition to the words denoting specific colours, there are a few used in OT to indicate a mixture, generally of black and white. The chief of these are: 1. Speckled נֶקֶד, literally dotted or spotted, used of sheep and goats, Gn 30. 31. In Jer 12<sup>9</sup> it is used of birds and is a tr. of נֶקֶד, lit. 'dyed.' 2. Spotted נֶקֶד, i.e. covered with patches, Gn 30. The same Heb. word is used in Ezk 16<sup>16</sup> of high places, and is translated in RV 'decked with divers colours.' 3. Ringstraked נֶקֶד, marked with rings or bands Gn 30. 31. 4. Grisled נֶקֶד, marked with white spots resembling hail, used of he-goats Gn 31<sup>10, 12</sup>, of horses Zec 6<sup>3, 6</sup>.

In Jg 5<sup>30</sup> the word נֶקֶד is tr. 'of divers colours' in RV, or 'dyed garments' in RVm (cf. also under Speckled). The word נֶקֶד is tr. 'of divers colours' in 1 Ch 29<sup>2</sup>, of precious stones, similarly in Ezk 17<sup>8</sup> of feathers. In other places it is generally translated 'brodered work.' It is derived from a root which, according to Fleischer, originally meant to make a thing many-coloured by engraving, drawing, writing, or brodering.

G. W. THATCHER.

COLT is not applied in the Bible to the young horse, but to the young ass, and once (Gn 32<sup>16</sup>) to the young camel. Outside the Bible it is not applied to the young of any animal but the horse. See ASS. J. HASTINGS.

COME.—1. Come about, i.e. 'come round,' either lit. 2 Ch 13<sup>18</sup> 'Jeroboam caused an ambushment to c. about behind them' (הִתְקַבֵּל); or fig. 1 S 1<sup>20</sup> 'when the time was c. about' (הָיָה הַיָּמִים הַהֵם on the return of the days). 2. Come again, i.e. 'come back' (see AGAIN), as Jg 15<sup>10</sup> 'when he had drunk, his spirit came a. and he revived' (שָׁבָה). 3. Come at, (1) 'come near,' 'reach,' Dn 6<sup>24</sup> 'the lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces or ever they came at the bottom of the den'; Lk 8<sup>19</sup> 'they could not c. at him for the crowd'; (2) 'come near,' 'touch,' Nu 6<sup>8</sup> 'he shall c. at no dead body' (RV 'c. near to'); (3) so as to have sexual intercourse, Ex 19<sup>18</sup> 'c. not at your wives' (RV 'c. not near a woman'). 4. Come by, 'come near,' esp. so as to get hold of, Ac 27<sup>16</sup> 'we had much work to c. by the boat' (RV, 'we were able, with difficulty, to secure the boat'); cf. Pref. to AV 'Translation it is . . . that removeth the cover of the well, that we may c. by the water'; and Shaks. Two Gent. of Ver. III. i. 125—

'Love is like a child,
That longs for everything that he can come by.'

5. Come in, 'enter upon,' 'begin,' Ro 11<sup>20</sup> 'until the fulness of the Gentiles be c. in' (εἰσέλθουσαι). Cf. Shaks. 2 Henry IV. v. iii. 52—

'Now comes in the sweet of the night.

For the phrase 'He that should come' (ὁ ἐρχόμενος, RV 'he that cometh') see JESUS CHRIST, and MESSIAH. And for the Second Coming see PAROUSIA. J. HASTINGS.

COMELY, COMELINESS.—These words, now slightly archaic in any sense, are quite obsol. in the sense of moral fitness or beauty, a meaning which they have a few times in EV, as Ps 33<sup>1</sup> 'praise is c. for the upright.' Dr. Murray (Oxf. Eng. Dict. s.v.) thinks the earliest meaning of 'comely' may have been 'delicately fashioned,' so that we may compare Jer 6<sup>2</sup> 'the c. and delicate one, the daughter of Zion.' But the usage of AV (foll. by RV) gives us: (1) Befitting, Ec 5<sup>18</sup> 'it is good and c. for one to eat and to drink and to enjoy the good of all his labour'; 1 Co 11<sup>18</sup> 'is it c. that a woman pray unto God uncovered?' (ἀπέρει, RV 'is it seemly?'). (2) Pleasing to the eye, because befitting, Job 41<sup>12</sup> 'his c. proportion' (Amer. RV 'goodly frame'); Ezk 27<sup>10</sup> 'they set forth thy comeliness' (הֵרָא). Then (3) handsome, beautiful, majestic (the distinction 'might be rather called comely than beautiful' being quite modern), Ca 6<sup>4</sup> 'Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah, c. as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners'; Is 53<sup>2</sup> 'he hath no form nor comeliness.' J. HASTINGS.

COMFORT (הֶרֶץ, הֵנִיחָהּ, παράκλησις *).—The state of relief from trouble, or the means of solace. In OT the evils to which the consolations of God are most characteristically opposed are the calamities of the chosen people, while in NT the divine comfort is mainly represented as enabling the individual Christian to endure, and even to rejoice under, the natural ills of human life and the persecutions to which the faithful are subjected. As the sources of comfort

COMFORTER.—See PARACLETE.

COMING OF CHRIST.—See PAROUSIA.

COMMANDMENT.—The distinction bet. 'command,' the order of a secular authority, and 'commandment,' a divine charge, is modern. In older Eng. we find, e.g., Rogers (1642) saying, 'As Papists have done with the second Command'; and in AV 'commandment' is freely used for the orders of a king or other secular power. Thus, Est 2<sup>30</sup> 'Esther did the commandment of Mordecai'; Mt 15<sup>9</sup> 'teaching for doctrines the commandments of men' (ἐντάλματα, RV 'precepts'); Ac 25<sup>23</sup> 'at Festus' commandment Paul was brought forth' (RV 'at the command of Festus'). To give commandment is an archaic phrase often used for the simple vb. 'to command,' and even 'to give in commandment' Ex 34<sup>32</sup> (קָטַב). The vb. to command is itself used in many obsol. constructions. Besides the mod. use to command one to do a thing, or a thing to be done, we find 'c. to do' without the person, Ac 5<sup>34</sup> 'Gamaliel . . . c<sup>ed</sup> to put the men forth.' Sometimes the pers. only is mentioned, as Gn 18<sup>19</sup> 'he will c. his children and his household after him'; sometimes the thing only, as Ps 133<sup>3</sup> 'there the LORD c<sup>ed</sup> the blessing'; or the pers. and thing without the infin. as 1 S 21<sup>12</sup> 'the king hath c<sup>ed</sup> me a business.' The subst. 'command' occurs once in AV, Job 39<sup>27</sup> 'Doth the eagle mount up at thy c.?' and only one earlier occurrence is found in Eng. literature, Shaks. Two Gent. IV. iii. 5—

'One that attends your Ladyship's command.'

For the Ten Commandments see DECALOGUE.

J. HASTINGS.

COMMEND, COMMENDATION.—To c. is now to approve of, speak well of, and in this sense it is used in AV, as Gn 12<sup>15</sup> 'The princes also of Pharaoh saw her, and c<sup>ed</sup> her before Pharaoh' (שָׁבַח RV 'praised'); Pr 12<sup>8</sup> 'A man shall be c<sup>ed</sup> acc. to his wisdom' (שָׁבַח); Ec 8<sup>16</sup> 'I c<sup>ed</sup> mirth' (הִשְׁבַּח); Lk 16<sup>8</sup> 'the Lord c<sup>ed</sup> the unjust steward' (ἐπαινέω). But in older Eng. 'c.' also signified (1) to present a person or thing to another as worthy of approval (mod. recommend): thus, Ro 16<sup>1</sup> 'I c. unto you Phoebe, our sister' (ἀντιστήμι. * So 3<sup>5</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>15</sup>); 1 Co 8<sup>8</sup> 'meat c<sup>eth</sup> us not to God' (ἀντιστήμι). In this sense is commendation used, 2 Co 3<sup>16</sup> [all], 'epistles of c.' (2) To entrust, Lk 23<sup>46</sup> 'Father, into thy hands I c. my spirit,' and Ac 14<sup>23</sup> 20<sup>32</sup> [all παρατίθημι]. Cf. Shaks. Henry VIII. v. i. 17—

'I love you;

And durst commend a secret to your ear.'

J. HASTINGS.

* On the meanings of this verb see Sanday-Headlam on Ro 3<sup>5</sup>, where, as in 5<sup>8</sup>, the meaning is rather 'prove,' 'establish.'

COMMENTARY.—Thus RV translates midhrash (מִדְרָשׁ, AV 'story') in the only passages in which that word is found, 2 Ch 13<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>1</sup>.

'The term Midrash,' says Driver (LOT 497), 'is common in post-Bibl. literature. Darash is "to search out," "investigate," "explore"; as applied to Scripture, to discover or develop a thought not apparent on the surface,—for instance, the hidden meaning of a word, or the particulars implied by an allusion (e.g. what Abraham did in Ur of the Chaldees, what Eldad and Medad said when they prophesied, the circumstances of Moses' death, etc.). The Midrash may be defined as an imaginative development of a thought or theme suggested by Scripture, especially a didactic or homiletic exposition, or an edifying religious story (Tobit and Susanna are thus Midrashim).'

The two Midrashim of OT are (1) 'The Midrash of the Prophet Iddo' (2 Ch 13<sup>22</sup>), and (2) 'The Midrash of the Book of Kings' (24<sup>1</sup>). They were probably didactic developments of the historical narratives we possess, making use of these narratives to emphasize some religious truth; but nothing is known of them beyond their titles. See under CHRONICLES. J. HASTINGS.

COMMERCE.—See TRADE.

COMMON.—1. Following the Gr. (κοινός), c. is used in NT in two chief senses. 1. That is 'c.' which is shared by all, as Ac 2<sup>44</sup> 4<sup>32</sup> 'they had all things c.'; Tit 1<sup>4</sup> 'Titus, mine own son after the c. faith'; Jude<sup>3</sup> 'the common salvation.' 2. That which is common to all is distinguished from that which is peculiar to the few; whence the application to the religious practices of the heathen in contrast with those of the Jews; or of the ordinary people, 'the people of the land' (ἡ γῆ) (2), in contrast with those of the Pharisees—i.e. ceremonially unclean. Thus Ac 10<sup>14</sup> 15 'But Peter said, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything that is c. or unclean.* And the voice spake unto him again after the second time, What God hath cleansed (ἐκαθάρισεν), that call not thou c.' (σὺ μὴ κοινου, RV 'make not thou c.'). In this sense c. is twice (1 S 21<sup>4</sup> 5) the tr. of Heb. hōl (never tr<sup>d</sup> by κοινός however in LXX, but always by βέβηλος), elsewhere rendered in AV 'unholy' (Lv 10<sup>10</sup>) or 'profane' (Ezk 22<sup>28</sup> 42<sup>20</sup> 44<sup>23</sup> 48<sup>15</sup> [all]), but by RV always 'common.'

3. For 'common hall' Mt 27<sup>27</sup> see PRÆTORIUM. In Ac 5<sup>18</sup>, 'the c. prison,' c. is used in the old sense of public. This is after Wyclif, who tr. Vulg. in custodia publica, 'in comun kepyng' (1388 'in the comyn warde'). Cf. Eng. Gilds (1467), 391, 'That no citezen be putt in comyn prisone, but in one of the chambers of the halle benethforth'; Coverdale's tr. of Ac 17<sup>22</sup> 'Paul stode on the myddes of the comon place'; Latimer's Serm. p. 326, 'I told you the diversity of prayer, namely, of the common prayer, and the private'; and 'the Book of Common Prayer.' See PRISON.

* RV gives 'c. and unclean,' reading καὶ ἀκάθαρτος with edd., instead of TR καὶ ἁγίος. Nevertheless καὶ ἁγίος have the same meaning. The classical passage is Mk 7<sup>2</sup>, καὶ αἱ χεῖρες, οὐκ ἵεραι ἀνθρώπων, 'with defiled (AVm, RVm 'common'), that is, unclean, hands.' With which cf. vv. 18, 19, where Jesus says, 'whatsoever from without goeth into the man, it cannot defile him' (οὐδὲν καὶ ὕστερον, lit. 'make him c.'). and St. Mark adds the comment, '(this he said), making all meats clean' (καθαρίζων). See Page on Ac 10<sup>14</sup>.

COMMUNE.—In its earliest use 'commune' (which had the same origin as 'common') signified to make common property, to share. This may be either by giving, as Wyclif's tr. of Ph 4<sup>14</sup> 'Ye han don wel, commynge to my tribulacioun'; or by receiving, as his tr. of 2 Jn 11 'He that saith to him, Heyl, comuneth with his yuele werkis.' Being by and by restricted to speech, it meant sometimes simply 'talk to,' as Gn 42<sup>24</sup> '[Joseph] returned to them again, and communed with them' (נִדְבָר וְשָׁקָה לָהֶם, RV 'and spake to them'). But generally the sense of both giving and receiving is present, either with others, as Lk 6<sup>11</sup> 'they communed one with another what they might do to Jesus' (διαλαλέω); or with oneself, as Ps 4<sup>4</sup> 'c. with your own heart upon your bed, and be still'—a meaning which Dr. Murray (Oxf. Eng. Dict. s.v.) describes as 'now only literary, devotional, and poetic.' In 1 S 25<sup>30</sup> (AV 'And David sent and communed with Abigail') the Heb. (אִבְיָגַיִם) is lit. 'spake concerning A.,' and has the special meaning of 'asked in marriage,' as in Ca 8<sup>8</sup> (same Heb.) AV and RV 'the day when she shall be spoken for.'

J. HASTINGS.

COMMUNICATE.—Like commune (wh. see), to c. is to make common property, either more particularly by giving, as Gal 2<sup>2</sup> 'I c<sup>ed</sup> unto them that gospel' (ἀνατίθεμαι, RV 'laid before them'); Ro 12<sup>13</sup> RV 'c<sup>ommune</sup> to the necessities of the saints' (AV 'distributing'); He 13<sup>16</sup> 'to do good and to c. forget not'; or by receiving, as Ph 4<sup>14</sup> 'ye did c. with my affliction' (RV 'had fellowship with'). Cf. Fenton (1579) 'Caesar the Dictator, of whom you beare the surname, and communicate in his fortunes.' But generally by giving and receiving equally, as Ph 4<sup>10</sup> 'no church c<sup>ommune</sup> with me as concerning giving and receiving' (RV 'had fellowship with me'). Communication is generally conversation,* as 2 K 9<sup>11</sup> 'Ye know the man, and his c.' (RV 'what his talk was'); Col 3<sup>8</sup> 'filthy c. out of your mouth' (ἀσχηρολογία, RV 'shameful speaking').

In 1 Co 15<sup>33</sup> 'evil & corrupt good manners,' RV takes the Gr. (βλαβερὰ κακὰ) in the sense of 'evil company,' Amer. RV 'evil companionships.' This is a new tr., Vulg. having 'colloquia mala'; Wyclif, 'yuele spechis'; Tindale, 'malleious speakinges'; Cranmer, 'evil wordes'; the Geneva, 'evil speakings'; the Rheims and AV 'evil communications.' And it is not certain that it is a correct tr. The vb. βλάττω occurs in NT only in the sense of 'speak with' (as in LXX, Jos. and mod. Greek—see Kennedy, Sources of NT Greek p. 165), and βλάβη, which occurs only here, may well have the same meaning—a meaning towards which it tends more and more in later Greek. In eccles. usage it is the sermon (homily) of the Christian preacher.

COMMUNION.—The word κοινωνία is variously rendered in the English Bible by 'communion,' 'fellowship,' 'contribution,' 'distribution.' It is used in relation to the Christian Society to express the idea of the fellowship in which it is united, and the acts of fellowship in which the idea is realized. Its general NT use deserves to be considered as introductory to its specific application to the Eucharist, or Holy Communion (see LORD'S SUPPER).

The corresponding verb κοινωνεῖν has two senses: (1) 'to have a share in,' (2) 'to give a share to'; so that we are prepared for a twofold meaning of κοινωνία: (1) 'fellowship' as recognized and enjoyed, (2) 'fellowship' as manifested in acts which give it expression. Four passages, or groups of passages, deserve special examination.

1. 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup> 'The fellowship of the Holy Spirit'; Ph 2<sup>1</sup> 'If there be any fellowship of the Spirit.' The first of these passages is one of the few in which, as in the Baptismal formula (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>), the three Persons of the Holy Trinity are brought into emphatic juxtaposition: 'The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all.'

The order is remarkable. It is explained, however, when we observe that we have here an expansion of the final salutation with which St. Paul regularly closes his epistles. Thus in 2 Th 3<sup>17, 18</sup> we read: 'The greeting of me Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle: thus I write: The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all.' It was his invariable habit to take the pen from his amanuensis at the close and write a parting salutation as his sign-manual. This was always a prayer that 'grace' might be with his readers; the word was characteristic of his teaching, and it always occurs, even in the briefest form of the closing salutation.

To understand the enlarged form of this salutation in 2 Co, we must recall the circumstances of the Corinthian Church. Party divisions were distracting it: all its manifold troubles St. Paul traces to this root. Unity must be restored: this is the first injunction of the first epistle (1 Co 1<sup>10</sup>), and the last injunction of the second (2 Co 13<sup>11</sup>). His remedy for disunion was his doctrine of the One Body, which he brought to bear on their sin of fornication, their difficulty about idol-meats, their jealousy as to spiritual gifts, their profanation of the Lord's Supper. The second epistle opens with an outburst of relief at their return to obedience. Yet at the close he shows that his fears are still alive. What will he find when he comes? 'Strife, jealousy, wraths, factions, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults?' If so, he warns them that he will not spare. He closes with exhortations to unity and peace, and promises the presence of 'the God of love and peace.' Then his final salutation runs at first in its accustomed form, 'the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ'; but it is expanded to meet the occasion and its needs: 'the God of love' suggests the addition 'the love of God'; and the true sense of membership which the One Spirit gives to the One Body is prayed for in the words 'the fellowship of the Holy Spirit.' It is clear, then, that the genitive here is subjective and not objective; and this is confirmed by the parallel clauses. 'The grace' which is 'of the Lord Jesus,' and 'the love' which is 'of God,' are parallel with 'the fellowship' which is 'of the Holy Spirit.'

The meaning in this place seems to decide the otherwise doubtful sense of Ph 2<sup>1</sup> 'if there be any fellowship of the Spirit.' Here, again, the context speaks of love and unity. So that it is most natural to interpret the phrase in both places of the sense of unity, membership or fellowship, which it is the peculiar work of the Holy Spirit to preserve in the Christian Church.

2. Ac 2<sup>42</sup> 'They continued steadfastly in the teaching of the apostles and the fellowship, the breaking of bread and the prayers.' This is the first description given us of the newly-baptized converts after Pentecost, when they numbered already about 3000. It is expanded in the next verses, in which two at least of its phrases are almost verbally repeated: 'the breaking of bread' is represented by 'breaking bread house by house,' and 'the fellowship' or 'communion' (κοινωνία) is echoed in the words, 'all they that believed together held all things common' (κοινά).

Thus 'the fellowship' seems to refer to the unity of recognized membership, the 'community,' in which the first brethren lived together. The words 'they held all things common' are illustrated by the statement that they sold their goods, and distributed to all 'according as any had need.' No systematic plan of relief for the poorer brethren is implied: the wealthier were moved to supply their needs as they occurred, in a way that must have been reckless had they not looked for a speedy return of Christ. The method was incomm-patible with the higher organization of the Body; but it was a striking exemplification of the new spirit of fellowship, the sense of common interest, the realization of oneness. This oneness is again emphasized in 4<sup>32a</sup>: 'Of the whole company of them that believed there was one heart and soul: and not one said that any of his possessions was his own; but they held all things common . . . nor was there any in need among them: for as many as were owners of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things sold and laid them at the feet of the apostles; and distribution was made to each, according as any had need.' Then follows the account of Barnabas, who thus disposed of his estate; and of Ananias and his wife, who sold a possession and offered a part of the price as the whole. St. Peter makes it plain that Ananias need not have parted with his property at all. It was his own, and in his own power. His offence lay, not in niggardliness, but in deceit. This makes it evident that 'community of goods' was not a part of the apostolic teaching; nor is this the meaning of the term κοινωνία. The reference to laying the price at the feet of the apostles shows that indiscriminate almsgiving was quickly yielding place to a central fund for common relief. The events of ch. 6 indicate that a common table for the poorer members was one method of their relief, and so one sign of 'the fellowship' which characterized the Body. This 'daily ministration' led to difficulties which imperilled the sense of unity itself, and so necessitated a more developed organization of the Body.

Turning back to Ac 2<sup>42</sup>, we now see that the words 'the breaking of bread and the prayers' are not to be regarded as an explanatory clause exhausting the meaning of the phrase 'the fellowship,' which precedes them. We have four phrases, which fall into two groups: (1) 'the teaching of the apostles and the fellowship,' (2) 'the breaking of the bread and the prayers.' The 'breaking of bread' took place in the homes of the brethren; 'the prayers' are perhaps those which they offered in the temple (cf. 2<sup>46</sup> and 3<sup>1</sup>). The 'fellowship' was exemplified, no doubt, in these acts; but it was wider than any of its special manifestations: it was the unity and membership in which the whole Body was constituted and maintained.

3. The third group of passages needing special investigation is that in which the word κοινωνία is used in the limited sense of the 'contribution' or 'distribution' of alms. As a general duty this is enforced in Ro 12<sup>13</sup>, He 13<sup>16</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>18</sup>, in each of which places the radical meaning of the word employed is that of 'fellowship.' Each act of Christian almsgiving was a witness to the central principle of fellowship in the Christian Society. Most conspicuously is this the case with the great collection for 'the poor saints at Jerusalem,' upon which St. Paul expended so much labour and anxiety. He regarded this as of supreme importance, as the external pledge of the living fellowship of the whole Christian Church. He insisted on carrying it in person, even though he was aware that the visit to Jerusalem endangered his liberty and his life. The Gentiles had enjoyed fellowship with the spiritual blessings of the Jews: it was but right that they should offer a return of fellowship such as was in their power (κοινωνίας τὰ ὑμῶν ποιεῖσθαι, Ro 15<sup>26</sup>, cf. 2 Co 8<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>13</sup>). The stress which the apostle lays on this collection is only explained when we regard it as the emblem and the instrument of the corporate fellowship of the locally scattered Christian Society.

4. We come, lastly, to the passage (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup> 17) in which the word is used in connexion with the Holy Eucharist. To understand this passage, the whole section, commencing at 8<sup>1</sup>, 'Concerning meats offered to idols,' needs to be studied continuously. The more immediate context begins with 9<sup>24</sup>. Just as not all who run receive the victor's crown, so in the history of the Chosen People not all who had spiritual privileges were saved thereby. These privileges are described in metaphors borrowed from the Christian Sacraments. They were all 'baptized into Moses,' as when the Cloud overshadowed them, and when they passed through the Sea: 'spiritual food' and 'spiritual drink' they all partook of, namely, the Manna and the Water from the Rock; the Rock was the Messiah. These words are of importance as showing incidentally that St. Paul, like St. John, thought of the Eucharist as 'spiritual food and drink,' although this is not the side of it on which he ordinarily insists. The idolatry into which the Israelites fell in spite of their spiritual privileges is the starting-point of the warning of 10<sup>14</sup>. From two sides the apostle has approached the danger of idolatry—the idolatry of the Gentiles of his own day, the idolatry of Israel in the past. Worship, whether true or false, implies a fellowship. The Christian fellowship must be recognized and vindicated from contamination.

'The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not κοινωνία of the blood of Christ? the bread which we break, is it not κοινωνία of the body of Christ? because one bread, one body, we the many are, for all of us partake (μετέχομεν) of the one bread.' What is the meaning of κοινωνία here? The AV renders 'the communion of'; the RV 'a communion of,' with the marg. alternative 'a participation in.' In the Greek the word, being a predicate, does not take the article; but in English the definite article is in such cases usually supplied; so that in this respect syntax makes no demand for altering the AV. Secondly, as to the word itself. It is no doubt tempting to take it in the simple sense of 'partaking of'; but this loses the force of its derivation from κοινός, which implies jointness, or community of some kind. In this very place St. Paul expresses mere 'partaking' by μετέχειν, not κοινωνεῖν. Fellowship is the ruling idea of the word, and we must not lose sight of it. In regard to the second of the clauses, the apostle himself interprets his meaning to us. The single loaf, broken and distributed and eaten, linked all who partook of it into unity. 'We are one loaf, one body, many though we be; for of the one loaf we all partake.' Thus the loaf was nothing less than 'fellowship with the Body of the Christ.'

This interpretation is borne out by the apostle's next words: You are God's new Israel—Israel after the Spirit; look at Israel after the flesh: they bring their sacrifices to the temple, they eat of them, and thereby they are in fellowship with the altar. Then, recurring to the Gentile sacrifices, he points out that to partake of them is to be in fellowship with the demons to whom they are offered. He contrasts 'the cup of the Lord' and 'the cup of the demons,' 'the table of the Lord' (i.e. the Bread) and 'the table of the demons' (i.e. the idol-meats). 'I would not have you to enter into fellowship with the demons (κοινωνοὺς τῶν δαιμονίων γίνεσθαι).' It is in sharp contrast with such a conception as this that St. Paul declares that to partake of the Eucharistic Cup is to be in fellowship with the Blood of Christ, and to partake of the Eucharistic Bread is to be in fellowship with the Body of Christ. Thus interpreting St. Paul by himself, we see once more the side of the truth on which he peculiarly insisted: fellowship in the New Covenant made by the Death of Christ; fellowship in the Body of Christ, that living corporate unity of which, to his view, Christ is at once the Head and in a deeper, fuller sense, the Whole (1 Co 12<sup>12</sup>, Eph 4<sup>15</sup>).

J. ARMITAGE ROBINSON.

COMPANY was formerly used with more freedom than now, 'a great c.' being loosely employed where we should say 'a great number,' or 'a great crowd.' Thus 2 Ch 20<sup>12</sup> 'this great c. that cometh against us' (hāmōn, crowd); Ac 6<sup>7</sup> 'a great c. of the priests were obedient to the faith' (ὄχλος; so Lk 5<sup>29</sup> 6<sup>17</sup> 9<sup>38</sup> 11<sup>27</sup> 12<sup>13</sup>, Jn 6<sup>5</sup>); Lk 23<sup>27</sup> 'there followed him a great c. of people' (πληθος, RV 'multitude'); and He 12<sup>22</sup> 'an innumerable c. of angels' (μυριάς, RV 'innum. hosts'). Even when the Heb. is a military term, as mahāneh, camp (Gn 32<sup>8-15</sup> 21 50<sup>9</sup>, 1 K 5<sup>15</sup>, 1 Ch 9<sup>10</sup>), hayil, force, army (2 Ch 9<sup>1</sup>), g'dhādāh, troop (1 S 30<sup>10-12</sup> 22, 2 K 5<sup>2</sup>), zābhā', host (Ps 68<sup>11</sup> 'great was the c. of those that published it,' RV 'the women that publish the tidings are a great host'), the meaning is quite indefinite.

In Ps 68<sup>30</sup> the word hayyāh has been taken by AV in the sense of 'c.' ('Rebuke the c. of spearmen'), after Ibn Ezra, Calvin, etc.; but there is no absolutely certain instance of this meaning of the word (see Driver, Notes on Sam., on 1 S 18<sup>18</sup>, 2 S 23<sup>18</sup>, and Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.), and RV returns to the tr. of Vulg. 'Increpa feras arundinis,' and Wyclif 'Blame thou the wilde beestis of the rehed,' giving 'Rebuke the wild beast of the reeds,' the reference then being to the crocodile or hippopotamus of the Nile as symbolical of the power of Egypt.

On 61<sup>8</sup> AV renders 'What will ye see in the Shulamite? As it were the c. of two armies,' this time following Wyclif ('What schalt thou see in the Sumanyte, no but compenyen of oostis?'), who takes the 'nisi choros castrorum' of Vulg. in that sense, which is the sense given by most of the VSS and Jewish commentators. But RV takes the Heb. nehōlāh in its invariable meaning of 'dance' and mahāndyīm as a proper name, 'Why will ye look upon the Shulamite, as upon the dance of Mahanaim?'

The vb. 'to c. together' is used in Apocr. (Sus 154. 57. 68) in the sense of 'to cohabit.' In NT 'to c. with' is simply to associate with; 1 Co 5<sup>9</sup> 'I wrote unto you in an epistle not to c. with fornicators' (RV 'to have no c.'). Ac 1<sup>21</sup> 'these men which have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us.' J. HASTINGS.

COMPASS (cum together, passus step, hence 'a route that comes together or joins itself'—Skeat) is used both as subst. and as vb. 1. As subst. c. = (a) a 'circle,' 'sphere,' the vault of heaven (Is 40<sup>22</sup>, see CIRCLE), or the horizon, Pr 8<sup>27</sup> 'he set a c. upon the face of the depth' (אָר, RV 'circle'); (b) instrument for making a circle, Is 44<sup>13</sup> 'the carpenter . . . marketh it [the image] out with the c.' (מִקְרָא, RV 'the compasses'); (c) circumference, margin round, Ex 27<sup>5</sup> 38<sup>4</sup> (מִקְרָא), 1 K 7<sup>30</sup> (מִקְרָא); (d) the space within a circle, range, limit, 1 Es 1<sup>13</sup> 'within the c. of their holy temple' (περικύκλω, RV 'round about their holy temple'), 1 Mac 14<sup>40</sup> 'within the c. of the sanctuary' (περίβολος, RV 'precinct'). The phrase fetch a c. is 'make a circuit' or 'go round about,' Heb. נָסַף, Nu 34<sup>6</sup>, Jos 15<sup>3</sup>, 2 S 5<sup>25</sup>, 2 K 3<sup>9</sup>; Gr. περιέρχεται, Ac 28<sup>13</sup> 'from thence we fetched a c., and came to Rhegium' (RV 'made a circuit'). 2. As verb the meaning is either (a) make a circle round, surround, or (b) make a circuit round, go round. Thus (a) 1 S 23<sup>30</sup> 'Saul and his men c<sup>d</sup> David and his men round about to take them'; Lk 21<sup>30</sup> 'When ye shall see Jerus. c<sup>d</sup> with armies'; 2 S 22<sup>6</sup> = Ps 18<sup>5</sup> 'the sorrows of hell c<sup>d</sup> me about' (נָסַף, RV 'the cords of Sheol were round about me'); Ps 139<sup>1</sup> 'Thou c<sup>d</sup> my path and my lying down' (נָסַף, RV 'searchest out'); Jer 31<sup>22</sup> 'A woman shall c. a man' (i.e. prob. as protector, cf. Dt 32<sup>10</sup>, Ps 32<sup>10</sup>). And (b) Dt 2<sup>1</sup> 'we c<sup>d</sup> mount Seir many days'; Jos 6<sup>11</sup> 'so the ark of the LORD c<sup>d</sup> the city, going about it once'; Jer 31<sup>30</sup> 'the measuring line . . . shall c. about to Goah' (נָסַף, RV 'shall turn about unto Goah'); Mt 23<sup>16</sup> 'ye c. sea and land to make one proselyte.' J. HASTINGS.

COMPASSION OR PITY.—These words have become entirely synonymous, and, with two exceptions, they are so employed in AV. But in 1 P 3<sup>8</sup> and He 10<sup>34</sup>, compassion retains its original meaning of sympathy, being used to tr. respectively συμπαθής (see RVm) and συμπαθεῖν.

With these exceptions the words are used indifferently both in AV and RV of the OT to translate the Heb. verbs hānā and hānā (and adj. and subst. from latter). The second of them is frequently rendered 'have mercy.' The plural hānā (Gr. σπλαγχνία) is also tr. 'bowels,' 'Pity' tr. also hānā (usually = 'to be gracious'), hānā (once Job 6<sup>14</sup>), and hānā (once Ps 69<sup>20</sup> marg. 'lament'). The equivalents in the LXX are olektrēin, with the cognates olektrubās, olektrubōn, eleēin, and phēdēsōai, used indifferently. In Ezk 24<sup>21</sup> 'that which your soul pitieth' (marg. 'pity of your soul') is equivalent to 'object of affection' (cf. v. 20). There is a play upon words in the Hebrew.

In NT to be moved with c. tr. σπλαγχνίζεσθαι, while eleēin is twice represented by have c. (Mt 18<sup>23</sup>, Ro 9<sup>15</sup> quoted from Ex 33<sup>19</sup> LXX). In the former of these passages, on its repetition, eleēin is rendered have pity. With this exception pity only appears in NT in 1 P 3<sup>8</sup>, where pitiſful tr. εὐσπλαγχνος, and in Ja 5<sup>11</sup>, where 'the Lord is very pitiſful and of tender mercy' represents the common Heb. formula hānā hānā (Ex 34<sup>6</sup> etc.).

C. is in the Bible a Divine as well as a human quality. But its attribution to God has raised certain questions among theologians.

The relation between pity and grace (eleē and chāp) is one of these. In the Divine mind, it is said, and in the order of our salvation pity precedes grace, but in the order of the manifestation of God's purposes of salvation the grace must go before the pity (Trench, N. T. Synonyms, p. 205).

Another point was raised by the Manichaeans, who objected that to call God compassionate was to make Him capable of suffering. The Latin misericors lent itself to such a perversion of truth, and Augustine brushes it aside as a mere pretence of logomachy (De Civ. Dei, ix. 5; De Div. Quæst. ii. 2; Lib. de mor. Eccl. Cath. 27). See the question also discussed in Aquinas (Summa Quæst. xxi. art. iii.). It is not God, but only Nature, that is pitiless; only the stars that 'would as soon look down on a Gethsemane as an Eden.' We may be thankful that the OT exulted in speaking of the compassion of God for human misery and human sin, and that the NT tells how the Divine pity went forth in the fulness of time, incarnate in the Son, to seek and to save that which was lost.

With their sense of the pity that was in the heart of God, the prophets could not do other than impress on the Hebrews the duty of pity for each other. Religion without kindness was unmeaning (Hos 6<sup>6</sup>). It became a proverb that he who pitied the poor lent to the Lord (Pr 19<sup>17</sup>). 'To him that is afflicted,' said Job, 'pity should be showed from his friend' (6<sup>14</sup>). The fatherless and widow were to be to man, as they were to God, special objects of compassion (Ps 146<sup>9</sup>, cf. Ja 1<sup>27</sup>).

But in regard to foreigners Heb. morality was that common to all the ancients. There is no trace in OT of compassion towards a beaten foe. The solitary stranger who might be 'in their gates' was respected, but for aliens generally pity did not exist. 'Thine eye shall have no pity on them' (Dt 7<sup>16</sup>) was the law of Israel in regard to enemies. It needed the revelation of NT, the parable of the good Samaritan, and the example of Christ's 'compassion for the multitude' to create the modern idea of general benevolence. The OT religious and ethical standard on the subject is presented in the verse 'Execute true judgment, and show mercy and compassion every man to his brother' (Zec 7<sup>9</sup>).

A. S. AGLE.

COMPEL.—This verb was sometimes used without any threatening or thought of force, simply in the sense of 'urge successfully.' It is doubtful if it is so used now. Hence we may misunderstand 1 S 28<sup>23</sup>, where it is said that Saul's servants, together with the woman of Endor, 'c<sup>d</sup> him to eat' (נָסַף, in 2 S 13<sup>25. 27</sup> tr<sup>d</sup> 'pressed him'); and esp. Lk 14<sup>23</sup> 'c. them to come in, that my house may be filled' (ἀναγκάζω, RV 'constrain'); cf. Earl Rivers (1477), 'Whiche grace . . . hath compelled me to sette a parte alle ingratitude.' Robertson (Charles V. III. xi. 335) says, 'As they could not persuade they tried to compel men to believe'—and this passage in St. Luke was quoted as their authority; but neither the Gr. nor the Eng. sanctions more than 'urging'; cf. RV even of Ac 26<sup>11</sup> 'I strove to make them blaspheme,' where Gr. and AV are the same as in Lk 14<sup>23</sup>.

In Mt 5<sup>41</sup> 'Whosoever shall c. thee to go a mile,' 27<sup>32</sup> 'him they c<sup>d</sup> to bear his cross,' and Mk 15<sup>21</sup> 'they c. one Simon a Cyrenian . . . to bear his cross,' the Gr. vb. (ἀγγαρίω) has the technical meaning of pressing into the king's service (RVm always 'impress'). The word is of Pers. origin, the ἀγγαροι being the public couriers of the kings of Persia, who had authority to press into their service in any emergency whatever horses or men they met. The word was adopted also into Latin angariare, and is used by Vulg. in passages named above.

COMPOUND.—Ex 30<sup>25</sup> 'an ointment compound after the art of the apothecary' = 'compounded,' as RV. Compound is the orig. and only accurate form of the ptep., the verb being componen in middle Eng., from Lat. componere.

J. HASTINGS.

COMPREHEND.—C. is used lit. = hold together, contain, in Is 40<sup>12</sup> 'and c<sup>d</sup> the dust of the earth in a measure'; and in the same sense, but fig., in Ro 13<sup>9</sup> 'it is briefly c<sup>d</sup> in the saying' (RV 'summed up in this word'). See APPREHEND.

CONANIAH (כנניה; כנני).—1. A Levite who had charge of the tithes and offerings in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31<sup>12-13</sup>, AV Cononiah). 2. A chief of the Levites in Josiah's reign (2 Ch 35<sup>9</sup>). On the form of the word see Kittel, ad loc. in Haupt.

CONCEIT.—A c. is something conceived, a thought, as Sir 27<sup>6</sup> 'The fruit declareth if the tree have been dressed; so is the utterance of a c. in the heart of man' (ἐνθυμημα, RV 'thought'); 20<sup>13</sup> AVm 'pleasant conceits' (χάριτες, AV 'graces,' RV 'pleasantries'); Pr 18<sup>11</sup> (RV 'imagination'); Ro 11<sup>25</sup> 12<sup>16</sup> 'wise in your own conceits' (παρ' ἑαυτοῖς, TR). Though c. is found very early in the sense of self-conceit, that is not its meaning in any of the foregoing passages. In Ro 11<sup>25</sup> 12<sup>16</sup> 'conceits' is due to Tindale and Coverdale ('consaytes'), but they probably meant simply 'opinions,' the word used in 12<sup>16</sup> by Tindale, Cranmer, and Geneva. (The plu. 'conceits' is used of more than one person). But in Pr 26<sup>5</sup> 12<sup>16</sup> 23<sup>11</sup> ('wise in his own c.'; Heb. עַיִן, 'eye') the meaning is no doubt the same as in mod. usage. In Wis 8<sup>11</sup> c. is used in the obsol. sense of 'power of conceiving,' 'mental capacity,' 'I shall be found of a quick c. in judgment'; cf. Shaks. As You Like It, v. ii. 48, 'I know you are a gentleman of good conceit'; and Lucrece, 701—

'O deeper sin than bottomless conceit

CONCLUDE.—1. In the sense of 'shut up,' 'enclose,' mod. include, Ro 11<sup>32</sup> 'God hath c<sup>d</sup> them all in unbelief,' and Gal 3<sup>22</sup> 'the Scripture hath c<sup>d</sup> all under sin' (RV 'shut up,' Gr. συγκλείω, used lit. in Lk 5<sup>6</sup> 'they inclosed a great multitude of fishes'; and fig. as above from Ps 78<sup>29</sup> LXX, 'He gave his people over unto the sword'—used with the pregnant sense of giving over so that there can be no escape—Sanday and Headlam). 2. To come to a conclusion by reasoning, infer, Ro 3<sup>28</sup> 'Therefore we c. that a man is justified by faith' (λογίζομεθα, RV 'we reckon'); and in RV, Ac 16<sup>10</sup> 'c<sup>ing</sup> that God had called us' (συμβιβάζοντες, AV 'assuredly gathering'). 3. To decide, Ac 21<sup>20</sup> 'we have written and c<sup>d</sup> that they observe no such thing' (κρίναντες, RV 'giving judgment'); and with direct object = 'determine upon,' Jth 2<sup>2</sup> 'Nebuch. . . c<sup>d</sup> the afflicting of the whole earth' (συπερέλεσεν, cf. 1 S 20<sup>7</sup> 'evil is determined by him,' LXX συπερέλεσται).

CONCOURSE.—A c. is a 'running together' (concurrere) of people, as Wyclif's tr. (1382) of Ac 24<sup>12</sup> 'makeinge concurs or rennyng to gidere of the company of peple.' In this orig. sense c. occurs in AV, Jth 10<sup>18</sup> 'Then was there a c. throughout all the camp' (συνδρομή); Pr 1<sup>21</sup> 'She crieth in the chief place of c.' (ἐν τῇ κεφαλῇ, Oxf. Heb. Lxx. 'at the head of bustling streets'); Ac 19<sup>40</sup> 'we may give an account of this c.' (συστροφῇ). J. HASTINGS.

CONCUBINE.—See MARRIAGE.

CONCUPISCENCE.—C. is intense desire (concupiscere intensive of concupere), always in a bad sense (so that 'evil c.' of Col 3<sup>5</sup> is a redundancy in English), and nearly always meaning sexual lust. The Gr. is always ἐπιθυμία, a more general word than the Eng. 'concupiscence.' The passages are Wis 4<sup>12</sup> (RV 'desire'), Sir 23<sup>5</sup> (RV 'concupiscence'), Ro 7<sup>8</sup> (RV 'coveting'), Col 3<sup>5</sup> (RV 'desire'), 1 Th 4<sup>5</sup> (RV 'lust').

CONDUIT (κρήνη, ὕδραγωγός, aqueductus).—A channel for the conveyance of water from the source whence it was derived to the place where it was delivered. It wound round hills, or passed through them by means of tunnels; and crossed valleys upon arches or upon a substructure of solid masonry. The channel, when not itself a tunnel of varying height, was rectangular in form, and either cut out of the solid rock or constructed of masonry. It was covered by slabs of stone to keep the water pure and cool, and its floor had a slight and fairly uniform fall.

The remains of ancient conduits constructed for the conveyance of water to towns, or for purposes of irrigation, are common in Pal., but it will only be necessary here to allude to those connected with the water supply of Jerusalem. Amongst the oldest of the Jerus. conduits are the rock-hewn channel that entered the temple area from the north, and was cut through when the ditch that separated Bezetha from the Antonia was excavated; one at a low level, beneath 'Robinson's Arch,' which was destroyed when Herod built the west peribolos wall of the temple; and the well-known tunnel that conveyed water from the Fountain of the Virgin to the Pool of Siloam. An inscription in Phoen. characters in the last conduit carries the date of its construction back to the 8th cent. B.C.

Equally interesting and, perhaps, in part of greater age, is the conduit about 13½ miles long, which conveyed water from the 'Pools of Solomon,' beyond Bethlehem, to the temple enclosure at Jerus., and is known as the 'low-level aqueduct.' Tradition, with great probability, ascribes the construction of this conduit to Solomon, who must have found himself obliged to increase the water supply when the temple services were instituted. The channel, which is about 2 ft. deep and 1½ ft. wide, passes under Bethlehem by a tunnel. It has been conjectured that this conduit was called 'Tannin' by the Jews from its serpentine course, and that the 'Dragon's Well' of Neh 2<sup>13</sup> was an outflow from it in the Valley of Hinnom. At a later date a pool (piscina) was constructed in the Wady Arrub to collect the water from springs in that valley, and this was connected with the 'low-level aqueduct' by a conduit about 28 miles in length, which, near Tekoa, passed through a long tunnel. This conduit is apparently that alluded to by Jos. (Ant. XVIII. iii. 2, BJ II. ix. 4) as having been made by Pontius Pilate with the Corban.

The most remarkable work, however, is the 'high-level aqueduct,' which probably entered Jerus. at the Jaffa Gate. It was apparently constructed by Herod for the supply of the citadel and palace which he built on the W. hill, and of the fountains and irrigation channels in his palace gardens (BJ v. iv. 4); and it displays a very high degree of engineering skill. It derived no portion of its supply from the 'Pools of Solomon,' but had its head in Wady Bîâr, 'valley of wells,' where it passed through a tunnel about four miles long, which collected the water from several small springs, and had numerous shafts leading to the surface. On issuing from the tunnel it entered a piscina, where any sediment contained in the water was deposited, and it afterwards passed through a second tunnel 1700 ft. long, which had nine shafts, —one 115 ft. deep. The conduit crossed the valley in which the 'Pools of Solomon' lie, above the upper pool, and at this point its level is 150 ft. above that of the 'low-level aqueduct.' One of its most interesting details is the inverted syphon, composed of perforated limestone blocks, cased in rubble masonry, which crosses the valley between Bethlehem and Mâr Elîâs. No details have come down to us of the manner in which the water conveyed by the numerous conduits was distributed after it reached Jerus.; but there were probably fountains, supplied by small conduits of lead or earthenware, as well as cisterns and pools, to which the public had access.

Amongst the conduits mentioned in the Bible are: 'the conduit of the upper pool,' at the end of which Isaiah was commanded to meet Alaz (Is 7<sup>9</sup>), and beside which Sennacherib's messengers stood when they spoke to the people on the wall (2 K 18<sup>17</sup>, Is 36<sup>2</sup>); that by which the waters of Gihon were brought straight down to the W. side of the city of David (2 Ch 32<sup>30</sup>); and that connected with the pool made by Hezekiah (2 K 20<sup>20</sup>). The existence of conduits is also implied in Sir 48<sup>17</sup>, Is 22<sup>9, 11</sup>. In Sir 24<sup>30</sup> there is an allusion to a conduit made for irrigating a garden.

CONEY (יֵשׁ שִׁפְחָן, χοιρογρύλλιος, δασύπους, chierogryllus).—The coney is undoubtedly Hyrax Syriacus. It is known by the S. Arabs as thufn, evidently the same as shaphân. In Pal. it is known as wabr, and in Lebanon as tobsân. The Arabs also call it ghunam-Beni-Israel, the sheep of the Children of Israel. It is a perissodactyl, with dentition and feet strongly resembling those of the rhinoceros. It is as large as a rabbit, has short ears and a very short tail. Its colour is greyish-brown on the back and whitish on the belly. It is declared unclean by the Mosaic law, because it chews the cud, but does not divide the hoof (Lv 11<sup>5</sup>, Dt 14<sup>7</sup>). It is not a ruminant, but has a motion of the jaws similar to that of the ruminants. Bruce the traveller kept a tame one, and supposed, from the motion of its jaws, that it was a ruminant. Cowper made a similar mistake in regard to his tame hares.

The conies are among the four 'exceeding wise' animals (Pr 30<sup>24, 26</sup>); they are 'but a feeble folk, yet make they their houses in the rocks.' 'The rocks are a refuge for the conies' (Ps 104<sup>16</sup>). They do not burrow like rabbits, but live in clefts and holes of the rocks. They are gregarious in habit, and strictly herbivorous. They are very shy, and usually come out of their holes towards evening. When feeding, an old male sits as sentry, and, on the approach of danger, gives a whistle or squeak as a warning to his companions, and they immediately take 'refuge' in the rocks. They are found all the way from Ras-Mulhannud to Lebanon. The natives esteem their flesh a delicacy.

CONFECTION, CONFECTIONARY.—Confection occurs in AV only Ex 30<sup>35</sup> 'a c. after the art of the apothecary' (קִרְיָרֹקָה, RV 'perfume'), and Sir 38<sup>8</sup> 'Of such doth the apothecary make a c.' (μύμα, RV as AV); to which RV adds 1 Ch 9<sup>30</sup> 'the sons of the priests prepared the c. of the spices' (קִרְיָרֹקָה, AV 'made the ointment'). Thus 'c.' is always something made up, a compound, and always of perfume or medicine, never sweetmeats. So confectionary is a perfumer; only 1 S 8<sup>13</sup> 'he will take your daughters to be confectionaries, and to be cooks, and to be bakers' (מִקְרָרִים, RVm 'perfumers'). Cf. Bp. Mountagu (1641), Acts and Mon. 298, 'the woman was an excellent Confectionary, very cunning in poisons.' See MEDICINE, PERFUMES.

J. HASTINGS.

CONFEDERACY in the common sense of league, alliance, is found Ob 7 'All the men of thy c.' (קִרְיָרֹקָה, 1 Mac 8<sup>17, 20, 22</sup> (συμμαχία)). In Is 8<sup>12</sup> <sup>14</sup> the meaning is 'conspiracy,'* which is nearly obsol., though D'Israeli (Charles I. II. ii. 39) has 'in a perpetual state of confederacy and rebellion.' Confederate is both adj. and subst. As adj. Gn 14<sup>13</sup> 'these were c. with Abram'; Ps 83<sup>3</sup> 'they are c. against thee' (RV 'against thee do they make a covenant'); Is 7<sup>2</sup> 'Syria is c. with Ephraim' (RVm after Heb. 'resteth on E.'). 1 Mac 10<sup>7</sup>. As subst. 1 Mac 8<sup>30</sup> 'Your confederates and friends.' J. HASTINGS.

CONFERENCE is what we should now call converse, almost the same as conversation, which is Bacon's meaning in the passage, Essays 'Of Studies' (p. 205, Gold. Treas. ed.), 'Reading maketh a full man; Conference a ready man; and Writing an exact man.' C. occurs Wis 8<sup>18</sup> (ὁμιλία, Vulg. loquela) and Gal 2<sup>6</sup> 'they who seemed to be somewhat in c. added nothing to me' (where the word has no proper equivalent in the Greek, RV 'they, I say, who were of repute imparted nothing to me'; but in 1<sup>16</sup> 'I conferred not' is the same Greek word as is here tr<sup>d</sup> 'imparted' (προσανατίθημι). In the Pref. to AV c. is used in the more prim. sense of 'comparison' (con-fero, 'bring together'), 'We cannot be helpen by c. of places.' J. HASTINGS.

CONFESSION (קִרְיָרֹקָה, ὁμολογεῖν, ὁμολογία).—Both the Heb. and the Gr. words are capable of the same double application as the English. To 'confess' is to acknowledge by either word or deed the existence and authority of a divine power, or the sins and offences of which one has been guilty. The biblical use of the verb and its derivatives is about equally divided between these two—(1) profession or acknowledgment of God as the true God or of Jesus as the Christ, (2) confession or open acknowledgment of sin. (For the distinction cf. further Cic. pro Sestio, 51, 109.)

* This is the meaning of the Heb. (קִרְיָרֹקָה) also, which Delitzsch in his 4th ed. successfully defends against the substitution of קִרְיָרֹקָה 'holy thing,' made by Secker, revived by Grätz, and accepted by Cheyne.

1. Confession of God as their God, acknowledgment of Him as the true God, was required of the members of the Chosen Family before it became a nation. It was rendered by Abraham when he 'called upon the name of the Lord' (Gn 13<sup>4</sup> etc.), and by him and his descendants when they claimed the covenant relationship through the rite of circumcision. In process of time this outward confession tended to become conventional, and only external. The consciousness of common nationality superseded that of personal relation to God. In the subsequent reaction of individualism, men of special piety, or in special circumstances, felt constrained to make specific confession of their personal adherence to J<sup>h</sup> (cf. Ps 63<sup>1</sup>, Is 44<sup>5</sup>). The passage in Isaiah shows that this confession was accompanied by an open act of self-dedication, if not, as some think, by the cutting of some permanent mark on the head or forehead. At other times, after a period of national apostasy, the general repentance and return was marked by a solemn renewal of the national confession (cf. 1 K 8<sup>35</sup>, 2 Ch 6<sup>30</sup>).

Such confession is the natural result of deep conviction (cf. Jn 4<sup>19</sup>, Mt 12<sup>34</sup>), and when Jesus had brought His disciples to the point of recognizing Him as the Christ, He drew from one of them that acknowledgment which is specifically known as St. Peter's Confession (Mt 16<sup>13-18</sup>). He announced that it was on the rock of such conviction and confession that His Church should be built; and He made this open acknowledgment of Himself, His dignity and authority, a sine quid non of true discipleship (Lk 12<sup>3</sup>).

In the Apostolic Church this confession was insisted upon as a sign of true conversion and a condition of baptism. Its contents were at first very general, varying with the circumstances of the conversion and the experience of the convert, but with a growing tendency to include certain constant elements. From the beginning it must have included the recognition of Jesus as 'the Lord' (cf. Ro 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>), and an expression of confidence and hope in Him (cf. He 3<sup>6</sup> 10<sup>23</sup>). Such general acknowledgment of allegiance to Christ is referred to in 1 Ti 6<sup>12</sup>, He 3<sup>1</sup>; but even He 4<sup>14</sup>, 'let us hold fast our confession' (AV 'profession') does not involve a formulated confession. An acknowledgment of the Resurrection doubtless found a place both early and often (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>), and prepared the way for a confession including belief of the historical facts of Christianity. Of theological inference there is an early trace in the interpolated confession of the Ethiopian (Ac 8<sup>37</sup>), but the early appearance of false teaching and imperfect views of Christ accentuated the necessity of more dogmatic expression. Signs of this are found in the Epistles of St. John (1 Jn 4<sup>15</sup>, cf. 2<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>2-3</sup>, 2 Jn 7<sup>1</sup>). Here we have the necessary antithesis to gnostic doctetism; the deepened consciousness of the Church corresponded to a fuller confession, involving both the Fatherhood of God and the true Sonship of Jesus.

2. Both in OT and NT, confession of sin before God is recognized as a condition of forgiveness, being the guarantee of genuine penitence and purpose of amendment. Thus Joshua exhorted Achan to make confession unto the Lord (Jos 7<sup>19</sup>); the Psalmist 'acknowledged his sin' (Ps 32<sup>5</sup>; cf. 51<sup>4</sup>); Pr 28<sup>13</sup> lays it down as a general principle that 'whoso confesseth and forsaketh his sin shall have mercy,' and Jesus exhibits the prodigal son as moved by a natural impulse to confess to his father. Confession, therefore, as at once an instinct of the heart and a principle of God's kingdom, was consistently recognized and inculcated by the Mosaic ritual. It was required of the individual whenever he had committed a trespass (Lv 5<sup>1-5</sup> 26<sup>40</sup>), and its necessity in regard to both individual and national sins was exhibited in the ceremony of the Scapegoat, over whose head the high-priest was to confess all the iniquities of the whole people (Lv 16<sup>21</sup>). Confession of sin became the natural and regular accompaniment of prayer (cf. Ezr 10<sup>1</sup>). At the same time representative men felt themselves to be partakers in national sins of unbelief and disobedience, and bound to confess these as well as their own (Dn 9<sup>20</sup>). The whole prayer in Dn 9 shows the nature and contents of such a confession.

The connexion between repentance and confession was so ingrained in the Jewish conscience that when, under the Baptist's preaching, many were led to repent, open confession accompanied their baptism (Mk 1<sup>6</sup>), and doubtless the Apostolic baptism was prefaced by a confession in this sense as well as the other. Such a confession was understood to be made to God, but commonly it would be made in the hearing of men (cf. Ae 17<sup>4</sup>). It is plain also that Christ taught the necessity of acknowledging, and obtaining forgiveness for, offences committed against other men (Mt 5<sup>24</sup>, Lk 17<sup>4</sup>). As to the mode of confession or the person to receive it, no instruction is given. It is clear, however, from the language of St. John (1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>) and St. James that it was specific, definite, and mutual. In Jn 5<sup>18</sup> the reading of WH (tὰς ἀμαρτίας for τὴν τὰ παραπτώματα) puts it beyond doubt that reference is made to sins against God; but the interpretation (Chrysostom and others) which infers that the confession was to be made to the Presbyters, involves an inadmissible tautology. 'Ἀλλήλοις can only refer to the relation of individual believers to one another, so that Cajetan from the Roman standpoint rightly admits 'nec hic est sermo de confessione sacramentali.'

C. A. SCOTT.

CONFIRMATION.—The verb 'confirm' is used in a very general sense in the AV, serving as a rendering of no fewer than eleven words in the original languages—seven Heb. (קָצַץ, כָּרַץ, קָיָה, כָּיָה, כָּרַץ, כָּרַץ, כָּרַץ) and four Gr. (βεβαιῶν, ἐπιστηρίζω, κυρῶ, μεστρεύω). The OT group of words suggests the idea of establishing and strengthening; though in some cases the more technical notion of a legal or authoritative confirmation comes in, esp. when the word קָיָה is used (e.g. Ru 4<sup>7</sup>, Est 9<sup>23</sup>. 31. 32). In the NT βεβαιῶν and ἐπιστηρίζω are used in the general sense of strengthening and establishing, while κυρῶ is used in the sense of giving power or validity (2 Co 2<sup>8</sup>, Gal 3<sup>16</sup>), and μεστρεύω is employed in its natural meaning of acting as a mediator (He 6<sup>17</sup>). The substantive 'confirmation' (βεβαίωσις) is used in the two senses of making firm, establishing (Ph 1<sup>7</sup>), and giving authoritative validity (He 6<sup>10</sup>). It is not used in the Bible to describe an ecclesiastical rite. In the Acts reference is made to St. Paul 'confirming the souls of the disciples' (14<sup>22</sup>), and 'confirming the Churches' (15<sup>41</sup>); and it is stated that 'Judas and Silas, being prophets also themselves, exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them' (15<sup>32</sup>)—forms of ἐπιστηρίζω being used in each case. There is no indication that any ceremony was performed on these occasions; the narrative would rather suggest the general idea of strengthening and establishing spiritually. But although the laying on of hands (ἐπίθεσις τῶν χειρῶν) is not connected with the word confirmation, it appears in association with the gift of the Holy Spirit to disciples by apostles subsequent to baptism (Ac 8<sup>12-17</sup> 19<sup>6</sup>), and as a rite following baptism, in He 6<sup>2</sup>. This was after the example of the Jewish method of blessing (e.g. Gn 48<sup>13, 14</sup>), which was recognized by the mothers who brought their children to Jesus that He might 'lay his hands on them,' etc. (Mt 19<sup>13</sup>). According to the Talmud, a father laid his hands on his child, after which the elders also blessed him (Buxtorf., Syn. Jud. 138). As late as Tertullian the laying on of hands was closely associated with baptism as almost part of the same rite (de Bap. c. 8; de Resurr. Carn. c. 8).

CONFISCATION.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

CONFOUND.—This vb. is used in three senses. 1. Destroy, shatter, Jer 1<sup>7</sup> 'be not dismayed at their faces, lest I c. thee before them.' The Geneva and Bishops' Bibles have 'destroy' here, and it is possible that AV chose a milder word on purpose, as RV has a still milder 'lest I dismay thee before them'; but the Heb. כָּרַעְתִּיךָ (qāra'atīkā) has the meaning of 'shatter,' as in Is 9<sup>4</sup> 'the yoke of his burden . . . thou hast broken' (RV); and the Eng. word has this meaning also, as Milton, Par. Lost, ii. 380—

'Whence,
But from the author of all ill, could spring
So deep a malice, to confound the race
Of Mankind in one root?'

2. Put to shame. This is the most frequent meaning. RV often changes 'c<sup>d</sup>' into 'ashamed,' but Amer. RV prefers 'put to shame.' Earlier versions sometimes had 'c<sup>d</sup>' where AV has 'ashamed,' as 2 S 10<sup>6</sup> Douay, 'The men were confounded very lowly, and David commanded them, Tarry in Jericho, til your beard be grown.' 3. Throw into confusion (stronger than mod. confuse, Dr. Murray suggests the colloq. dumfound), as Gn 11<sup>7, 9</sup> (see TONGUES, CONFUSION OF), 2 Mac 13<sup>23</sup> 14<sup>28</sup> 'he was much c<sup>d</sup> in himself'; Ac 2<sup>6</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> (συγχέω, cf. Ac 19<sup>32</sup> 21<sup>31</sup> 'was in confusion' RV).

J. HASTINGS.

CONFUSED.—Confuse and confusion were much stronger words in Elizabethan than in mod. Eng., Ac 19<sup>32</sup> 'the assembly was c<sup>d</sup> (RV 'in confusion')'; Is 9<sup>5</sup> 'with c. noise (RV 'in the tumult')'. See CONFOUND 3. Confusion: 1. Tumultuous disorder, as Ac 19<sup>32</sup> 'the whole city was filled with c.' (σύνχυσσις), 1 Co 14<sup>32</sup>, Ja 3<sup>16</sup> (ἀκαταστασία), 2 Es 16<sup>21</sup>, Lv 18<sup>23</sup> 20<sup>12</sup> (קָפָה), Is 24<sup>10</sup> 34<sup>11</sup> 41<sup>29</sup> (הָרָה). The Oxf. Eng. Dict. quotes Is 34<sup>11</sup> 'he shall stretch out upon it the line of c.' as an example of c. in the sense of destruction (see CONFOUND 1); and that meaning was common in 1611, as Shaks. Mid. Night's Dream, i. i. 149—

'So quick bright things come to confusion.'

But the Heb. (which is the word tr. 'without form,' RV 'waste,' in Gn 1<sup>2</sup>) makes it probable that in all the passages from Isaiah the meaning is disorder. 2. Shame, disgrace, as Ps 35<sup>4, 26</sup> 'brought to c.' (קָפָה, RV 'confounded,' Cheyne 'abashed'); Job 10<sup>16</sup> 'I am full of c.' (קָפָה, RV 'ignominy'); esp. with Heb. bôsheth, 1 S 20<sup>30</sup> 26<sup>16</sup>, Ezr 9<sup>7</sup>, Ps 109<sup>29</sup>, Jer 7<sup>19</sup>, Dn 9<sup>7</sup> 8<sup>1</sup>. (Except Ps 70<sup>8</sup>, Is 61<sup>7</sup>, Jer 7<sup>19</sup>, Mic 1<sup>11</sup>, Zeph 3<sup>8, 19</sup>, bôsheth is tr. by ἀσχημία in LXX.) See TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

J. HASTINGS.

CONGREGATION is AV rendering of several Heb. terms, esp. מוֹעֵד, קָהָל, and קָהָל. It will be necessary to examine minutely the linguistic usage of OT in regard to each of these.

1. מוֹעֵד (mô'ed). The root-idea contained in this word is that of a fixed appointed meeting or tryst between God and man. Hence it is frequently employed to mean a 'set time,' or to designate the sacred seasons (mô'adim) when all the males in Israel had to present themselves at J<sup>r</sup>'s sanctuary (Hos 9<sup>5</sup> 12<sup>9</sup>, Lv 23<sup>2, 4, 37, 41</sup>). It is but a step from this when we find the word used to designate the assembly that celebrated the festival, or indeed as a designation for any assembly. In Job 30<sup>23</sup> we have מוֹעֵד לְקָהָל בְּרִית 'the place of assembly for all living,' used of Sheol, while in Is 33<sup>20</sup> Zion is called מוֹעֵד קָהָל 'the city of our assemblies' (cf. Ps 74<sup>4</sup>, La 1<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 44<sup>24</sup>). In particular, מוֹעֵד occurs very frequently in the phrase מוֹעֵד מוֹעֵד ('Ohel mô'ed) the Tent of Meeting (between J<sup>r</sup> and Israel). The familiar AV tabernacle of the congregation fails entirely to suggest the true idea conveyed by the phrase as this is explained in Ex 29<sup>42</sup>. (Cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC 246.) The Sept. σκηνή τοῦ μαρτυρίου and Vulg. tabernaculum testimonii, as well as Luther's Stiftshütte, have arisen, as Ges. explains, from improperly regarding מוֹעֵד as synonymous with קָהָל (see Nu 9<sup>15</sup>, where 'tabernacle of the testimony' is the correct rendering). מוֹעֵד מוֹעֵד is used with great frequency by P (131 times) and by the Chronicler (1 Ch 6<sup>32</sup> 9<sup>21</sup> 23<sup>32</sup>, 2 Ch 1<sup>8, 6, 19</sup> 5<sup>6</sup>), but it is employed also by E (Ex 33<sup>7</sup>, where its meaning is explained; cf. Nu 11<sup>24, 30</sup> J), and occurs in at least two passages which belong to JE, viz. Nu 11<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>4</sup>. The source of Dt 31<sup>14</sup> is uncertain, and 1 S 2<sup>22</sup> and 1 K 8<sup>4</sup> can scarcely be taken into consideration, because both contain elements of late date. In Ps 74<sup>8</sup> אֱלֹהֵינוּ מוֹעֵד = all the synagogues of God, and in 1a 2<sup>6</sup> מוֹעֵד is employed as a designation for the temple.

It may be worth while to remind the reader that in the expression solemn assembly, which is occasionally used by AV as a rendering of מוֹעֵד, 'solemn' has its archaic sense of 'fixed' or 'stated,' Lat. solennis (Driver, Deut. 189).

In Is 14<sup>18</sup> mount of the congregation probably refers to the assembly of the gods, whose dwelling-place, according to Bab. mythology, was located in the far north, upon the 'mountain of the world' (Driver, Isaiah 129 n.; Delitzsch, Isaiah, new ed. i. 310). See BABYLONIA, p. 216<sup>a</sup>.

2. קָהָל (qāhāl) and קָהָל (kāhāl). Before examining the linguistic usage of OT it may be well to refer to a distinction between these two words which has been contended for by some. Vitranga (de Synagoga vetere, 80, 88), with whom Trench (Synonyms of NT, 3 f.) agrees, expresses the difference thus, 'notat proprie קָהָל universam alicujus populi multitudinem vinctis societatibus unitam et rempublicam quandam constituentem; cum vocabulum קָהָל ex indole et vi significationis suae tantum dicat quencumque hominum ceterum et conventum sive minorem sive majorem. . . . συναγωγή ut et קָהָל semper significat ceterum conjunctum et congregatum etiamsi nullo forte vinculo ligatum, sed ἐκκλησία (קָהָל) designat multitudinem aliquam quae populum constituit, per leges et vincula inter se junctam, etsi saepe fiat ut non sit coacta vel cogi possit.' This is certainly far more plausible and reasonable than the famous distinction which Augustine sought to establish between συναγωγή and ἐκκλησία, or rather between their Latin equivalents, congregatio and convocatio, the latter being the nobler term, because used of calling together men, while congregatio designated the gathering together of cattle (grex)! Vitranga's distinction comes, in fact, pretty near to that of Schürer, to which we shall advert presently; but it seems a mistake to endeavour to carry such a distinction back to OT. It may fairly be questioned whether in a single instance the contention of Vitranga can be established. Rather are we inclined to see in the choice of the one or the other of these terms a mark of authorship. It is remarkable that קָהָל finds favour in certain books, while קָהָל is prevailingly, if not exclusively, employed in others.

In the Sept. συναγωγή generally answers to קהל, and ἐκκλησία to קהל. The latter statement holds good uniformly in Jos, Jg, S, K, Ch, Ezr, and Neh, also in Dt (with the exception of 5<sup>22</sup>, where קהל is rendered συναγωγή). On the other hand, קהל is rendered by συναγωγή in Ex, Lv, Nu, probably in order to secure uniformity in the Gr., for קהל in these books is always συναγωγή. Once in the Ps קהל is rendered συναγωγή (40<sup>10</sup>); elsewhere we find ἐκκλησία, except in 26<sup>3</sup>, where it is συνέδριον.

While we cannot admit that the distinction contended for by Vitrina is traceable in OT, yet a somewhat similar distinction is discovered by Schlüter in the usage of the terms by later Judaism. συναγωγή was the term applicable to the empirical reality, the actual congregation existing in any one place, while ἐκκλησία designated the ideal, the assembly of those called by God to salvation. It is easy to see how, on this account, ἐκκλησία displaced συναγωγή in Christian circles. In classical Greek, as is well known, ἐκκλησία was the name for the body of free citizens summoned by a herald, and in this sense it is used in Ac 19 of the assembly at Ephesus. A statutory meeting was designated κύρια or ἐννομος (the latter in Ac 19<sup>30</sup>), one specially summoned was σύγκλητος. It can hardly be said, however, that classical usage throws much light upon the nature of the ἐκκλησία, or 'congregation,' so often spoken of in OT. The word may be used of an assembly summoned for a definite purpose (1 K 8<sup>6</sup>) or met on a festal occasion (Dt 23<sup>1</sup>), but far more frequently it has in view the community of Israel collectively regarded as a congregation. Wellhausen (Comp. d. Hex. 205) finds this last usage distinctive of P, denying that the nation is viewed from such a purely churchly standpoint in JE, or even in D. See ASSEMBLY.

In OT Apoc. ἐκκλησία occurs in the sense of a popular assembly (Jth 6<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>6</sup>, Sir 15<sup>1</sup>), more rarely as a designation for the people as a whole (1 Mac 4<sup>30</sup>).

In NT ἐκκλησία is applied to the congregation of the people of Isr. in the speech of Stephen (Ac 7<sup>38</sup>), but συναγωγή came gradually to be employed to distinguish Isr. from other nations. (It is characteristic of the Ep. of James that in 2<sup>2</sup> συναγωγή is used of an assembly of Jewish Christians, and of the Ep. to the Hebrews that in 10<sup>25</sup> ἐπισυναγωγή [the word has a different meaning in 2 Th 2<sup>1</sup>] is spoken of a Christian community.) Hence, apart from the reason noted above, it was natural that ἐκκλησία should be chosen as the designation of the Christian Church, owing to the Judaistic associations of συναγωγή.

While there is little about OT 'congregation' to recall the popular assembly of a Gr. community (for the elders, or in post-exilic times at Jerus., the high priest and his counsellors, seem to have generally acted alone), there are one or two examples of an opposite kind. In Nu 35<sup>44</sup> (P) it is the 'congregation' that decides the case of the manslayer who has reached a city of refuge, although even here the decision according to D<sup>2</sup> rests with the elders (cf. the above passage with Jos 20<sup>4</sup> [D<sup>2</sup>], or the latter with v.<sup>36</sup> [P]). Similar functions are ascribed to the 'congregation' in the late and peculiar narrative of Jg 20, 21, and in Ezr 10, on the latter of which Kuenen (Rel. of Israel, ii. 214) remarks, 'In very weighty matters the decision even rested with the whole community, which was summoned to Jerus. for that purpose.' (All that concerns the OT congregation as a worshipping body will be dealt with under CHURCH, SYNAGOGUE, and TEMPLE.)

For the sake of completeness it may be well to note the usage of some other words of kindred import to the three we have discussed.

(b) מִקְרָא קֹדֶשׁ (mikrā' qōdesh), which occurs so frequently in the 'holy convocation' of AV, is a favourite expression in the priestly sections of Ex, Lv, and Nu, particularly in H (Lv 17-26). The Sept. usually renders it κληρολογία (cf. Sanday, Romans, 12 f.). The simple מִקְרָא occurs in Nu 10<sup>2</sup> and Is 1<sup>13</sup>. It is hard to discover any difference between this term and קָרָץ.

(c) סֵדָה (sēdā), originally = friendly conversation (δουλία), then on the one hand = friendliness, friendship, and on the other—a body of friends (cf. Driver on Am 3<sup>8</sup>). It is used of a gathering for familiar converse (Jer 6<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>17</sup>, in the latter of which the Sept. has συνέδριον), of a deliberative council (Job 15<sup>8</sup>, Jer 23<sup>14</sup>, Ps 89<sup>7</sup>, in all these used of the Privy Council of the Almighty), of a secret company of wicked men plotting evil (Ps 64<sup>2</sup>), or of the select assembly of the upright (Ps 111<sup>1</sup>, where סֵדָה is coupled with קהל, as it is in Gn 49<sup>6</sup> with קהל).

CONJECTURE.—Only Wis 8<sup>8</sup> '[Wisdom] ceth aright what is to come' (εὐκρίτε). RV has 'divineth the things to come,' with 'ceth' in marg. But it is probable that in AV ceth = 'divineth,' as Scot (1584), 'Conjecture unto me by thy familiar spirit.'

CONSCIENCE.—The word is not found in OT; it occurs in Apoc., Wis 17<sup>11</sup> 'wickedness . . . being pressed with c., always forecasteth grievous things' (συνείδησις), Sir 14<sup>2</sup> 'Blessed is he whose c. hath not condemned him' (ψυχή, RV 'soul'), and 2 Mac 6<sup>11</sup> 'they made a c. to help themselves' (εὐλαβὴς ἔχειν, RV 'scrupled'; cf. Purchas [1625], Pilgrimes, ii. 1276, 'They will . . . make more conscience to breake a Fast, than to commit a Murther'). In NT 32 times (RV 30 times, omitting Jn 8<sup>9</sup>, and reading συνήθεια 1 Co 8<sup>7</sup>) always for συνείδησις, of which it is the invariable and appropriate tr. But mod. usage would prefer 'consciousness' in 1 Co 8<sup>7</sup> 'some with c. of the idol unto this hour eat it as a thing offered unto an idol' (RV with edd. reads συνήθεια, hence 'being used until now to the idol'); and in He 10<sup>2</sup> 'no more c. of sins.' Cf. Milton, Par. Lost, viii. 502—

'Her virtue and the conscience of her worth.'

A. HISTORICAL SKETCH.—When man begins to reflect on his experience as a moral agent, two questions emerge. (1) What is the highest good for man? What is the 'chief end' in attainment of which man finds satisfaction? (2) What is the source of moral obligation? What power commands and regulates human action? In the history of thought, these two questions occur in the order stated; and it is not till the second has been asked that a doctrine of conscience is possible.

1. Greek philosophy in its prime is mainly concerned with the first of these. The ethics of Plato and Aristotle are largely occupied with discussing the nature of the Good; and practically their doctrine amounts to this, that man finds his highest welfare in the duties of citizenship. Man is regarded as part of the physical and social world in which he finds himself; and his welfare lies in playing his due part therein. This doctrine was sufficient as long as the Greek State lasted. When this was broken up, however, and there was no longer a life of free and ennobling activity open to men, the moral problem assumed the second form. Man is thrust back on himself. His individuality becomes emphasized over against the world, in which he can now no longer realize himself. Turning in upon himself, he seeks within the guidance he has hitherto found in the life which waited for him without. This type of mind, so characteristic of thoughtful and earnest men under the Roman Empire, finds expression in the philosophical doctrines of the Stoics and Epicureans. These are as intensely subjective as the systems of Plato and Aristotle had been comprehensive and objective. Not, therefore, till man has become aware of himself as an individual, and looks out on life from the standpoint of his subjectivity, does the question of the rule of conduct clearly emerge. In discussing this question, the Stoics found the rule in reason, the Epicureans in sense. The Stoics made wide the opposition between reason and sense. Virtue, according to them, is reasonableness, and is exercised in absolute control of sense, utter indifference to material things, and austere rejection of pleasure. Noble things are said by them in praise of virtue, and eloquent testimony is borne against the views of a corrupt age. But by their own admission the leading principle of their thought and action is sublime but powerless. The moral world needed an active principle which should regenerate character and reconstitute society. This power came with Christianity.

2. In the history of religion as set forth in the Christian Scriptures, we find a similar succession in the order in which the above-mentioned problems emerge. A doctrine of conscience is not found till late in the development of Christian thought, when the consciousness of individuality is strong and full. There are indeed traces of the operations of conscience. Man is always treated as a moral being (so in the prophets, and especially in Ezekiel, whose sense of individual responsibility is new and strong), susceptible of communications from a personal God, and amenable to His judgment. But conscience, or the source of obligation for the individual, is not made a subject of special treatment in the earlier stages of man's spiritual history. Broadly speaking, there is no doctrine of conscience in the OT. The heart is the centre of man's whole spiritual energy, whether intellectual or moral; and no subtle analysis of mental or moral powers is attempted. The characteristic work of conscience, that of condemning us when we do wrong, is ascribed to the heart, Job 27<sup>6</sup>. The absence of a doctrine of conscience from the OT is to be explained, not by any reference to the alleged disinclination of the Heb. mind for psychological study, but by the fact that the stage of religious development at which the Hebrews were under Mosaism, precluded the question to which the doctrine of conscience is an answer. The law may be compared to the systems of Plato and Aristotle, inasmuch as it answers the first of the moral questions which arise on consideration of man's life, viz. What is the Good? The Good is the will of God expressed in this body of legislation. The question of principle of action, or an organ of moral judgment, cannot emerge till the conception of the Good has been made explicit. The law is the conscience of the Heb. community. Hence, as Oehler points out, the idea of a νόμος γράμμις ἐν καρδίᾳ is wholly alien to the OT. This absence of a doctrine of conscience is to be found also in our Lord's teaching. He never uses the word, and for a similar reason. His teaching is essentially revelation. He is dealing with the highest good for man, stating it in words, exhibiting it in life. His teaching and example are addressed to conscience, and are meant to awaken conscience; and for this very reason He does not and cannot discuss conscience. Many of His sayings apply to conscience, and cast light on it, e.g. 'the lamp of the body,' Mt 6<sup>22-23</sup>; but conscience itself does not form part of His express teaching.

With Christ's work as Redeemer a new stage of man's history is entered on. The first question is answered; the first need is met. The Good is revealed as truth; it is accomplished in act; it is present as power. What Greek philosophy sought after in the speculations of Plato and Aristotle, is possessed in the kingdom of God. The parallel is more than fanciful. As the Greek realized the good in the duties of citizenship in the State, the Christian realizes it in the duties and privileges of citizenship in the kingdom of God. The virtue of the Greek, narrowed by the limitations of the Gr. State, is the obligation and possibility of mankind in the wide realm of grace, which no political change can restrict or destroy.

Now, accordingly, man as an individual gets his rights, and becomes the subject of special study. The NT, apart from the teaching of our Lord, is largely occupied with the consideration of man in relation to the grace of God which has come with Christ. Human nature is studied as it could not be at an earlier stage. It is true that there is no merely speculative treatment, the interest of the NT being practical and not technical. References, however, to various aspects of man's moral constitution abound. In particular, the question of man's relation to the Good as the will of God receives special treatment, and is answered by an explicit doctrine of conscience. Man is confronted by the revealed will of God, revealed not only in a book, but in a Person. How does this will make itself felt in the sphere of man's individual consciousness? How is man guided and impelled towards the fulfilment of this will? The answer of St. Paul, and other writers in the NT, is conscience. Conscience, therefore, at once becomes the object of special practical interest. It is the great aim of a Christian to have a conscience that shall be 'good,' 'void of offence,' or 'pure'; and it is of paramount importance that conscience should be maintained in a condition of enlightenment and power adequate to the discharge of its great function as the organ of moral apprehension and moral judgment.

3. After the varied Christian life of the early centuries of our era had died away, Christian ethic, like Christian theology, fell under the blight of mediæval scholasticism. Christian truth was stiffened into a system of dogma. Christian morality was elaborated into a legal system more cumbrous and wearisome than ever the Mosaic code had been. Under this double burden the souls of men groaned in bondage. Yet even in the darkest ages there were not wanting symptoms of revolt. Mysticism claimed the power of holding fellowship with God, without the intervention of ecclesiastical machinery; but it failed to base its protest on a sound conception of human nature, and so never rose beyond the position of a secret in possession of a few unique spirits. Final deliverance came in the epoch of the Reformation. The Reformation was in essence a religious revival. The cumbrous ecclesiastical machinery by which the mediæval Church, while professing to unite God and man, had really held them apart, was swept away in a burst of righteous wrath. The relations of God and man came to be re-stated under the inspiration of original Christian ideas. In this process conscience necessarily played an important part. Conscience accentuated the antagonism between man and God, and showed man guilty in a degree for which indulgences and priestly absolutions brought no sound relief. Conscience, in like manner, in view of the complete atonement wrought by Christ, testified, to him who rested on Christ alone for salvation, perfect peace with God. Conscience, accordingly, occupies large space in the writings of the Reformers, as it must do in all Christian teaching. It is not made, however, the subject of special theoretical treatment. Speculative interest in the question of the source of moral judgment has not awakened; and the necessity of its discussion is not yet felt. The Reformation, in fact, was not an individualistic movement. It is a misrepresentation to describe it as such, or to quote such phrases as 'the right of private judgment,' as embodying its characteristic ideas. Those philosophical writers who most fully express in the domain of pure thought the Protestant spirit—Descartes and Spinoza—are by no means individualists. At the same time, there can be no doubt that the Reformation contained the possibility of individualism. The external unity of the Church had been broken up. Before a conception of spiritual unity could be formed and wrought out in moral and political life, it was inevitable that an epoch of individualism should supervene, in which man should seek to find the solution of intellectual and moral problems within his own subjectivity. This movement predominated most largely in England, and obtained almost exclusive sway, till within the present century it has met a counter current of thought. Ethical theory during such a period is largely occupied with the question of the source of moral obligation, and the faculty of moral judgment. British moralists may be distinguished and classified mainly by their views on this topic. At the head of the long line stands Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679), a writer whose fertile suggestiveness, virile force, and daring paradox, made him a paramount influence in the development of ethical doctrine in Britain. His fundamental position is that man's natural tendencies are only and altogether 'self-regarding.' The good for the individual is simply what he desires for himself. The result of each individual seeking the gratification of his own desires is, of course, a state of war, whose miseries

Hobbes depicts to the life. Reason, accordingly, intervenes to stop this intolerable state of matters, and does so by enjoining submission to a strong government. Hobbes thus pushes individualism to an extreme in which it becomes intolerable, and is replaced by an iron system in which the individual is practically extinguished. In such a system there is no place for conscience, properly speaking. Hobbes uses the word only in connexion with the analogous phrase 'conscious.' Conscience is no more than opinion shared by various individuals. Any higher sense is mere metaphor. The moral faculty is no other than reason, calculating how best to secure individual advantage, and deciding upon submission to the State as the best means of securing the end aimed at. Such a doctrine was rather the propounding of a problem than its solution. Accordingly, we find that ethical thought in England consists mainly in answers to Hobbes, or rather in answers to the moral problem so acutely stated by him: What is the source of moral obligation? What is the nature of the moral faculty? These answers follow three distinct lines.

(1) Appeal is made to reason. Reason is regarded as the power by which universal truths and principles are perceived and proclaimed. This is, in general, the view of Cudworth (1617-1688), whose Treatise concerning Eternal and Immutable Morality, not published till 1731, is directed against the teaching of Hobbes as destructive of the essential distinctions of good and evil; and of Clarke (1675-1729). Both these writers claim for man this faculty of recognizing truths, ideas, or relations of things, prior to and apart from the suggestions of sensation. Here we have a real answer to Hobbes, and a most hopeful line of ethical thought. If man have this power, then we are lifted at once above the degrading view of man as a creature of merely selfish instincts, and have morality based, not on conventions, but on eternal fact.

The value of such 'lianoetic ethics,' to use Martineau's designation, depends obviously on the view taken of reason; and in the above-mentioned writers, reason is conceived too much as a mere formal power, limited to the recognition of truths submitted to it. Thus, while phrases in Cudworth, for instance, remind one of Kant, there is no approach to the Kantian doctrine of knowledge, still less to its subsequent idealist development.

(2) A fuller analysis of human instincts is attempted. Hobbes had said man's primary instincts are self-regarding. It was obviously open to reply that they were not, or that they all were not. Accordingly, we have such writers as Shaftesbury (1671-1713) and Hutcheson (1694-1747) elaborately proving that man possesses social as well as selfish instincts, and placing virtue in the proper balance of the two. The perception of this balance or proportion is due to a moral sense, which, like the sense of beauty in things artistic, guides us in things moral. At a first glance it might appear, as no doubt it did to the writers themselves, that they were answering Hobbes, and giving a more dignified conception of human nature. Really, however, they are in substantial agreement with Hobbes, entirely so as to presuppositions, and practically so as to result. They also appeal to instincts as providing motives and impulses. Some of these, indeed, they say are not selfish; but if we press them we find that the special power of unselfish instincts is the superior gratification they afford, i.e. they are at bottom selfish still. Selfishness, or, to give it a more refined but more misleading title, Utility, is the spring and standard of action. The psychological and even the ethical principles of Hobbes are really continued in Shaftesbury, Hutcheson, Adam Smith, Hume.

(3) Reference is made to a distinct power of human nature, viz. to Conscience, as supreme arbiter in morals. Butler (1692-1752) is distinguished among British moralists for the emphasis he lays on this faculty. He sees that Shaftesbury's reply to Hobbes is defective in this respect, that his 'moral sense' lacks the quality of supremacy, which is required to face and quell the imperiousness of selfish instincts. He labours, therefore, to establish the supremacy of conscience, and to vindicate for it magisterial position and authority. Of the impressiveness and moral strength of Butler's writings it is impossible to speak too highly. As a practical protest against the immorality of his own age, they are deeply interesting; and as a moral tonic in any age, they are invaluable. As ethical theory, or doctrine of conscience, however, they cannot be said to be final or satisfactory. Butler was, to quote the words of T. H. Green, 'the victim of the current psychology.'* To him, as much as to Hobbes, Shaftesbury, Locke, or Hume, feeling was the source of action, as of knowledge. Objects of desire are given. Then conscience, a power whose origin and nature are unexplained and inexplicable, appears to decide among the competing motives. It speaks with authority, but is unable to make its authority felt. Ultimately, Butler is driven to admit practical supremacy to self-love, and takes refuge in the identity of duty and self-interest. A higher principle does indeed appear in Butler, viz. the love of God. But as he never reconsidered his psychology, this rather contributes additional confusion to his scheme. Human nature remains 'a cross of unreconciled principles,' self-love, benevolence, conscience, the love of God. Plainly, such a view of man cannot provide a sure basis of ethics. The whole moral problem must be reconsidered. What is implied in moral action? If it shall appear that the sensationalist psychology is at fault, if feeling cannot present objects of desire, if in the simplest action there is implied the presence of a Self, making itself its own object, then we are led to a view of man as a being who finds his true good in the good of others, and of conscience as not merely authoritative, but also mighty to carry its precepts into effect, being indeed the presence within the individual consciousness of that Reason, Mind, Spirit, or Personality whose revelation is found in all reality and all good.

It is not needful to pursue the line of British moralists any further. Whoever they happen to be, Paley, Bentham, James Mill, J. S. Mill, or Bain, whatever their minor differences or their special excellences, they unite in retaining the psychology which reigned throughout the eighteenth century. In vain for them did Hume carry the conclusions of that psychology to a scepticism which provoked Kant to a reply, which introduced a new conception of man and the spiritual world. All alike they cling to the conviction that it is possible by dissection to arrive at the living man, and by analyzing his sensations to account for knowledge and morality. They may vary in detail, but they are in substantial agreement as to results. The chief end of man is happiness. The moral faculty is a variously described compound of feelings, whose fluidity is stiffened by the sanctions and punishments of society. This psychology has more recently allied itself with the hypothesis of organic evolution, and made draughts of illimitable time aid in establishing its conclusions. Prolonged experience of pleasure in connexion with actions, which serve social ends, has resulted in certain physiological changes in the brain and nervous system, which render these actions constant. Thus, according to Spencer, is begotten a conscience or faculty, to which he even gives the name of intuition. This sensationalist psychology, thus strengthened by evolution, has called forth various replies.

(a) Intuitionism enters its earnest denial. Dr. Martineau's strictures on evolutionary ethics are powerful, and his general ethical doctrine is most earnest and impressive. His position closely resembles that of Butler in last century. Like Butler, he gives an account of the springs of moral action. But whereas Butler only mentions two, Self-love and Benevolence, Martineau's list is most elaborate, containing no fewer than thirteen passions, propensions, sentiments, or affections. Quite as Butler had done, he gives to conscience a judicial function in respect to these springs of action. Distinctive in Martineau, however, is his doctrine that conscience judges, not of the rightness of acts, but of the rank of motives. Conscience he defines to be 'the critical perception we have of the relative authority of our several principles of action.' Right and wrong he defines thus: 'Every action is right which, in presence of a lower principle, follows a higher; every action is wrong which, in presence of a higher principle, follows a lower.' Eloquent and powerful as Dr. Martineau's exposition is, it is open to the objection which may be brought against Butler. Whence come these springs of action? Do they simply appear before the judgment-seat of conscience, without any prior determination by self-consciousness? Then we are thrown back, as we were by Butler, upon current sensational psychology. And whence comes conscience? Does it simply appear, and seat itself in judicial state, a separate, unique faculty, inexplicable and mysterious, owning no organic relation to self-consciousness? Then its authority is blind, and, as in Butler's doctrine, is unsupported by power.

(b) A conclusive answer can be reached only through a consideration of the possibility of experience in general, and of moral experience in particular. Such an answer is to be found in Green's Prolegomena to Ethics. Press the analysis of sensation as far back as we please, make our list of feelings and instincts as detailed as possible, we never get a mere sensation or instinct, such as we might suppose it to be in the lower animals, but always the sensation as it is to a self, already modified by its relation to self-consciousness. In the simplest sensation, there is implied the operation of a spiritual principle, which is the basis of the possibility at once of knowledge and of morality. The sensationalist psychology is thus deprived of its whole raison d'être. It exists in order to get personality out of sensations. It can do so, only because personality is therein already implied.

The hypothesis of evolution is of no use to sensationalism, and does not invalidate the argument of idealism. 'That countless generations should have passed during which a transmitted organism was progressively modified by reaction on its surroundings, by struggle for existence or otherwise, till its functions became such that an eternal consciousness could realize or reproduce itself through them,—this might add to the wonder with which the consideration of what we do and are must always fill us, but it could not alter the results of that consideration. If such be discovered to be the case, the discovery cannot affect the analysis of knowledge of what is implied in there being a world to be known, and in our knowing it, on which we found our theory of the action of a free or self-conditioned and eternal mind in man' (Prolegomena, p. 82). Man, therefore, is a self or personality, which is not, however, an incident in a series, but is rooted in an infinite self or personality. Our individual self-consciousness derives from and is maintained by an infinite, eternal, universal, self-consciousness; Green would say, is a 'reproduction' of it,—a phrase open to misconception. Knowledge, therefore, is the gradual discovery of mind or spirit in things, the exhibition of the world as the self-manifestation of an infinite personality, with whom the finite intelligence of man is one. Morality is the progressive accomplishment of an eternal purpose, with which the individual is and ought to be at one, whose goal is the perfection of man. The good for man is self-realization, but it is the realization of an infinite self, and is thus identical with the widest possible range of good for others, and is attained by the profoundest self-surrender. The moral faculty in man, the practical reason or conscience, is no special inexplicable endowment, a vox clamantis in deserto. It is the man himself, conscious in all action of a good, which he either reaches or fails to reach, which in either case stands above his separate impulses, in the one case approving and beckoning him onward and upward, in the other condemning him and binding on him the penalty due to one who has broken the law of his own being. Conscience, thus conceived, may also with equal truth be described as the revelation of infinite good to man, or the voice of God witnessing to eternal right within the individual soul. It is the voice of the man's true self, and his true self is ideally one with God. On such lines alone is the sensationalist attack on absolute right and on conscience successfully met, and room found for Christian ethic, and a Christian doctrine of conscience.

B. OUTLINE OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE.

i. THE NATURE OF CONSCIENCE. — The locus classicus here is Ro 2<sup>14, 15</sup>. The connexion of thought is the responsibility of all men for their actions, their condemnation in sin, their acceptance in righteousness. This applies to Gentiles as well as Jews. It would not apply had Gentiles no revelation of absolute good made to them, as the Jews had in the Law. Such a revelation, however, the Gentiles have. They (v.<sup>14</sup>) do by nature, i.e. instinctively, the things which are articulately prescribed in the Law, and accordingly while they have not the Law as a written code, yet they have it in another sense. In what sense is now explained (v.<sup>15</sup>). The comparison in the apostle's mind is between Jew and Gentile, in respect of the delivery to each of God's Law. To the Jews, this delivery was made at Sinai, and so in speaking of its delivery to the Gentiles he uses Sinaitic imagery. The apostle's description involves three points. (1) The delivery of the Law in the dictates of natural impulse; 'the work of the law,' i.e. a course of conduct conforming to the will of God, being 'written in their hearts,' as in the case of the Jews it was written on tables of stone. (2) The recognition of the Law in its binding obligations by a moral faculty, just as the Jews heard with bodily ear the proclamation of the Ten Commandments; 'their conscience bearing witness therewith,' i.e. along with the heart, when it speaks and prompts to duty. (3) Judgments passed upon actions in the light of the witness of conscience, some being favourable, others (as the emphasis implies, the greater number) being unfavourable; 'their thoughts one with another, accusing or else excusing them.'

The doctrine of this passage, borne out by other Scripture usage, therefore, is: (a) That man has received a revelation of good, sufficient to make him morally responsible. This revelation comes in different forms to men differently placed in the providential disposition of affairs. Even those who seem least advantageously situated have the revelation of 'nature.' Man is so made that he finds the satisfaction of his true self in moral good only; and towards this the forward impulse of his heart goes forth. The race, charged with the special function of guarding and transmitting the spiritual heritage of humanity, has appropriately a special revelation of good, explicitly bearing the stamp of superhuman origin. Finally, when 'the fulness of time' in the moral discipline of mankind is reached, the good finds complete revelation in a person, the man Christ Jesus. 'Nature,' with its few rudimentary facts of moral life, and 'Law,' with its greater articulateness, are summed up in 'Christ,' in whom moral good is perfectly realized. (β) That man possesses a moral faculty, or is possessed by it, that he has a conscience, which is indeed his self-consciousness in respect of moral action, in virtue of which he recognizes, approves, and binds upon himself the Good, in whatsoever form it is revealed to him, and by the authority of which he pronounces judgment upon himself. This doctrine obviously rests upon the general scriptural doctrine of man as made in the image of God, of man as spirit even as God is spirit or personality, a conception which we have seen to be the suggestion of philosophy in its criticism of unphilosophical sensationalist psychology. God reveals His will to man, partially in Nature and Law, fully in Christ. Man as a spiritual being is susceptible of this revelation; his consciousness of it in things moral is conscience.

This view of conscience greatly simplifies it, and reduces it from the position of an inexplicable faculty, fulminating in impotent majesty above the warring impulses of man's nature. It is simply the faculty, if we must use the term, through which we apprehend the divine will so that it may govern our lives. It is no more a separate faculty than faith, and deserves no more than faith the credit of its operations. As faith lays hold of Christ, and thus saves and sanctifies; so conscience lays hold of the divine will, and thus legislates and judges. It is not an independent source of law and judgment. It voices the will of God.

It is plain, however, that this view, if in one sense it deprives conscience of the proud position which an intuitionist theory would confer upon it, in another confers upon it unique and awful supremacy. When conscience wakes and speaks, it means that man is in spiritual contact with God, that God is making His will felt in the depths of man's constitution. Thus it is that 'to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin'; sin, not error or mistake, nor only shortcoming, but trespass against the law of God, which is recognized as the law of our own being, in keeping which our welfare lies.

The practical result is that conscience claims, and must receive if we are to be true to our very nature, a position of absolute supremacy. Every action must be brought beneath its sway; in popular phrase, we must make conscience of all we do. Actions laid upon us by outward authority, we are to do, not because the authority is supported by force, but because conscience recognizes the good of which this authority is an expression; and so we obey 'for conscience' sake' (Ro 13<sup>5</sup>). Actions which seemingly lie outside the moral judgment, having apparently no relation to moral questions, are to be brought before conscience and carefully scrutinized, so that even in such matters as what we are to eat or refrain from eating, we are still to act 'for conscience' sake' (1 Co 10<sup>28-29</sup>). The whole domain of life is to be brought within the sweep of conscience, and every element in it is to be made subject to that great and just arbitrament.

It may be true that in a society so largely Christianized as ours, the man who acts from conscience will not behave in a manner markedly distinct from the behaviour of those who simply follow the conventions of society. There will, however, be very distinct differences on a closer scrutiny. He will discover new meanings in actions prescribed by convention, and will perform them the better that he does them with conscience. He will be on the outlook for new duties and new means of realizing the good which he apprehends, not as a code, but as an inner spiritual impulse. Apart from specific differences of action, there is a difference in spring of action, which cannot but tell in the long run. Perceiving the disparity between his own attainments and that good of which conscience is the witness, and to which it summons him, he has within him a divine discontent which drives him to further efforts, and secures for him greater excellences. The morality of a code is rigid, self-satisfied, pharisaic. The morality of conscience is ever aspiring, humble, dissatisfied with self. A conscience thus kept in its supremacy is described as 'good' (Ac 23<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>6, 19</sup>, He 13<sup>18</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>16, 21</sup>), not in the sense that he who has it has never sinned, but because he has yielded himself to the will of God, and is living in the spirit and aim of his career for the glory of God, while he never permits unforgiven sin to lie upon his heart: 'void of offence toward God and toward man' (Ac 24<sup>16</sup>), because the pleasing of God in all things, and his neighbour in all things for his good unto edification, is the man's constant aim and exercise: 'pure' (1 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>), because there is no doubleness of mind, or secret alienation from the will of God, but a sincere desire, an unwavering resolution to live so that He may approve.

It is, of course, always open to man as a free agent to disobey conscience, reject its supremacy, disregard its witness, and defy its authority. On an intuitionist theory, which regards conscience as a part of man, separable from other parts, it would be difficult to vindicate the terrible consequences of such conduct. It is because the conscience is the man himself in his consciousness of the divine will, that the consequences are so injurious, penetrate so deeply, and extend so widely. Conscience disobeyed is: (1) Defiled; and this defilement may be either (a) occasional (1 Co 8<sup>7</sup>), or (β) permanent and pervasive (Tit 1<sup>15</sup>). (2) Branded or seared (1 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>), where the figure is either the branding of a slave with a stamp, or the extinction of faculty by the use of hot iron, in any case expressing the reduction of conscience to a state of moral incapacity. (3) Perverted (Mt 6<sup>23</sup>), so that conscience, the light of the soul, gives, not merely no deliverance, but a deliverance on the wrong side, the man being now, not a servant of the good, but of the evil, having sinned against the Holy Spirit.

That conscience is disobeyed in countless instances is patent fact; and these consequences may be traced in the history of individuals. It is more difficult to see the fact and to trace the consequence in the records of the race. Yet it is certain that sin is not merely an incident in the career of an individual, but a quality inherent in the conduct of man universally, and that the effects of sin are traceable, to what extent it is impossible to define, in the general conscience of mankind.

ii. THE COMPETENCE OF CONSCIENCE. — In all that is said of the supremacy of conscience its competence is, of course, presupposed. This, however, is precisely what is denied by those who desire to explain the phenomena of conscience on the hypothesis of evolution, and facts are urged in disproof of the claim of original authority. It must be remembered, however, what it is that is claimed by the Christian doctrine on behalf of conscience. It is not the infallible authority of an independent faculty, but the ability on the part of a being made in God's image to recognize God's will as it is progressively revealed to him.

Much of the sensationalist and evolutionary attack on conscience really applies only to the intuitionist theory of conscience, and does not touch the Christian doctrine or the idealist philosophy, whose criticism of sensationalist psychology we have noticed above. The special difficulties which call for consideration are these—

1. The diversity of moral judgments, as among different nations now, or at different stages of the world's history. The heathen conscience enjoins what the Christian conscience condemns. Jewish feeling rejoiced in deeds at which Christian sentiment shudders. Amid such divergences, is not the supremacy of conscience lost? The answer to this puzzle lies in our general view of man and his conscience of good. If man be a personal being in constant communication with the infinite Person, God, we can understand how his moral history is an education or development, each step in advance being gained through obedience to conscience, which proclaims as absolute the will of God. The stages of the revelation of good are marked by advance up to the full realization of good in Christ. Conscience at each stage is supreme, though its deliverances, compared together, vary according to the stage reached. Combined with this view is the fact of deterioration through disobedience, so that the conscience of a nation or religious community may become perverted, and proclaim as duty a bloody crime or an unnatural offence. Even among races which have formed the most mistaken standard of duty, it is found, as missionary records amply show, that the revelation of higher excellence meets with ready response, and conscience, revived by the light, calls upon man to follow it. In order to prove the supremacy of conscience, we do not need to prove uniformity amid the deliverances of conscience, from age to age. The very divergences set its persistent authority in more vivid light.

2. The alleged conflict of duties, which occasionally arises, reducing conscience to perplexity and silence. This certainly would be a fatal objection, not to the supremacy of conscience only, but to morality as a whole. If there arise circumstances, not due to any human crime or error, in which duty confronts duty in absolute contradiction, so that merely to act is to transgress, not only is conscience proved incompetent, but the moral sphere is shown not to include the whole of life, and righteousness by being demonstrated to be impossible is made unnecessary. The question can be met only by analyses of cases. Those cases must, of course, be excluded which are not, properly speaking, cases of conscience. One case only needs to be stated to be dismissed, that in which a verdict of conscience, in itself clear and distinct, is opposed by strong passion or self-interest which clamorously demands to be obeyed. Here, plainly, there is no question of the competence of conscience, or its claim to be obeyed. Another case is that in which the clear testimony of conscience is confronted by some instinct of the soul, itself true and noble. Here also there is, strictly speaking, no perplexity of conscience, and it is admitted that there is no wavering in its demand to be obeyed. Hesitation arises from the strong appeal of feeling. Sir Walter Scott has presented such a situation in the classic instance of Jeanie Deans, tempted to tell a falsehood in order to save her sister's life. Here the obligation of truth is confronted by sisterly affection. The action of Jeanie Deans unquestionably represents the true solution. Conscience is obeyed, while love goes forth in noblest sacrifice on behalf of the beloved. The difficulty of such cases is not speculative, but practical, and is to be met, not by intellectual discussion on the occasion when the difficulty arises, for which, indeed, there would be no time, but by the life habit of obedience, begetting an insight into the nature of the highest good for others, even our best beloved, as well as for ourselves, which will be available in the sudden emergency as an intuitive judgment.

Cases which do affect conscience and seem to perplex it, are those in which there is a 'conflict between different formulae for expressing the ideal of good in human conduct, or between different institutions for furthering its realization, which have alike obtained authority over men's minds without being intrinsically entitled to more than a partial and relative obedience,' or an 'incompatibility of some such formula or institution, on the one side, with some moral impulse of the individual on the other, which is really an impulse towards the attainment of human perfection, but cannot adjust itself to recognized rules and established institutions' (Prolegomena, p. 342). In such cases 'the requirements of conscience seem to be in conflict with each other. However disposed to do what his conscience enjoins, the man finds it difficult to decide what its injunction is' (ibid. p. 351). Such cases may, indeed, become peculiarly complicated, and exceedingly painful. But they do not really constitute a conflict of duties. Right seems to be divided against itself, when in reality it is only rising through contest of opposite one-sided views to a fuller conception, or through the break-up of a system to a higher realization than could be contained within its limits. There is no such thing really as a conflict of duties. 'A man's duty under any particular set of circumstances is always one, though the conditions of the case may be so complicated and obscure as to make it difficult to decide what the duty really is' (ibid. p. 355). Here, in like manner, the ability and claim of conscience are not involved. It is true that there is no extant formula which will serve by its mere quotation to settle the case. Conscience is not so formal and unnatural a faculty as such a view would imply. Yet it is not incompetent, because it moves slowly and grows in knowledge and power through the discipline of life and the practice of obedience. With characteristic caution Butler states the matter, 'Let any plain, honest man, before he engages in any course of action, ask himself, Is this I am going about right, or is it wrong? Is it good, or is it evil? I do not in the least doubt but that this question would be answered agreeably to truth and virtue by almost any fair man in almost any circumstances' (Sermon III). A recent essayist, to the question, 'How am I to know what is right?' makes answer, 'By the αἰσθησις of the φρόνιμος' (Bradley's Ethical Studies, p. 177). 'If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching,' or system, or institution, or formula, 'whether it be of God' (Jn 7<sup>17</sup>).

iii. THE EDUCATION OF CONSCIENCE.—We thus see that objections, which might be valid against a doctrine which made conscience an infallible oracle, are not valid against the view which regards conscience as man's consciousness of the will of God. It is now to be regarded, not as an inexplicable part of man, but as man himself in relation to the revelation of right. It is the apprehension of God as Righteousness, just as faith is the apprehension of God as Grace; and Luther, as Dörner points out, speaks of faith as the Christian conscience. Conscience, accordingly, is involved in man's moral history. It suffers in his sin and alienation from God, becoming clouded in its insight, feeble in its testimony, and may even come to be grievously perverted in its judgments. It gains in his restoration through grace, its knowledge is clarified, its judgment strengthened. The deepest characteristic of sin is a liberty, which is, in truth, the bondage of man's will or personality. The deepest characteristic of grace is a service, which is perfect freedom. Man, in yielding himself to God, accepts a law, which is the law of his own being. He is therefore free, self-determining, and self-realizing; a person as God is a person, realizing the fulness of personal life in harmony with God. Conscience shares in this subjection 'which is also emancipation.' The NT everywhere claims for conscience this independence of action, this immediacy and certainty of its deliverances, undetermined by a formal code or the voice of a spiritual director (Ro 14<sup>5-6, 15-23</sup>, Col 2<sup>10</sup>, Ja 1<sup>8-9</sup>). Toward this point, therefore, the growth of conscience must be directed under the guidance of special education. This education is twofold.

1. Social.—The highest good for man always involves the relation of man to man. 'Through society,' says Professor Green, 'is personality actualized.' Hence it follows 'that the human spirit can only realize itself, or fulfil its idea, in persons; and that it can only do so through society, since society is the condition of the development of a personality' (Prolegomena, pp. 200, 201). Conscience, therefore, being personality in its relation to right, is also socially conditioned. There is no such thing as a merely individual conscience. Even when seemingly most individual, as when a reformer rises to protest against the injustice of some institution, its testimony is still on behalf of a good for man, which this institution, founded, no doubt, to further it, now fails to express and practically opposes. It is plain, therefore, that 'no individual can make a conscience for himself. He always needs a society to make it for him' (Prolegomena, p. 351). Conscience is born and cradled in the home, trained and exercised in the Church, in civil society, and the State. The enormous importance of this social education of conscience is thus evident. The ethical functions of parent, teacher, pastor, employer, statesman, are seen to be the highest and most sacred. Under their influence, the conscience of the individual receives its revelation of duty, and its preparation for the exercise of its legislative and judicial vocation.

2. Individual.—Man cannot be merely passive in education. All true education is self-education. The education of conscience, in particular, must be the work of the individual, consciously fitting himself for the service in which freedom and life for him lie. The means at his disposal are mainly three.

(a) The institutions of society, the sacred rights of life, honour, property, reputation, with all the detailed obligations to which these give rise. Only through the most careful obedience to these elementary conditions of moral life can conscience be kept clear and strong. Negligence here, even in name of high spirituality, has always produced a terrible Nemesis, and those who have claimed emancipation in name of religion have sunk beneath the load of that mere morality they affected to despise. Hence the NT ethic is remarkable for its abundance of commonplace, and has the homeliest directions to give to children, servants, citizens, to fulfil the duties of their station, while it frequently recalls those who are thrilling with consciousness of new light and life to the rudiments of morality, truth, honesty, purity, industry, etc. The attempt to be religious at the expense of morality is very ancient and is still very prevalent, and requires continually the prophetic rebuke (Mic 6<sup>8-9</sup>).

(b) The literature in which the conscience of humanity has given utterance to itself. The whole field of history, biography, and fiction is opened up for the education of conscience. By diligent study, conscience grows informed, and becomes more sure of itself. Along with such general literature we may class the Bible. It requires no a priori doctrine of inspiration to establish the supremacy of biblical ethic. Here we have a revelation of right, which has never been seriously questioned, and has commanded the unaffected approval even of unbelievers. The Bible is the touchstone of conscience. Conscience can only be maintained in truth and vigour, according as it is continually refreshed by earnest study of the unveiling of the ideal contained in Scripture and principally in the character of Jesus Christ.

(c) Communion with God. Here we are on the borderland of ethic and religion. The education of books becomes the education of living intercourse. The conscience whose sole sources of information have been natural laws, or the records of literature, fails of the highest light, breaks down in critical instances, and is, besides, gloomy stern and hopeless. The conscience which rises through obedience to moral law and study of ethic into fellowship with Him who is Righteousness and Truth, becomes clear and full in its testimony, a reliable guide in the perplexities of life. Of course this result is not reached by a leap. It implies a process carried on through life. The growth of conscience will have its periods of weakness, onesidedness, acrid fanaticism, morbid tenderness, all of which must be most patiently borne with, not only by observers, but by the individual himself. Conscience will even pronounce judgments that are needless, foolish, or actually erroneous. The utmost care must be taken not to wound conscience at such times. Specially must it not be overborne by those who rejoice in higher light and claim a larger liberty. Their higher duty, indeed, may be to deny themselves a liberty which is their right (1 Co 8<sup>7-13</sup> 10<sup>23-33</sup>, Ro 15<sup>1-2</sup>). The stage of weakness is, however, in itself an effect of sin, and to continue in it is added sin. Strength and truth of conscience are the aim to be consciously striven after (He 5<sup>14</sup>). The testimony of conscience is meant to be part of our assurance toward God (2 Co 1<sup>12</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>21</sup>).

iv. THE WITNESS OF CONSCIENCE.—The work of conscience lies, no doubt, within the moral sphere. But in considering the basis of ethics, we are led to see that moral action implies a reference to an infinite Personality as the ground and origin of man's personal being. Morality presupposes religion as the basis of its possibility, and prepares for religion through its incompleteness. Conscience, accordingly, as the supreme moral faculty, points beyond the merely moral sphere, and becomes a witness to the truth of religion. The witness of conscience is not to be regarded as logical demonstration. In point of fact, spiritual realities cannot be reached by logical processes. The only valid argument for religious truth is that which proceeds by consideration of the constitution of man, and discerns in that constitution the necessity of the existence of a Divine Being in whose image man has been made. In that argument, the witness of conscience forms an important element. To trace this witness fully belongs to dogmatics. We conclude this article by a bare outline of the direction which this witness takes.

1. God.—Conscience we have seen to be man's consciousness in action of right to be done. This is with equal truth to be described as the revelation of right within us, or the voice of God speaking in the soul of man. In moral action we are dealing with more than the judgments of our fellow-men, with more even than our own judgment upon ourselves. There is present in the court of conscience an invisible Assessor, who is, indeed, the ultimate source and standard of right by which the judgment proceeds. Individual experience presents this line of proof with an intensity which is best expressed in silence. Biography and history present the demonstration often with tragic articulateness. In conscience, the consciousness of God cannot be got rid of. It haunts the sinner in his revolt as shadow of doom. It accompanies the seeker in his upward movement with ever-growing confirmation. All other arguments for the being of God find their force increased by being combined with this. If the ontological argument leads us to a reason or universal self-consciousness, through man's relation to which knowledge is possible; if the argument e contingentia mundi brings us to an eternal substance in which all things inhere; if the teleological argument requires a purpose fulfilling itself in creation,—the moral argument enables us to define that reason, substance, purpose, as a Person whose very nature is righteousness. (See suggestive treatment in Illingworth, Personality, Lect. iv.)

2. Christ.—The constitution of man requires as its root a Personal God, to whom conscience in man ascribes moral perfection. But Personality is inconceivable apart from Self-revelation and Self-communication. An Incarnation of God, therefore, is profoundly congruous with the demand for God which arises out of the constitution of man. Jesus Christ is presented to the mind of man as such an Incarnation. It will scarcely be denied that He used language regarding Himself which implies such a claim. It is certain that the Church with growing fulness has made it on His behalf. Conscience makes in intensest form the demand for a Personal God. It is fair, therefore, to ask if conscience is satisfied with the claim advanced for Christ. Here there is no hesitation in the answer. The conscience of humanity has recognized in Christ, in His teaching and in His life, the final revelation of God. Christ is the conscience of humanity. The words of J. S. Mill are often and justly adduced as consenting to this dictum. 'Even now it would not be easy, even for an unbeliever, to find a better translation of the rule of virtue from the abstract into the concrete than to endeavour so to live that Christ would approve our life.' Here we have a moral argument, not only for Theism, but for Christianity. Conscience, as Dorner finely says, becomes our 'παραγωγός' (Gal 3<sup>24</sup>), and leads us through obedience into knowledge (Jn 7<sup>17</sup>). Faith in Christ, accordingly, is no longer an act unrelated to our moral life, but is itself a moral obligation.

3. Atonement.—Conscience, especially as enlightened by Christianity, witnesses to infinite perfection. At the same time, it pronounces upon all our actions sentence of failure. Between the absolute good and the individual will there is ever a want of complete harmony. Conscience abates none of its condemnation, when action is largely harmonized with social institutions or codes of moral law. The more entirely it wins the mastery, the more stern is its refusal to be satisfied. Its demand is for absolute harmony with infinite good. Any breach it treats as infinite; and lays upon the heart the burden, not of shortcoming merely, but of guilt. The question of salvation, therefore, is a moral question. It is stated in Hebrews in this form, How can the conscience be cleansed from dead works to serve the living God? (He 9<sup>14</sup>). How can the incubus of guilt be removed, so that the will of man may act in unhindered harmony with the will of God? Two solutions conscience declines.

First, that of gratuitous forgiveness. God is sometimes represented as saying, in virtue of His bare almighty will, 'I forgive.' But mere sovereignty is mere unreason. And if to this be added, 'at the prompting of His tender heart,' the reply is still, mere feeling is mere unreason. In either case, the supreme arbiter of life is represented as mere caprice; and in order to save man from consequences of immoral act, we have confounded the whole moral sphere. To conscience, sin is a moral fact, and not until sin is dealt with can the relations of God and man be adjusted on a permanent, i.e. on a moral, basis.

Second, that of ritual observance. Action that is good, i.e. in absolute moral quality, can spring only from harmony with absolute good. Hence no action of a merely external kind can produce the requisite harmony. The historic demonstration of this incapacity is the Jewish ceremonial law. It did, indeed, cleanse, but the cleansing reached only to the flesh (He 9<sup>13</sup>), and had to be constantly repeated (He 10<sup>1-2</sup>). The practical point is that the most elaborate scheme ever devised—devised, be it observed, by divine wisdom—failed consciously and intentionally to reach the springs of action, emancipate the will, and purge the conscience. Is it likely that any other scheme will succeed, that any morality which human wisdom can devise or individual care execute, will accomplish what the law failed to do? Conscience steadily pronounces against every such attempt, in name, not of arbitrary creed, but of essential righteousness.

A third solution presents itself. Jesus Christ perfectly reveals God to man, because He is Himself true and perfect man. Accordingly, He not only unveils to men the Absolute Good, but as man He Himself fulfils this Good. If, then, He who is thus in inmost being one with the Good, that is, God, and perfectly satisfactory to Him, shall in virtue of His humanity take man's place, and bear as a substitute man's burden, offering Himself a sacrifice for sin, will not this meet the requirements of conscience? It is now possible, through faith in the Sin-bearer, to enter into that moral union with God which is the condition of good action. Sin no more interposes its barrier. It has been recognized and dealt with by One competent to do so. The blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without blemish unto God, avails to cleanse the conscience from dead works, and qualifies us to serve the living God (He 9<sup>14</sup>). In the death of Christ the demand of conscience is satisfied through atonement being made for sin. In union to Christ through faith, the ideal to which conscience witnesses is no longer an impossibility for ever condemning us, but an actual realization upon the basis of which we are justified, and through the power of which we are enabled to fulfil the will of God (Ro 3<sup>28</sup> 5<sup>9, 10</sup> 6<sup>1st</sup> 8<sup>4-6</sup>). The witness of conscience, which brings us to God and Christ, directs us also to that which is central in Christianity, atonement made by sacrifice.

LITERATURE.—Special treatment of the doctrine of conscience is to be found in the ethical works of Dörner, Rothe, Harless, Wuttke, Hofmann, Martineau, T. H. Green, Newman Smyth. The last has the advantage of exhibiting the place of conscience in relation to the whole system of Christian ethics. The Biblical Psychologies of Beck and Delitzsch also contain discussions of conscience. Monographs upon conscience have been written by R. H. Hofmann (Die Lehre von dem Gewissen, Leipzig, 1806), W. Gass (Die Lehre vom Gewissen, Berlin, 1809), A. Ritschl (Ueber das Gewissen; Ein Vortrag, Bonn, 1876), M. Köhler (Das Gewissen, Halle, 1878), F. D. Maurice (The Conscience; Lectures on Casuistry), W. T. Davison (The Christian Conscience; Fernley Lecture for 1888). An edition of Butler's Three Sermons has been published by T. & T. Clark, with Introduction and Notes by T. B. Kilpatrick; and see Gladstone's ed. of Butler's Works, 1806.

CONSECRATE, CONSECRATION.—In OT several Heb. words are so tr'd: 1. nāzar Nu 6<sup>12</sup> or nēzer Nu 6<sup>7, 9</sup>, better 'separate,' 'separation'; see NAZIRITE. 2. kiddash as in Ex 28<sup>3</sup> 30<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ch 31<sup>6</sup>, Ezr 3<sup>6</sup>, or kōdash Jos 6<sup>19</sup>, 2 Ch 29<sup>33</sup>, better 'sanctify,' 'sanctification' (wh. see). 3. hēbērīm Mic 4<sup>13</sup>, better 'devote' (see CURSE). 4. millā' yād; this is the commonest and only characteristic expression for 'consecrate' (with millū'im for 'consecration'): lit. 'fill the hand.' The origin of the phrase is quite obscure.* The Heb. millū'im being plu., AV has 'consecrations' (Ex 29<sup>34</sup>, Lv 7<sup>37</sup> 8<sup>23, 31</sup>) without difference of meaning; RV sing. always. In Ex 29<sup>34</sup> 'the flesh of the consecrations,' the c. is transferred to the offering by which the c. took place; so Lv 8<sup>28</sup> 'they [the cake of unleavened bread, etc.] were consecrations for a sweet savour.'

J. HASTINGS.

CONSENT.—To c. is now no more than to acquiesce; in earlier Eng. it often included approval. Hence (1) to approve of a thing, Ac 8<sup>1</sup> 'Saul was c<sup>ing</sup> unto his death' (συνευδόκῃ, so 22<sup>20</sup>; in Lk 11<sup>48</sup> tr'd 'allow'—'ye allow the deeds of your fathers,' RV 'consent unto'); Ro 7<sup>18</sup> 'I c. unto the law that it is good' (σύνμφημι). Cf. Shaks. 1 Henry VI. I. v. 34—

'You all consented unto Salisbury's death,
For none would strike a stroke in his revenge.'

Or (2) to be in sympathy with a person, Ps 50<sup>18</sup> 'When thou savest a thief, then thou consentedst with him' (777); Ro 1<sup>32</sup>, AVm, RV 'not only do the same, but also c. with them that practise them' (συνευδόκῃ, AV 'have pleasure in them'). Cf. Ford (1633)—

'T had been pity
To sunder hearts so equally consented.'

J. HASTINGS.

CONSIDER.—To c. is either to look carefully at or think carefully about. The former sense is now obsol. or archaic: Pr 31<sup>16</sup> 'She c<sup>eth</sup> a field and buyeth it'; Lv 13<sup>18</sup> 'the priest shall c.' (i.e. examine the leper, 787, RV 'look'); Sir 38<sup>28</sup> 'The smith also sitting by the anvil, and c<sup>ing</sup> the iron work'; He 13<sup>7</sup> 'c<sup>ing</sup> the end of their conversation' (ἀναθεωροῦντες); Gal 6<sup>1</sup> 'c. thyself, lest thou also be tempted' (σκοπέω, RV 'looking to'). So Coverdale's tr. of Neh 2<sup>15</sup> 'Then wente I on in the night . . . and considered the wall' (AV 'viewed'). 'Consider of' is now rare: Jg 19<sup>30</sup> 'c. of it, take advice, and speak'; Ps 64<sup>9</sup>; Pref. to AV '[they] set them forth openly to be c<sup>ed</sup> of and perused by all.'

J. HASTINGS.

CONSIST.—Col 1<sup>17</sup> 'by him all things c.' (συνέστηκε, RVm 'hold together')=mod. 'subsist.' This is the oldest meaning of the word and the tr. of the Rhemish NT; Tindale gives 'have their being,' and is followed by Cranmer and the Geneva; Wyclif simply 'ben'=are.

J. HASTINGS.

CONSOLATION.—See COMFORT.

CONSORT.—To c. with is to associate with, cast in one's lot with (con together, sors, sortem lot); Ac 17<sup>4</sup> 'some of them believed, and c<sup>ed</sup> with Paul and Silas' (a good idiomatic tr. of the Gr. προσκληρόω, fr. πρός to, κλήρος lot, though the form is pass., lit. 'were allotted to'). Up to the end of the 18th cent. a concert of music was, by a mistaken associa-

* It is used of the consecration of the priest only (except Exk 43<sup>26</sup> the altar), and the most probable explanation is that the things to be offered were put into the priest's hands, a symbolic act by which he was installed or consecrated. Some (esp. Vatke, Alttest. Theol. p. 273 f., and Wellhausen, ProL 3 p. 130) think that the priest's hand was filled with money as 'earnest' (Scotch arles). See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

tion with this word, spelt 'consort,' though it comes through Fr. concert, It. concerto from Lat. concertare to contend (or, as Skeat decidedly prefers, conservare to unite). Cf. Rom. and Jul. III. i. 48—

Tybalt.—Mercurio, thou consort'st with Romeo,—
Mer.—Consort! what! dost thou make us minstrels?

In Sir 32<sup>o</sup> AV 1611 we have 'A consort of musick in a banquet of wine' (σύγκριμα μουσικῶν), but mod. add. spell 'concert.' See MUSIC. J. HASTINGS.

CONSTANT.—1 Ch 28<sup>7</sup> 'if he be c. to do my commandments' (πνεύμα=if he be firm). Cf. Shaks. Jul. Cæs. III. i. 72—

'For I was constant Cimber should be banish'd,
And constant do remain to keep him so.'

Constantly: Pr 21<sup>28</sup> 'the man that heareth speaketh c., i.e. 'confidently,' not 'frequently' (νῆ), RV 'unchallenged,' RVm 'so as to endure'; Ac 12<sup>15</sup> 'she c. affirmed that it was even so' (δὲ ἀσχυρίζετο, RV 'confidently affirmed'); Tit 3<sup>8</sup> 'these things I will that thou affirm c.' (διαβεβαίωσθα, RV 'affirm confidently'). Cf. the Collect for St. John Baptist's Day, 'After his example c. speak the truth,' i.e. firmly, consistently. J. HASTINGS.

CONSULT.—1. To take counsel, deliberate, used of a single person, as Neh 5<sup>7</sup> 'Then I c<sup>d</sup> with myself'; Lk 14<sup>31</sup> 'Or what king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and cth whether he be able' (RV 'will not . . . take counsel'). 2. To devise, contrive, with a simple object, as Mic 6<sup>8</sup> 'remember now what Balak king of Moab c<sup>d</sup>'; Hab 2<sup>10</sup> 'Thou hast c<sup>d</sup> shame to thy house'; or with an infin., as Ps 62<sup>4</sup> 'They only c. to east him down from his excellency.'

J. HASTINGS.

J. HASTINGS.

CONTAIN.—1 Co 7<sup>9</sup> 'if they cannot c., let them marry' (RV 'if they have not continency,' ἐγκρατεῖσθαι, fr. ἐν, κράτος power='have self-control'; it is tr<sup>d</sup> 'be temperate' 9<sup>25</sup>). Cf. Young, Paraphr. Job (1719), 'Then Job contained no more; but ensh'd his fate'; and for the meaning here, Swift, Letters (1710), 'No wonder she married when she was so ill at containing.' Wyclif's tr. (after the Vulg. si non se continent) is, 'For if thei continen not hem self, or ben not chast, wedd be thei.'

J. HASTINGS.

CONTEND.—Generally 'c. with' in the mod. sense of 'fight with,' as Is 49<sup>23</sup> 'I will c. with him that cth with thee'; or 'argue with,' as Ac 11<sup>2</sup> 'they that were of the circumcision c<sup>d</sup> with him, saying.' But in the latter sense c. is also found without 'with,' as Is 57<sup>10</sup> 'I will not c. for ever' (prob.=argue with, accuse, condemn); Job 13<sup>8</sup> 'will ye c. for God?' (=argue with others for God, be an advocate for God), Am 7<sup>4</sup> 'the Lord God called to c. by fire' (=argue, and so Mic 6<sup>1</sup> 'c. thou before the mountains, and let the hills hear thy voice'). In all these passages the Heb. is רִיבָה. In Jude<sup>8</sup> 'ye should earnestly c. for the faith' (ἐπαγρομίζεσθαι), the meaning passes out of strife or argument into the wider sphere of earnest endeavour; as with the simple ἀγρομίζεσθαι in Lk 13<sup>34</sup> 'Strive to enter in at the strait gate,' and Col 4<sup>12</sup> 'labouring fervently for you in prayers' (RV 'always striving for you'), and as Bacon, Essays, 'Let a man contend, to excell any Competitors of his in Honour.'

J. HASTINGS.

CONTENT.—When Gehazi in his greed begged of Naaman a talent of silver, Naaman said (2 K 5<sup>23</sup>), 'Be content, take two talents.' Evidently he did not mean 'be satisfied,' but 'be pleased, let it be your pleasure.' So also Ex 21<sup>1</sup>, Jos 7<sup>7</sup>, Jg 17<sup>11</sup> 19<sup>6</sup>, 2 K 6<sup>3</sup>, Job 6<sup>28</sup> (RV 'be pleased') where the Heb. is [חָגַל] hā'al in hiph.= 'acquiesce,' and where the Eng. is obsol. except in the phrase 'well c.,' as Stevenson, Underwoods, I. xxv. 55 (1887), 'So sits the while at home the mother well content.' Cf. the voting formula 'Content' or 'non-Content' used in the House of Lords. In this sense the vb. content is also used, Wis 16<sup>30</sup> 'bread . . . able to c. every man's delight' (RV 'having the virtue of every pleasant savour'), with which cf. Bacon, Essays, 'He that questioneth much, shall learne much, and content much.' J. HASTINGS.

CONTENTMENT.—This is a peculiarly Christian grace, and the form it assumes in the Bible, and esp. in the NT, differentiates it from the allied pagan virtues. It is quite distinct from Oriental apathy, which is pessimistic, while Christian contentment is nearer optimism; and it is almost equally distinct from the calm of Stoicism, because it does not regard external things with absolute indifference, despise pain and pleasure, and rest in its self-sufficiency. It is more cheerful than Buddhism, more human than Stoicism. While it implies a just appreciation of the good and ill of life, it does not base itself on the balance of fortune, but finds its source and its sustenance in the unseen world. The most elementary form of contentment is extolled in the Book of Proverbs as a certain discreet expediency. Here the secret of domestic content is given in the apothegm, 'Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith' (Pr 15<sup>17</sup>), and the superiority of moral to material grounds of content in the saying, 'Better is the poor that walketh in his integrity, than he that is perverse in his lips, and is a fool' (Pr 19<sup>1</sup>). In the Psalms we meet with more indications of the contentment which is derived directly from faith in God. This is seen in two forms. (1) Trust in Providence, which leads to the conviction that the righteous man's life is rightly ordered so that no evil can befall him (e.g. Ps 23). (2) An appreciation of the supreme blessedness of union with God, which is independent of external fortune, God Himself being the portion of the soul (e.g. Ps 73<sup>20</sup>). The prophets concern themselves largely with public affairs, and in so doing never encourage injustice and oppression by preaching an ignoble acquiescence in wrong. In them we see the divine discontent which cannot endure the triumph of the rich and strong over their unhappy victims. Still the essence of the higher contentment is also present in the faith which is assured of God's care for His people and His coming redemption of them, and the promise of the Messianic age, the hope of which should check impatience and prevent despair.

Our Lord's teachings carry the higher forms of contentment up to their supreme excellency. He did not come into contact with those ideas of the prophets which concern the more public treatment of social wrongs, because His method was to work from within, and perhaps because the contemporary condition of the Roman world did not admit of a sudden social revolution. Accordingly He did not contradict the preaching of John the Baptist, who discouraged restless agitation (Lk 3<sup>11</sup>); and He said nothing directly against the institution of slavery. On the other hand, He inculcated principles of justice, charity, and brotherhood, the effect of which must be to sweep away the wrongs which provoke the most reasonable discontent. In training His disciples personally He rebuked greed of gain and anxiety about temporal affairs, encouraging contentment, (1) by giving the assurance that our Father knows of our needs, and will provide for them, since He provides even for those of birds and flowers; (2) by directing attention to the true riches, the heavenly treasures, which can alone satisfy the soul of man; and (3) by urging the duty of seeking first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, discontent being a phase of self-seeking, and therefore a sin (Lk 12<sup>33-32</sup>). St. Paul inculcates the patient endurance of present sufferings on the grounds of hope, these sufferings not being worthy to be compared with the future glory (Ro 8<sup>18</sup>), and even working for that glory (2 Co 4<sup>17</sup>); and of faith, all things working together for good to them that love God (Ro 8<sup>28</sup>). Towards the end of his life, when a prisoner at Rome, he claims to have learned the secret of contentment, and he implies that this is found in a certain independence of external things—he has learned to be 'independent' (ἀυτάρκης), and he has reached this attainment, as also all others to which he has come, because Christ has strengthened him (Ph 4<sup>11-13</sup>). The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews encourages contentment by reference to God's fatherly chastisement of His children (12<sup>5-13</sup>). St. James rebukes covetousness and contentiousness, and encourages a humble, restful spirit with especial reference to the efficacy of prayer (Ja 4<sup>1-10</sup> 5<sup>7-13</sup>). St. Peter inculcates patience by dwelling on the example of Christ (1 P 2<sup>18-25</sup>); and St. John endurance of the world's hatred by considering the love of God (1 Jn 3<sup>1-13</sup>). W. F. ADENEY.

CONTRARY.—1. In the sense of 'antagonistic,' c. is now obsol. or dialectic, except in ref. to wind or weather, where the phrase in NT, 'the wind was c.,' has kept the meaning alive. This is the meaning of c. in Lv 26, where it is used as tr. of כָּף הָעֵר in all its occurrences (26<sup>21, 23, 24, 27, 28, 40, 41</sup>), 'if ye walk c. unto me,' lit. 'in an encounter,' in hostile meeting and revolt, inimically, as Kalisch explains. In NT this is the only meaning, whether the Gr. be ἐναντίος, 'c.' of wind (Mt 14<sup>24</sup>, Mk 6<sup>48</sup>, Ac 27<sup>4</sup>); of Saul's opposition, Ac 26<sup>9</sup> 'I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things c. to the name of Jesus of Nazareth'; of the opponents of Christianity, 1 Th 2<sup>15</sup> (the Jews), Tit 2<sup>3</sup> 'he that is of the c. part'; or ἐναντίος, Col 2<sup>14</sup> 'the handwriting . . . which was c. to us (ὁ ἡ ἐναντίον ἡμῶν describes its active hostility—Light-foot); or ἀντίον, Ac 17<sup>7</sup> 'these all do c. to the decrees of Caesar,' a charge of treason; or ἀντίκειμαι, Gal 5<sup>17</sup> 'the Spirit and the flesh . . . are c. the one to the other'; 1 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>; or even παρὰ, Ac 18<sup>13</sup>, Ro 11<sup>24</sup> 16<sup>17</sup>. 2. In 2 Es 11<sup>3, 11</sup> c. is used in the sense of opposite in position or direction, 'out of her feathers there grew other c. feathers.' Contrariwise (a hybrid, fr. Lat. contrarius and Eng. wise, way) = 'on the c.,' occurs 2 Co 2<sup>7</sup>, Gal 2<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>9</sup>. J. HASTINGS.

CONTRIBUTION.—See COMMUNION.

CONTRITE (Lat. contritus, bruised, crushed) appears early in Eng. in a fig.* sense, 'bruised in heart,' prob. through the influence of the Vulg. and the Eng. versions, and nearly always with the meaning of penitent. Thus Wyclif (1380), Select Works, ii. 400, 'To assoile men that ben contrite'; Milton, Par. Lost, x. 1091—

'Pardon beg, with tears
Watering the ground, and with our sighs the air
Frequenting, sent from hearts contrite.'

ment. Certainly, God will 'not despise a broken and a penitent heart'; but more than that, He will not despise a broken and a crushed heart: 'Blessed are the poor in spirit.' J. HASTINGS.

CONVENIENT, now greatly restricted in meaning, is freely used in AV in the sense of befitting, becoming, seemly, as Eph 5<sup>4</sup> 'Neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not c.' (RV 'befitting'); so 1 P 30<sup>8</sup> (RV 'that is needful'), Jer 40<sup>4, 5</sup>, Wis 13<sup>15</sup> 'a c. room,' not 'commodious,' but 'befitting' (ἀξιος, RV 'worthy'), Sir 10<sup>28</sup> (RV 'right'), 2 Mac 4<sup>19</sup> (RV 'fit'), Ro 1<sup>28</sup> (RV 'befitting'), Philem 8 (RV 'befitting'). In Merchant of Venice, III. iv. 52, Portia says, 'Bring them, I pray thee, with imagined speed,' i.e. quick as thought; to which Balthazar replies, 'Madam, I go with all convenient speed,' i.e. speed befitting the urgency. In the sense of 'morally becoming' (as Ro 1<sup>28</sup>, Eph 5<sup>4</sup>, Philem 8) the word was once quite common, as Trans. of Agrippa's Van Artes (1684), 'She sang and danced more exquisitely than was convenient for an honest woman.' J. HASTINGS.

CONVENT.—Jer 49<sup>19</sup> AVm, 'who will c. me in judgment?' and 50<sup>44</sup> AVm, 'who will c. me to plead?'—an obsolete vb. = summon (convenire). Cf. Elsing, Debates House of Lords (1621), 'The Commons have convented Flood, examed him, and sentenced him.' J. HASTINGS.

CONVERSATION.—The word never occurs in AV in its modern sense of colloquy, but always in its earlier sense of conduct, behaviour. But as intercourse by speech is a large part of conduct, the word was specialized to its present limited sense at an early date (not much later than the date of AV). See Oxf. Eng. Dict.* 'Conversation' in AV is probably due to Vulg. conversatio, conversor. These usually stand in Vulg. for NT ἀναστροφή, ἀναστροφῆς, though in two cases, Ph 1<sup>27</sup> and 3<sup>20</sup>, they represent πορεύομαι and πορεύημα. On these latter passages see CITIZENSHIP. In one instance where Vulg. renders πορεία by conversatio (Eph 2<sup>12</sup>), AV departs from the guidance of Vulg. and correctly renders 'commonwealth.' In a few other places AV does not render by 'have our c.' but by 'behave,' 'live,' 'pass the time of.'

The true equivalent of ἀναστροφή in mod. Eng. is 'conduct'; and it is an unfortunate result of the AV archaism 'conversation' that the real prominence of conduct in NT teaching is obscured (see ETHICS). Indeed, the substantive 'conduct' nowhere occurs in AV, though RV wisely introduces it in 2 Ti 3<sup>10</sup> to represent ἀγωγή.

There are but two passages in OT where c. occurs (Is 37<sup>14</sup> and 50<sup>20</sup>). In both it represents 'way.' Conduct in OT is thought of under the metaphor of walking, and the words describing it are literally tr.<sup>d</sup>, hence abstract nouns to express moral conduct do not occur. Hatch (Essays in Bibl. Gr. p. 9) sees the conditions of Syr. and Gr. life respectively mirrored in the metaphors which the two nations severally employed for conduct, viz. περιπατεῖν and ἀναστροφῆς. 'Whereas in Athens and Rome the bustling activity of the streets gave rise to the conception of life as a quick movement to and fro; the constant intercourse on foot between village and village in Syria, and the difficulties of travel on the stony tracks over the hills, gave rise to the metaphors which regard life as a journey.' But the OT metaphor naturally runs on into the NT, and in Epp. of St. Paul περιπατεῖν is far more frequent than ἀναστροφῆς. Christianity is 'the Way.' Cf. Hort, Way, Truth, and Life, Lect. I.

* A good example of conversation in the old as distinguished from the mod. sense, is in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Prog. 'Your Conversation gives this your Mouth-profession, the lyce.'

The NT words for converse in its modern sense are ὁμιλεῖν (Lk 24<sup>14-15</sup> 'they talked together'), συνομιλεῖν (Ac 10<sup>27</sup>).
E. R. BERNARD.

CONVERSION.—The noun (ἐπιστροφή) occurs only once in Scripture, Ac 15<sup>3</sup> (cf. Sir 49<sup>2</sup>), where it need not denote the definite spiritual change belonging to the word in the verb-form. The verb-form (ἐπιστρέφειν) is frequently found both in OT and NT, answering in the former to such Heb. terms as שׁוּב, חָזַק, and esp. שׁוּב. The point to be noted is that it almost invariably denotes an act of man: 'Turn ye, turn ye (שׁוּבוּ) from your evil ways' (Ezk 33<sup>11</sup>); 'Except ye turn' (Mt 18<sup>3</sup>); 'When thou hast turned again' (Lk 22<sup>32</sup>), etc. It is worth noting also that 'convert' is merely a synonym for 'turn,' and answers to the same originals. In Ps 19<sup>7</sup> 'converting' is a mistransl. of חָשַׁב (RV correctly 'restoring,' i.e. 'refreshing,' cf. Ps 23<sup>3</sup> and Lk 1<sup>11</sup>). In Is 12<sup>7</sup> 'her converts' (AVm, RVm 'they that return of her') is too technical a tr<sup>n</sup> of חָשַׁב. Whatever the causes lying behind the act of turning, the act itself is man's. The idea is esp. prominent in OT; and, while in NT it is often brought into connexion with repentance, in OT the term repent seldom occurs in reference to man. Many times it is used to denote an apparent change of purpose on the part of God (Gn 6<sup>5</sup> etc.), but very seldom in the same sense of man (1 K 8<sup>27</sup>, Job 42<sup>2</sup>). It never there becomes a standing term, as in NT. Twice at least in NT, 'turn' is associated with 'repent' (Ac 3<sup>19</sup> 26<sup>20</sup>). We find the term also similarly associated with faith: 'A great number that believed turned to the Lord' (Ac 11<sup>21</sup>). As the very idea of the word implies both a turning from and a turning to something, it seems equally natural to make the former aspect coincide with repentance, which is a turning from evil, and the latter coincide with faith, which is a turning to God. In other words, conversion on its negative side is repentance, and on its positive side is faith. In some cases one element will be emphasized, in some the other; and in some both will be included. This interpretation will, we believe, explain all the passages of Scripture. 'Repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ac 20<sup>21</sup>), though the term conversion does not occur, expresses the contents of the idea.

Nor is the divine ground of these acts of man overlooked: 'Unto you first, God, having raised up his Servant, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from your iniquities' (Ac 3<sup>26</sup>; cf. Jn 6<sup>44</sup>). The ancient prophet held the same faith: 'Turn thou me, and I shall be turned' (Jer 31<sup>18</sup>). Sinful man turns, but the power by which he does so is God's, given him for Christ's sake; just as the stretching out of the withered hand was man's act, but the power by which it was done was divine. The prophets are addressing, not the good, but the wicked; the wicked are to turn and live. In like manner the apostolic exhortations are addressed to those who have not yet come to God.

There is thus little difficulty in fixing both the nature of conversion and its place in the order of salvation in biblical teaching. It is man's first act under the leading of divine grace in the process of salvation, the initial step in the transition from evil to good. A universal presence and operation of grace is a necessary corollary of universal atonement; the universal work of the Spirit goes along with the universal work of the Redeemer, always, of course, assuming the necessity of conditions on man's part. The fulfilment of the conditions, divine grace supplying the power, is biblical conversion. Subsequently conversion has been identified with regeneration; and there is less objection to such use, if the term is so defined and accepted.

Scripture recognizes not only divine grace as the efficient cause of conversion, but also human agency in bringing it about. This is the preaching of the truth by prophets and apostles: in other words, the proclamation of God's truth by men who are themselves witnesses to its power. This is not only implied in the passages already referred to, but is expressly mentioned in other places, e.g. Ac 10<sup>44</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>. The importance of the channel which conveys the water, or of the wire which conveys the force, although secondary, is still great. While recognizing that, as a rule, divine grace works through human means and instruments, we need not doubt that it also can and does often work independently.

CONVERT.—In AV c. is used once intransitively, Is 6<sup>10</sup> 'lest they see with their eyes . . . and convert and be healed' (RV 'turn again'). Cf. Wyclif's tr. of Jn 1<sup>38</sup> (1382) 'Sothli Ihesu convertid and seynghe hem suwynghe him, seith to hem, What seken ye?' The most frequent meaning of c. in early Eng. (and in AV) is simply to turn (e.g. Is 60<sup>2</sup>); but the mod. use was known, as Shaks. Merch. of Ven. III. v. 37: 'in converting Jews to Christians you raise the price of pork.' In Ps 23<sup>1</sup> for AV 'he restoreth my soul,' Douay reads 'he hath converted my soule,' with the remark, 'which is the first justification.' See CONVERSION. J. HASTINGS.

CONVINCE.—Certainly in most, probably in all the examples of c. in AV, the meaning is to convict. Job 32<sup>2</sup> 'There was none of you that convinced Job' (נִסְּתָה, cf. Ps 50<sup>21</sup>, Pr 30<sup>6</sup> where EV have 'reprove,' but 'convict' would be better); Job's friends did not try to convince him merely, but to convict him, find him in the wrong, and that is probably the meaning both of the Heb. and of the English. In NT the Gr. is either the simple ἐλέγχο Jn 8<sup>46</sup> 'Which of you cth me of sin?'; 1 Co 14<sup>24</sup> 'he is c<sup>ed</sup> of all, he is judged of all'; Tit 1<sup>9</sup> 'to c. the gainsayers' (not merely refute in argument, but convict in conscience); Ja 2<sup>9</sup> 'are c<sup>ed</sup> of the law'; Jude<sup>15</sup> (edd.; TR ἐξελέγχο) 'to c. all that are ungodly among them of their ungodly deeds'; or διακατελέγχομαι, a compound occurring here only in all Gr. literature, Ac 18<sup>28</sup> 'he mightily c<sup>ed</sup> the Jews' (RV 'powerfully confuted'; but from the analogy of other passages it is prob. that St. Luke means that the apostle brought home moral blame to them, not merely that he refuted their arguments). Cf. Milton, Par. Reg. iii. 3, 'Satan stood . . . confuted, and convince't'; and Adams, Serm. ii. 38, 'Whatsoever is written is written either for our instruction or destruction; to convert us if we embrace it, to convince us if we despise it.'

CORAL (חֹמֶל) is twice (or thrice, if we include Pr 24<sup>7</sup> where 'too high' is tr. of same word) mentioned in OT, Job 28<sup>18</sup> and Ezk 27<sup>16</sup>; and as coral is abundant in the waters of the Mediterranean, the reference in the latter to Syria as a 'merchant in coral' is peculiarly appropriate (cf. Dillm. Job 28<sup>18</sup>). Red coral (Corallium rubrum) is probably meant, as being specially suited for ornament; but from the rareness of ornaments of this material, found amongst those of Egypt and Phœnicia, we may conclude that it was not in much request, at least in OT times; on the other hand, the material may have crumbled away, or been dissolved.

* The Heb. is simply 'I will turn.' Cf. La 5<sup>21</sup>, where the same passive form is adopted in both AV and RV. This unfortunate mistransl. implies a technical dogmatic sense, which is not in the original. Cf. RV of Ps 61<sup>18</sup>, Mt 18<sup>18</sup>, Lk 22<sup>32</sup>.

The polyps, or animals producing coral, belong to those members of the Actinozoa which secrete a hard, generally calcareous, skeleton. They flourish in the warm waters of the Mediterranean and Indian Ocean, where these are clear and free from sediment, at various depths down to about 80 fathoms or more. The most important fisheries are off the coasts of Tunis, Algeria, Naples, Genoa, Sardinia, and Corsica. E. HULL.

COR-ASHAN (AV Chor-ashan, 1 S 30<sup>30</sup>) is the present reading (כּוֹרֶשָׁן) of MT, but the orig. text was undoubtedly Bor-ashan (בּוֹרֶשָׁן), as is evident from the LXX (A Βωρασάν, B Βηρασβέε). Cf. notes of Budde, Driver, and Wellh. ad loc. The place may be the same as Ashan of Jos 15<sup>42</sup> 19<sup>7</sup>.

CORBAN (Heb. כּוֹרְבָן korbān) means (1) an oblation; * (2) a gift. The word occurs Mk 7<sup>11</sup> 'If a man shall say to his father or his mother, That wherewith thou mightest have been profited by me is Corban, that is to say, Given (to God), ye no longer suffer him to do aught for his father or his mother' (cf. Mt 15<sup>6</sup> RV). The Talmudic treatise Nedarim (=vows) discloses that the Jews were much addicted to rash vows; and כּוֹרְבָן, or its equivalent קֹנָם (= kōnās, which according to Levy is a corruption of קֹנָם, kōnām), was in constant use; so that it gradually became a mere formula of interdiction, without any intention of making the thing interdicted 'a gift to God.' A man seeing his house on fire says, 'My tallith shall be korban, if it is not burnt,' Ned. iii. 6. In making a vow of abstinence he says, 'Kōnās be the food (vi. 1) or the wine (viii. 1) which I taste.' When a man resolves not to plough a field, he says, 'Kōnās be the field, if I plough it,' iv. 7. Repudiation of a wife is thus expressed, 'What my wife might be benefited by me is kōnās (לִּי קֹנָסָה נָשִׁי), because she has stolen my cup' or 'struck my son,' iii. 2; while the precise Heb. formula of our text is כּוֹרְבָן לִּי נְשָׁאָה, viii. 11 (Lowe's Mishna).

In Nedarim, c. ix., retraction of, and absolution from, vows is considered. The problem was a knotty one. Oblations were needed for the sanctuary, and vows were a fruitful source of income; and besides this, Dt 23<sup>21-23</sup> most rigorously forbade any retraction of vows; and therefore the Rabbis, while they did not encourage vows, ruled that when made they must be kept. Here arises an extreme case. A man in haste or passion has vowed that nothing of his shall ever again go to the maintenance of his parents. Must that vow hold good? 'Certainly,' the Rabbis say. 'It is hard for the parents, but the law is clear, vows must be kept.' Thus, as often, did they allow the literal to override the ethical. Jesus revealed a different 'spirit,' as He ruled that 'duty to parents is a far higher law than fulfilment of a rash vow.'

R. Eliezer ben Hyrkanos (c. A.D. 90), who felt in several ways the influence of Christianity, was apparently the first Rabbi to advocate retraction of vows. I render Nedarim 9<sup>1</sup> thus: 'R. Eliezer said that when rash vows infringe at all on parental obligations, Rabbis should suggest a retraction (lit. open a door) by appealing to the honour due to parents. The sages dissented. R. Zadok said, instead of appealing to the honour due to parents let them appeal to the honour due to God; then might rash vows cease. The sages at length agreed with R. Eliezer, that if the case be directly between a man and his parents (as in Mt 15<sup>6</sup>), they might suggest retraction by appealing to the honour due to parents.'

CORD.—1. כֶּלֶךְ, Arab. habl, the common name for rope in Syria. It is translated in RV 'cord' in Jos 2<sup>15</sup>, Job 36<sup>8</sup> etc.; 'line' in Mic 2<sup>2</sup>, 2 S 8<sup>2</sup>, Ps 16<sup>6</sup> 78<sup>55</sup>, Am 7<sup>17</sup>, Zec 2<sup>1</sup>; 'ropes' in 1 K 20<sup>31</sup>; and 'tacklings' in Is 33<sup>23</sup>. In Syria ropes and cords are made of goat's or camel's hair spun into threads, and then plaited or twisted. Sometimes they are made of strips of goat's skin or cow's hide twisted together. In modern times ropes of hemp are more commonly used. 2. רִבְדָּה, Arab. rībūḏ, 'band,' a binding or fastening. It is so translated in Ezk 3<sup>25</sup>, Job 39<sup>10</sup>, Hos 11<sup>4</sup>; but 'ropes' in Jg 15<sup>18, 14</sup>; 'cords' in Ps 118<sup>27</sup> 129<sup>1</sup>; and 'cart rope' in Is 5<sup>18</sup>. The word has the meaning of something interlaced or twisted. See BAND. Besides the common ropes mentioned above, ropes for temporary fastenings are often made from branches of vines interlaced or twisted together, and also from the bark of branches of the mulberry tree. 3. קֶסֶר, Arab. afnāb, tent ropes, trans. 'cords' in Ex 35<sup>18</sup> 39<sup>40</sup>, Is 54<sup>2</sup>, and Jer 10<sup>20</sup>. Tent ropes, among the Bedawin, are made of goat's or camel's hair. 4. חַט, Arab. khait, line, tr. 'cord' in Ec 4<sup>12</sup>. 5. קָטָר, Arab. wittar, catgut. In Jg 16<sup>7</sup> this word is translated 'withes,' in RVm 'bowstring,' which is probably correct. In Job 30<sup>11</sup> AV 'my cord' may mean 'bowstring,' or the 'rein' of a bridle; in Ps 11<sup>2</sup> 'bowstring.' Catgut is often made in the villages of Lebanon. In the NT σχοῖνον, ropes of rushes, is translated 'cord' in Jn 2<sup>15</sup>, and 'ropes' in Ac 27<sup>32</sup>. W. CARSLAW.

CORIANDER SEED (גִּדְיָה, gadiyā, κόριον, coriandrum).—The fruit of an umbelliferous plant, Coriandrum sativum, L., extensively cultivated in the East. It is an annual, with two kinds of leaves, the lower divided into two to three pairs of ovate-cuneate, dentate segments, the upper much dissected into linear-setaceous lobes. The fruits are o-ate-globular, straw-coloured, twice as large as a hemp seed, and striate. They have a warm, aromatic taste, and stomachic, carminative properties. Avicenna recites (ii. 198) a long list of virtues attributed to it, in a variety of diseases. The only mention of it in the Bible is in comparison with the size and colour of manna (Ex 16<sup>31</sup>, Nu 11<sup>7</sup>). The Arabic name of it is kizbarah. G. E. POST.

CORINTH (Κόρινθος) was in many respects the most important city of Greece (i.e. Achaia, according to the Rom. appellation, cf. Ac 20<sup>2</sup> with 19<sup>21</sup>) under the Rom. Empire. Whereas Athens was the educational centre, the seat of the greatest university in the world at that time, and the city to which the memories of Greek freedom and older history clung most persistently, C. was the capital of the Rom. province (see ACHAIA), the centre of government and commerce, of actual life and political development in the country; while its situation, again, on the great central route between Rome and the East, made it one of the knots towards which converged a number of subordinate roads. In this last respect it was the next stage to Ephesus (wh. see) on this great highway, and must have been in very close and frequent communication with it. The situation of C. qualified it to be the most important centre whence any new movement in thought or society might radiate over the entire province of Achaia; and therefore it became one of the small list of cities (along with Syrian Antioch and Ephesus) which were most closely connected with the early spread of Christianity towards the West.

C. occupied a striking and powerful position.

It was situated at the southern extremity of the narrow isthmus which connected the Peloponnesus with the mainland of Greece, on a slightly raised terrace, sloping up from the low-lying plain to a bold rock, the Acrocorinthus, which rises abruptly on the south side of the city to the height of over 1800 ft. above sea-level. Thus the city was easy of access from both east and west, and at the same time possessed of great military importance, on account of its powerful citadel. Its strength was increased by its fortifications, which not merely surrounded the city, but also connected it by the 'Long Walls' with its harbour Lechæum on the western sea, about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles (12 stadia) distant. Its situation enabled it to command all land communication between central Greece and the Peloponnesus. Along the southern edge of the isthmus stretches a ridge called Oneion from E. to W.; and the Acrocorinthus, which from the north seems to be an isolated rock, is really a spur of Oneion, though separated from the ridge by a deep cleft or ravine. This ridge makes communication with the Peloponnesus difficult, leaving only three paths—one along the western sea (Corinthian Gulf), commanded by Lechæum and the Long Walls, one close under the walls of Corinth, and one along the eastern sea (Saronic Gulf), commanded by the other harbour of Corinth named Cenchræ (Ac 18<sup>18</sup>, Ro 16<sup>13</sup>), about  $\frac{3}{4}$  miles (70 stadia) distant from the city. The Acrocorinthus commands a wonderful view over both seas, on the E. the Saronic Gulf, and on the W. the Corinthian,\* and over the low lands bordering the two seas, up to the mountains both in the Peloponnesus and in central Greece; the acropolis of Athens, Mount Parnassus, and many other famous points are clearly visible.

Through its two harbours C. bestrode the isthmus, with one foot planted on each sea; and hence it is called 'two-sea'd Corinth' (bimaris Corinthiænia, Horace, Od. i. 7); and Philip IV. of Macedon called it one of the 'fettlers of Greece'; the other two being Chalcis in Eubœa and Demetrias in Thessaly. But the territory belonging to the city was confined and unproductive (except the fertile though narrow strip of soil extending along the Corinthian Gulf towards Sicyon); the low ground of the Isthmus was poor and stony; and Oneion was mere rock. Hence the population was at once tempted by two quiet seas, and compelled by the churlish land, to turn to maritime enterprise; and there lay the greatness of C. so long as Greece was free. Only when Greece was enslaved did C. become one of the fettlers of the country.

It was customary in ancient times to haul ships across the low and narrow Isthmus by a made route, called Diolkos (δίοικος), between the W. and the E. sea. Owing to the dread entertained by ancient sailors for the voyage round the southern capes of the Peloponnesus (especially Malea), as well as to the saving of time effected on the voyage from Italy to the Asian coast by the Corinthian route, many smaller ships were thus carried bodily across the Isthmus; though the larger ships (such as that in which St. Paul sailed, Ac 27<sup>3-37</sup>) could never have been treated in that way. Many travellers along the great route from Italy to the East came to Lechæum in one ship, and sailed east in another from Cenchræ, while the merchandise of large ships must have been transhipped; and thus Corinth was thronged with travellers. Under Nero an attempt was made about A.D. 66-67 to cut a ship-canal across the Isthmus (after several earlier schemes had been frustrated as an impious interference with the divine will); and traces of the works were observable before the present ship-canal was made.* The canal was intended to be some distance north of the two harbours, and would have damaged their prosperity. In such a city any new movement of thought originating in the East was certain to become known rapidly, in the frequent intercourse that was maintained between Rome and the East. Moreover, Christians travelling for various reasons were often likely to pass through C.; and hence St. Paul calls Gaius of Corinth 'my host and of the whole Church' (Ro 16<sup>23</sup>). In the end of the 1st cent. Clement, writing to the Church at C., alludes several times (§ 1, § 10, § 35), to the frequent occasion which the people had to show hospitality to travellers.

In this situation C. had generally been the leading commercial city of Greece. Historical reasons, indeed, occasionally endangered its trading supremacy for a time; sometimes the energy of the Athenians, or of some other rivals, challenged it; and at last the Romans destroyed the city in B.C. 146. But the favourable situation which had made it the originator in Greek history of great fleets and of commercial enterprise on a large scale, and enabled it to become the mother-city of many colonies in the central and western parts of the Mediterranean, could not allow it to remain a ruin and a mere historical memory. For a time, indeed, Delos succeeded to its commercial supremacy, and Sicyon to its presidency at the Isthmian Games; but in B.C. 46 it was refounded by Julius Cæsar as a Rom. colony, under the name Colonia Laus Julia Corinthus. Hence a considerable proportion of the small number of names in NT connected with C. are Roman: Crispus, Titius Justus (Ac 18<sup>7-8</sup>), Lucius, Tertius, Gaius, Quartus (Ro 16<sup>21-23</sup>), Fortunatus, Achaicus (1 Co 16<sup>17</sup>). Since Greece was revived as an independent country in modern times, the claim of C. to be the site of the capital, though mentioned, has been always rejected, partly through the surpassing historical memories that cluster round Athens, and partly through the fact that C. is subject to earthquakes.

The oration of Dion Chrysostom, delivered in C. in the early part of the 2nd cent. (Or. 37), gives a lively idea of the prosperity of C.; he describes it as the most prominent and the richest city of Greece (vol. ii. p. 120, ed. Reiske), and alludes to its library, but enlarges chiefly on the historical and mythological associations. Half a century later Aelius Aristides in an oration 'to Poseidon,' delivered at C. in connexion with the Isthmian Games, also draws a picture of the city, enlarging more on the educated and literary spirit manifested there. About the same period Pausanias describes its history and monuments and public buildings (ii. c. 1-4): the old temple of Aphrodite, on the top of the Acrocorinthus; the sacred fountain Peirene on its side, close under the summit; below this the Sisyphæum; in the lower city the Agora, with its temples and statues, and so on. The coinage of the Rom. colony proves, by the numerous types taken from old Corinthian history and mythology, the pride which was felt by the Roman C. in the ancient memories of the city; and at once illustrates and confirms the testimony of Dion and Aristides. This feeling in the colony must be taken into account in estimating its character when St. Paul visited it; and the subject is admirably treated by Imhoof-Blumer and Gardner in their Numismatic Commentary on Pausanias (see Journal of Hellenic Studies, vi. 1885, pp. 59-77). It must, however, be remembered that the colonial coins used by them are generally later than the time of St. Paul, and that this feeling grew stronger in the 2nd cent. as the Rom. blood and spirit died out on a foreign and uncongenial soil. The circumference of the lower city was 40 stadia, and the circumference of the fortifications, including in their circuit the Acrocorinthus, was 85 stadia (about 10 miles), as Pausanias and Strabo agree. Only scanty and unimpressive remains of ancient buildings now remain.

* A bold hill, projecting a little distance on the west of the Acrocorinthus, seriously interferes with the view on that side; Leake calls it 'the eyesore of Corinth.'

* These traces, which have been entirely obliterated by the modern canal, are described, and a map given showing the line intended to be followed by Nero's canal, in Bulletin de Correspond. Hellénique, viii. (1884) p. 228 f.

The population of such a colony as C. would consist (1) of the descendants of the Rom. coloni, established there in B.C. 46, who would on the whole constitute a sort of local aristocracy; (2) of many resident 'Romans' who came for commercial reasons, in addition to a few resident officials of the government; (3) of a large Greek population, who ranked as incolae; (4) of many other resident strangers of various nationalities, attracted to C. for various reasons, amid the busy intercourse that characterized the Rom. world. The Rom. colonial blood had not yet had time to melt into the Greek stock, as it probably did in the cent. or two following St. Paul's visit. Among the resident strangers it is clear that a considerable colony of Jews existed at C., where they had a synagogue (Ac 18<sup>4</sup>); and in such a commercial centre a Jewish settlement was a matter of course. Among the Corinthian Jews a certain number of converts, including some of the most prominent persons, joined St. Paul (Ac 18<sup>4-8</sup>, Ro 16<sup>21</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>20</sup>); and this was, doubtless, one of the reasons why the feeling against St. Paul was so strong in the city, leading even to a plot against his life (Ac 20<sup>3</sup>). It is clear, however, both from Ac and from the two letters of St. Paul to the Corinthians, that the Church consisted chiefly of non-Jews (see esp. 1 Co 12<sup>2</sup>). But the presence in the Church of some influential Jews, and probably of a considerable number of Gentiles who had previously been brought under the influence of the synagogue (such as Titus Justus, Ac 18<sup>7</sup>), constituted an element always likely to cause that strong Judaizing tendency which is revealed in St. Paul's letters.

St. Paul visited C. at first without any definite intention of making it a great centre of his work (Ac 18<sup>1</sup>). He was still under the impression that his call to Macedonia (Ac 16<sup>9-10</sup>) was operative; and he was eager to return to Macedonia, and specially to Thessalonica (1 Th 2<sup>17-18</sup>), but was prevented by various circumstances and impediments (which he sums up in the expression 'Satan hindered us'). It would appear from the narrative of Ac 17<sup>1</sup>, 18<sup>25</sup> that in Athens, and at first in C., St. Paul was still strongly possessed with the Macedonian scheme, and was only delaying his return thither until the difficulties were cleared away. But a special revelation (Ac 18<sup>9-10</sup>) altered his plans, when in a night-vision the Lord directed him to speak freely and boldly in C., 'for I have much people in this city.' St. Paul regarded this as releasing him from the Macedonian duty, and now directed his work entirely towards the new sphere, in which he remained altogether for a year and six months. It is not stated what period had elapsed between his arrival and this revelation; but, in all probability, no very long time intervened. It is at least clear that the new governor Junius Gallio arrived after the revelation, and during the second period of work, which was directed towards the new Achaian sphere. But evidently even during the first period St. Paul had been encouraged by considerable success in C. In the Jewish synagogue, indeed, he had met with strong opposition, and had already found himself obliged to break off his connexion definitely with his own nation, and to go unto the Gentiles (Ac 18<sup>9</sup>) from henceforth (i.e. during the rest of his stay in C.). But even among the Jews, Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, believed with all his house; while among the general population of C. many were baptized (Ac 18<sup>8</sup>). None of the baptisms in C. were performed by St. Paul himself, except those of Crispus and of Gaius, and of the household of Stephanas (1 Co 1<sup>14-16</sup>). It is not certain whether this abstention from personally baptizing was something peculiar in the special case of C., or was commonly practised by St. Paul; but the other apostles seem to have often left the work of baptizing to ministers and subordinates (Ac 10<sup>48</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>); and St. Paul probably did the same. The three exceptions mentioned by him are noteworthy; the circumstances show why St. Paul was likely to attach special importance to them; Stephanas was 'the first-fruits of Achaia' (1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>); Gaius was his host on his later visit (Ro 16<sup>23</sup>), and therefore probably a specially beloved friend; Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, was a convert of uncommon importance.

About five or six weeks, perhaps, after St. Paul's arrival at C., he was rejoined by Silas and Timothy, returning from Macedonia. He had left them at Berea, and they had joined him probably in Athens, and been immediately sent away on a mission to Thessalonica (1 Th 3<sup>1</sup>, Ac 17<sup>10</sup> 18<sup>5</sup>) and probably also to Philippi.* The fact that Timothy alone is quoted as authority for news from Thessalonica (1 Th 3<sup>6</sup>), and as messenger to Thessalonica, shows that Silas had been sent to some other city of Macedonia (doubtless to Philippi). Immediately on receipt of Timothy's news St. Paul wrote his First Ep. to the Thess. (1 Th 3<sup>6</sup>) from C. The date of the second is not so clearly fixed; but it also was probably composed in the early part of the Corinthian work, immediately on receipt of news about the reception of the first letter in Thessalonica.

During St. Paul's residence in C., Gallio came to govern Achaia as proconsul of praetorian rank. There is no evidence, except what can be derived from the life of St. Paul, to fix the year in which Gallio administered the province; but he may probably have come during the summer of A.D. 52, though some authorities fix the date differently (53, Renan, Lightfoot; see GALLIO). During his administration, the Jews—angry at the defection of at least one leading compatriot, at the manner in which St. Paul had turned away from them with a very exasperating gesture, and at the institution of a rival meeting-house next door to the synagogue, in the house of Titus Justus, a Roman, and a 'God-fearing proselyte' (Ac 18<sup>7-8</sup>)—brought an accusation against St. Paul before the proconsul. In order that such an accusation might be admitted for trial, the Jews must have tried to give to it a colouring of offence against Roman law, for the Jews still possessed the right to try among themselves in their own way any offence against purely Jewish religious observance. But the attempt to give colour to a charge which was essentially religious did not deceive Gallio; he refused to admit the case to trial, and 'drove them from the judgment-seat.' His action was highly important; it amounted to an authoritative decision that St. Paul's preaching could not be construed as an offence against Rom. law, and that, if there was anything wrong in it, the wrong was only in respect of Jewish law, and therefore should come before a Jewish court, and could not be admitted before the proconsular court. This decision by an official of such rank formed a precedent which might be appealed to in later trials; and it is not too much to say that it had practically the force of a declaration of freedom to preach in the province. According to our view, this incident had a marked effect in directing St. Paul's attention to the protection which the Roman state might give him against the Jews. Hitherto his position had been so humble that his relation to the state had probably not entered consciously into his mind, or formed any part of his calculations; but the decision of the first Roman imperial official before whom he had been accused (combined with the favourable memory of the other high imperial official, Sergius Paulus, with whom he had come in contact), was calculated to make a strong impression on his mind.

When St. Paul ceased to preach in the synagogue, he began to use the house of Titius Justus, a 'God-fearing proselyte' (evidently Roman from his name), as a centre for teaching. In the following months he was evidently understood by the Corinthian population to be one of those lecturers on philosophy and morals, so common in the Greek world, who often travelled, and settled in new cities where there seemed a good opening for a teacher; and scornful remarks were made contrasting the high fees charged by teachers of established reputation with the gratis lectures of this new aspirant, and an impression was common that St. Paul (like other beginners in philosophy) was working to obtain a reputation and position such as would justify him, after a time, in beginning to charge fees, and make a livelihood by his brains instead of by his hands. The effect produced on St. Paul by these remarks is shown in 1 Co.

As was the case in most other cities, the Greek populace of C. disliked the Jews; and the marked reprimand administered to the latter by Gallio, in refusing to entertain the case against St. Paul, seems to have been popular in the city (Ac 18<sup>17</sup>). The Greeks took and beat Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue (who had apparently succeeded Crispus when the latter became a Christian);* and Gallio took no notice of an act which he may probably have considered as a piece of rough justice, and also as a mark of popular approval (which was always grateful to a Rom. official). At this time there can be no doubt that in the popular mind Christianity was looked on merely as an obscure variety of Judaism.

In C. at his first arrival St. Paul became acquainted with two persons who played an important part in subsequent events; these were Priscilla and Aquila (to follow the noteworthy order observed by St. Luke, Ac 18<sup>26-28</sup>,† and by St. Paul himself, Ro 16<sup>3</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>19</sup>). Aquila, a Jew of the province Pontus, had left Rome in consequence of Claudius' edict (perhaps issued in the latter part of A.D. 50);‡ and the commercial advantages of C. attracted him thither. St. Paul resided in their house during his long stay in C.; and they accompanied him to Ephesus, where they were still residing when he came thither after visiting Pal., Syrian Antioch, and the Galatian churches. Priscilla bears a good Rom. name, and was probably a lady of good family (which would explain why she is so often mentioned before her husband); and Aquila doubtless had acquired a wide knowledge of the Rom. world during his life; and they would therefore be well suited to suggest to St. Paul the central importance of Rome in the development of the Church, and form a medium of communication with the great city. We may fairly associate with this friendship the maturing of St. Paul's plan for evangelizing Rome and the West, which we find already fully arranged a little later (Ac 19<sup>21</sup>).

* So in AV; but in RV it seems to be implied that the Jews beat Sosthenes (implying that he was a Christian, as either he or another Sosthenes afterwards was, 1 Co 11), but it seems inconceivable that Gallio should have permitted such an act on the part of those whom he had just snubbed so emphatically.

† So in RV; but AV has the wrong order in 18<sup>26</sup>.

‡ The dates assigned vary. Orosius names 49 as the year; and it has been contended that his dates at this period are all uniformly one year too early (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, pp. 68, 254). Lightfoot gives the date 62, Renan 51, Lewin 52.

Ro 15<sup>21</sup>). In this respect, also, the Corinthian residence was an epoch in St. Paul's conception of the development of the Church in the Rom. world.

In C. the development of the Church might be expected to move rapidly. East and West met there, where Rom. colonists, Greek residents, and Jewish settlers all dwelt; and thought progressed in the contact of race with race. But rapid development always implies dissension and conflict of opinions; and hence we find the existence of warring factions mentioned far more emphatically in C. than in any other Church; some were of Paul (the founder), some of Apollos (Paul's eloquent successor), some of Cephas (i.e. the Judaizing party), some of Christ (presumably persons who claimed to be above mere apostolic partisanship), as we read in 1 Co 1<sup>12</sup>. Of these parties it is perhaps a permissible conjecture that the Rom. colonists, and the freedmen who naturally agreed with them, formed the bulk of the first, while the Greek residents had been more attracted by the Alexandrian philosophy, and perhaps the mysticism of Apollos; the Jews and some proselytes would comprise the Judaizing adherents of Cephas. St. Paul, when he came to C., seems to have been moved by the want of success that had attended his very philosophic style of address in Athens; and he deliberately adopted a specially simple style of address. As he says (1 Co 2<sup>1-2</sup>, cf. Ac 18<sup>5</sup>), he came not with oratorical power or philosophic subtlety, expounding the mysterious nature of God; he did not declare to the Corinthians, as he had done to the Athenian audience, 'the Divine Nature' (Ac 17<sup>23-29</sup>); he determined not to know anything among his hearers at C. save Jesus Christ and Him crucified. To the Greeks, who sought after philosophy, such preaching must have seemed uneducated and unintellectual (1 Co 1<sup>22-23</sup>); and we might conjecture that, as a rule, they would prefer the message as delivered by Apollos. But there is no evidence to confirm this conjecture; and in the only slight description of Apollos' preaching in Achaia, he is said to have been specially successful among the Jews (Ac 18<sup>28</sup>). It seems, therefore, not possible to feel any confidence in the details of an hypothesis connecting the parties in the Church with the nationalities that were mingled in the population of C., though we admit the strong probability that the variety of races contributed to cause the variety of parties, and that there would be a tendency for each race to become concentrated in one party.

The preceding paragraphs show that we are justified in attaching great importance to St. Paul's stay in C., as constituting an epoch in his preaching, in his plans, and in his conscious attitude towards the Rom. government, and also as resulting in the formation of a new Church in the track of ready communication alike with the East and with Italy. As to the constitution of this new Church, it is evident that a very considerable congregation had been formed in C. within a few years after St. Paul first entered it, and some of the converts were men of position; on the whole, however, he declares that there were among them not many that were deeply educated in philosophy, not many possessing official dignity and power, not many of aristocratic birth (1 Co 1<sup>26</sup>); the bulk of the Church was humble, but these words ('not many') may fairly be taken as implying that there were in it some few members of higher position.

St. Paul seems to have departed from C. for the purpose of celebrating the feast at Jerus. (Ac 18<sup>22</sup>, where RV omits the words intimating his intention—but probably they are original); we cannot doubt that this was the Passover, which fixes his departure to early spring, and his arrival in C. to autumn, acc. to our view Sept. 51–March 53 (52–54 many scholars, 48–50 Harnack). Perhaps his vow, in accordance with which he cut his hair in Cenchrea, when on the point of going on board the ship, was completed and discharged at the Passover in Jerusalem. Doubtless, he performed the voyage on a ship whose special purpose was to carry pilgrims to Jerus. for the feast from Achaia and Asia. In 20<sup>9</sup> he probably again thought of performing the voyage on such a ship, and found that the Jews were too incensed against him to make the voyage safe.

The subsequent history of the Corinthian Church is lightly passed over by St. Luke. Apollos was sent over from Ephesus with a letter of recommendation to the brethren in Achaia (Ac 18<sup>27</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>1</sup>),* and his influence in C. was powerful (Ac 18<sup>27, 28</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>12</sup>). It is generally admitted that St. Paul, during the early part of his stay in Ephesus, sent to C. a letter which has not been preserved (1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>); and it may be regarded as highly probable that this is not the only one of his letters that has perished. The view has also been strongly maintained that St. Paul paid a short visit to C. from Ephesus, and returned to Ephesus (2 Co 12<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>); but, more probably, such a short visit was paid later from Macedonia (see Drescher in SK, 1897, pp. 50 ff. In the latter part of St. Paul's stay in Ephesus, however, the report that was brought to him from C. by envoys (1 Co 16<sup>17, 18</sup>) drew from him the letter which has been preserved, and is commonly cited as 1 Co. It seems probable that this letter was sent by the hands of Titus: at least it is certain that he was sent by St. Paul on a mission to C. about this time (2 Co 7<sup>13, 15</sup>); and St. Paul several times refers to the strong interest which Titus took in the Corinthians (2 Co 7<sup>15</sup> 8<sup>19</sup>). Timothy also was sent on a mission to C. from Ephesus (1 Co 4<sup>17</sup>). When St. Paul left Ephesus and came to Macedonia, he met there Titus on his return from C. (probably at Philippi), after having been disappointed in the hope of finding him at Troas. Evidently, Titus returned from C. by the land route or by a coasting vessel by way of Macedonia and Troas. On this report the second letter to C. was now dispatched; and Titus went on a second mission, accompanied this time by 'the brother whose praise in the gospel is spread through all the Churches' (identified by an early tradition, which may probably be correct, as St. Luke). Timothy also returned by the land route from C., and met St. Paul in Macedonia (2 Co 1<sup>1</sup>). After spending some months in Macedonia, apparently in several cities (Ac 20<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>5</sup>, Ro 15<sup>19</sup>), St. Paul entered Greece, where he spent three months, chiefly, no doubt, at C., during the winter of 56–57 (or 57–58 acc. to Lightfoot and many others). During the years 55–56 St. Paul had been much occupied with a scheme for a general contribution from his new Churches in the four provinces Achaia, Macedonia, Galatia, and Asia,† which was to be devoted to the benefit of the poor Christians in Jerusalem. To this scheme St. Paul attached the utmost importance, as marking the solidarity of the new foundations with the original Church; and he pays a high compliment to the Corinthians for the readiness with which they had begun to respond to the call (2 Co 9<sup>2-4</sup>). No envoy from C. is named among the delegates sent in charge of the money to Jerus. (Ac 20<sup>4</sup>); but it seems possible that the Corinthians asked either St. Paul himself or one of the envoys mentioned in 2 Co 8<sup>16-22</sup> to act as their steward.

The development of the Church in C. between A.D. 53 and 57, and the kinds of difficulties that beset the early steps of this young congregation, are closely connected with the letters of St. Paul (which form our sole authority), and will be more appropriately treated under the heading of CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE; but we must here refer to the probable influence of the character of society in the city on the Church. C. had always been a great seat of the worship of Aphrodite; and that goddess retained in her seat on the Isthmus much of the abominable (and really non-Greek) character of the Asian and esp. Phœnician religion from which she sprang, particularly the system of hierodouloi who lived a life of vice as part of the religious ceremonial of the goddess. Hence the viciousness of C. was proverbial through the Roman world; and we can realize how vile was the society out of which the Corinthian congregation arose, how hard it was for them to shake off the influence of early and long association with vicious surroundings, how deep they were likely to sink in case of any lapse from religion. It is no wonder that St. Paul wrote (1 Co 5<sup>10</sup>) that, if they were to cut themselves off altogether from vicious persons, they 'must needs go out of the world.'

Near C. was the scene of the Isthmian Games, one of the four great athletic contests and festivals of Greece. These games were held at the shrine of Poseidon, a little way N.E. of the city, about the narrowest part of the Isthmus, and close to the shore of the Saronic Gulf. They were of the usual Greek style, including foot-races, chariot-races, boxing, etc., and the victor's prize was a wreath of the foliage of the pine-trees, which grow abundantly on the coast. It is usual to say that St. Paul borrows his imagery in such passages as 1 Co 9<sup>24-26</sup> from these games; but games were universal in all Greek or semi-Greek cities; and St. Paul, who had lived long in such cities as Tarsus and Antioch, and had already visited many others, did not require to visit the Isthmian Games in order to write that 'they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize,' or that 'they do it to receive a corruptible crown.' Such allusions would be as luminous to the inhabitants of every other Greek city in the Mediterranean lands as they were to the Corinthians.

LITERATURE.—Of general works on geography the best are Leake's Moræa, iii. 229-304, and his Peloponnesiaca, 392 ff.; Curtius, Peloponnesos, li. 514 ff.; Clark, Peloponnesus, 42-61. The guide-books, especially Budeker, are good; and the articles in works on Greek geography are in general excellent in regard to Greece proper (far superior to those on the cities of Asia). The works on the life of St. Paul by Conybeare and Howson, and a host of others, are, as a rule, very good in their treatment of Corinth. On the coinage, besides Imhof-Blumer and Gardner already quoted, see the works of Mionnet, Eckhel, and catalogues like that of the British Museum.

1. The two companion Epistles to the Corinthians have occupied from the first an unchallenged

* In the passage of 2 Co 3, probably other Jews who came with letters of recommendation from Jerus. are referred to, as well as Apollos with his Ephesian recommendation.

† St. Paul mentions the contribution of Macedonia and Achaia in Ro 15<sup>26</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>4, 6, 9</sup>, of Galatia and Corinth, 1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>. He has no occasion to allude to that of Asia; and he alludes to that of Galatia only perhaps as being the first and supplying the model. The Asian contribution is implied in Ac 20<sup>4</sup>, where the envoys who carried it to Jerus. are mentioned (cf. Ac 24<sup>17</sup>).

place among the acknowledged writings of St. Paul. These writings, as is well known, formed a recognized group, under the name of 'the Apostle,'* before the date at which we have evidence of a complete NT CANON. The well-known response† of the Scillitan Martyrs (A.D. 180) at once includes and distinguishes the 'letters of Paul a just man' among the 'books' carried about by Christians. That a collection of Pauline letters existed at least as early as the reign of Trajan is a strong inference from the now generally accepted date of the Ignatian letters.‡ Whether or no the whole thirteen letters, already included in the Muratorian list, were part of this collection from the first cannot be discussed here; but it is of special interest for our purpose to note that, although eventually superseded by the modern order, traceable as far back as Origen, a very ancient order of the thirteen Epp., preserved in Can. Murat. and attested from other quarters, places the Epp. to Corinth at the head of the list. Zahn infers that this order is the primitive one, and that the collection of Pauline Epp. was first made at Corinth.§ In any case, the recognition of our Epistle is coeval with the evidence for any collection of the apostle; in fact it goes back beyond any clear evidence of the kind. The reference in Clement of Rome (xlvii. 1) is, unlike most of the early references to NT books, a formal appeal to our letter. Echoes of the Ep. are too numerous to be quoted here (a fairly full collection is in Charteris' Canonicity, p. 222 ff.); they occur in Clement of Rome (seven), Ignatius (nine), Polycarp (three, or with the Martyrdom, four), Justin (at least five) [Hermas, Sim. v. vii. 2, is doubtful, and the same may be said of Didache x. μαρὰν ἀδὰ], and others. From the citations in Hippolytus we know that the Ophites knew our Ep.; the same is true of Basilides as well as of the later Gnostics. It is unnecessary to set out in detail the evidence for an undisputed fact (see below, § 4).

2. The Epistle has been transmitted in the Peshitta, Old Lat., Copt., and other oldest versions of NT as well as in the principal Gr. MSS.

Of the latter, the Epistle is contained entire in MS. Paul (1418<sup>22</sup> 'manu alia antiqua'), E (copy of 1), L. FG contain all but 38-16 67-14. C all except 718-96 138-1540. P all except 718-17 1223-135 1423-59. Fragments are contained in F<sup>a</sup>, II (cf. Robinson, Euthaliana, 60f.), P, K (considerable), M, Q, S, Z. Of the cursives, it may suffice to refer to 67*, 5, 47, 37 as of special interest.

The Old Lat. of our Epistle is transmitted in the Lat. VS of the Gr.-Latin MSS DE (d e; on f and g see Gregory, Prolegomena, p. 969, and Sanday-Headlam, Romans, pp. lxxvi ff.), and in x<sup>s</sup>, a 9th cent. MS at Oxford; fragments only in m and r.

The Epistle then comes down to us with every possible external attestation of genuineness, and its integrity (see on 2 Co, § 8) is equally free from suspicion.

3. But external attestation is hardly enough to determine the authorship of a book in the face of internal evidence. What then does the Epistle tell us of its authorship? We may remark generally that no NT writing bears a more convincing stamp of originality than this letter; it is clearly the reflex of a great and markedly individual personality. manifold as are its contents, its several parts hang naturally together, and are strongly homogeneous in treatment and style. Moreover, as we shall see presently, the Ep., read in conjunction with our other sources of knowledge, yields a definitely realizable historical situation, without a particle of evidence to suggest that it stands to those sources in a secondary relation. Until quite modern times, and except within a limited area, this has not been questioned. Our Ep., with 2 Co, Ro, and Gal, have, as is well known, formed the unimpeached and unassailable nucleus of admitted Pauline writings, and have furnished to criticism the standard by which the claims of all other supposed Pauline literature have been estimated. This was conspicuously the case in the period of the Tübingen school. With the exception of the free-lance Bruno Bauer, whose isolated attack is recorded rather as a literary curiosity than as a contribution to historical criticism, the four Epp. were allowed on all sides, even by the most radical criticism, to be the genuine work of St. Paul. This was characteristic of the genuine psychological insight which, in spite of admitted extravagances of subjective criticism, marks the work of F. C. Baur and his ablest followers.

4. Of late years, however, the genuineness of the four 'Pauline homologumena' has been called in question by a somewhat more imposing body of opinion.* On the one hand, a somewhat numerous band of Dutch writers (Loman, Quaestiones Paulinae in Th. T. 1882-1886; Pierson and Naber, Verisimilia, 1886; Van Manen in Jahrb. f. Prot. Theol. 1883-1887, and others) have, by subjective criticism of the wildest kind, endeavoured to dissolve the personality of St. Paul and of Jesus Christ, and resolve the teaching of the Epp. into the product of vague and arbitrarily-assumed movements of Jewish religious thought. Kuenen, Scholten, and others have thought the arguments by which these views are supported worthy of refutation, but any detailed notice of extravagances, tending only to bring rational historical criticism into discredit, would be out of place in an article like the present. The same must be said of a somewhat less fanciful critic, Rudolf Steck, professor at Bern, who published (Berlin, 1888) Der Galaterbrief nach seiner Echtheit untersucht. His arguments reach our Ep. through that to the Galatians. The latter is condemned, partly on the ground of its discrepancies with Ac (exactly reversing the argument of Baur and his followers, Steck allows Ac a relative superiority as a source), partly on that of its literary dependence upon Ro, and 1 and 2 Co. Extending the method to the latter, Steck† finds in our Epistles signs of dependence on Ro (e.g. the ἀ γέγραπται of 1 Co 4<sup>o</sup> refers to Ro 12<sup>o</sup>!), while the latter in turn presupposes the Gospels, and such post-Christian Apoc. as 2 Es and the Assumption of Moses. Accordingly, all the 'Pauline homologumena' fall to the ground. Our Ep. in particular is dependent upon the synoptic Gospels, especially on Lk, as appears from the accounts of the Last Supper (1 Co 11) and of the post-Resurrection appearances of Christ (1 Co 15). Steck appears to have gained a convert in J. Friedrich (Die Unechtheit des Galater-Briefes, 1891).

Those who wish to follow the questions raised by Loman, Steck, and their adherents into further detail, may be referred to the works quoted in the previous notes. A general weakness of all the writers in question appears to be a defective appreciation of personality, carrying with it an inability to distinguish the spontaneous from the artificial. In common with the representatives of

* A careful account of the arguments of the Dutch hypercritical school, and of Steck, is given by Knowling, The Witness of the Epistles, ch. iii.; cf. also Schmiedel in Hand-Kommentar, vol. ii.; Zahn, Die Briefe des Paulus seit 50 Jahren im Feuer der Kritik (in ZKW, 1889). The arguments of Volter (Komposition der paul. II.-Briefe, 1890) reach a similar conclusion by a super-refined method of analysis.

every influential school of criticism, we regard the Pauline authorship of our Ep. as unimpeached and unimpeachable.

5. St. Paul first visited Corinth during his first European mission (Ac 18<sup>1-18</sup>). The circumstances have been stated under CORINTH. In modification of the view there taken, it should be noted that at any rate the arrival of Timothy and Silas from Macedonia convinced him that Corinth was to be a great centre of work. He 'became engrossed in the word' (συνελχέτο τῷ λόγῳ, v. 9). The vision of vv. 9-10 had reference rather to alarms arising on the spot (1 Co 2<sup>9</sup>) than to any remaining doubt as to his mission to the Corinthians. His earliest converts were made by his addresses in the synagogue, and comprised 'Jews and Greeks' (Ac 18<sup>4</sup>). To the former class belonged Crispus; but the baptism of the household of Stephanas must have been his first conquest (1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>). S. and Gaius were probably proselytes (i.e. σεβηταί). After the arrival of his companions, St. Paul, engrossed in preaching, entrusted the baptism of his converts to them (1 Co 14<sup>16</sup>). St. Paul was the first to preach the gospel at Corinth. Hence he describes himself as the planter (1 Co 3<sup>9</sup>), the first builder (vv. 10-11), the father (4<sup>13</sup>) of the Cor. Church. He laid, as its foundation, 'Jesus Christ' (3<sup>11</sup>), teaching the significance of His death (22, 2 Co 1<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>9</sup>) and resurrection (1 Co 15<sup>1-8</sup>), of the Eucharist (10<sup>16</sup>, 11<sup>23ff</sup>), the fundamental principles of the Christian life (3<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>15-19</sup>), and the hope beyond the grave (15<sup>23</sup>, 31 1<sup>8</sup>, cf. 6<sup>2</sup>). The composition of the Cor. Church was mainly Gentile, but not without Jews (Ro 16<sup>21</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>18</sup> 9<sup>20</sup> 12<sup>13</sup>); and heathenish antecedents (12<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>1</sup>) were the cause of most of the troubles of the community. The Christians of Corinth were of the lower ranks of life (12<sup>20-23</sup> 7<sup>21</sup>), though there were marked differences of wealth among them (11<sup>21</sup>); Gaius and Erastus (Ro 16<sup>23</sup>) may be added to Crispus and Stephanas (above) as persons of higher social position.

Of the numbers of the Cor. Church we cannot form any safe conjecture. St. Paul preached at first in the house of Titius Justus (Ac 18<sup>7</sup>) while residing with Aquila and Priscilla (v. 2). Later (1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>) we hear of an ἐκκλησία at the house of the latter, which probably implies that the Christians were no longer capable of being contained in any one house. In any case, the language of 1 Co 3, 4 suggests continued growth under other teachers after the departure of St. Paul himself. Chief among these was APOLLOS (Ac 18<sup>27-28</sup>). The Acts hints at two lines of his activity at Corinth: edification of the believers (27), and successful controversy with Jews (28), the γάρ here cannot fairly be held to restrict the scope of συνεβόλετο to his success with the Jews). For both purposes his Alexandrian training was a high qualification. The contrast between his style of preaching and the severe simplicity of St. Paul was laid hold of by frivolous minds as a basis of party spirit (infra, § 7). The date of Apollos' arrival at Corinth is uncertain, except that it precedes St. Paul's arrival at Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>1</sup>). To Ephesus, at some time during St. Paul's πρερία there, Apollos returned. The remaining points in the history of the Church of Corinth enter into the situation out of which our Ep. arises. Before dealing with this, it is desirable to consider the dates.

6. The chronology of St. Paul's life has recently been the subject of renewed investigations, which have tended to disturb the scheme which, in its broad features, may be described as in possession of the field previous to 1893. Among the most important of recent discussions are those of Clemen (Chronol. d. Paul. Briefe, 1893) and of Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, also in Expositor, May 1896). A discussion of the questions raised will be found in articles CHRONOLOGY OF NT, and FESTUS. Here it will suffice to state that the prevalent view, as represented (e.g.) by Wieseler, Lewin (Pastl. S.), and Lightfoot (on Acts in Smith 11B<sup>2</sup>, and Biblical Essays, p. 223), used the arrival of Festus in Palestine as the pivot date for the reconstruction of the period. It was argued, on grounds not to be entered on here (see FESTUS), that this pivot, though not absolutely rigid, yet oscillated only as between the years A.D. 60 and 61, and that of these two, the year 60 was the more probably correct. Subtracting, then, the two years of St. Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea, we obtained 58 as the year of his last journey from Corinth to Jerusalem. As he left Corinth before the Passover (Ac 20<sup>6</sup>), the three months spent there carried us back to his arrival at Corinth in Nov. 57 (see CORINTHIANS, SECOND EP. TO, § 6). This, corresponding as it does with the intention of wintering at Corinth expressed 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup>, made the spring of 57 the probable date of 1 Co.

Moreover, if 37 was the earliest possible date for St. Paul's escape from Damascus (2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>, Ac 9<sup>25</sup>, see ARETAS), and 14 years elapsed between this and the apostolic conference of Ac 15, identified with that of Gal 2, the latter must have occurred about 51. Subtracting, then, from 57, the date of 1 Co, the three years (Ac 20<sup>31</sup>) of his Ephesian ministry, we had 54 as the date of St. Paul's arrival at Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>1</sup>), and three years remained for all the events of Ac 16-18, or hardly eighteen months for his movements before and after the year and a half claimed (Ac 18<sup>11-18</sup>) by his first sojourn at Corinth. And this residual space of time was certainly none too large for the movements of the apostle which had to be fitted into it. Now the argument of Ramsay, from the days of the week which the data of Ac 20<sup>6ff</sup> require, in relation to the calendar of the year 57 (Expos. May 1896, 'A Fixed Date in the Life of St. Paul'), if accepted, pushes back our Epistles by a year. He insists on the absolute looseness, amounting to uselessness, of the pivot date referred to above (a question to be discussed under FESTUS), and, identifying the conference of Gal 2 with St. Paul's famous visit (dated by him in 46) to Jerus. (Ac 11<sup>30</sup> 12<sup>25</sup>), pushes back St. Paul's conversion to the year 32 (St. Paul the Traveller, ch. 14 and note). The latter date is too early to satisfy the reference to ARETAS in 2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>; while the objections to Ramsay's identification of the conference of Gal 2 seem overwhelming. But GALATIANS rather than our Ep. is the battle-ground of this controversy, which after all affects the absolute rather than the relative chronology of the Ep. to the Corinthians. It may suffice for our purpose to remark that Ramsay's 'fixed date' depends on the twofold assumption that St. Paul and his party left Philippi (Ac 20<sup>6</sup>) on the very morning after the last day of unleavened bread,—a mere matter of inference,—and that the night on which St. Paul preached at Troas was, as Meyer, etc., assume, a Sunday night, not (as Hackett, Conybeare and Howson, etc.) a Saturday night,—a very dubious point in view of the Jewish phraseology used to denote the day. We do not think, therefore, that the accepted chronology has been shattered by Ramsay's assault. That of Clemen proceeds on far more radical lines. Here again the battle-ground is ultimately the Ep. to the GALATIANS. But we may sketch the outlines of Clemen's construction as bearing on our Epistle. Accepting 60 as the date for Festus, and consequently 68 as that of St. Paul's arrest, he yet brings St. Paul to Jerusalem (Ac 20-21<sup>28</sup>) in 64, where the conference of Gal 2 is inserted; between 64 and 68 the apostle is lost to our ken; the rebuke of Cephas at Antioch and the Ep. to the Gal belong to this nebulous interval. The winter of 53-54 was spent at Cor., the previous summer in the evangelization of Illyricum (Ro 15<sup>19</sup>), the winter 52-53 at Nicopolis (Tit. 3<sup>12</sup>); in the summer of 52 the apostle left Ephesus, where he had been since the beginning of 50. This is the period of our Ep. to the Corinthians, which may be conveniently remembered as follows: A.D. 50, early spring, 1st letter (that of 1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>); later spring, 2nd letter (= 1 Co); 51, summer, Titus carries to Corinth the 3rd letter (2 Co 9); then, after a revolt in the Cor. Church, and a painful visit of the apostle to Corinth, comes a 4th (painful) letter (= 2 Co 10-13<sup>10</sup>); lastly, when St. Paul has already reached Macedonia, in the summer of 52, the 5th letter (= 2 Co 1-8<sup>13</sup> 13<sup>11</sup>-end). (On the above details compare art. 2 CORINTHIANS, §§ 4 (g), 8.) The vision referred to in 2 Co 12<sup>2</sup> is that at the conversion, which thus falls 14 years before 61, i.e. in 37, two years after the crucifixion (A.D. 35).

To discuss this scheme in detail is out of place here. The present writer, holding that the Pauline chapters of the Acts give a trustworthy consecutive outline of the apostle's life; that Ac 15 is meant to describe the conference of Gal 2, and that the hiatus left between A.D. 54 and 58, with the dislocation of the sequence of events in Ac 21<sup>17-40</sup>, amounts to a failure of the entire scheme, is not predisposed in favour of the proposed readjustment of the chronology of our Epistles. In particular, that 1 Co comes at the beginning rather than at the end of the Ephesian ministry of St. Paul, is not only contrary to the indications of Ac 19<sup>1</sup>, 21 20<sup>1</sup>, a consideration which would weigh lightly with Clemen, but is contrary to the spirit of 1 Co 4<sup>19</sup>, and especially 16. That 10<sup>8,9</sup> are anything but natural in the closing period of the Ephesian sojourn, is surely a desperate argument.

The time has not arrived, then, to abandon the year 57, and the latter end of St. Paul's three years' ministry at Ephesus, as the date of 1 Co, unless, indeed, it be held (as Godet and others maintain, but without conclusive reasons) that it must have preceded 2 Co by at least a complete year (see 2 CORINTHIANS, § 6).

7. The history of the Cor. Church after the departure of Apollos for Ephesus is known to us solely from the two Epp. to the Corinthians. That communications passed from time to time between St. Paul and this Church is only what we might expect from our general knowledge of St. Paul's life. In one letter, written not very long before 1 Co, he had had occasion to warn the Corinthians not to allow themselves to associate (συναμειγνυσθαι) with fornicators. This warning, in view of the conditions of the place (CORINTH), does not indicate circumstances of special urgency there. But we gather that there was a tendency in Corinth to treat the apostle's command as impracticable in its severity (1 Co 5<sup>10c</sup>); the tone of public opinion in the Cor. Church was ominously low (cf. 1 Co 6<sup>12-20</sup>); and when a case of exceptional repulsiveness occurred, it was treated by the community with a tolerance amounting almost to levity (5<sup>1-9</sup>). How St. Paul heard of this, of the litigious recourse to heathen tribunals (6<sup>1c</sup>), and of other matters for blame (11<sup>19</sup> 15<sup>12</sup>), we do not know. Speaking broadly, these were all anxieties of a kind likely to occur, in a more or less acute form, in any community whose Christianity was recent, while the heathen instincts of its members were bred in the bone and not to be overcome except by time.

It was somewhat different with the σχιζματα or dissensions which occupy the early chapters of the Epistle. Partly no doubt, and specially as regards the use of the names of St. Paul and Apollos as party watchwords, they are explicable by the frivolous and excitable temper of the people. The Epistle of Clement shows us that forty years later than St. Paul's time, although the party watchwords of the year 57 have disappeared, the tendency to faction is still at work (§§ 1, 47, etc.). In communities of this kind, as Renan observes (St. Paul, p. 373 f.), 'divisions, parties, are a social necessity; life would seem dull without them.' 'The talent of Apollos turned all their heads.' The contrast between the Alexandrian methods of Apollos and the simpler spiritual preaching of St. Paul, would, in fact, furnish this tendency with an irresistible temptation. But in Corinth we are in the presence of a more serious and far-reaching phenomenon. Apart from the question of the personal presence there at any time of one of the older apostles (see below), it is clear from the data of our Ep., combined with those of 2 Co (§ 4 [e] there), that Corinth was the scene of an anti-Pauline mission identical in its source and aims, though naturally differing in tactics, with that which troubled the Churches of Galatia. At Corinth the demand for circumcision would appear to have been dropped or held back; the point of attack was the apostolic mission of St. Paul (1 Co 9<sup>1c</sup>), whose conduct and position had become the object of suspicious criticism (ἀνακρίνειν, 1 Co 4<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>3</sup> etc.). The Judaic movement against St. Paul is probably responsible for the two watchwords ἐγὼ δὲ Κηφᾶ· ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ. This is clearly the case with the former (cf. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 96 f.). Ἐγὼ δὲ Κηφᾶ must have been, in the first instance, the utterance of a person who knew St. Peter by his Pal. name. Such persons must have found their way to Corinth, and attached to themselves partisans, whether Gentile or Jewish, who were impressed by the prior claim of St. Peter to apostolic rank, or perhaps repelled by the lengths to which emancipation from Jewish prejudices had carried some of the Christians at Corinth (1 Co 8<sup>1c</sup>). It does not follow that, in order to say ἐγὼ δὲ Κηφᾶ, it was necessary to be a personal pupil of St. Peter. The name of Cephas must have become a household word in every Church visited by the Pal. propagandists; there is nothing in 1 Co 1<sup>12</sup>, even combined with 9<sup>1</sup>, to justify us in inferring, as a 2nd cent. bishop of Corinth inferred (Dionys. ap. Enseb. HE ii. 25), that St. Peter had actually visited Corinth and shared with St. Paul the claim to rank as founder of the Church there. St. Paul's silence would in that case suggest a more painful relation between himself and the partisans of Cephas than we need otherwise assume. He blames the partisans of Cephas indeed, but neither more nor less than he blames those of Apollos and of himself; there is nothing to suggest any special hostility between St. Paul and any one of the three. This would equally apply to the fourth party, whose watchword was ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ, had we only our present Ep. to go by. But on them the second Ep. throws a peculiar light, which reduces the other three parties to a comparatively unimportant rank. It is true that the Cephas-party must have been under the influence of the Judaizing propaganda; but the second Ep. shows that it is not among them (cf. 1 Co 3<sup>2</sup>) that we are to look for its extreme and dangerous partisans.

In considering the 'Christ-party,' it will be needless to discuss the endless suggestions that have been made apart from the light derived from 2 Co. That ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ were the words of St. Paul himself, or of Christians who formed a party against party spirit, etc., are views for which the reader must consult the Commentaries (see also Rabiger, Krit. Untersuchungen über den Inhalt der beiden Briefe an die Kor. Gemeinde, etc., 1880. Rabiger denies the existence of a Christ-party). Quite certainly there were men in Corinth who put forward the name of Christ as a party watchword, as others put forward that of Cephas, Apollos, or St. Paul. It is instructive to note the absolute contrast between the ὁμοῖ δὲ Χριστοῦ of 3<sup>2</sup> (cf. 15<sup>23</sup> etc.), where the apostle asserts ὅτι Χριστοῦ ἵνα as true of all, and the ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ of 1<sup>12</sup> where he stamps its falsehood (v. 19 'is Christ portioned off' to any) as the exclusive claim of some.

There were, then, those at Corinth who falsely claimed a monopoly of Christ, and the renewed repudiation of this claim in 2 Co 10<sup>7</sup> lets in a flood of light upon their position. The claim stands in the closest connexion with the disparagement of St. Paul's apostolic rank. He had not, like the Twelve, known Christ personally; while his witness of Christ, therefore, was second-hand, theirs was direct; they were, and he was not, appointed to the apostolate by Christ Himself. This contention was due in the first instance, no doubt, to newcomers at Corinth (2 Co 11<sup>13,23</sup>), but appears to have imposed upon some native members of the Church (1 Co 1<sup>12</sup> ἐκαστος ἑαυτὸν). This view of the matter is clinched by St. Paul's depreciation of a knowledge of Christ 'after the flesh' (2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>). By the time the second Ep. was written, this agitation had grown to far more alarming dimensions than we can trace in our present letter (see CORINTHIANS, SECOND EP. TO THE, § 4 [e]).

While fully recognizing the nature and importance of these σχιζματα, we must not exaggerate their intensity by supposing that they constituted 'schisms' in the modern sense of the word. They were dissensions within the society, not separately organized bodies. Our Ep. presupposes throughout a corporate life, impaired indeed, but not destroyed, by these dissensions, and the other burning questions which existed at Corinth seem to have had no party relation to the σχιζματα— in some cases they may have mitigated their intensity by causing cross-divisions. The attempt has indeed been made to connect each of the several evils touched upon in 1 Co with one or other of the parties (e.g. in the work of Rübiger mentioned above), but this entirely outruns the evidence, and assigns to the parties a too fundamental significance in the life of the Cor. Church. That the enlightened persons, who went too far in their emancipation from prejudice about εἰδωλόθυτα, were not under Judaizing influence is no doubt pretty certain; but that does not connect them without more ado with the 'party' of St. Paul or Apollos; that the τινὲς of 15<sup>12</sup> embody a thoroughly Gr. prejudice does not prove that Apollos was their watchword. Nothing in the morbid exaltation of the gift of tongues (14) betrays (even in the light of Ac 2<sup>4</sup> 11<sup>15</sup>) the Petrine partisan.

8. Tidings of the σχίσματα reached St. Paul for the first time through some persons described by him as οἱ Χλόης (11<sup>11</sup>). These were probably, by the analogy of St. Paul's language elsewhere, slaves. Whether their mistress was a Christian, and where she lived, are uncertain points (CHLOE). Stephanas, who had a household of his own (1<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>18</sup>), can hardly have been one of οἱ Χλόης. Stephanas and his companions must have reached St. Paul after Chloe's people; they to some extent allayed the disquieting impression which the news of the latter had produced (16<sup>18</sup>). Whether they were the carriers of a letter from Corinth is not quite clear. Such a letter, in any case, reached the apostle about this time. He begins to answer it in 7<sup>1</sup>; its contents may be inferred to be unconnected with the matters dealt with in 1-6—even, probably, with the misunderstood injunction of the apostle in 5<sup>9</sup>. The Corinthians consulted him about marriage and its problems (7), probably about εἰδωλόθυτα (8-10), about the veiling of women in public worship (11<sup>2</sup>), and not improbably about πνευματικά; the λογία (16<sup>14</sup>) was very likely another matter upon which they consulted St. Paul—probably in reply to some previous indication of his wish that something should be done for the purpose. Before the receipt of the letter from Corinth, as it would seem, but after the arrival of Chloe's people, St. Paul had instructed Timothy, whom he was employing for a mission to Macedonia (Ac 19<sup>22</sup>), to proceed afterwards to Corinth and endeavour to restore discipline (14<sup>17</sup> 16<sup>10-11</sup>). But the task required a strong man, and St. Paul is evidently anxious as to Timothy's reception. And as an opportunity, probably the Cor. letter and the visit of Stephanas and his party, offered itself, shortly after Timothy's departure, for the dispatch of a letter, the apostle penned the Epistle before us. After a preamble of guarded but sincere general commendation (1<sup>4-9</sup>), he deals (1<sup>10-6</sup>) with the more urgent matters for blame: the σχίσματα (1-4), the case of incest (5), litigation before heathen courts (6<sup>1-9</sup>), and immorality generally (6<sup>9-20</sup>). He then takes up the Cor. letter, and answers its inquiries about marriage in general (7<sup>1-7</sup>), the duties of various classes in relation to marriage (8-21), and specially the duty of the unmarried, or rather of the parents of virgins, as regards the question of marrying (25-30). Then follows the difficult question of the εἰδωλόθυτα, which brings out the principle that privilege is to be exercised only subject to considerations of the higher expediency (8-10); to exercise it without regard to this, leads men to overstep its lawful limits (10<sup>14-22</sup>). Next follows a series of matters relating to public worship (11<sup>2-14</sup>): first, the veiling of women (11<sup>2-16</sup>); then the disorders connected with the Eucharist (11<sup>17-34</sup>); then (12-14) the πνευματικά. The principle which emerges here is closely analogous to that which determines the discussion of the εἰδωλόθυτα. Chapter 13 occupies the same place here as does ch. 9 in the former subject; only the principle of forbearance from privilege enforced in 9 is here carried to the higher and deeper ground of ἀγάπη, itself the greatest of the Spirit's gifts. We then reach the only properly doctrinal subject dealt with ex professo in the Epistle, that of the Resurrection. Our account of this must be a little more full. The question arises from the denial, on the part of 'some' (15<sup>12</sup>), of the future resurrection of the body. St. Paul's reply is, that if Christ has risen,—if the truth of His resurrection is part of the gospel common to St. Paul and the Twelve (15<sup>1-11</sup>),—then the dead in Christ will rise also. The denial of the τινὲς, 'some,' extended to the latter or consequent proposition, not to its antecedent. St. Paul's argument is (12-19), that their denial of the consequent truth overthrows the antecedent, viz. the resurrection of Christ. On the other hand (20-23), if the latter is a certain truth of the gospel, the resurrection of the dead in Christ, denied by the τινὲς, follows as effect from cause. This is supplemented (24-28) by an explanation which puts the resurrection of the dead into context with the return of Christ and the consummation of all things. Two practical and corroboratory arguments (29-34) complete the refutation. Then follows the answer to the objection, founded on the nature of the resurrection body (35-58), issuing in the triumphant vindication of the hope of a resurrection as the basis of quiet Christian perseverance. St. Paul now turns to purely epistolary matters: directions as to the λογία (16<sup>1-4</sup>) lead to a statement of his plans of travel (6-9). Then follows a recommendation of Timothy (10<sup>11</sup>), a message on behalf of Apollos (12), a brief general exhortation (13<sup>1-14</sup>), a commendation of Stephanas and his household, and an expression of thankfulness for his presence, with Fortunatus and Achaicus, at Ephesus (16-18). Salutations (19-24) form the close, the solemn anathema of v. 21 comes in abruptly in their midst. That it is directed against the Judaizing agitators (cf. 2 Co 11<sup>13-15</sup>) is not improbable, but can hardly be proved.

Such is the general plan of the letter. Its contents can be exhibited more in detail by the aid of a table.

9. Analysis of the Epistle.

I. EPISTOLARY INTRODUCTION (1<sup>1-9</sup>).

A. THE SALUTATION (1<sup>3</sup>). [α. The writer (1); β. the readers (2); γ. the greeting (3).]

B. PREAMBLE (4<sup>9</sup>). α. The apostle's thankfulness for the work of grace at Corinth, especially in regard to λόγος and γνώσις (4<sup>6</sup>).

β. The end to which this should tend, and which will not fail for lack of anything on God's part (7<sup>9</sup>).

II. URGENT MATTERS FOR BLAME (11<sup>10</sup> 13<sup>20</sup>).

A. PARTY SPIRIT (11<sup>10-12</sup>).

α. The facts (10<sup>17</sup>).

(1) The facts stated (10<sup>12</sup>).

(2) The facts characterized (13<sup>17</sup>). [Christ degraded to the leadership of some; Paul exalted as if the saviour of any.]

β. Party spirit forgets the essential nature of the Christian teaching (11<sup>13-14</sup>).

(1) The gospel has no room for σοφία (in the lower sense, ε. λόγος) (11<sup>17-20</sup>).

This shown by (α) the facts in general (13<sup>22</sup>); (β) the history of the growth of the Corinthian Church; (20<sup>31</sup>); and by (γ) the way in which the apostle founded it (21<sup>5</sup>).

(2) The gospel is σοφία in the true sense (ε. θεοῦ) (25<sup>34</sup>).

(α) This wisdom hidden from the world, but revealed to the saints (25<sup>10a</sup>).

(β) The Spirit of God the vehicle of its revelation (10<sup>12</sup>).

(γ) Hence it is revealed to spiritual (13), but not to unspiritual (14<sup>10</sup>), nor, except in a rudimentary form, to unripe hearers (31<sup>4</sup>).

γ. Party spirit forgets the essential character of the Christian teacher (35<sup>4-6</sup>).

(1) All alike, whatever their ministry, are but secondary to God, who determines the result (5<sup>8a</sup>).

- (2) This in no way diminishes their several responsibility (46-15).
Paul the (planter v. 9, father 415) founder, others the after-builders (10, waterers 4, guardians 415). The Day will test the work of all alike.
- (3) The temple of God destroyed by those who practically deny the above truths by 'glorying in men' (16-21).
- (4) All teachers, like all that enters into the existence and experience of the Christian, are part of God's gift to him, means to the one end, God in Christ (22-23).
- (5) The Christian teacher to be regarded as an underling (υπερτατος) of Christ, to whose judgment alone he is ultimately subject (41-5).
- (6) The Corinthians have only too good cause to look down on the apostles to a higher level (46-15); yet the apostle's aim is not to crush by sarcasm, but to reclaim them as their father (14-16).
3. Epilogue on the party spirit. The mission of Timothy, and the coming visit of Paul (17-21).
- B. THE MORAL SCANDAL (51-13).
- α. The facts (1).
- β. False attitude of the Corinthians (2, cf. 9).
- γ. The proper way to deal with the case (3-5).
- (1) The Paschal metaphor of the leaven (46-8).
- (2) A repetition, with removal of an objection, of a former injunction on the subject (9-13).
- C. LITIGATION BEFORE THE UNRIGHTEOUS (61-14). This—
- α. Unworthy of the eternal destiny of Christians (1-4).
- β. Speaks ill for the wisdom (5-9), but still worse for the moral tone, of the community (7-9).
- γ. The injustice, or unrighteousness, thus shown to exist among them is part of a heathen past (9-11), transitional, working the argument back to B).
- D. FORNICATION.
- α. Not a legitimate use of the body (12, 13a), but
- β. A denial of the true destiny of the body (13b-20).
- (1) This destiny described (13b-14).
- (2) Fornication desecrates the limbs of Christ (15-17).
- (3) Fornication, beyond any other sin, assails (the eternal destiny of) the body (18-19) in which we are to glorify God (20).
- III. REPLY TO THE CORINTHIAN LETTER: MARRIAGE AND ITS PROBLEMS (7).
- A. PREAMBLE (1-7). While the single state is preferable, marriage is meant for some, and its obligations are to be maintained.
- B. ADVICE TO DIFFERENT CLASSES.
- α. The unmarried (8-9).
- β. Those who 'have married' (as Christians) (10, 11).
- γ. The rest (i.e. those who have been converted as married persons) (12-24).
- (1) General principle: existing relations to be loyally maintained (12-13, cf. 17, 26-24) [a reason for this, as regards family life, v. 14].
- (2) This general principle not to enslave a Christian to union with a reluctant heathen partner (15, 16); but
- (5) The general principle to be observed where possible (17).
- (4) This principle is the same as is to govern all relations of life.
- (a) Circumcision or uncircumcision (18-20).
- (b) Slavery (21-23): this does not forbid an opportunity of emancipation being accepted, 21b).
3. Virgins (25-30).
- (1) St. Paul's opinion tentative, but he decidedly advises celibacy (25, 26).
- (2) Reasons for this:
- (a) The general principle (γ. 1) makes this way (27, 28), especially
- (b) In view of the precariousness of all earthly relations, given the 'shortness of the time' (29-35): the unmarried are freer to serve the Lord individually.
- (3) This applied to the duty of the parent of a virgin (36-38).
- (4) The same principle applies to widows (39, 40).
- IV. FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS (8-11).
- A. GENERAL PRINCIPLES: to act on mere knowledge not right (8).
- α. Knowledge does not guarantee truth of instinct (1-3).
- β. The truth about idols (1-5).
- γ. This truth not equally grasped by all (7-13).
- (1) Some, influenced by association of ideas, cannot eat without sin (7).
- (2) No one sins by abstaining (8).
- (3) The enlightened may by eating injure the weak (9-13).
- B. THE GREAT PRINCIPLE THAT OF FORBEARANCE IN VIEW OF THE HIGHER EXPEDIENCY (9).
- α. The Apostolic position (1-3), and rights (4-12a) to maintenance, of St. Paul (13, 14, a supplementary corroboration).
- β. His forbearance to exercise these rights (12b, 15-18).
- γ. His motive in this: (19-23a) to save others, (23b-27) to save himself.
- C. THE ABOVE PRINCIPLES APPLIED (10-11).
- α. The example of the Israelites warns us of the danger, even to ourselves, of presuming on privilege (10-12).

- β. The danger of idolatry, for all their enlightenment, a real one to the Corinthians (13-23).
- (1) There is no necessity to yield (23).
- (2) The partaking of a sacrificial feast (cf. 810) is an act of idolatry, as is evident (14-15) from the parallels of
- (a) The Christian Eucharist, a partaking of the blood-shedding of Christ (16-17).
- (b) The Jewish sacrifices, to eat of which is to partake of the altar (18).
- (3) Result: to eat ceremonially of ειδωλίσματα totally forbidden (19-22).
- γ. Practical rules for other cases.
- (1) Preliminary repetition of the principle of the higher expediency (25, 24).
- (2) Where the history of the food is not forced on your attention, it may be freely eaten (25, 26).
- (3) Where the history of the food is forced on your attention, better abstain for the sake of others (27-29a), and to avoid exposing yourselves to misconstruction (29b, 30, 32).
- (4) Epilogue (31-11). The glory of God and the higher expediency to be your guides, as they are mine.
- V. MATTERS RELATING TO PUBLIC WORSHIP (112-14).
112. General commendatory preamble to this section.
- A. THE VERBOSITY OF WOMEN (13-16).
- α. Principle of organic subordination (8).
- β. The covering or uncovering the head a recognition of this principle (4-10).
- γ. Women not lowered by this (11, 12).
- δ. Corroboratory considerations { from nature (13-15), from the custom of the Churches (16) }.
- B. DISORDERS CONNECTED WITH THE EUCHARIST (117-34).
- α. The assemblies of the Church marked by dissensions (17-19).
- β. They substitute their own feast for the Lord's (20, 21).
- γ. Unseemliness of the above (22-27).
- (1) In the spirit displayed (22).
- (2) In view of { the history (23-25), and of the significance (26, 27) of the eucharistic acts (which are the central feature of the κυριακὸν δειπνόν) }.
- (3) Precautions for worthy, and dangers of unworthy, reception (28-32).
- (4) Conclusion: the feast not to be used to satisfy hunger; other directions postponed till the apostle's arrival (33, 34).
- C. THE SPIRITUAL GIFTS (12-14).
- α. General principles: The purpose of these gifts forbids their use as ends-in-themselves (12).
- (1) A caution necessitated by the reader's heathen antecedents: the nature of the utterance the criterion of its divine origin (1-3).
- (2) Diversity of these gifts, but all from one source, and for one aim—the higher expediency (4-11).
- (3) The organic unity of the body of Christ (12-27)
- (a) Forbids us { to envy those who have gifts which we lack (15-20), to despise those who lack gifts which we have (21). }
- (b) Implies organic interdependence of all (22-27).
- (4) Church organization and functions based on these principles (28-30).
- [Transition to (3) (31).]
- β. Charity, the greatest gift of all, the principle determining the use of all the rest (1231-13).
- (1) No gift, miraculous or moral, of any value without charity (1-3).
- (2) Charity, its nature and pre-eminence (4-13).
- (a) Charity described (4-7).
- (b) Charity outlasts prophecy, tongues, knowledge, all of which belong to our childhood, i.e. our present dim and partial vision of truth (8-12).
- (c) Conclusion, of the three lasting gifts, charity the chief (13).
- γ. Practical application. Spiritual gifts to be valued only as means to edification (14).
- (1) Prophecy preferable to tongues (1-25).
- (a) Prophecy edifies all present, tongues the speaker only (1-6).
- (b) The inutility of tongues { of musical instruments (7-9), illustrated by analogy of human language (9-11). }
- (c) Consequent practical superiority of worship 'with the understanding' (12-19).
- (d) Practical application of the above (20-25).
- (2) Concluding directions (a) as to the exercise of εὐχαριστία (26-34).
- (b) as to the silence of women (34-36).
- (3) Epilogue: (a) Gainsayers rebuked (37, 38).
- (b) Result (39, 40).
- VI. THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD (15).
- A. THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST AN ESSENTIAL ARTICLE OF THE GOSPEL (1-11).
- α. The creed originally delivered to the Corinthians (1-4).
- β. Witnesses to the resurrection of Christ from Cephas to St. Paul (5-9).
- γ. Paul as apostle 9-10.

3. This truth common to all the apostles (11).
- B. IF CHRIST IS RISEN, THE DEAD IN CHRIST SHALL RISE (12-34).
- a. To deny the consequent overthrows the antecedent (12-19).
- (1) The denial of a resurrection of the dead by 'some among you' (12).
  - (2) What this denial involves:
    - (a) The falsification of apostolic preaching and of Christian faith (13-17a).
    - (b) The destruction of Christian hope (17b-19).
  - β. The resurrection of Christ carries with it that of those who are Christ's (20-23).
  - (1) Christ leads the way in resurrection as Adam did in death (20-22).
  - (2) The resurrection in relation to the consummation of Christ's mediatorial reign (23-28).
    1. Resurrection of Christ.
    2. Return of Christ and resurrection of His people.
    3. The end, or re-delivery of the kingdom to God (23, 24a).
  - (b) Before the end must come the subjugation of all powers, all enemies to Christ, and, last of all, that of death (24b-26).
  - (c) The end itself, and subjection of the Son to the Father (27, 28).
  - γ. Subsidiary arguments: (a) Baptism for the dead (29).
  - (b) The motive of the Christian life (30-34).
- C. ANSWER TO OBJECTIONS: THE BODY OF THE RISEN (35-48).
- a. One kind of body is sown, another is raised up (35-44).
- (1) The seed differs from the fruit (35-38).
  - (2) Flesh differs from flesh, heavenly bodies from earthly (39-42).
  - (3) The spiritual body differs from the natural as the second Adam from the first (43-49).
- β. The change from the one to the other, at the coming of Christ, will destroy the strength and sting of death (50-55).
- γ. Epilogue: (1) Sin and the law (56).
- (2) Our victory in Christ (57).
  - (3) Result (58).
- VII. EPISTOLARY CONCLUSION (16).
- A. Directions for the λογία (1-4).
- B. Personal plans of the apostle (5-9).
- C. Personal notices (10-18).
- a. The mission of Timothy (10, 11).
  - β. Apollos (12).
  - γ. A closing exhortation interjected (13-14).
  - δ. Stephanas (15-18).
    - (1) His household (15, 16).
    - (2) His mission to Ephesus (17, 18).
- D. Conclusion of the Epistle.
- a. Salutations (19-21).
  - β. Anathema against false brethren (22).
  - γ. Concluding benediction (23, 24).

10. IMPORTANCE OF THE EPISTLE.—The above synopsis is enough to show the richness and diversity of the light thrown by our letter upon the spirit and circumstances of the apostolic age. In its fulness of light and shadow it vividly reproduces the life of a typical Gentile-Christian community, seething with the beginnings of that age-long warfare of the highest and lowest in man, which constitutes the history of the Church of Christ from the time when His fire was kindled on the earth down to this day. To do justice to the manifold lessons of the Epistle would require a commentary; but without trespassing beyond the limits of this article, a few salient points may be noted.

Pastoral character.—The two Epistles to the Corinthians are the most pastoral of the Epistles. For details of pastoral work and organization, indeed, we go to the letters to Timothy and Titus. But for the deep-seated principles, for the essential relations between pastor and people, for the conception of the apostolic office, and the nature of apostolic authority, these Epp. are our primary source. The questions touched upon in our Ep. furnish a fair sample of the difficulties of Church government; and as each is taken up in turn some deep-lying principle springs naturally to the apostle's lips, and is brought to bear with all its power upon the matter in hand. The letter is unique as an object-lesson in the bishopric of souls.

11. Doctrinal importance.—It is impossible within our limits to do more than glance at the main points of interest. (a) The Epistle bears fewer traces than 2 Co of the great controversy of the period to which it belongs. The only express reference to the subject is 15<sup>36</sup> 'the strength of sin is the law' (cf. Ro 7<sup>25</sup>). But the foundation-stone of his preaching in Corinth, 'Jesus Christ, and that crucified' (2<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>10, 11</sup>), is the root of the apostle's whole mind and thought on the subject. (b) The doctrine of the Person of Christ, indissolubly correlated with that of His work, is touched upon 8<sup>6</sup>, where the δι' οὗ τὰ πάντα anticipates Col 1<sup>16ff</sup>. The redelivery of the kingdom (15<sup>24-28</sup>) by the glorified Christ, and His final 'subjection' to His Father, is a thought not elsewhere brought out (but see 1 Co 3<sup>23</sup> 8<sup>6</sup>, Ro 11<sup>36</sup>). With regard to the pre-existence and human nature of Christ, the passage 15<sup>45-48</sup> is of great importance, and has given rise, from Baur onwards, to startling interpretations (Pfleiderer, Paulinism, Eng. tr. i. 139 ff.; Schmiedel in loc.). (c) The Holy Spirit (2<sup>10ff</sup> and 12) is the vehicle of all true enlightenment and receptivity to revealed truth (24<sup>13</sup>), and of all the χάρισμα which enable Christians to live their corporate life. The language of 12<sup>11</sup> involves the personality of the Spirit (see further the art. on 2 CORINTHIANS, § 7). The Spirit is assumed to be the active power in baptism, and to be present in all baptized persons (12<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>11</sup>); though this is ideally rather than actually true of all (3<sup>16</sup>). (d) With regard to the sacraments, baptism and its significance are touched upon in the passages just mentioned. It was administered in the name of Christ (1<sup>13</sup>, cf. Ac 19<sup>5</sup>). An enigmatical practice of baptizing 'for the dead' is referred to (15<sup>29</sup>); the context (ὡπὲρ αὐτῶν) forbids us to regard this as merely an aspect of ordinary baptism. On the doctrine of the Eucharist a side-light is thrown in 10<sup>16-17</sup>. The reference is introduced to illustrate the principle that to eat the sacrifice is to take part in the sacrificial act. The sacrifice here is that of the cross, offered by Christ; the Eucharist has a sacrificial character analogous to that of the Jewish or heathen sacrificial meal, and like them has the effect of establishing a communion between the worshipper and his God. The reference involves the belief on St. Paul's part that the body of Christ is eaten (cf. 11<sup>27, 29</sup>). In what sense this is so, St. Paul does not define. (e) With reference to the resurrection (see above, § 8), that of Christ is the premise of St. Paul's argument in 15<sup>1-34</sup>. In vv.<sup>3, 4</sup> we have the germ of a creed. In vv.<sup>5-7</sup> we have the earliest record of the post-resurrection appearances of the Lord; v.<sup>6</sup> is of special importance. That He rose with a σώμα πνευματικόν is implied in v.<sup>44ff</sup>. The whole argument is addressed, not to the general resurrection of all men, but to that of οἱ Χριστοῦ, the κεκοιμημένοι, whose rising again is the effect of their being quickened in Christ. From other places we know that St. Paul taught a future life and judgment for all, good and bad alike; but (except in the hypothetical ἀπόλοτο of v.<sup>18</sup>) this chapter has no word applicable to the latter. (f) Eschatology in general the Ep. touches upon 7<sup>26, 29</sup> 15<sup>51</sup>, whence we see that the apostle still expected the early return of Christ, and especially in 15<sup>23-28</sup> (see analysis, § 9). In this latter passage the coming of Christ appears as the last and final act of His reign, immediately ushering in the end. At His coming Christ will, by raising His dead to incorruption, destroy death (v.<sup>54</sup>), and thus complete the subjugation of all inimical powers (2<sup>6</sup>). Then all is ready for the redelivery of the kingdom, that God may be all in all. This seems incompatible with the millennial reign after the resurrection of the just, which some commentators (Godet, etc.) would read into our passage from the Apocalypse.

12. The Christian life.—The whole Ep. is 'an inexhaustible mine of Christian thought and life.' Nowhere else in the NT is there a more many-sided embodiment of the imperishable principles and instincts which should inspire each member of the body of Christ for all time. With regard to personal life, it may be noted that the ascetic instinct which has ever asserted itself in the Christian Church finds its first utterance in 7<sup>(1-25)</sup>. <sup>40</sup> θέλω, νομίζω ὅτι κάλον, etc.; but coupled with a solemn and lofty insistence (οὐκ ἐγὼ ἀλλὰ ὁ κύριος) on the obligations of married life, and founded on the simple ground of the higher expediency. This latter principle (τὸ συμφέρον) is the keynote of the ethics of the Epistle. The whole content of life is to the Christian but means to a supreme end; free in his sole responsibility to God (3<sup>21</sup> 2<sup>15</sup> 10<sup>29</sup>), the spiritual man limits his own freedom (6<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>19</sup>) for the building up of others and the discipline of self (9<sup>24-27</sup>). The corporate life of the Church is reflected in our Epistle as nowhere else in NT (see Weizsäcker, Ap. Zeit. pp. 567-605, Eng. tr. ii. 246 ff., for a careful and interesting discussion, mainly on the data of our Epistle). We note especially the development of discipline, of organization, and of worship. With regard to discipline, the leading passage is 5<sup>1ff.</sup>, where are described, not indeed the actual proceedings against the immoral person, but those which might and ought to have been carried out. St. Paul sees the Corinthian Church assemble; he himself is with them in spirit; the power of the Lord Jesus is in their midst. In the name of the Lord Jesus they expel the offender, 'deliver him to Satan for the destruction of his flesh, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord.' We have here the beginning of ecclesiastical censures, inflicted by the community as a whole, and it is not surprising in the apostolic age (1 Co 11<sup>30</sup>, Ac 5<sup>1ff.</sup>) to find physical suffering associated with the spiritual penalty. Such an assembly as St. Paul here pictures could, a fortiori, dispose of such matters of personal rights as should arise (6<sup>1-2</sup> 5<sup>12</sup>). The organization of the Cor. Church is evidently in a very early stage. We hear of no bishop, presbyter, or deacon (contrast Ph 1<sup>1</sup>), but of prophets and teachers, as the ranks immediately following the apostles. This is in remarkable conformity with what we hear of at Antioch (Ac 13<sup>1</sup>), and its correspondence with the lists given in other Epistles is too close to be accidental. The following list compares the data of 12<sup>28ff.</sup> with those of Ro 7<sup>8-8</sup>, Eph 4<sup>11</sup>:-

1. ἀποστολοι (Co, Eph).
2. προφῆται (Co, Eph, -ία Ro).
[ἐναγγελισται (Eph)
τοιμιν (Eph)
δικκονια (Ro)].
3. διδάσκαλοι (Co, Eph, -ων Ro)
[παρακαλῶν (Ro)
ἡνῶμαι, ἰάματα (Eph)]
ἀντιλήψεις (Co) [μετακιδους (Ro)] κυβερνήσεις (Co) [προιστάμενος (Ro)] [ἰλιῶν (Ro)]
γινῆ γλωσσῶν (Co).

These lists are evidently not to be regarded as statistical, and their variations are clearly due to the unstudied spontaneity with which each enumeration is made. All the more significant, then, is it that 'prophets' everywhere take rank next after the apostles, while 'teachers,' who stand high in all these lists, are the only other class common to all. In our Epistle these three classes alone are expressly assigned an order, 'first,' 'second,' 'third.' To interpret these facts would take us beyond our limits, but it is worth noting that the prophetic gift is not strictly limited to a class, but potentially belongs to all (14<sup>30-32</sup>). That administrative gifts (κυβερνήσεις) come so low, perhaps implies that they are still voluntary (cf. the προιστάμενος of Ro). To organize the λογία (16<sup>1ff.</sup>) the presence of Titus was required (2 Co 8<sup>6</sup>). The ἐποικοδομοῦντες or παιδαγωγοί of 3<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>, who, like Apollos (3<sup>6</sup>), carried on the work begun by St. Paul at Corinth, were therefore probably 'prophets and teachers'; but the Ep. makes little reference to them (perhaps 16<sup>15</sup>, cf. 1 Th 5<sup>21</sup>). Public worship is the subject of a long section of the Epistle (see analysis, § 9). At some ἐκκλησία, ἰδιῶται (possibly unbaptized persons) might be present (14<sup>16-23</sup>); this would not be at the κυριακὸν δειπνον. The 'Amen' is in use as the response to prayer or praise (14<sup>16</sup>). The discussion 11<sup>2ff.</sup> would suggest that women might, under certain conditions, pray or prophesy in public; but 14<sup>34</sup> shows that the apostle was merely holding in reserve a total prohibition, at any rate as regards speaking ἐν ἐκκλησία. Otherwise, the liberty of prophesying belonged to all; the utterances were to be tested (14<sup>29</sup>), but the test was simply the character of the utterance (12<sup>1ff.</sup>). Prayer or praise ἐν γλώσσῃ (see TONGUES) was a marked feature of public worship, but St. Paul insists on its inferiority to prophecy. Sunday is mentioned as a day for setting apart alms (16<sup>2</sup>), and was therefore probably a day for common worship; but this is not expressly stated. To come together for common worship constituted an ἐκκλησία (11<sup>18</sup>). It is possible that assemblies for prophecy and teaching (14<sup>29</sup>) were distinct from those held ἐκ τὸ φαγεῖν (11<sup>33</sup>). This was the case apparently in Pliny's time (see Weizsäcker, Apost. Zeitalter, p. 568 f.). The purpose of the latter assembly was to break the bread and bless the cup of the Lord. In 11<sup>17-34</sup> we have the locus classicus for the Eucharist of the apostolic age. Two views may be referred to which appear to be erroneous. One, represented, for example, by Beet in his commentary on the passage, is founded on the abuse censured in v. 21 (cf. 3<sup>30</sup>), that 'each one taketh before other his own supper,' thereby destroying the character of the meal as a 'Lord's Supper.' If, it is argued, previous consecration of the bread and wine by the προεστῶς, and reception at his hands, had been an essential of the Eucharist then, as we find it to be in the age of Justin (Apol. i. § 65), the abuse in question could not have occurred; and St. Paul's remedy would have been 'wait for the consecration,' not 'wait for each other' (v. 33). This argument assumes, firstly, a departure from the procedure of Christ in instituting the sacrament, which is quite incredible. That in carrying out His command, τοῦτο ποιεῖτε, the apostolic Churches omitted precisely the actions which accompanied His words, and that the presence of those actions in Justin's Eucharist is due to a reversion, not to continuous repetition, is improbable to the last degree. The argument is really due to a second erroneous assumption that 'the Lord's Supper' in v. 20 'can be no other than the bread and the cup of the Lord in v. 27.' This assumption is a reaction from the anachronism of introducing the Agape of later times* to explain the passage. The 'Lord's Supper' is not the Eucharist proper, still less the Agape, but the entire re-enactment of the Last Supper, with the eucharistic acts occurring in the course of it, as they do in the paschal meal of the synoptic Gospels. The name 'Lord's Supper' is not elsewhere used in the NT, but in the Church the 'Lord's Supper' was neither the earliest nor the commonest name for the Eucharist; it primarily, though not exclusively, meant the annual re-enactment of the Last Supper, which survived after the Agape had first been separated from the Eucharist, and then had gradually dropped out of use (see Smith's Dict. Christ. Antig. s.v. 'Lord's Supper'). In any case, then, the 'Lord's Supper' at Corinth would be already in progress when the bread and cup were blessed; St. Paul's censure and remedy (vv. 21, 33) are entirely compatible with the closest adherence to the procedure of the Last Supper. Who presided, we do not know, but it may be taken as certain that someone did. In v.<sup>34</sup> we see the first impulse toward the separation of the Eucharist proper from the common meal in which it was embedded (see Weizsäcker, p. 601). St. Paul's account of the words of institution has probably crept into the text of St. Luke's account of the Last Supper (see Hort's critical note). But it has recently been argued by Percy Gardner (The Origin of the Lord's Supper, 1893) that a revelation to St. Paul at Corinth (so he very questionably understands 11<sup>23</sup>) may have been the sole source of the institution of the Eucharist; and it is suggested further, that this revelation was largely coloured by the neighbouring mysteries of Eleusis. The tradition of the institution in the first two Gospels is enough to refute this view. That they have derived it from Pauline influence is not to be believed for a moment; nor, in view of its thoroughly Palestinian and Jewish antecedents, can great weight be assigned to the fact that they do not expressly record a command to repeat the ordinance (cf. Bickell, Messe und Pascha; Anrich, Antike Mysterienwesen, p. 127). We note the stress laid by the apostle on previous preparation (11<sup>28</sup>). The solemnity of the rite in St. Paul's eyes can hardly be exaggerated.

12. LITERATURE.—(For complete commentaries on the NT see NW TESTAMENT; for commentaries on the Epp. of St. Paul generally, and introductions to them, see PAUL, ROMANS; for grammatical works, see LANGUAGE OF THE NT.) A very complete list of works on the Epp. to the Cor. will be found in Meyer's Commentary (Eng. tr.), also in Plummer's articles on Corinthians in Smith DIB<sup>2</sup>, see also Wald. Schmidt in PRE<sup>3</sup> xi. 360 ff., 378; Reuss, Gesch. der II. Schriften NT, § 88 ff. In a select bibliography we must be content with mentioning a few books of special importance without implying in any way that those omitted are without (often great) value. (a) On both Epistles: The historical situation has been specially discussed (among others) by Bleek, SK 1830; Baur, Tüb. Z. 1831 (important for the exilewara), Paulus<sup>2</sup>, pp. 287-343; Rühliger (see above, § 7); Schenkel, De eocl. Cor. factionibus turbata, 1838; Beyschlag, De eocl. Cor. factione Christiana, 1861, and in SK, 1865, 1871; Hilgenfeld in his ZfTh, 1865, 1866, 1871, 1872; Heinrich, das erste SS. des Ap. P. an die Kor. 1880, and in his edd. of Meyer (see below); Klopfer (see next article); Krenkel, Beiträge z. Aufhellung d. Gesch. u. d. Briefe des P. 1890; Eylau, Zur Chron. d. P. Briefe, 1873; Hagge in J. prot. Th. 1876; Weizsäcker (as cited above) and in J. Th. 1876; Pfeleiderer, Urchristentum, pp. 89-117, 1887; Hausrath, Paulus<sup>2</sup>, 1895 (see also his Hist. of N.T. Times, Eng. tr. 1895); Lasco, Paulus Antipaulinus (a very novel theory on 1 Co 1-4), 1894; Ekedal, Inter Paul. et Cor. quæ intercesserint rationes usq. ad 1 Cor (London, 1887; Godel, Introd. (Edin.) 1894; Clemens (see above, § 6), and Schmiedel in Hand-Commentar, 1891, 2nd 1892, the most searching and accurate digest of the many complicated questions involved; Zahn, Eitell. in d. NT, i. 195 ff. Of commentaries on both Epp. the homilies of Chrysostom 'have ever been considered by devout men as among the most perfect specimens of his mind and teaching' (see Nicene and P. N. Library, series i. vol. xli.); they were delivered at Antioch, i.e. before 308; 44 are on 1 Co, 30 on 2 Co. On the commentaries of Theodoret, John Damascene, Theophylact, Occumenius, Euthymius, 'Ambrosiaster', Pelagius, Thomas Aquinas, the reader may be referred to the remarks in Sunday-Headlam, Romans, p. xcix ff. The 'Postils' of Nic. de Lyra (first in 1471-1472) mark a revival of exegetical insight upon some points in our Epp. Melancthon wrote on both Epp., but 2 Co was not finished. Of more modern writers, Locke's Paraphrase and Essay on St. Paul (1705-1707) dealt with 1 and 2 Co. For lists of 17th and 18th cent. commentators, see the references given above. The list of strictly modern commentaries opens with Pott, 1826; Bilroth, 1853; Rückert, 1836. Olshausen, de Wette, Meyer dealt with the Epistles in their general works on the NT. Meyer remains the nearest approach to a standard commentary; his latest edd. have been revised by Heinrich, who had previously published a commentary of his own. Olshander, 1847-1858; Neander, 1859; Kling in Lange's Biblwerk, 1861; Maier (Rom. Cath.), 1857-1866; Schnedermann (in Strack-Zöckler), 1887; Schmiedel (see above). On both Epistles, in English, the best modern works are those of Hodge (New York), 1857-1860; F. W. Robertson's (lectures); Stanley, 4th ed., 1876; J. A. Beet, 3rd 1885; Kay, 1887 (scholarly but slight, posthumous); Ilaas (in Camb. Greek Test.), 1886-1892. We may add T. K. Abbott, Short Notes on St. Paul's Epp. 1892. Several excellent commentaries exist on 1 Co only. Dean Colet's (ed. by Lupton), 1874; Heydenreich, 1825-1828; Holsten (in Das Evang. des Paulus), 1880; T. C. Edwards, 1885 (very valuable); Elliott, 1887 (possibly the most thorough English commentary); Evans (in Speaker's Comm.), 1881 (unsurpassed insight in many passages); Godet, 1887 (excellent); Bois, Adversaria Critica, 1887; Milligan, The Resurrection of the Dead (on 1 Co 15), 1891; Lightfoot's Notes on Epistles of St. Paul, 1895, contain notes on 1 Co 1-7. References to Field's Origines Norvicensis, to articles in the Expositor, etc., are given by Plummer in DIB<sup>2</sup>, s.v. 1 and 2 Co; the articles give interesting and valuable details as to style, coincidences with Acts, etc. The art. Paulus in PRE<sup>2</sup> by W. Schmidt, contains some useful references; that in Ersch and Gruber (1886) is by Schmiedel, and represents his earlier views on both Epistles.

1. The traces of this Epistle in the post-apostolic age are as slight as those of the first Epistle are exceptionally strong. Clement of Rome does not quote it. Where the Epistle would have furnished him with most apposite material (e.g. Clem. ad Cor. v. 6), he makes no use of it. It is not referred to by Ignatius. Polycarp, on the other hand, distinctly quotes 2 Co 4<sup>14</sup> (Polyc. ad Phil. ii. 4, ὁ δὲ ἐπέλας . . . καὶ ἡμᾶς ἐγέρετο), and apparently 8<sup>21</sup> (ad Phil. vi. 1, comparing Pr 3<sup>4</sup>). The letter to Diognetus v.<sup>8</sup> shows a knowledge of 2 Co 6<sup>8-10</sup> 10<sup>8</sup>. The reference of Athenagoras (de Resurr. 18) to v.<sup>10</sup> is fairly clear; two references, at least in Theophilus (ad Autol. i. 2, iii. 4), to 7<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>19</sup> are quite distinct. The 'Presbyters' quoted by Irenæus (v. v. 1) refer to 12<sup>1</sup>. Moreover, the Epistle was in the canon of Marcion, and appears to have been used by the Sethites, (ap. Hippol. Philos. v. iii. 19, p. 216, Cruice) and by the Ophites, who quoted 2 Co 12<sup>4</sup> (ib. p. 166). The above references fairly cover the period prior to the Muratorian Canon, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, all of which authorities bear full witness to the Epistle. The utmost we can say is that there is no evidence that our Ep. was absent from any list of writings of St. Paul. This would hardly hold good if we were to follow Zahn (Kanon, 2. 833 ff.) in his view that a definitive collection of Pauline Epp. had been compiled before the date of Clemens Romanus. For, as we have seen, his knowledge of our Epistle is more than doubtful.

2. The text of the Epistle has been transmitted by the same versions and MSS as 1 Co (see last art.), with the following exceptions:—A lacks 4<sup>13</sup> (-ποὺ ἐλθόντων)—12<sup>7</sup> καὶ τ.; C lacks all from 10<sup>8</sup>; it is contained entire in FGKL; H contains 4<sup>2-7</sup>, 10<sup>8-12</sup>, 18<sup>1-11</sup>, 12<sup>1-22</sup>, the first fragment at St. Petersburg, the rest at Mt. Athos; I<sup>2</sup> contains no part of our Epistle; M contains the first fifteen verses of chapter 1, and 10<sup>12-12<sup>5</sup></sup> (Brit. Mus.); O has 12<sup>20-212</sup>; P lacks only 2<sup>13-16</sup>; Q has no part of the Ep.; R has 11<sup>19-19</sup>. For the old Latin, r lacks 2<sup>11-31<sup>8</sup></sup> 52-79 812-99 1122-1213 1311<sup>17</sup>.

3. Although inferior in its external attestation to the first Epistle, the internal character of 2 Co removes it far above any suspicion as to its authenticity. On whatever ground its integrity may be called in question (see § 8), the several parts of the Epistle are acknowledged as Pauline by all sober criticism (see 1 Cor. § 3). In fact, in its individuality of style, intensity of feeling, inimitable expression of the writer's idiosyncrasy, it may be said to stand at the head of all the Pauline Epistles, Galatians not excepted. Moreover, its historical references are so unstudied, so manifold, so intricate, that difficult as it is to reconstruct with any certainty the historical situation (§§ 4, 5), the difficulty is rather analogous to the 'subtilitas Naturae,' than such as would result from the inconsistencies of a literary fabrication. It is the most personal, least doctrinal, of all the Epistles except Philemon; but at the same time it is saturated with the characteristic theological conceptions of St. Paul. The personal relation of the apostle to the community is viewed in the light of the apostolic office as such, and this in turn in that of the distinctive character of the gospel; the profoundest conceptions of grace, reconciliation, consummation, thus enter into the very fibre of chs. 1-7. This interpenetration of practical detail with first principles of the faith is a characteristic which our Epistle shares with 1 Co. But here it is even more strongly marked. Not only do the relations between the Old and New Covenants (3), the Earthly and the Future Life (4), not only do the doctrines of Redemption and the Incarnation (5. 7. 8) find classical expression, but there is not the smallest matter mentioned in the letter which does not carry us back to the highest and most ultimate laws; the mere organization of the λειτουργία is sowing for eternity (9), a carrying out of the principle of the Incarnation (8); 'from the surface of things he everywhere penetrates to the depths.'

The Epistle is a letter of many moods, but all under strong control. 'Joy and heaviness, anxiety and hope, trust and resentment, anger and love, follow one another, the one as intense as the other. Yet there is no touch of changeableness, nor any contradiction. The circumstances dictate and justify it all, and he is master of it all, the same throughout, and always his whole self. An extraordinary susceptibility of feeling and impression, such as only an extraordinary character can hold in control' (Weizsäcker, Apost. Ziller, p. 328; cf. the whole section).

In the discussions (art. 1 CORINTHIANS, § 4) raised by the Dutch hypercritical school, and by Steck, on the genuineness of the 'Haupt-briefe,' our Epistle has played a somewhat subordinate part (see Knowling, ubi supra, pp. 192, 174). We may therefore dispense with any discussion on the subject, and postpone the question of Integrity until we have dealt with the difficulties connected with the historical situation.

4. As we have seen above (on 1 COR. § 7), the complete elucidation of the circumstances of 1 Co depends on the recovery of the thread of events connected with and ascertainable from the second Epistle. Here we enter upon what the most accurate of explorers has compared to a 'trackless forest.' The problem is especially tantalizing, because the abundance of material at once stimulates and mocks the attempt at a complete combination.

The broad question, How does the historical situation in 2 Co differ from that in 1 Co? how many letters, how many visits, of St. Paul to Corinth, how many estrangements and reconciliations, are to be traced or assumed? depends for its solution on our success or failure in unravelling several distinct threads. Such are the movements of Timothy, the movements of Titus, the history of the λειτουργία (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>) at Corinth, the sequel of the case of the offender of 1 Co 5<sup>1ff</sup>, the progress of party spirit and of opposition to St. Paul at Corinth, and, lastly, St. Paul's references to his plans of travel, and to letters and visits of his own.

We will briefly sketch the position of each of these questions, and then consider the possibilities of a satisfactory reconstruction of the history.

(a) As to Timothy, the case is comparatively simple. We have seen (on 1 COR. § 7) that Timothy left St. Paul at Ephesus for Macedonia, probably not long before the dispatch of 1 Co. He was to reach Corinth eventually (1 Co 4<sup>7</sup>), though St. Paul implies some doubt (ἐὰν ἐλθῇ, 16<sup>10</sup>) as to the prospect of his doing so. St. Paul expected him to return to Ephesus with the bearers of 1 Co (16<sup>11</sup>) by Pentecost (16<sup>12</sup>). His return from Corinth would in that case be by sea direct. The expression of Luke (Ac 19<sup>22</sup> εἰς τὴν Μακ. only) is, however, easily understood if he failed to reach Corinth. Lightfoot (Bibl. Ess. 275 ff.), who maintained that he probably did not do so, suggested that Titus might have overtaken him on the way to Corinth, or, if he went thither by sea, have met Timothy on the way back. Certainty on this point is not possible; we have to weigh the total silence of St. Paul in 2 Co (in the face of 1 Co 4<sup>7</sup>) as to any result of Timothy's mission to Cor., against the absence from 2 Co of any explanation (in face, again, of 1 Co 4<sup>17</sup>) of the non-arrival of a messenger so impressively announced. The latter argument seems to the present writer to be slightly outweighed by the former. 'It is patent that the mission had in some way miscarried' (Waite); but that Timothy had failed painfully at Corinth is hardly to be assumed (as by Jülicher, Einf. p. 61) without more proof than we possess. Anyhow, Timothy was with St. Paul when he wrote 2 Co. They may have met either at Ephesus or in Macedonia.

(b) Of Titus (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>) we do not hear by name in 1 Co. From 2 Co we learn that he was the bearer of our letter (8<sup>6, 10-21</sup>), accompanied by two unnamed brethren, one of whom, 'whose praise is in the Gospel,' may or may not have been Luke.

From 2 Co 12<sup>18</sup> we see that Titus had been to Corinth before, as we should also gather from 8<sup>6</sup> καθὼς προεβήξατο. This also follows independently from 7<sup>6, 13</sup> 2<sup>13</sup>. Titus, then, paid at any rate two visits to Corinth; and on one of them, previous to 2 Co, he had been accompanied by a (single, unnamed) brother (2 Co 12<sup>18</sup>).

We will come back to Titus after briefly considering the history of the λειτουργία at Corinth. The directions given 1 Co 16<sup>1-4</sup> were possibly in answer to some inquiry on the part of the Corinthians (supra, 1 COR. § 7). They had offered (2 Co 9<sup>8</sup> προεγγεμένῃ) to contribute, and, acc. to 8<sup>6</sup>, Titus had assisted in the preliminary organization of their efforts (8<sup>10</sup>, cf. v. 4 προεβήξατο). To this reference appears to be made 2 Co 12<sup>18</sup> (cf. ἐπλεονέκτησεν with 9<sup>8</sup>). Why not, then, identify (as Lightfoot, Bibl. Ess. 281) Titus and 'the brother' with 'the brethren' who carried 1 Co? (supra, 1 COR. § 7). This combination seems free from any objection, and the note of time, ἀπὸ πέρους (8<sup>10</sup> 9<sup>2</sup>), pushes back this visit of Titus to a date in any case very near 1 Co (see 1 COR. § 6). Titus visited Corinth, then, in connexion with the λειτουργία on two occasions; on the second occasion he was one of the bearers of 2 Co; on the first, not improbably he was one of the bearers of 1 Co.

(c) The person of Titus (cf. infra, §§ 6, 7) forms the link between the λειτουργία and the more painful questions between St. Paul and the Church of Corinth. The question whether Titus paid yet a third visit thither depends upon the consideration of the troubles which threatened to estrange St. Paul and the Corinthians. Firstly, the case of incest (1 Co 5<sup>1ff</sup>) was dealt with in 1 Co, and the expulsion there ordered would naturally follow upon the arrival of the letter. Did it? It is the prevalent view (the grounds for it are stated with admirable conciseness by Holtzmann, Einf. p. 255) that 2 Co 2<sup>6-11</sup> (= 7<sup>9-12</sup>) records the sequel. Stung by St. Paul's summons, the Corinthians, by a majority

(2<sup>o</sup>), inflict a punishment which St. Paul pronounces sufficient, and, lest the pain of it should drive the offender to desperation, advises the Corinthians to relax. The punishment had been inflicted in the presence and at the summons (7<sup>10</sup>) of Titus, who reported the contrition, zeal, and loyalty wrought by the letter he had borne. This letter would accordingly be 1 Co, unless we should have, on further consideration, to infer that the inattention or disaffection with which that letter had been received, or some other cause, had necessitated the dispatch by the hand of Titus of a sharper summons (see below, g).

(d) But a closer examination of the passages we are considering makes it doubtful whether they really relate to the offender of 1 Co 5<sup>1</sup>. The object in view, in St. Paul's treatment of the case now in question, had been to prove the loyalty of the Corinthians to himself (7<sup>12b</sup> 2<sup>o</sup>). To have persisted in withholding pardon would have been to give Satan an advantage over them all, St. Paul included; i.e. to have intensified the very evil St. Paul was combating. Moreover, St. Paul is specially careful to depreciate the grief inflicted upon himself (2<sup>o</sup>), which strongly suggests that the ἀδικησίς of 7<sup>12</sup> is also none other than himself. The οὐκ ἔσκεν τοῦ ἀδικήσαντος of the latter verse contradicts the via of 1 Co 5<sup>5b</sup> even more sharply than the notion of a personal wrong, the prominent thought in 2 Co 2. 7, contrasts with that of a sin against God, such as the πορεία of 1 Co 5. There are, then, weighty grounds for eliminating from these verses any reference to the inexcusable offender (who may none the less be glanced at among the προσημαρτηκότες of 12<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>2</sup>), and for referring them to some other individual. Here, again, it is a question of probability; but the view adopted by very many scholars,* that the offender of 2 Co 2. 7 is a personal opponent of St. Paul, who has grossly slandered him, and has temporarily succeeded in undermining the loyalty of the Corinthians, has much to recommend it. On this view, which is as old as Tertullian, de Pud. xiii. ff., this mission of Titus, and the letter then carried by him, must be quite independent of, and subsequent to, 1 Co. The ἀγρυπνία of 2 Co 7<sup>11</sup> then harmonizes in sense with 11<sup>2</sup>.

(e) The σέληματα of 1 Co 1-4 have undergone a change of aspect in 2 Co. Of the watchwords Paul, Apollos, Cephas, we hear no more. It is otherwise with the name of Christ. In the section 10-13<sup>10</sup> a distinct group of opponents are in view who arrogate the distinction Χριστοῦ εἶναι (10<sup>7</sup>). The final consideration of this movement must be deferred (see below, § 7). For our present purpose it is enough to dwell on the marked change of situation. In 1 Co indeed we trace the tendency to arraign (ἀνακρίνειν, 4<sup>14c</sup>) the apostle, and to question his apostolic rank (9<sup>14c</sup>). But it is disposed of briefly and quietly; it is not as in 2 Co the subject of a long and passionate indictment. The first (1-7) and last (10-13<sup>10</sup>) sections of the Epistle present somewhat different aspects of the case. In the former, we have references to 'the many who traffic in the word of God' (2<sup>17</sup>; cf. 4<sup>2</sup>); to 'certain, who need letters of introduction' to the Corinthians (3<sup>1</sup>); to imputations against the apostle of fleshly motives, of duplicity (1<sup>12</sup> 17 4<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>8</sup>). These imputations proceed, it would seem, from ἀπιστοί, men blinded by worldliness to the light of the gospel (4<sup>4</sup>), who yet, as we infer from 5<sup>16</sup>, lay great stress on having known Christ after the flesh. The last two points throw light on the purpose of such passages as 1<sup>19</sup> 2<sup>14-17</sup>, above all 3<sup>10-18</sup> 5<sup>14-21</sup>. The Judaizing tendencies faintly traceable in 1 Co have assumed a doctrinal character. Still, the polemic of these chapters is not direct; St. Paul assumes that his readers are with him; so far as they are concerned (εἰ τις ἐν Χριστῷ, contrast 13<sup>2b</sup> 6<sup>1</sup>) 'old things are passed away, and new things have come.' We seem to hear 'not the threatenings of a coming so much as the rumblings of a departing storm.' But when we turn to the concluding chapters (10-13<sup>10</sup>) the brightness and confidence of tone is gone. The features of the opposition of 1-7 are still there. St. Paul is charged with fleshly motives (10<sup>2</sup>), with lording it over the Church (10<sup>8</sup> 13<sup>10</sup>; cf. 1<sup>24</sup>), with deceit (11<sup>31</sup>). His opponents still come armed with letters of introduction (10<sup>12-18</sup>), they are—not now ἀπιστοί but—ministers of Satan, false apostles (11<sup>13-16</sup>); they preach another Jesus, another gospel (11<sup>4</sup>); they claim to be ministers of Christ, to be 'Christ's' (11<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>7</sup>; cf. 1 Co 1<sup>12</sup>). All the features of the opponents of 1-7 are here, but they are heightened, and the polemic against them is more painfully intense. Their accusations against St. Paul, too, are more direct and audacious,—embellishment (12<sup>16-18</sup>), bullying by letters (10<sup>10c</sup>) in contrast with weakness when face to face, reckless folly (11<sup>10</sup>), are imputed to him; if he refuses direct sustentation, it is because he knows he has no right to it, being no true apostle (11<sup>8</sup> 12<sup>11-18</sup>). But, worse than all, St. Paul is conscious that his readers are not with him; their loyalty is undermined. Their obedience is unfulfilled—'Ye look at the outside of things' (10<sup>6</sup> 7). They are in imminent peril of being corrupted, in fact they tolerate another gospel,—yes, gladly tolerate the yoke of 'the fools' who are tyrannizing over them (11<sup>1-4</sup> 18. 20); they accept the invidious construction put upon St. Paul's conduct, are prepared to doubt his love for them (11<sup>7-11</sup>; cf. 12<sup>16-18</sup>). They are wavering in faith, Christ can hardly be in them; St. Paul dreads to think of the impenitent state in which he will find them, dreads the humiliation which awaits him at Corinth, dreads the unsparring severity he will have to exercise (12<sup>10</sup>-13<sup>10</sup>),—his last hope is that the letter may pave the way to better things. Note that St. Paul is addressing the community as a whole throughout, not the Judaizing rivés, not a minority still under their influence; of this the chapters give no hint. Can the situation still be that of 1-7, or even that of 8. 9? There is some plausibility, prima facie, in the severance of 10-13<sup>10</sup> from the rest of the Epistle. But in any case the situation in these chapters is a new one as compared with that in 1 Co; and from its nature can hardly have been revealed to St. Paul by the arrival of Titus in Macedonia, for he brought news of quite a different kind (7<sup>13</sup>).

(f) St. Paul entertained, at different times, two distinct plans of travel. The simpler of the two is that announced in 1 Co 16<sup>5</sup>, and carried out Ac 20<sup>1</sup>, viz. from Ephesus to Macedonia and thence to Corinth. But from 2 Co 1<sup>10-16</sup> we learn that he had at one time entertained, but (v. 23 in order to spare the Corinthians) had abandoned, the more complicated plan of proceeding direct from Asia to Corinth, thence to Macedonia, and thence to Corinth again. This plan had been communicated to the Corinthians, at least in the form of a promise of a prompt visit. This is not satisfied by 1 Co 4<sup>16</sup>; for if so, the withdrawal would be announced in 1 Co 16<sup>5-6</sup>, a passage totally out of correspondence (v. 18) with the situation presupposed in 2 Co 1<sup>23</sup>. Moreover, in defending his change of plan (2 Co 1<sup>10-23</sup>), St. Paul would not have failed to appeal to the clear statement of his intentions in 1 Co 16<sup>5</sup>. The inference seems irresistible that the change of plan was subsequent to 1 Co, and that the

* It is well put by Dr. Mewlwyn Davies in Smith's DB, s.v. PAUL. It had been maintained by Bleek, Credner, Olshausen, Naander, Ewald; and is also adopted by Hilgenfeld, Weizsäcker, Jülicher, Golet, etc. Krenkel and Olemen suppose that the slander was directly aimed, not at St. Paul, but at a fellow-worker. See Schmiedel, Exe. on 2 Co 2<sup>11</sup>.

Complicated Plan was formed in consequence of something that had transpired after 1 Co was dispatched, and that further events caused St. Paul to fall back upon the original Simple Plan.

(g) We have now to take note of St. Paul's references to letters written by himself to Corinth. That there were three such is certain, viz. the two canonical letters, and the 'pre-canonical' or lost letter referred to in 1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>. But we have seen that the Complicated Plan of travel was communicated to the Corinthians after 1 Co; whether this was by letter or not, depends on the interpretation of 2 Co 12<sup>14</sup>. At any rate the promise of a direct visit was given in the confidence (πεποίθους, v. 15) of happy relations between the apostle and the Corinthians, and the promised visit was looked forward to as a 'joy' (χαρά). But something occurred to upset this confidence, and to demand that the visit, if paid, should be one of stern judgment. St. Paul decided 'to spare' them, and not to return to them in sorrow (2<sup>1</sup>). And this he had stated in a letter (2<sup>3-4</sup>), written in affliction and distress of heart and many tears,—a letter calculated to cause pain, and one which he for a time regretted having written (7<sup>28</sup>), but which, aided by the presence of Titus (supra, c. d), produced a happy revolution in the temper of the Corinthians. Two questions arise—(1) Did the letter announce the abandonment of the Complicated Plan, or did the latter merely follow tacitly by way of postponement? This depends on the sense of τοῦτο αὐτῷ (2<sup>3</sup>), which may merely mean 'for this very cause' (cf. 2 P 1<sup>5</sup>; Winer, III. § xxi. fin.). (2) Can this letter be our 1 Co? Certainly not, if, as we have argued, it arose out of a situation subsequent to that of 1 Co. But, quite independently of this, 1 Co is hardly a letter which St. Paul could even temporarily have repented writing. Stern passages it contains, but they are relieved by frequent encouragement, calm discussion, quiet practical advice; its emotional tension is not to be compared with that of 2 Co 10-13, or even 1-7; it does not correspond to the description 2 Co 2<sup>4</sup> (see White, p. 383). This is a vital point, but it seems hardly doubtful. The one strong counter-argument, the supposed identity of reference in 2 Co 2<sup>4</sup> and 1 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, has already been examined (d), and found to be of very dubious validity.

We must therefore insert a stern and highly painful letter between 1 and 2 Co; and if 2 Co 12<sup>14-15</sup> refers to a letter at all, it is certainly not to 1 Co, and still less to the painful letter just mentioned. St. Paul then, who in any case wrote not fewer than three, can be fairly proved to have written four, and may very probably have written five letters to the Corinthians, including our two canonical Epistles (cf. Clemen, Einheitl. p. 66; and see below, § 8).

(h) Lastly, we consider the references to his visits to Corinth. First of all, in 2 Co 12<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> he says, ἰδοὺ τρίτον τοῦτο ἐτοίμως ἔχω ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς . . . τρίτον τοῦτο ἐρχομαι πρὸς ὑμᾶς. Taken by themselves, these words would be held by anyone to establish two previous visits. And the more natural interpretation of 2<sup>1</sup> ἐκρίνα . . . τὸ μὴ πάλιν ἐν λύπῃ πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐλθεῖν, connects πάλιν with ἐν λύπῃ rather than with ἐλθεῖν. If so, a previous visit ἐν λύπῃ is implied; the attempt to explain this by 1 Co 2<sup>1</sup> ἐλθὼν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, is unworthy of serious discussion. We are therefore obliged to assume provisionally that, when the painful letter was written, St. Paul had visited Corinth twice, and the second time ἐν λύπῃ. Only if this assumption proves so improbable as to outweigh the more obvious sense of the passages just quoted, shall we be justified in throwing into the scale against them the δευτέρα χαρά of 1<sup>10</sup>, the ὡς παρὼν τὸ δευτερον of 13<sup>2</sup>. As a matter of fact, the assumption of a visit ἐν λύπῃ does encounter hopeless obstacles, whether we seek to place it before or after 1 Co.

Let us consider the latter possibility first. St. Paul abandoned his direct visit (i.e. the Complicated Plan) 'in order to spare' the Corinthians. This excludes at once from consideration the period between the painful letter and 2 Co. Let us suppose then that St. Paul, on receiving from Corinth unfavourable news (probably connected with the offender of 2<sup>7-12</sup>), after he had dispatched 1 Co, proceeded thither in person. If so, St. Paul, unsuccessful (12<sup>21</sup>) at Corinth, returns to Ephesus (still ἐν λύπῃ); receives better news; announces another immediate visit (i.e. the Complicated Plan) 'ἐν περιστάσει' (11<sup>3</sup>); another estrangement, connected again with the offender of 2<sup>7-12</sup>, breaks out; St. Paul writes again ἐν λύπῃ, and this time with more permanent success, which he at last learns from Titus in Macedonia. The improbability of this duplication of events condemns the entire hypothesis, and drives us back on the other alternative, that St. Paul's visit ἐν λύπῃ must have preceded 1 Co. But here we are encountered by the total ignorance of such a visit which that Epistle betrays. Not only is there 'not a single trace' of it (Weizsäcker, pp. 277, 300); we are compelled to ask, and ask in vain, to what, on this assumption, was the λύπη due? Not to the σχίσματα, of which St. Paul knew only from Chloe's people. Not to the σφοδρία nor to the disorders in their 'assembling together,' of which he knew only by report (5<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>). Not to the litigiousness (1 Co 6) nor to the denial of the Resurrection, of both of which he speaks with indignant surprise. If the distressing second visit preceded 1 Co, the λύπη which occasioned it was dead and buried when 1 Co was written, it had nothing to do with any of the subjects touched upon in 1 Co, and St. Paul's references to it in 2 Co are inexplicable.

In fact, the main ground on which Weizsäcker, Clemen, and others place it after 1 Co is the inadmissibility of placing it earlier; while Schmiedel follows Neander, Olshausen, Reuss, Wieseler, Meyer, Klöpfer, and many others in placing it earlier, because the attempt to find room for it later breaks down. He justly observes that in a complicated hypothesis we cannot expect to harmonize all details satisfactorily, but must be content with certainty where possible. But this may justify us in questioning the finality of the inferences drawn at first sight from 2 Co 2<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>.

Against the probability of either of the two hypotheses just discussed, we must weigh that of the interpretation of those verses adopted by Paley (Horae Paul.), Baur, de Wette, Renan, Hilgenfeld, Davidson, Farrar, and others, that by τρίτον τοῦτο ἐρχομαι St. Paul means 'this is the third time I am coming' (i.e. meaning to come), while 2<sup>1</sup> simply states his resolve that his new visit (πάλιν ἐλθεῖν) shall not be ἐν λύπῃ. This interpretation is at first sight of inferior probability to the more obvious sense of the words, but it harmonizes well with 13<sup>2</sup> (RVm) and with the οὐκέτι of 1<sup>22</sup> (RV; AV is against the idiom).

(i) Summary.—Timothy's visit, then, hardly enters into our problem; Titus visits Corinth three times, first (possibly as bearer of 1 Co) to organize the λογία, the second time to cope with the troubles there, thirdly as bearer of 2 Co, and to complete the λογία. The troubles at Corinth were mainly due to events subsequent to the situation of 1 Co, and the offender of 2 Co 2. 7 was more probably an offender against St. Paul, connected with the Judaizing party, than the incestuous person of 1 Co 5. The troubles, however, had taken root and hold in Corinth to a degree far beyond what is traceable in 1 Co. It is not altogether easy to combine the situation presupposed in 2 Co 10-13<sup>10</sup> with that in 2 Co 1-9; it is quite impossible to identify it with the situation of 1 Co. St. Paul, then, dispatched Titus to cope with new troubles at Corinth, the news of which had reached him after the dispatch of 1 Co, and had induced him to abandon an intended visit to Corinth, and to write a painful letter instead. To insert a visit of St. Paul to Corinth in connexion with this crisis is impossible, while the painful letter, and the abandonment of the δευτέρα χαρά, are so closely bound up with the visit ἐν λύπῃ, that the three must rest on a single basis of fact. If so, the visit ἐν λύπῃ was a visit abandoned, not one actually paid. Still less can we find a probable place for a second visit anterior to 1 Co and connected with a painful crisis not dealt with in that Epistle. Accordingly, as the language of 2 Co is susceptible of a different though perhaps less prepossessing explanation, we remove the intermediate visit from the horizon of either Epistle.

5. (a) A too simple scheme impossible.—We are now in a position to reconstruct the order of events from the evidence. The simpler such an order, the fewer the events assumed, the better; but we must not be tempted by this consideration to force the phenomena to combine where they do not naturally do so.

Let us begin by trying the combination suggested in art. CORINTH, which is in substance that of Bishop Lightfoot (Bibl. Essays, p. 282 ff.). The order of events suggested is—1. Paul at Corinth (A.D. 51?). 2. Apollos at Corinth (52-53?). 3. Paul at Ephesus (53-56). [Here Lightfoot inserts the second visit of Paul to Corinth.] 4. Lost letter of 1 Co 5<sup>9</sup> [‘announcing the plan of 2 Co 1<sup>10</sup>’ Lightfoot]. 5. [‘Possible, but not proved’] Second visit of Paul to Cor. 6. Stephanas, etc., to Ephesus (1 Co 16<sup>17-18</sup>). (Letter of the Corinthians.) 8. Dispatch by Titus of 1 Co [‘with the brother, 2 Co 12<sup>18</sup>’ Lightfoot.]; or 9. Titus sent close after 1 Co. 10. Titus returns to Macedonia (2 Co 7<sup>9</sup>). 11. Titus and the brother (2 Co 12<sup>18</sup> or 8<sup>18</sup>?) sent back, with 2 Co, to Corinth.

The schemes of Waite (in Speaker's Comm.) and of Weiss (most recently in die Paul. Briefe, 1896, pp. 9, 10) are in substantial agreement with the above, but Waite inserts the painful letter after 8. The arguments against the view taken below are best put by Holtzmann, Einl.<sup>2</sup> p. 254 f.

To begin with, we must insert here, before 6, the arrival at Ephesus of οὐ λόγος (1 Co 1<sup>10</sup>). But more important is the need for further links between 8 and 10. It seems, indeed, needless to distinguish 9 from 8. But between the mission of Titus (possibly as one of the bearers of 1 Co) to begin the organization (2 Co 8<sup>6, 10</sup>) of the λογία, and his mission (v. 6) to complete it, i.e. the dispatch of 2 Co, many events, as we have seen, demand room. The ἀδίκημα of 2 Co 2<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>12</sup>, almost certainly; a visit of Titus in connexion therewith (2 Co 7<sup>9</sup>), quite certainly; and a letter, not corresponding in its character (sup. § 4, g) with 1 Co, probably carried by Titus on the same occasion. Titus, then, had returned to Ephesus before that; and since St. Paul, though he eventually carried out the plan of travel announced 1 Co 16<sup>8</sup>, yet has to defend himself from the charge of fickleness with respect to his plans, we must find room for his adoption of the plan of two visits to Corinth, for the announcement of this, and for its abandonment. If the latter coincides, as we have shown to be probable, with the painful letter, we have to insert the first change of plan between 8 and the return of Titus to Ephesus.

(b) Resultant scheme.—We therefore revise the scheme as follows: 1-8 (as above). 9 or 10. St. Paul determines to pay a double visit to Corinth (δευτέρα χαρά, 2 Co 1<sup>10</sup>). 11. Painful news from Corinth (possibly brought back by Titus) changes this plan; the δευτέρα χαρά given up, the visit—now painful in prospect—abandoned; and 12. A painfully severe letter sent. 13. Titus at Corinth (2 Co 7<sup>7-10</sup>), with happy results. 14. Titus meets St. Paul in Macedonia; and 15. Returns to Corinth with 2 Co.

6. The above seems to be the simplest scheme that permits the insertion of all the events implied in 2 Co. (For a comparison of the views of different critics, see Schmiedel's Table in Hand-Kommentar, pp. xii, xiii). It remains to consider the interval of time required between the letters 1 and 2 Co.

We have to provide time for Titus making one double journey between Ephesus and Corinth, a second journey to Corinth, and a return journey as far as, say, Philippi. And, assuming the correctness of the view taken above (§ 4, b) as to the connexion of the first journey with the λογία, we have so to place the journeys that, in dispatching Titus for the third time (§ 5: 15), Paul could speak of his first visit (§ 5: 8, 9) as having taken place

‘last year’ (ἐν τῇ ῥησιν, 2 Co 8<sup>6, 10</sup> 9<sup>2</sup>). This latter condition is elastic; it only implies in strictness that the beginning of a new year had intervened; and the interval between the two letters is so far left open within somewhat wide limits. The movements of Titus, however, require a considerable minimum of time. As 1 Co was likely to reach Corinth before Timothy, who was on his way through Macedonia, it was probably dispatched (8) by sea direct. This was possible at any time after Mar. 5, when the mare clausum properly ended. ‘The voyage was often accomplished in three or four days’ (Con. and Howson, ch. xii. p. 449 n.; for full details see Schmiedel in HK xvi. 3a); let us allow seven. Titus may, but need not, have returned (11) by Macedonia. This route would require, with rapid travelling, about a month; let us allow six weeks. Another week will then be claimed by the second journey (12) to Corinth, and four weeks, let us suppose, for Titus at last to meet St. Paul in Macedonia (14). We thus require at most 12 weeks for the actual journeys of Titus; and for his two visits (8, 13) to Corinth, in default of any statement as to their duration, we should allow about four weeks in all as a minimum. Accordingly we require 16 weeks for the movements of Titus, allowing him but little repose.

But St. Paul (assuming the year to be 57) must have reached Corinth by the end of November (Ac 20<sup>8</sup> 9), and this pushes back the dispatch (15) of 2 Co into the month of October. Now the new year, according to the Macedonian calendar, began on Sept. 21, and the civil reckoning of the Jews (1 Tisri) coincided within a few days. St. Paul, therefore, could easily speak of the first mission of Titus (8) as ‘last year’. From the beginning of October (which we adopt in order to deal liberally with the time) the 20 weeks carry us back to the midsummer solstice, or over three weeks after Pentecost (May 28). These three weeks then are at our disposal as spare time. To these we add the time between Pentecost and the previous (1 Co 16<sup>10</sup>) dispatch of 1 Co (8); to this interval we cannot assign a definite value, unless (following a possible suggestion from 1 Co 6) we place 1 Co about the paschal season. If so, there is time for Titus to rejoin St. Paul (11) at Eph., even if he returned through Macedonia; but there is no strong reason to suppose that he did not return, as he probably went, by sea (sup. § 4, a, cf. b).

There is thus no impossibility in the view taken by the majority of critics, that 2 Co was written in the autumn of the Roman year, in the spring of which the apostle had written 1 Co. The separation of the two Epistles by a longer interval is not, indeed, forbidden by their contents; but the necessity of finding a place here for an evangelization of Illyricum (Godet, Clemen), in order to satisfy Ro 15<sup>10</sup>, is not so apparent as to claim a voice in the settlement of our question. 1 Co 16<sup>8</sup> is prima facie evidence that St. Paul's three months at Corinth belong to the winter next following that Epistle; nor are his changes of plan revealed in 2 Co such as to affect the broad outline. At the same time, the question as to the interval between the two Epistles must be finally decided, if at all, by reference to the general chronology of St. Paul's Epistles (see on 1 Cor. § 6, and art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT); always recollecting that the two must, by 2 Co 8<sup>10</sup> 9<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>16</sup> (assuming the integrity of 2 Co 1-9, see below, § 8), fall within two successive calendar years.

7. The purpose of the Epistle follows from the circumstances of its origin. The effect of 1 Co had been, it would seem, good at first. Titus had begun actively the organization of the λογία (2 Co 8<sup>6</sup> 9<sup>2</sup>) in a spirit to the purity of which the apostle appeals as a fact above question (the exact force of 2 Co 12<sup>18</sup> is often overlooked, e.g. by Clemen). Titus had needed encouragement (παρεκάλεισα), and St. Paul had given this in the form of a warm recommendation of the Corinthians (7<sup>14</sup>), which was fully justified only after serious disappointments. Meanwhile, apparently, St. Paul was incurring the danger at Ephesus described 1<sup>8</sup> (cf. Ro 16<sup>1</sup> [?], Ac 19<sup>23ff.</sup> [?]) of which he characteristically first informs the Corinthians when the worst of the crisis at Corinth is over. St. Paul had formed the plan of visiting Corinth earlier than he had intended (§ 4, f), when the return of Titus with bad news of a quite unlooked-for character convinced him that such a visit would be most painful to both sides. Hence the painful letter, again dispatched by Titus, and the reversion to the Simple Plan of 1 Co 16<sup>8</sup>. This was before the apostle's departure from Ephesus; and the period immediately succeeding, during which St. Paul moved first to Troas (2<sup>12, 13</sup>) and then on to Macedonia, anxiously awaiting the return of Titus to put an end to his suspense, is the time of intense mental strain of which our Epistle is the outcome. The relief expressed in 1-7 finds its outlet along with much of the pent-up indignation and self-vindication (10-13) which had been all the while accumulating in the apostle's mind. The main purpose of the Epistle, then, turns upon the new troubles at Corinth, which differentiate our Epistle from 1 Co. These have been touched upon above (§ 4, c), but require a little further examination in this connexion.

The difference between the new troubles at Corinth and those connected with the 'Christ-party' of 1 Co is one of degree, not of kind. But the difference of degree is very great, and is probably due to the arrival of a fresh agitator (10<sup>10</sup> ἄνθρωπος) or fresh agitators (10<sup>12</sup> 11<sup>4</sup>) on the scene. Can we identify them with any closeness? The ἑπὶ τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν of 11<sup>4</sup> links them on to the agitators of Gal 16. At Corinth, this is rather in prospect than actually preached; but 11<sup>22</sup> shows that we have to do with Christians of Jewish birth. Were they personal disciples of Christ? (10<sup>7</sup>, cf. 11<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>12</sup>). This is matter for conjecture rather than proof. The original Twelve seem to be referred to in the twice-recurring phrase ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ κυρίου (11<sup>18</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>); but to suppose that any of the Twelve were personally concerned is out of the question, St. Paul would not in that case have stigmatized them as ψευδοστόλοι, etc. (11<sup>13</sup>). But did the agitators claim to represent the Twelve, to whose superior authority they certainly made appeal? In this connexion, the Letters of Introduction (31, cf. Ro 16<sup>1</sup>) are of importance. As the ἡ ὑμῶν of 31 is meant rather to point the contrast with 33 than to positively describe the πιστῆς, we must understand that the claims of the letter were backed by these letters. These claims would have lost all their danger and prestige had not the letters come from some well-known names. That the agitators used letters of merely personal commendation for purposes beyond the scope of such letters is, of course, possible (Gal 212, Ac 161.21). At any rate St. Paul ignores any real connexion between the agitators and the Twelve. In loyal conformity to his side of the Jerusalem agreement (Gal 210) he pushes forward the λογισμὸς (cf. 911-16 with Ro 15<sup>10</sup>), in the assurance that his uncompromising warfare against the agitators will in no way compromise his relation with the older apostles. Chapters 8, 9 therefore stand in a close relation to the main purpose of the Epistle. The first seven chapters, with their suggestive passages on the relation of the Law to the Gospel, their profound glances into the doctrine of Redemption, also lead up to the same principal purpose (sup. § 3). Whether the ἄλλας ἰστορίας of 11<sup>4</sup> (cf. 612 11<sup>19</sup>) refers to a lower view of the Person of Christ, cannot be regarded as certain. Unquestionably, the question of Christology underlies the question of Law and Grace, of Faith and Works; but this fundamental issue is felt rather than perceived in the NT as a rule. At any rate it was necessary to throw aside all thoughts of compromise, and to endeavour to stamp out from Corinth a movement which had fair to result in complete apostasy (11<sup>3</sup>). Hence the peculiar transition in the Epistle from thankful reconciliation (1-7) to bitter polemic (10-13), the alternating tones of endearment and rebuke, first the appeal to the higher, then the withering exposure of the lower tendencies at work among the Corinthians.

8. We must now, accordingly, endeavour to reach a result with regard to the Integrity of the Epistle. We have seen that the canonical Epp. to the Corinthians are the remains of a correspondence which comprised other letters now lost (§ 4, g), and that possibly not fewer than three lost letters were addressed by St. Paul to the Corinthians. The temptation to rediscover all or part of these in our extant letters, coupled with undeniable difficulties in their sequence of ideas (cf. § 4, c), has naturally been strong. Clemen (whose Einheitlichkeit der Paul. Briefe, 1894, contains the most searching and acute of recent essays in this direction) has relidivided our Epistles into five (see 1 CORINTHIANS, § 6), thus providing wholly or in part for each letter of St. Paul to the Corinthians of which we have any trace whatever. As affecting 1 Co, his result consists merely in the relegation to the lost letter of 1 Co 5<sup>9</sup> of certain passages in chs. 3. 7. 9. 14, where the connexion is difficult, and of the whole of 15 (except the rejected v. <sup>60</sup>). We venture to think that a little more patience, or exegetical penetration, might have very greatly reduced the compass of these fragments. But with regard to 2 Co the difficulties are more serious. They fall into three main heads—(1) The interjected warning (see below, § 9, A 2, b β) 6<sup>14</sup>-7<sup>1</sup>. The direct continuity of 6<sup>18</sup> 7<sup>2</sup> is too obvious to be mistaken; the interjected appeal simply breaks the connexion. Accordingly Clemen, following Hilgenfeld and others, refers it to the lost letter of 1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>, while many other critics (see Heinrici, Das zweite SS. u.s.w. pp. 329-334) agree that it is out of place here. It must be allowed that if this is the case, the insertion was made at a date prior to the first circulation of the Epistle, for textual tradition of any kind is totally silent as to it. Whether this objection is fatal in limine will be considered at the close of this section. Waiving it for the present, the question becomes one (a) of exegesis, which on the whole has hitherto failed to find a clear line of connexion with the context before or after; and (b) of the general analogy of St. Paul's style, and of this Epistle especially. True, 'there is no literary work in which the cross-currents are so violent and so frequent'; but there is no other 'cross-current' in the Epistle which cuts with so clean an edge as this. On the whole, if we may assume an interpolation at all without textual evidence, this is perhaps dignus vindice nodus. Whether, if out of place here, the section is part of the letter of 1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>, is not so clear; the juncture of 6<sup>14</sup> does not fit so exactly with 1 Co 5<sup>10</sup> as to preclude all doubt. To reject the passage as un-Pauline (Holsten, etc.) is quite arbitrary. (See the discussions of Whitelaw, Chase, and Sanday in Class. Review, 1890, pp. 12, 150, 248, 317, 359; Schmiedel's Exc. in loc.; Clemen, Einh. 58 f.)

(2) Chapters 8 and 9.—All allow chapter 8 to remain part of our (the 'Fifth') Epistle, but chapter 9 is thrown back to the 'Third.' This divorce, in which Clemen follows Semler and a long series of later critics, is mainly on grounds which are more suitable for discussion in a commentary (see Waite in loc.). That chs. 8 and 9, especially in view of 9<sup>1</sup> (γάμ), are impossible in one and the same letter, is an assumption founded, surely, upon a somewhat narrow view of St. Paul's logic.

(3) The great invective, or 'Vierkapitelbrief.'—The main grounds for relegating this to a different Epistle are given above (§ 4, c). If they have any validity they make for its identification with the 'Fourth' or Painful Letter (§ 4, g). This is the view of Hausrath (Vierkapitelbrief, 1870) and of Schmiedel (in Ersch and Gruber, and in Hund-Kommentar). The arguments are not easy to meet directly—they are not indeed conclusive; we know less of the circumstances than did St. Paul's readers (cf. Jülicher, Einleit. § 7; Weizsäcker, Apost. Zeitalter, 314-316). The difficulty is that in 1-9 the Corinthians are reconciled, whereas in 10-13 they are still in a state of hostility, or at best of dubious fidelity. That the apostle is addressing a section only of the Corinthians is against all the evidence. That after the good news brought by Titus, some worse news again arrived to change the apostle's tone, is unproved and improbable. The opening of chapter 10, αὐτὸς δὲ ἐγὼ ἡδύς, is of importance as bearing on the question. Assuming that the words mark, not the beginning of an interpolated document, but the opening of a new section in the letter, they indicate some change of treatment. Possibly, St. Paul may have sent Timothy (1<sup>1</sup>) away and begun to write, either by his own hand or by a confidential amanuensis, words that had been maturing in his mind (§ 7) in the period of suspense before the arrival of Titus, and which not even the good news brought by Titus could persuade him to leave unwritten. If this view be correct, we can, with Weizsäcker and others, regard these chapters as the final assault, prepared for in the whole previous course of the letter, which is decisively to secure for the apostle the allegiance of the Corinthians, and to drive the interlopers (11<sup>4</sup>), who had gained a partial hold over them, headlong from the field. The Corinthians are already won 'in part' (1<sup>14</sup>), but a leaven of disloyalty exists among them, and the success reported by Titus must be followed up to be lasting, and the disloyal leaven effectually stamped out. Add to this that the identification of these chapters with the Painful Letter (§ 4, g) would seem to demand that they should refer to the (ex hypothesi) still unsettled case of the Offender (chs. 2, 7). But no such reference can be traced; the argument for separating 10-13 from the rest of the Epistle thus loses a very strong positive factor. On the whole, then, as regards internal evidence, we may say that the case for separation is not proved; but it would be going too far to say that it is absolutely disproved. Whether this is so or not must depend on the weight to be attached to the entire lack of external evidence. Can we suppose that interpolations so serious as to amount (if we accept all the three hypotheses discussed above) to the formation of an entire Epistle out of heterogeneous fragments—or even the interpolation of any one of the passages in question—can have taken place without leaving so much as a ripple upon the stream of textual tradition? Certainly, there exist 'primitive corruptions' of the NT text, i.e. changes which occurred so early that the original text has left no documentary traces of itself. But these are small in number and in scale. 'We cannot too strongly express our disbelief in the existence of undetected interpolations of any moment' (Westcott and Hort). The strongest internal evidence might conceivably modify this in an exceptional case; only our witnesses to the text push its history back so very early as to leave very scanty room for the occurrence of such interpolations. But the literary relations of the synoptic Gospels furnish an analogy which warns us against too summary a rejection of any such hypothesis in this case. The question is whether the Second Epistle to the Corinthians passed into general circulation as soon as the first. The latter, formally appealed to within forty years of its origin, was circulated too early to permit us to assume interpolations in it on any large scale unreflected in the textual tradition. But Clement appears to know nothing of 2 Co, and its comparatively late appearance in the stream of attestation (see above, § 1) is perhaps compatible with some process of editing on the part of the Corinthian Church before it was copied for public reading and imparted to other Churches. This would be easier to suppose, if the autographs were written on leaves or tablets rather than on rolls. (See Sir E. M. Thompson, Handbook of Palaeography, pp. 20 ff., 54-61.) We do not therefore regard the absence of textual evidence in this particular case as absolutely fatal in limine to the hypotheses we have been considering; but it must be allowed to weigh heavily against them; and we believe that a patient and circumspect exegesis will gradually dissolve the arguments, at first sight very tempting, for the segregation of chs. 10-13, and even perhaps of 6<sup>14-7<sup>1</sup></sup>.

9. Contents of the Epistle.—The nature of the Letter (§§ 3, 7) makes it far less readily divisible into well-marked sections than the first Epistle. The order of ideas is emotional rather than logical; a subject is not taken up, dealt with, and disposed of, but, like some strain in a piece of impassioned music, occurs, is lost in a maze of crowding harmonies, and recurs again and again. This is especially the case in chs. 10-13. But certain broad lines of division may be recognized, and we shall exhibit these, without pursuing the analysis into its subtler subdivisions.

10. IMPORTANCE OF THE EPISTLE.—The Epistle is far less various in its contents than 1 Co, and throws correspondingly less direct light on the theology of St. Paul and on the life of the apostolic Church. All the more important is its contribution to our personal knowledge of St. Paul. The most important biographical material is supplied in 11<sup>23-28</sup>. Some of the details (v. 28) are not easy to fit into the otherwise known life of the apostle; but this is only what one would expect from a genuine source. The notice of ARETAS is exceptionally important for chronological reasons. Whether the same can be said of 12<sup>2</sup> (see Clement's view, referred to in 1 CORINTHIANS, § 6) may be doubted. The attempts to identify the vision with any point of contact in Ac have been various and precarious. The apostle's καύχημα (1 Co 9<sup>1st</sup>), of taking no sustenance from the Corinthians, is more fully elucidated 2 Co 11<sup>7-13</sup> 12<sup>13st</sup>. Of a more personal kind are the notices of the apostle's miracles 12<sup>12</sup>; of the much-debated σκόλοψ τῇ σαρκί (12<sup>7</sup>) (see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 183 ff.; Lias, p. xxiv; Ramsay, Ch. in Rom. Emp., pp. 62-68; St. Paul<sup>1</sup>, p. 94 f.), and the references to St. Paul's comparative inferiority as a speaker (11<sup>6</sup> 10<sup>10</sup>) and lack of commanding presence (Plummer in DB, p. 658*; Ramsay, CRB<sup>2</sup>, p. 30 f.). But the interest of such details is far transcended by the Epistle's revelation of the writer's personality. To draw out this in detail is superfluous; let it suffice to say that to this Epistle, more than to any other, we owe our knowledge of the true 'pectus Paulinum,'—our intimacy with the apostle's inmost self. From this point of view it takes its place side by side with 1 Co as the most pastoral of all Epistles. 'What an admirable Epistle is the second to the Corinthians! how full of affections! he joys and he is sorry, he grieves and he glories; never was there such care of a flock expressed, save in the great Shepherd of the Fold, who first shed tears over Jerusalem, and afterwards blood' (George Herbert; cf. Lightfoot, Galatians, pp. 44, 51). The doctrinal interest of the Epistle must be very briefly indicated. The eschatology of 4<sup>10-5<sup>8</sup></sup> is difficult, and involves at any rate a less confident expectation of living until the return of Christ than is expressed 1 Co 15<sup>51</sup> (for a very accurate exegesis of the passage see Waite in loc.). The contrast of the spirit and letter (3<sup>6-18</sup>) leads to the difficult passage 3<sup>17-18</sup>, apparently identifying the 'Lord' with the 'Spirit,' a thought with a long sequel in the history of theology (see Gebhardt and Harnack on Herm. Sim. v. 2; Swete in Dict. Chr. Biog. iii. 115; Bull, Def. Fid. Nic. i. ii. 5, ii. ii. 3; Harnack, Dogmengesch. 494 n.; Athan. de Syn. 27 [Anath. 21]); and so to the Christology of St. Paul, which receives striking sidelights from the Epistle. The glory of the exalted Christ is the dominant thought of 3<sup>18-4<sup>6</sup></sup>, a glory which shines upon and transforms (Ac 9<sup>34</sup>) the Christian, constituting in the life of grace a foretaste of the life of glory (v. 18, see Ro 6<sup>9-11</sup> 8<sup>10</sup> 21-23 etc.). The doctrine of renovation (5<sup>17</sup>) and of the Christian life (47-55) thus rests upon the agency of a living Christ as the sustaining force; but there is presupposed, as the fountainhead of union with Christ, forgiveness of sin (3<sup>6</sup>), founded on the reconciling work of the Sinless (5<sup>21</sup>) Christ (5<sup>15</sup>, 18<sup>28</sup>). The last-mentioned passage is a most important contribution to St. Paul's soteriology. In 8<sup>3</sup> the thought of Ph 2<sup>6</sup> is anticipated. The concluding verse of the Epistle is not a doctrinal announcement of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, but may fairly be combined with other passages in which that doctrine is implicit.

We do not directly know the effect this Epistle produced at Corinth; but from the fact that St. Paul's promised visit was carried out, and that our two Epistles were treasured up at Corinth and thence eventually found their way into the Church's canon, we infer that the Epistle produced the effect of which such a letter was worthy.

11. APOCRYPHAL CORRESPONDENCE OF ST. PAUL AND THE CORINTHIANS.—A letter of the Corinthian Church to St. Paul, and a reply by the apostle, formed part of the NT of the Syrian Church in the time of Aphraates and Ephraim. From the Syrian Church the letters passed over into the Armenian, which retained them to a late date (they are still quoted by a writer of the 7th cent.). The Corinthians ask St. Paul to condemn certain false teachers who have appeared among them, and the apostle duly replies. Ephraim, in his commentary on St. Paul (given in Zahn, Gesch. d. N.T. K. ii. 595 ff.), already noticed that the false doctrine is that taught by the school of Bardesanes, who lived from A.D. 155 to 223. The letters are accordingly in all probability a product of the 3rd cent., and directed against the school in question. They were first made known in Europe by Usher, 1644, (Sylloge Annotat. p. 29), from an imperfect Arm. MS; then in 1736 Whiston published a Gr. and Lat. transl. from a complete MS. The Arm. text was printed by Zohrab in 1805. The commentary of Ephraim on St. Paul (where our Epp. follow 2 Co) was printed from an Arm. MS of A.D. 999 at Venice in 1836. At last, in 1890, Berger discovered at Milan a Latin MS of the Bible ('saec. x. ut videtur') containing our two Epp. (after He), and a second Lat. MS (saec. xiii.) has been discovered at Laon by Bratke, where the Epp. come after the Apoc. and Cath. Epp. The text of the Milan MS is given in ThL, 1892, p. 7 ff., that of the Laon MS in the same volume, p. 586 ff. The existence in a Latin version of letters known only to Syrian and Armenian tradition, and which have left no trace in Greek Christian literature, is not as yet explained. See Harnack, Gesch. d. altchrist. Lit. i. 37 ff.; Carrière et Berger, Corresp. Apocr. de S. P. et des Corinthiens, 1891; Vetter, D. apokr. 3 Korinther-brief (Tüb.), 1894; also in Th. Quartalschrift (1895) iv.; Zahn (ubi sup.), maintains that the correspondence comes from the lost Acta Pauli, PRE<sup>2</sup> xi. 378; Jülicher in ThL, 1889, p. 164.

pp. 43-111. Other works as quoted in the body of the above article. A. ROBERTSON.

CORMORANT is the rendering of AV for two Heb. words, נָקָר kā'ath (see PELICAN), and שָׂדֵלָק shālāk, karapākrys, mergulus.

Shālāk occurs only in the list of unclean birds (Lv 11<sup>17</sup>, Dt 14<sup>17</sup>), with no context to assist in determining its meaning except its association with kā'ath. From its etymology it should be a plunging bird. The difficulty of identifying it is enhanced by the uncertainty of the meaning of the LXX rendering karapākrys, which is also a plunging bird. Tristram is inclined to the rendering of AV, which is also that of RV, saying that the cormorant, Phalacrocorax carbo, is common along the coast, coming up the Kishon, and visiting the Sea of Galilee. It is likewise abundant along the Jordan. G. E. POST.

CORN.—In Jn 12<sup>24</sup> 'a corn of wheat,' we have a solitary instance of 'corn' used for a particle. The AV went back for it to Wyclif, intermediate versions having 'the wheat corn,' except Rheims, 'the grain of wheat,' which RV ('a grain of wheat') adopts. It is the earliest meaning of the word 'corn.' Cf. Jewel, On Thess. (1611), 'We must understand this authority with a corn of salt (cum grano salis), otherwise it may bee vnsauorie'; and Hall (1656), Occas. Med. 11, 'He, that cannot make one spire of grass, or corn of sand, will yet be framing of worlds.' The Gr. is κόκκος, everywhere else tr<sup>d</sup> 'grain.' J. HASTINGS.

CORN (נֶאֱמָר dāgan, otros, fruges).—The generic (?) name for the cereal grains. Those cultivated in Bible lands are: Wheat, חֵטָה hittāh, the same as the Arab. hittāh. The Arab., with its usual wealth of names for familiar objects, has also burr and kōmāh for wheat. Barley, שְׂעִיר sē'irāh. The Arab. for this grain is shu'ir. Vetch, נֶקֶט kusse-meth, called in AV (Ex 9<sup>32</sup>, Is 28<sup>26</sup>) rye, (Ezk 4<sup>9</sup>) fitches. The kirsennēh of the Arab. is a modified form, with n substituted for m, and r inserted. This grain is Vicia Ervilia, L. It is extensively cultivated in the East. Fitches, קֶזַח kezah (Is 28<sup>26, 27</sup>), the seeds of the nutmeg flower, Nigella arvensis, L., which is known in the E. as el-habbat es-saudā, the black seed, or habbat el-barakat, the seed of blessing. This seed, which has carminative properties, is sprinkled on the top of loaves of bread. Millet, דָּחָן dōhan (Ezk 4<sup>9</sup>), which is the same as the Arab. dukhn, Panicum miliaceum, L., also Milium Italicum, L. Beans, בֶּל pōl, Arab. fāl. Lentils, אֲדָשִׁים 'adāshim, Arab. 'adas. Pulse, זֵרֹ'ים zērō'im (Dn 1<sup>2, 10</sup>), seeds, probably refers to edible seeds in general, corresponding to the Arab. kutniyah, plur. kaṭāni, which includes not only the leguminous seeds which we know as pulse, but millet, etc.; but excludes wheat. Rye, as above stated, is an incorrect rendering for vetch, and is not otherwise mentioned in Scripture, nor cultivated in the Holy Land. Oats, also, are not mentioned nor cultivated.

Corn of all kinds is carried in sheaves from the harvest-fields on asses, mules, horses, or camels. It is threshed by the nauraj or mauraj (Heb. mōrag), and winnowed, and stored in earthen, barrel-shaped receptacles or oblong bins in the houses (2 S 4<sup>9</sup>), or in pits under the floor (2 S 17<sup>19</sup>), or in store-houses (2 Ch 32<sup>28</sup>). It is now often stored in underground chambers, with domed roofs, at the top of which is an opening to introduce the corn and remove it. These chambers, contrary to what might be expected, are dry and free from vermin. They are sometimes excavated in the rock, at other times in a sort of soft marl called huw-wārah.

The corn is liable to mildew, ἡ γέρακον (the equivalent of the Arab. gerakān, which means jaundice), and blasting, ἡ σιδδρόφον (1 K 8<sup>27</sup>), caused by the hot and withering east wind (Hos 13<sup>4</sup>, Jon 4<sup>8</sup>). When the corn was burned by carelessness, restitution was enjoined (Ex 22<sup>5</sup>). Also if the corn land was made pasture ground for flocks other than those of the owners of the land (Ex 22<sup>5</sup>).

Palestine exported corn in Solomon's time (2 Ch 21<sup>10, 15</sup>) and in Ezekiel's (Ezk 27<sup>17</sup>). Even now it exports some corn, although its imports of grain exceed its exports. See further under BARLEY, WHEAT, etc. G. E. POST.

CORNELIUS (Κορνήλιος).—A centurion in the garrison of Caesarea (Ac 10<sup>1</sup>). He was probably an Italian, the Italian Cohort (cf. Blass ad loc.), being so named to distinguish it from companies locally enrolled, while his name is pure Roman, having been borne by the Scipios and Sulla. In Ac 10 he flits across the line of apostolic history, being brought, in consequence of a series of mutually supplementary visions, into contact with St. Peter, and admitted by baptism into the Church. According to a later tradition he founded a church at Caesarea, while another legend makes him bishop of Seamiandros. The baptism of C. has generally been regarded as the first step in the admission of the uncircumcised into the Church; but before this can be definitely maintained, we should have to assume that the events related in Ac 8-11 are narrated chronologically. The eunuch's baptism by Philip (8<sup>28</sup>), that of C. by St. Peter (10<sup>48</sup>), and the admission of the Greeks (RV) at Antioch (11<sup>20</sup>), may all have occurred coincidentally, or in any order; the events are dovetailed into each other without any necessary implication of historical sequence. There is no evidence that the eunuch was circumcised, though he was probably a proselyte of the wider class (proselytes of the Gate); while the Greeks at Antioch may also have belonged to this class. But C., too, is described as φοβούμενος τὸν θεόν, the regular phrase in Ac for such proselytes (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 43), though Renan (The Apostles, ch. xi.) says he was not a proselyte in any degree whatever. Now, if C. was a proselyte, the question regarding the admission of the unmitigated heathen still remained, since the apostles could hardly wish to make the door of the Church narrower than that of the Synagogue. Some have therefore conjectured that St. Peter simply gave C. a standing in the Church similar to that which he had in the Synagogue (see Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i. 103 f.); others, that his case was passed as an exceptional one (Ramsay). St. Peter, however, according to Ac 11<sup>36</sup>, uses it as a true precedent, though, had it been accepted as such, what was the purpose of the subsequent Council at Jerusalem (Ac 15)? Arguing from this, and from the fact that St. Peter was blamed, not for admitting the Gentiles, but for eating with them, Pfleiderer (Urchristentum, Apostelgeschichte) holds that the case of C. is given to show the cessation of ceremonial exclusiveness from the Jewish standpoint. But if so, it is strange to find St. Peter later on (Gal 2<sup>14</sup>) hesitating about this very point. On the whole, it is a priori unlikely that a terse writer like St. Luke would have bestowed such pains upon anything but a matter of prime importance, which the relaxing of Jewish exclusiveness could hardly have appeared to him—a Gentile—to be. We may, therefore, most safely infer that he looked on the baptism of C. as an all-important step in the admission of the Gentiles, while a long advance still remained to be made. A. GRIEVE.

CORNER.—See AGRICULTURE.

CORNER-STONE (in Job 38<sup>6</sup> קֹרֶן יָזַק, λίθος γωνιαίος, in Jer 51 (Gr. 28) קֹרֶן יָזַק, λίθος ἐκς γωνίας).—The corner-stones of important buildings, such as palaces or temples, were sometimes of an exceedingly ornate and costly description, and of extraordinary dimensions. With the view of giving greater strength to the two walls which they connected, they were generally arranged lengthways and endways alternately, or a single angular stone might be inserted at the corner (Layard, Nin. ii. 254).

There are two passages in the OT where corner-stones are spoken of, which are of primary importance because of the use made of them in the NT. These are Is 28<sup>16</sup> 'Behold I lay in Zion,' etc., and Ps 118<sup>22</sup> 'The stone which the builders rejected,' etc. The first is quoted in 1 P 2<sup>6</sup> and underlies Eph 2<sup>20</sup>, in both of which λίθος ἀκρογωνιαίος represents קֹרֶן יָזַק of Is 28<sup>16</sup>. (On the unusual construction of the latter verse see Davidson's Heb. Syntax, p. 37.) The second is quoted in Mt 21<sup>42</sup>, Mk 12<sup>10</sup>, Lk 20<sup>17</sup>, Ac 4<sup>11</sup>, and 1 P 2<sup>7</sup>. Here instead of קֹרֶן יָזַק we find קֹרֶן עֹזֵר, answering to κεφαλὴ γωνίας, 'head of the corner.' In Ps 144<sup>12</sup> a different word occurs, רִיחַ (Syr. ܕܠܥܝܢܐ), which in Zec 9<sup>15</sup> is applied to the corners of the altar. It is doubtful whether in the above psalm corner-stones (accepted by both AV and RV) is the correct rendering. The Sept. has simply κεκαλλωπισμένοι, Aq. ὡς ἐπιγώνια, Symm. ὡς γωνίαὶ λεκοσμημένα, Vulg. quasi anguli. Gesenius understands the word of 'corner-columns beautifully carved,' or of Caryatides. Kautzsch, who in all the other OT passages offers the rendering Eckstein, has here Ecksaulen. In all the NT passages Weizsäcker gives Eckstein, rightly treating 'corner-stone' and 'head of the corner' as synonymous expressions.

As to Is 28<sup>16</sup>, Driver (Isaiah, p. 52) finds in the prophet's language an allusion to the huge and costly foundation stones of the temple (1 K 5<sup>7</sup>), the prominent thought of the passage being that of the permanent element in Zion (the theocracy or the Davidic dynasty). It is easy to understand St. Peter's application of the words. (Cf. Delitzsch, Isaiah, new ed. vol. ii. p. 9.) Similarly, the expressions used of Israel in Ps 118<sup>22</sup> were readily transferred to Christ. The figure of Eph 2<sup>20</sup> is well explained by Grimm (Clavis, s. ἀκρογωνιαίος). As the corner-stone is inserted at the angle of a building, holding two walls together and supporting the superstructure, so Christ unites Jew and Gentile, and is the support of the Church. The additional thought of 1 P 2<sup>6</sup> can be without violence derived from the same figure. As one recklessly turning the corner of a building may stumble over the corner-stone, so, while some find in Christ their support, others stumble at Him and perish. (Cf. Alford and Ellicott on Eph 2<sup>20</sup>.) For various superstitions and religious rites connected with the corner-stone, comp. Trumbull, Threshold Covenant, 22, 51, 55, and see FOUNDATION.

CORNET.—See MUSIC.

CORONATION.—Only 2 Mac 4<sup>21</sup> 'the coronation of king Ptolemaeus Philometor,' AVm 'enthronizing' (Rawlinson in Speaker's Com. 'enthronization'), RV 'enthronement.'

The Greek τὰ πρωτοκλίσια is found only here, and its meaning is doubtful. It has been identified, as by Bissell in loc., with πρωτοκλίσια, the 'chief seat' (AV 'highest room') at a feast, which occurs Mt 23<sup>6</sup>, Mk 12<sup>39</sup>, Lk 20<sup>46</sup>, and Lk 14<sup>7</sup>; elsewhere only in eccles. writers. But cod. A. (fol. by Swete) has πρωτοκλήσια in our passage, 'a first assembly,' whence Luther's ersten Reichstag. J. HASTINGS.

CORPSE, from Lat. corpus, is in earliest Eng. a body, living* or dead, and is so found as late as 1707. Hence 'dead corpses,' 2 K 19<sup>35</sup> = Is 37<sup>36</sup>, as in Fuller, Holy War, iv. 27, 'the cruditie of a dead corpse.' RV retains 'dead corpses' because of the Heb. (מֵתִים מְרֵימִים) of which it is a literal translation.

CORRECT, CORRECTION.—Both vb. and subst. are used in the (nearly) obsol. sense of chastisement, and it is doubtful if in any other. Thus Jer 10<sup>24</sup> 'O LORD, correct me, but with judgment; not in thine anger, lest thou bring me to nothing'; and Sir 16<sup>12</sup> 'As his mercy is great, so is his correction also' (ἐλεγχος). In Job 37<sup>13</sup> the Heb. is 'a rod' (מִדָּה) as it is tr<sup>d</sup> in 21<sup>9</sup>. The Heb., however, is generally מִדָּה mīḡār (or vb. דָּרַס), a word very characteristic of Pr, in AV most freq. tr<sup>d</sup> 'instruction,' but RV prefers 'correction,' though not consistently. In He 12<sup>9</sup> παιδεύεις is tr<sup>d</sup> by a verb, AV 'which corrected us,' RV 'to chasten us' (as the vb. παιδεύω is tr<sup>d</sup> in v.<sup>10</sup>); but the same word is rendered in Ro 2<sup>20</sup> AV 'an instructor,' RV 'a corrector.' In 2 Ti 3<sup>16</sup> Scripture is said to be profitable for 'correction.' The Eng. word prob. means 'chastening' (if not 'chastisement,' Wyclif has 'to chastise'), and this is prob. the meaning of the Gr. ἐπανόρθωσις, which occurs only here in NT, though in the classics it is common for 'amendment.'

CORRUPT.—In older English 'corrupt' (and its derivatives) had the meaning of destroy, consume, and in that sense, not in the sense of taint, it is most freq. in AV. Thus Mt 6<sup>19</sup> 'where moth and rust doth corrupt' (ἀφαιλεῖ, 'causes to disappear,' RV 'doth consume'); Lk 12<sup>28</sup> 'neither moth corrupteth' (διαφθείρει, RV 'destroyeth'); Ja 5<sup>2</sup> 'Your riches are corrupted' (σέσπτε). Corrupter: Is 14<sup>1</sup> 'children that are corrupters' (RV 'that deal corruptly'), but the Heb. (בְּנֵי מַחֲרִיפִים) means 'sons that deal or act corruptly.' Corrupt as participial adj., Job 17<sup>1</sup> 'My breath is c.' (אֶחָדָה, RV 'my spirit is consumed'); Eph 4<sup>22</sup> 'c. acc. to the deceitful lusts' (φθειρόμενον = 'morally decaying, on the way to final ruin'—Moule). Corruptible: Wis 19<sup>21</sup> 'the flesh of c. living things' (ἐφθάρτων ζώων); Ro 12<sup>8</sup> 'c. man,' i.e. liable to decay, mortal (φθαρτός); 1 Co 9<sup>26</sup> 'a c. crown,' referring to the garland of bay leaves with which the victors in the games were crowned, and which soon went to decay. Corruption: Ps 16<sup>10</sup> 'Neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see c.' (RVm correctly 'the pit,' מַחְלָה, LXX διαφθορά, whence Ac 27<sup>13</sup>); Ro 8<sup>21</sup> 'the bondage of c.' (δουλεία τῆς φθορᾶς, 'the state of subjection or thralldom to dissolution and decay'—Sanday-Headlam, in loc.

There is an obsol. meaning of 'corrupt' = adulterate, of which Oxf. Eng. Dict. has found two examples: Act 23 Elizabeth, c. 8, § 4 (1681), 'Every Person and Persons that shall corrupt the Honny . . . with any deceptfull mixture, shall forfeite the Barrell'; and Vinea Penal Laws, 244 (1697), 'If any . . . Vintners shall Corrupt or Adulterate any Wine.' Of this rare usage there is an instance in AV, 2 Co 21<sup>7</sup>. For we are not as many, which corrupt the word of God.' This tr<sup>d</sup> is a change from that of the Rheims Bible 'adulterating,' which again resembles Wyclif's 'for we ben not as many that don avouterie (=adultery) bi the word of god.' The Gr. verb (ἀναμύλλω from ἀμύλλω, a vintner, huckster, Is 22, Sir 26<sup>29</sup>) signifies to make money by trading, esp. by trading basely in anything; and some prefer that more common meaning here; hence Tindale's tr<sup>d</sup> 'many . . . which choppe and chaunge with the word of God,' foll<sup>d</sup> by Cranmer. But as such hucksters sought to increase their gain by adulterating their goods (the reference is esp. to wine) the word came to mean 'adulterate,' and is taken in that sense by most here.

In 2 K 23<sup>18</sup> the Mount of Olives is called, on account of the 'high places' which Solomon built * T. Adams (quoted by Davies, Bible English, p. 161) speaks of those to whom 'orchards, fishponds, parks, warrens, and whatsoever may yield pleasurable stuffing to the corpse, is a very heaven upon earth.'—Sermons (Pur. Divines), i. 276.

there, or, rather, turned to idolatrous uses, 'the mount of corruption' (LXXm 'destruction'; Heb. מֶלֶךְ הַמָּוֶת, LXX τὸ ὄρος τοῦ Μορδοῦ, Vulg. mons offensionis, whence the name of a part of Olivet in later Christian writings 'Mount of Offence.' See OLIVES, MOUNT OF.

CORRUPTION (usual rendering of φθῶ, διαφθορά, φθορά) has in OT only a literal and physical meaning, though the verb is also emblematical and moral (Gn 6<sup>11</sup>, Jg 2<sup>9</sup>, Dn 2<sup>9</sup>). In profane Gr. both φθορά and διαφθορά bear the physico-moral sense of sensual corruption (Xen. Apol. 19; Plut. 2. 712c); and διαφθορά, the more strictly moral corruption of bribery (Arist. Rhet. i. 12. 8). Both the verbs are used of bribery and also of the degradation of the judgment (Aesch. Ag. 932), the preference being, both in class. Greek and in LXX, for διαφθεῖν in the moral region. In NT διαφθορά (six times) denotes only physical decomposition and decay (Ac 2<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>34-37</sup>), while φθορά stands in 2 P 14<sup>212</sup>, Jude 10, Gal 6<sup>8</sup>, Ro 8<sup>21</sup>, for the natural decay of the world, the unreasoning animals, or the flesh, as emblematic of the immoral, sin being behind the decomposition of the natural body and nature generally (2 P 14, Ro 8<sup>21</sup>; cf. Gn 3<sup>17-18</sup>), fettering free development and keeping the creation in slavery (Ro 8<sup>21</sup>). Both verbs (with a balance in favour of φθεῖν) are used morally without any medium of metaphor (1 Ti 6<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>58</sup>, Rev 19<sup>2</sup>, Jude 10, 2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>). In Gal 6<sup>8</sup> (of the flesh reap φθοράν . . . of the spirit reap ζωὴν αἰώνιον) φθορά is antithetical to eternal life and all that is therein contained. But while φθορά in this connexion includes the moral death, which is the lowest depth of moral deterioration and decay, and the kindred verbs mean not only to make worse, but also to destroy (διαφθεῖν in NT only in two passages, Rev 8<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>; φθεῖν perhaps in three, 1 Co 3<sup>17</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>12</sup>, Jude 10), there is nothing in NT usage which involves the substitution of annihilation, literal destruction of spirit, for the continuation of the miserable and penal existence which, according to later OT ideas and the more definite Jewish views in NT times, was the destiny of the wicked after the death of the body. (Cf. for the general misery of after existence, Job 14<sup>22</sup>; penal for the wicked, Ps 91<sup>7</sup>; the righteous rescued from it, Ps 16<sup>10</sup>; climax for both in resurrection, Dn 12<sup>2</sup>; Jewish idea of Hades in NT times, Lk 16<sup>28</sup>, Ps-Sol 14<sup>9</sup> 15<sup>11</sup> 16<sup>2</sup>, Enoch 63<sup>10</sup>. In the Talm., Sheol has become synonymous with Gehenna. Weber, L.d.T. 326<sup>7</sup>. Charles, Enoch, p. 69.) The corrupted state of the moral functions, brought to a kind of completion (cf. perfect participle διεφθαρμένοι), may be already reached in this life (1 Ti 6<sup>9</sup>; cf. 2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>12</sup>, Eph 4<sup>22</sup>).

COS (Κῶς).—An island off the Carian coast, nearly blocking the entrance to the Ceramic gulf, very fertile (producing ointments, wheat, wines, and, above all, silk), famous for its rich and comfortable country life and the beauty and character of its people, with a city of the same name at its eastern end. It was one of the six Dorian colonies. Its famous temple of Æsculapius was the centre of one of the oldest and greatest medical schools in Greece, adorned especially by the genius of Hippocrates in the 5th century. Amid the busy and frequent trade and intercourse between the Ægean cities and the Syrian and Egypt. coasts, which existed for many centuries after the time of Alexander the Great (336-321), C., which lay on the path of all ships engaged in that trade, S. of Miletus and Samos, and N. of Rhodes (Ac 21<sup>1</sup>; Lucan, viii. 243 f.; Livy, xxxvii. 16), became a place of great importance and wealth. In the 3rd cent. C. clung closely to the Egypt. kings; but in the 2nd cent. it was a good deal under the influence of Rhodes, and like it a staunch ally of Rome. It is uncertain whether C. was incorporated in the Rom. province Asia in B.C. 129 along with the rest of Caria (which see); it had always the dignity of a free city (see Cnidos) as a reward for its faithful alliance; and this perhaps implied a position of approximate autonomy until the time of Augustus, when C. became definitely a part of the province (after the death or deposition of the tyrant Nicias). It suffered from earthquakes in B.C. 6, under Pius (A.D. 138-161), and in A.D. 554 (Agathias, p. 98, gives a vivid description of the latter). There is a famous plane tree of great size and age in the square of the modern city, declared by tradition to be over 2000 years old.

From its Syrian and Alexandrian trading connexion, C. was one of the great Jewish centres in the Aegean. In B.C. 139-138 the Romans wrote to its government in favour of the Jews (1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup>; see CARIA). The position of C. naturally made it one of the great banking and financial centres of the E. commercial world; and the treasure of Cleopatra, which Mithridates seized in B.C. 87, is thought by Rayet to have been deposited with the Jewish bankers of C., as certainly were the 800 talents (£192,000) belonging to Jews of Asia Minor, which Mithridates also seized there (Jos. Ant. XIV. vii. 2). In B.C. 49, C. Fannius, governor of the province Asia, wrote to the Coans urging them to observe the decree of the Rom. Senate,* and provide for the safe passage of Jewish pilgrims through C. (which lay on their route) to Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 15). The poet Meleager, who lived in C. in that century, complains that his mistress deserted him for a Jewish lover (Ep. 83, Anthol. Gr. v. 160). Herod the Great was a benefactor of the Coans; and the inscription of a statue to his son Herod the Tetrarch has been found at Cos.

LITERATURE.—Strabo, p. 657f. The latest and best account is by Paton and Hicks, Inscriptions of Cos; Rayet, Mémoire sur l'île de Kos (extr. des archives des missions, iii. 3); Dubois, De Cos insula; Ross, Reisen nach Kos, u.s.w., and his Reisen auf den griech. Inseln, ii. pp. 86-92, iii. pp. 126-139, are also useful. A list of other works is given, Paton-Hicks, p. ix.

COSAM (Κωσάμ).—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3<sup>29</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

COSMOGONY.—I. Two cosmogonies or narratives of creation confront us in the opening chapters of the Bible. The first, contained in the first chapter of the Book of Genesis, is a part of the document P, belonging to the early post-exilic period; while the second, contained in Gn 2<sup>4b-7</sup>, forms the introduction to the Jahwistic document (J), redacted in the pre-exilic period, and therefore earlier than the first.

(A) THE FIRST CREATION NARRATIVE.—The writer† of the opening chapter of the Book of Genesis (Gn 1<sup>1-24</sup>) set before himself the task of giving a comprehensive survey of the origins of Israel's history. 'It was his purpose to show that the theocracy which became historically realized in Israel as hierarchy was the end and aim of the creation of the world' (Holzinger). To his consciousness Israel and Israel's sacerdotal institutions stand central to the great movement of history, and he consistently works out this grandiose conception to its ultimate origins. Accordingly, he unfolds the narrative in successive gradations, the scope of which narrows from the universal to the particular as it passes from heaven and earth to Adam, from Adam to Noah, from Noah to Abraham, and, lastly, from Abraham to Israel and his descendants. Beginning each section we find an enumeration of Tôledôth or 'generations.' First we have the Tôledôth of the universe (heaven and earth) of which God is the Creator, then of man (Adam), then of Noah, then of Abraham. We are here concerned only with the first of the series, which deals with the pre-human stages in the drama of the world.

The following is a brief summary of the First Creation Story. The week of seven days forms a calendar into which the different successive stages of the work of creation are divided. The creation of man forms the climax and conclusion of the work on the sixth day, while the close of the narrative describes the seventh or day of rest, when "J" ceased from His creation-work.
